It is true that such an agency is in many respects convenient to the Treasury, but it is not indispensable. A limitation of the expenses of the Government to its actual wants, and of the revenue to those expenses, with convenient means for its prompt application to the purposes for which it was raised, are the objects which we should seek to accomplish. The collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, can, it is believed, be well managed by officers of the Government. Its collection, and, to a great extent, its disbursement also, have indeed been hitherto conducted solely by them; neither national nor State banks, when employed, being required to do more than keep it safely while in their custody, and transfer and pay it in such portions and at such times as the Treasury shall direct.

Surely banks are not more able than the Government to secure the money in their possession against accident, violence, or fraud. The assertion that they are so, must assume that a vault in a bank is stronger than a vault in the Treasury; and that directors, cashiers, and clerks, not selected by the Government, nor under its control, are more worthy of confidence than officers selected from the people and responsible to the Government; officers bound by official oaths and bonds for a faithful performance of their duties, and constantly subject to the supervision of Congress.

The difficulties of transfer, and the aid heretofore rendered by banks, have been less than is usually supposed. The actual accounts show that by far the larger portion of payments is made within short or convenient distances from the places of collection; and the whole number of warrants issued at the Treasury in the year 1834—a year the results of which will, it is believed, afford a safe test for the future—fell short of five thousand, or an average of less than one daily for each State; in the city of New York they did not average more than two a day, and at the city of Washington, only four.

The difficulties heretofore existing are, moreover, daily lessened by an increase in the cheapness and facility of communication; and it may be asserted with confidence, that the necessary transfers, as well as the safe-keeping and disbursements of the public moneys, can be with safety and convenience accomplished through the agencies of Treasury officers. The opinion has been, in some degree, confirmed by actual experience since the discontinuance of the banks as fiscal agents, in May last; a period which, from the embarrassments in commercial intercourse, presented obstacles as great as any which may be hereafter apprehended.

The manner of keeping the public money since that period is fully stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. That officer also suggests the propriety of assigning, by law, certain additional duties to existing establishments and officers, which, with the modifications and safeguards referred to by him, will, he thinks, enable the Department to continue to perform this branch of the public service, without any material addition either to their number or to the present expense. The extent of the business to be transacted has already been stated; and in respect to the amount of money with which the officers employed would be intrusted at any one time, it appears that, assuming a balance of five millions to be at all times kept in the Treasury, and the whole of it left in the hands of the collectors and receivers, the proportion of each would not exceed an average of thirty thousand dollars; but that, deducting one million for the use of the mint, and assuming the remaining four millions to be in the hands of one-half of the present number of officers—a supposition deemed more likely to correspond with the fact—the sum in the hands of each would still be less than the amount of most of the bonds now taken from the receivers of public money. Every apprehension, however, on the subject, either in respect to the safety of the money, or the faithful discharge of these fiscal transactions, may, it appears to me, be effectually removed by adding to the present means of the Treasury the establishment by law, at a few important points, of offices for the deposit and disbursement of such portions of the public revenue as cannot, with obvious safety and convenience, be left in the possession of the collecting officers until paid over by them to the public creditors. Neither the amounts retained in their hands nor those deposited in the offices, would, in an ordinary condition of the revenue, be larger in most cases than those often under the control of disbursing officers of the army and navy, and might be made entirely safe, by requiring such securities, and exercising such controlling supervision, as Congress may by law prescribe. The principal officers whose appointments would become necessary under this plan, taking the largest number suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, would not exceed ten; nor the additional expenses, at the same estimate, sixty thousand dollars a year.

There can be no doubt of the obligation of those who are intrusted with the affairs of Government, to conduct them with as little cost to the nation as is consistent with the public interest; and it is for Congress, and ultimately for the people, to decide whether the benefits to be derived from keeping our fiscal concerns apart and severing the connection which has hitherto existed between the Government and banks, offer sufficient advantages to justify the necessary expenses. If the object to be accomplished is deemed important to the future welfare of the country, I cannot allow myself to believe that the addition to the public expenditure of comparatively so small an amount as will be necessary to effect it, will be objected to by the people.

It will be seen by the report of the Postmaster General, herewith communicated, that the fiscal affairs of that Department have been successfully conducted since May last upon the principle of dealing only in the legal currency of the United States, and that it needs no legislation to maintain its credit, and facilitate the management of its concerns; the existing laws being, in the opinion of that officer, ample for those objects.

Difficulties will doubtless be encountered for a season, and increased services required from the public functionaries; such are usually incident to the commencement of every system, but they will be greatly lessened in the progress of its operations.

The power and influence supposed to be connected with the custody and disbursement of the public money, are topics on which the public mind is naturally, and with great propriety, peculiarly sensitive. Much has been said on them, in reference to the proposed separation of the Government from the banking institutions; and surely no one can object to any appeals or animadversions on the subject, which are consistent with facts, and evince a proper respect for the intelligence of the people. If a Chief Magistrate may be allowed to speak for himself on such a point, I can truly say, that to me nothing would be more acceptable than the withdrawal from the Executive, to the greatest practicable extent, of all concern in the custody and disbursement of the public revenue; not that I would shrink from any responsibility cast upon me by the duties of my office, but because it is my firm belief that its capacity for usefulness is in no degree promoted by the possession of any patronage not actually necessary to the performance of those duties. But under our present form of Government, the intervention of the executive officers in the custody and disbursement of the public money seems to be unavoidable; and before it can be admitted that the influence and power of the Executive would be increased by dispensing with the agency of banks, the nature of that intervention in such an agency must be carefully regarded, and a comparison must be instituted between its extent in the two cases.

The revenue can only be collected by officers appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The public moneys, in the first instance, must, therefore, in all cases, pass through hands selected by the Executive. Other officers appointed in the same way, or, as in some cases, by the President alone, must also be intrusted with them when drawn for the purpose of disbursement. It is thus seen that even when banks are employed, the public funds must twice pass through the hands of Executive officers. Besides this, the head of the Treasury Department, who also holds office at the pleasure of the President, and some other officers of the same department, must necessarily be invested with more or less power in the selection, continuance, and supervision of the banks that may be employed. The question is then narrowed to the single point, whether, in the intermediate stage between the collection and disbursement of the public money, the agency of banks is necessary to avoid a dangerous extension of the patronage and influence of the Executive? But is it clear that the connection of the Executive with powerful moneyed institutions, capable of ministering to the interests of men in points where they are most accessible to corruption, is less liable to abuse, than his constitutional agency in the appointment and control of the few public officers required by the proposed plan? Will the public money, when in their hands, be necessarily exposed to any improper interference on the part of the Executive? May it not be hoped that a prudent fear of public jealousy and disapprobation, in a matter so peculiarly exposed to them, will deter him from any such interference, even if higher motives be found inoperative? May not Congress so regulate by law the duty of those officers, and subject it to such supervision and publicity, as to prevent the possibility of any serious abuse on the part of the Executive? and is there equal room for such supervision and publicity in a connection with banks, acting under the shield of corporate immunities, and conducted by persons irresponsible to the Government and the people? It is believed that a considerate and candid investigation of these questions will result in the conviction that the proposed plan is far less liable to objection, on the score of Executive patronage and control, than any bank agency that has been, or can be, devised.

With these views, I leave to Congress the measures necessary to regulate, in the present emergency, the safe-keeping and transfer of the public moneys. In the performance of constitutional duty, I have stated to them, without reserve, the result of my own reflections. The subject is of great importance, and one on which we can scarcely expect to be as united in sentiment as we are in interest. It deserves a full and free discussion, and cannot fail to be benefited by a dispassionate comparison of opinions. Well aware myself of the duty of reciprocal concession among the co-ordinate branches of the Government, I can promise a reasonable spirit of co-operation, so far as it can be indulged in without the surrender of constitutional objections, which I believe to be well founded. Any system that may be adopted should be subjected to the fullest legal provision, so as to leave nothing to the Executive but what is necessary to the discharge of the duties imposed on him; and whatever plan may be ultimately established, my own part shall be so discharged as to give to it a fair trial, and the best prospect of success.

The character of the funds to be received and disbursed in the transactions of the Government, likewise demands your most careful consideration.

There can be no doubt that those who framed and adopted the constitution, having in immediate view the depreciated paper of the confederacy—of which five hundred dollars in paper were, at times, only equal to one dollar in coin—intended to prevent the recurrence of similar evils, so far at least as related to the transactions of the new Government. They gave to Congress express powers to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin; they refused to give it power to establish corporations—the agents then, as now, chiefly employed to create a paper currency; they prohibited the States from making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts; and the first Congress directed, by positive law, that the revenue should be received in nothing but gold and silver.

Public exigency at the outset of the Government, without direct legislative authority, led to the use of banks as fiscal aids to the Treasury. In admitted deviation from the law, at the same period, and under the same exigency, the Secretary of the Treasury received their notes in payment of duties. The sole ground on which the practice, thus commenced, was then, or has since been justified, is the certain, immediate, and convenient exchange of such notes for specie. The Government did indeed receive the inconvertible notes of State banks during the difficulties of war; and the community submitted without a murmur to the unequal taxation and multiplied evils of which such a course was productive. With the war, this indulgence ceased; and the banks were obliged again to redeem their notes in gold and silver. The Treasury, in accordance with previous practice, continued to dispense with the currency required by the act of 1789, and took the notes of banks, in full confidence of their being paid in specie on demand; and Congress, to guard against the slightest violation of this principle, have declared, by law, that if notes are paid in the transactions of the Government, it must be under such circumstances as to enable the holder to convert them into specie without depreciation or delay.

Of my own duties under the existing laws, when the banks suspended specie payments, I could not doubt. Directions were immediately given to prevent the reception into the Treasury of any thing but gold and silver or its equivalent; and every practicable arrangement was made to preserve the public faith by similar or equivalent payments to the public creditors. The revenue from lands had been for some time substantially so collected, under the order issued by the directions of my predecessor. The effects of that order had been so salutary, and its forecast in regard to the increasing insecurity of bank paper had become so apparent, that, even before the catastrophe, I had resolved not to interfere with its operation. Congress is now to decide whether the revenue shall continue to be so collected or not.

The receipts into the Treasury of bank notes not redeemed in specie on demand, will not, I presume, be sanctioned. It would destroy, without the excuse of war or public distress, that equality of imports, and identity of commercial regulation, which lie at the foundation of our confederacy, and would offer to each State a direct temptation to increase its foreign trade by depreciating the currency received for duties in its ports. Such a proceeding would also, in a great degree, frustrate the policy, so highly cherished, of infusing into our circulation a larger proportion of the precious metals; a policy the wisdom of which none can doubt, though there may be different opinions as to the extent to which it should be carried. Its results have been already too auspicious, and its success is too closely interwoven with the future prosperity of the country, to permit us for a moment to contemplate its abandonment. We have seen, under its influence, our specie augmented beyond eighty millions; our coinage increased so as to make that of gold amount, between August, 1834, and December, 1836, to ten millions of dollars; exceeding the whole coinage at the mint during the thirty-one previous years. The prospect of further improvement continued without abatement until the moment of the suspension of specie payments. This policy has now, indeed, been suddenly checked, but is still far from being overthrown. Amidst all conflicting theories, one position is undeniable: the precious metals will invariably disappear when there ceases to be a necessity for their use as a circulating medium. It was in strict accordance with this truth, that whilst, in the month of May last, they were everywhere seen, and were current for all ordinary purposes, they disappeared from circulation the moment the payment of specie was refused by the banks, and the community tacitly agreed to dispense with its employment. Their place was supplied by a currency exclusively of paper, and, in many cases, of the worst description. Already are the bank notes now in circulation greatly depreciated, and they fluctuate in value between one place and another; thus diminishing and making uncertain the worth of property and the price of labor, and failing to subserve, except at a heavy loss, the purposes of business. With each succeeding day the metallic currency decreases; by some it is hoarded in the natural fear that, once parted with, it cannot be replaced; while by others it is diverted from its more legitimate uses, for the sake of gain. Should Congress sanction this condition of things, by making irredeemable paper money receivable in payment of public dues, a temporary check to a wise and salutary policy will, in all probability, be converted into its absolute destruction.

It is true that bank notes actually convertible into specie may be received in payment of the revenue, without being liable to all these objections, and that such a course may, to some extent, promote individual convenience; an object always to be considered where it does not conflict with the principles of our Government or the general welfare of the country. If such notes only were received, and always under circumstances allowing their early presentation for payment, and if, at short and fixed periods, they were converted into specie, to be kept by the officers of the Treasury, some of the most serious obstacles to their reception would perhaps be removed. To retain the notes in the Treasury would be to renew, under another form, the loans of public money to the banks, and the evils consequent thereon.

It is, however, a mistaken impression, that any large amount of specie is required for public payments. Of the seventy or eighty millions now estimated to be in the country, ten millions would be abundantly sufficient for that purpose, provided an accumulation of a large amount of revenue, beyond the necessary wants of the Government, be hereafter prevented. If to these considerations be added the facilities which will arise from enabling the Treasury to satisfy the public creditors, by its drafts or notes received in payment of the public dues, it may be safely assumed that no motive of convenience to the citizen requires the reception of bank paper.

To say that the refusal of paper money by the Government introduces an unjust discrimination between the currency received by it, and that used by individuals in their ordinary affairs, is, in my judgment, to view it in a very erroneous light. The constitution prohibits the States from making any thing but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts, and thus secures to every citizen a right to demand payment in the legal currency. To provide by law that the Government will only receive its dues in gold and silver, is not to confer on it any peculiar privilege, but merely to place it on an equality with the citizen, by reserving to it a right secured to him by the constitution. It is doubtless for this reason that the principle has been sanctioned by successive laws, from the time of the first Congress under the constitution down to the last. Such precedents, never objected to, and proceeding from such sources, afford a decisive answer to the imputation of inequality or injustice.

But, in fact, the measure is one of restriction, not of favor. To forbid the public agent to receive in payment any other than a certain kind of money, is to refuse him a discretion possessed by every citizen. It may be left to those who have the management of their own transactions, to make their own terms; but no such discretion should be given to him who acts merely as an agent of the people, who is to collect what the law requires, and to pay the appropriations it makes. When bank notes are redeemed on demand, there is then no discrimination in reality, for the individual who receives them may, at his option, substitute the specie for them; he takes them from convenience or choice. When they are not so redeemed, it will scarcely be contended that their receipt and payment, by a public officer, should be permitted, though none deny that right to an individual; if it were, the effect would be most injurious to the public, since their officer could make none of those arrangements to meet or guard against the depreciation, which an individual is at liberty to do. Nor can inconvenience to the community be alleged as an objection to such a regulation. Its object and motive are their convenience and welfare.

If, at a moment of simultaneous and unexpected suspension, by the banks, it adds something to the many embarrassments of that proceeding, yet these are far overbalanced by its direct tendency to produce a wider circulation of gold and silver, to increase the safety of bank paper, to improve the general currency, and thus to prevent altogether such occurrences, and the other and far greater evils that attend them.

It may, indeed, be questioned, whether it is not for the interest of the banks themselves that the Government should not receive their paper. They would be conducted with more caution, and on sounder principles. By using specie only in its transactions, the Government would create a demand for it, which would, to a great extent, prevent its exportation, and, by keeping it in circulation, maintain a broader and safer basis for the paper currency. That the banks would thus be rendered more sound, and the community more safe, cannot admit of a doubt.

The foregoing views, it seems to me, do but fairly carry out the provisions of the federal constitution in relation to the currency, as far as relates to the public revenue. At the time that instrument was framed, there were but three or four banks in the United States; and had the extension of the banking system, and the evils growing out of it, been foreseen, they would probably have been specially guarded against. The same policy which led to the prohibition of bills of credit by the States, would, doubtless, in that event, have also interdicted their issue as a currency in any other form. The constitution, however, contains no such prohibition; and, since the States have exercised for nearly half a century the power to regulate the business of banking, it is not to be expected that it will be abandoned. The whole matter is now under discussion before the proper tribunal—the people of the States. Never before has the public mind been so thoroughly awakened to a proper sense of its importance; never has the subject, in all its bearings, been submitted to so searching an inquiry. It would be distrusting the intelligence and virtue of the people to doubt the speedy and efficient adoption of such measures of reform as the public good demands. All that can rightfully be done by the federal Government to promote the accomplishment of that important object, will, without doubt, be performed.

In the mean time, it is our duty to provide all the remedies against a depreciated paper currency which the constitution enables us to afford. The Treasury Department, on several former occasions, has suggested the propriety and importance of a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations, and other bankers. Through the instrumentality of such a law, a salutary check may doubtless be imposed on the issues of paper money, and an effectual remedy given to the citizen in a way at once equal in all parts of the Union, and fully authorized by the constitution.

The indulgence granted by executive authority in the payment of bonds for duties has been already mentioned. Seeing that the immediate enforcement of these obligations would subject a large and highly respectable portion of our citizens to great sacrifices, and believing that a temporary postponement could be made without detriment to other interests, and with increased certainty of ultimate payment, I did not hesitate to comply with the request that was made of me. The terms allowed are, to the full extent, as liberal as any that are to be found in the practice of the Executive Department. It remains for Congress to decide whether a further postponement may not with propriety be allowed; and, if so, their legislation upon the subject is respectfully invited.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury will exhibit the condition of these debts; the extent and effect of the present indulgence; the probable result of its further extension on the state of the Treasury; and every other fact necessary to a full consideration of the subject. Similar information is communicated in regard to such depositories of the public moneys as are indebted to the Government, in order that Congress may also adopt the proper measures in regard to them.

The President's Message.

The receipts and expenditures for the first half of the year, and an estimate of those for the residue, will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury. In his report of December last, it was estimated that the current receipts would fall short of the expenditures by about three millions of dollars. It will be seen that the difference will be much greater. This is to be attributed not only to the occurrence of greater pecuniary embarrassments in the business of the country than those which were then predicted, and, consequently, a greater diminution in the revenue, but also to the fact that the appropriations exceeded, by nearly six millions, the amount which was asked for in the estimates then submitted. The sum necessary for the service of the year, beyond the probable receipts, and the amount which it was intended should be reserved in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, will be about six millions. If the whole of the reserved balance be not at once applied to the current expenditures, but four millions be still kept in the Treasury, as seems most expedient, for the uses of the mint, and to meet contingencies, the sum needed will be ten millions.

In making this estimate, the receipts are calculated on the supposition of some further extension of the indulgence granted in the payment of bonds for duties, which will affect the amount of the revenue for the present year to the extent of two and a half millions.

It is not proposed to procure the required amount by loans or increased taxation. There are now in the Treasury nine millions three hundred and sixty-seven thousand two hundred and fourteen dollars, directed by the act of the 23d of June, 1836, to be deposited with the States in October next. This sum, if so deposited, will be subject, under the law, to be recalled, if needed, to defray existing appropriations; and as it is now evident that the whole, or the principal part of it, will be wanted for that purpose, it appears most proper that the deposit should be withheld. Until the amount can be collected from the banks, Treasury notes may be temporarily issued, to be gradually redeemed as it is received.

I am aware that this course may be productive of inconvenience to many of the States. Relying upon the acts of Congress which held out to them the strong probability, if not the certainty, of receiving this instalment, they have in some instances adopted measures with which its retention may seriously interfere. That such a condition of things should have occurred, is much to be regretted. It is not the least among the unfortunate results of the disasters of the times, and it is for Congress to devise a fit remedy, if there be one. The money being indispensable to the wants of the Treasury, it is difficult to conceive upon what principle of justice or expediency its application to that object can be avoided. To recall any portions of the sums already deposited with the States, would be more inconvenient and less efficient. To burden the country with increased taxation, when there is in fact a large surplus revenue, would be unjust and unwise; to raise moneys by loans under such circumstances, and thus to commence a new national debt, would scarcely be sanctioned by the American people.

The plan proposed will be adequate to all our fiscal operations, during the remainder of the year. Should it be adopted, the Treasury, aided by the ample resources of the country, will be able to discharge, punctually, every pecuniary obligation. For the future, all that is needed will be that caution and forbearance in appropriations which the diminution of the revenue requires, and which the complete accomplishment or great forwardness of many expensive national undertakings renders equally consistent with prudence and patriotic liberality.

The preceding suggestions and recommendations are submitted, in the belief that their adoption by Congress will enable the Executive Department to conduct our fiscal concerns with success, so far as their management has been committed to it. Whilst the objects, and the means proposed to attain them, are within its constitutional powers and appropriate duties, they will at the same time, it is hoped, by their necessary operation, afford essential aid in the transaction of individual concerns, and thus yield relief to the people at large in a form adapted to the nature of our Government. Those who look to the action of this Government for specific aid to the citizens to relieve embarrassments arising from losses by revulsions in commerce and credit, lose sight of the ends for which it was created, and the powers with which it is clothed. It was established to give security to us all, in our lawful and honorable pursuits, under the lasting safeguard of republican institutions. It was not intended to confer special favors on individuals, or on any classes of them; to create systems of agriculture, manufactures, or trade; or to engage in them, either separately or in connection with individual citizens or organized associations. If its operations were to be directed for the benefit of any one class, equivalent favors must, in justice, be extended to the rest; and the attempt to bestow such favors with an equal hand, or even to select those who should most deserve them, would never be successful. All communities are apt to look to Government for too much. Even in our own country, where its powers and duties are so strictly limited, we are prone to do so, especially at periods of sudden embarrassments and distress. But this ought not to be. The framers of our excellent constitution, and the people who approved it with calm and sagacious deliberation, acted at the time on a sounder principle. They wisely judged that the less Government interferes with private pursuits, the better for general prosperity. It is not its legitimate object to make men rich, or to repair, by direct grants of money or legislation in favor of particular pursuits, losses not incurred in the public service. This would be substantially to use the property of some for the benefit of others. But its real duty—that duty the performance of which makes a good Government the most precious of human blessings—is to enact and enforce a system of general laws commensurate with, but not exceeding, the objects of its establishment, and to leave every citizen and every interest to reap, under its benign protection, the rewards of virtue, industry, and prudence.

I cannot doubt that on this, as on all similar occasions, the Federal Government will find its agency most conducive to the security and happiness of the people, when limited to the exercise of its conceded powers. In never assuming, even for a well-meant object, such powers as were not designed to be conferred upon it, we shall in reality do most for the general welfare. To avoid every unnecessary interference with the pursuits of the citizen, will result in more benefit than to adopt measures which could only assist limited interests, and are eagerly, but perhaps naturally, sought for, under the pressure of temporary circumstances. If, therefore, I refrain from suggesting to Congress any specific plan for regulating the exchanges of the country, relieving mercantile embarrassments, or interfering with the ordinary operations of foreign or domestic commerce, it is from a conviction that such measures are not within the constitutional province of the General Government, and that their adoption would not promote the real and permanent welfare of those they might be designed to aid.

The difficulties and distresses of the times, though unquestionably great, are limited in their extent, and cannot be regarded as affecting the permanent prosperity of the nation. Arising, in a great degree, from the transactions of foreign and domestic commerce, it is upon them that they have chiefly fallen. The great agricultural interest has, in many parts of the country, suffered comparatively little; and, as if Providence intended to display the munificence of its goodness at the moment of our greatest need, and in direct contrast to the evils occasioned by the waywardness of man, we have been blessed throughout our extended territory with a season of general health and of uncommon fruitfulness. The proceeds of our great staples will soon furnish the means of liquidating debts at home and abroad, and contribute equally to the revival of commercial activity, and the restoration of commercial credit. The banks, established avowedly for its support, deriving their profits from it, and resting under obligations to it which cannot be overlooked, will feel at once the necessity and justice of uniting their energies with those of the mercantile interest. The suspension of specie payments, at such a time and under such circumstances as we have lately witnessed, could not be other than a temporary measure; and we can scarcely err in believing that the period must soon arrive when all that are solvent will redeem their issues in gold and silver. Dealings abroad naturally depend on resources and prosperity at home. If the debt of our merchants has accumulated, or their credit is impaired, these are fluctuations always incident to extensive or extravagant mercantile transactions. But the ultimate security of such obligations does not admit of question. They are guaranteed by the resources of a country, the fruits of whose industry afford abundant means of ample liquidation, and by the evident interest of every merchant to sustain a credit, hitherto high, by promptly applying these means for its preservation.

I deeply regret that events have occurred which require me to ask your consideration of such serious topics. I could have wished that, in making my first communication to the assembled Representatives of my country, I had nothing to dwell upon but the history of her unalloyed prosperity. Since it is otherwise, we can only feel more deeply the responsibility of the respective trusts that have been confided to us, and, under the pressure of difficulties, unite in invoking the guidance and aid of the Supreme Ruler of nations, and in laboring with zealous resolution to overcome the difficulties by which we are environed.

It is, under such circumstances, a high gratification to know, by long experience, that we act for a people to whom the truth, however unpromising, can always be spoken with safety; for the trial of whose patriotism no emergency is too severe, and who are sure never to desert a public functionary honestly laboring for the public good. It seems just that they should receive, without delay, any aid in their embarrassments which your deliberations can afford. Coming directly from the midst of them, and knowing the course of events in every section of our country, from you may best be learned as well the extent and nature of these embarrassments, as the most desirable measures of relief.

I am aware, however, that it is not proper to detain you, at present, longer than may be demanded by the special objects for which you are convened. To them, therefore, I have confined my communication; and, believing it will not be your own wish now to extend your deliberations beyond them, I reserve till the usual period of your annual meeting that general information on the state of the Union which the constitution requires me to give.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 4, 1837.

Mr. WRIGHT moved the printing of 5,000 copies of the Message, and 1,500 of the accompanying documents.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he rose to second the motion of the Senator from New York (Mr. WRIGHT) to print an extra number of copies of the Message. He should indeed have no objection to publishing double or triple the number proposed, if it were convenient to distribute them. He had accomplished the sole purpose for which he had risen; but while he was up, he could not forbear saying that, after attentively listening to the reading of this Message, he felt the deepest regret that the President, entertaining such views, and proposing such a plan for the relief of the country, as he had presented, had deemed it his duty to call an extra session of Congress at this inconvenient period of the year.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not rise to express any opinion or to enter into any discussion. "Sufficient for the day," said he, "is the evil thereof." But it was his wish to increase the number of copies to be printed from five thousand to ten. He thought the former number too small for his proportion of it to satisfy the demand of his constituents.

Mr. WRIGHT was ready to accept the proposition as a modification of his original motion, and did so.

The question on printing ten thousand was then put and carried.

MONDAY, September 11.

The CHAIR stated the order of the day to be the election of a Secretary of the Senate; whereupon, the Senate proceeded to ballot for Secretary, and at the first ballot ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., received 39 votes out of 40, and was declared duly elected.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate then proceeded to the election of Chaplain; when, after four ballotings, the number of candidates being twenty-one, the Rev. Mr. SLOER, of the Methodist Church, Georgetown, received a majority of the votes, and was declared duly elected.

Report from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT, chairman of the Committee on Finance, to which was referred that part of the Message of the President of the United States relating to the distribution of the surplus revenue, and other matters, reported a bill for the postponement of the fourth instalment of the deposit to the States till further provision therefor by law. Mr. W. said that, as the time the committee had was but short, he should now merely report the above bill, which he would move to be read a first time, and ordered to a second reading, with a view to take it up to-morrow; when he expected the committee would be able to report further.

Mr. CALHOUN said he hoped this bill would not be pressed so rapidly. It was due to the Senate to have the whole subject before them, and he therefore hoped that this bill would be suffered to rest until it should be seen what other measures the committee might propose.

Mr. WEBSTER said he rose to express a wish that, whether the measures proposed were to be considered separately, or whether they were to be considered all together, they might be considered and decided upon with all the promptness and despatch consistent with considerate legislation.

The bill, as reported by Mr. WRIGHT, was then ordered to a second reading.

Fourth Instalment—Duty Bonds.

The bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States being taken up—

The bill was read a second time, and,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the further consideration of it was postponed till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, September 13.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes. Read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

[This bill authorizes the issue of Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding — millions of dollars, and of denominations not less than $100, and provides that the notes be redeemed by the United States, at the Treasury, after one year from their date, to bear interest for the said term; rate of interest to be fixed by the Secretary, not to exceed six per cent. per annum; the faith of the United States to be solemnly pledged for the redemption of said notes. Also, that the notes be signed by the Treasurer of the United States, and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury; separate accounts of the number signed to be kept by each officer as a mutual check. These officers are by this section also authorized to employ such additional clerks as these duties may render necessary; their salary to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 4th authorizes the Secretary to issue these notes to all creditors of the United States who choose to receive them at par, and also to borrow money on the credit of such notes.

Section 6th enacts that such notes shall everywhere be received in payment of all duties, taxes, &c., and for public lands.

Section 9th makes it felony to counterfeit said notes, and fixes the penalty on conviction.]

Mr. WRIGHT, from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the postponement of the payment of duty bonds. Ordered to a second reading.

[This bill provides that the extension of credit for duties now outstanding shall be six months from the time the original bond became due; and making the condition in each case to depend on the same conditions as to additional security, interest, &c., prescribed by the Treasury Department to the extension of revenue bonds since May; and not to include any bonds where the parties have not given additional security, or made part payment, or are (by the proper officers of the Government) considered insolvent or unsafe security for their bonds.]

Section 2d provides an additional credit of six months granted on all bonds which may be given during the period of one year from and after the 1st of October, 1837. Also, that, where the security in any bond postponed is satisfactory, the principal and sureties shall not be disabled from being the same for other bonds, though the first bond be not yet paid.]

Mr. WRIGHT also reported from the same committee a bill adjusting the remaining claims on the late deposit banks; which was also read, and ordered to a second reading.

[Section 1st provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to withdraw the public moneys remaining in any of the late deposit banks, in as convenient a manner to them as may be suitable to the interests of Government. No bank having met, or which shall meet, the requisitions of the Department, to pay any further interest than that required by the deposit act of 23d June, 1836.]

Section 2d provides that, in case of neglect or refusal on the part of the banks to comply with the requisitions of the Secretary of the Treasury, then such banks shall be sued at law, unless bond with security be given, providing for payment in three instalments: the first instalment after two months from the passage of this act; the second after five months, and the remainder after eight months from the same period; interest being paid at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the time of default, and damages to be paid accruing from protests or other causes.

[SEPTEMBER, 1837]

THURSDAY, September 14.

Financial Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following bills, which were severally read and ordered to a second reading:

1. A bill to authorize goods and merchandise to be deposited in the public stores.

[This bill authorizes the deposit of goods in the public stores, under the requisite precautions, allowing them to be transported to other districts, or to be exported, on certain conditions; to be sold, if requisite, at the end of three years, so far as to pay the duties, storage, and other necessary expenses.]

2. A bill imposing additional duties, as depositaries, in certain cases, on public officers, commonly called the Divorce Bill.

[This bill provides for the receiving and safe-keeping of the public revenue, by the various receiving officers, postmasters, &c., until regularly called for by the Department. The bill contains many details, especially of precaution, to secure the faithfulness of officers having the custody of the public money.]

3. A bill to revoke the charters of such banks in the District of Columbia as shall not resume specie payments in a specified time; and for the suppression of small notes in the District.

[This bill requires the payment of specie on all notes of and under ten dollars, in sixty days from the date of the bill; and on all notes of a larger denomination, in six months. It provides for the appointment of three public commissioners, in case of failure; not interrupting, however, the due course of law. It forbids the issuing of notes under five dollars; and requires that within thirty days all notes of individuals and private corporations, under five dollars, shall be neither issued nor passed, under the penalty of a fine of not more than fifty dollars for each offence—one-half to the prosecutor. The banks to forfeit their charters for non-compliance with the provisions of this bill.]

Fourth Instalment—Duty Bonds.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, the bill to postpone the payment of the fourth instalment of the deposits to the States.

Mr. NILES said: Sir, we have been called here at an extraordinary emergency, when the business of the country was deranged, and the public mind in an unsettled and feverish state; the expectations of the people are excited; the eyes of the whole country are upon us. At such a time, and under such circumstances, Congress cannot remain in session without a prodigious influence for good or for evil; and he greatly feared it would be the latter.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose, and said that the importance of the present crisis and the urgency of this occasion was such as to lead him earnestly to desire that some measures of adequate relief might come from the quarter which alone had the power to effect any thing, by the majority it commanded. Much as I differ from them, (said Mr. W.,) I would be glad to accept any measure of substantial relief which they might bring forward. I think, sir, I see such a necessity for relief as never before, within my recollection, has existed in this country, and I regret to be obliged to say that the measures proposed by the President, in his Message to Congress, and reiterated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to the same body, only regard one object, and are, in their tendency, only directed to one branch of partial relief. The evils, however, under which the community now suffers, (said Mr. W.,) though related, and of the same family, are yet capable of distinct consideration. In the first place, there are the wants of the Treasury, arising from the stoppage of payments and the falling off of the revenue. This is an exigency requiring the consideration of Congress; it is an evil threatening to suspend the functions of at least one department of the Government unless it be remedied. Another and a greater evil is, the prostration of credit—the interruption brought upon all business transactions, arising from the suspension of all the local banks throughout the country, with some few and trifling exceptions. Hence has proceeded a prostration of the local currency, and a serious obstruction and difficulty thrown in the way of buying and selling. A third want is, the want of an accredited paper medium, equal to specie, having equal credit over all parts of the country, capable of serving for the payment of debts and carrying on the internal business of the country throughout and between the different and distant sections of this great Union. These three evils, though they are co-existent and cognate in their being, cannot be met by the same measures of relief. If relief is given to the one, it does not follow that you will relieve the others; if you replenish the Treasury, and thus bring a remedy to that evil, this brings no relief to the disordered currency. And again: if the local currency is relieved, it does not supply the other want, namely, that of a universally accredited medium.

I shall now (continued Mr. W.) confine myself to a few remarks on the bill before us, and not detain the Senate longer than will be strictly necessary to give a plain statement of my opinion.

This measure is proposed in order to provide for the wants of the Government. I agree that this is a necessary object; but the question is, whether this bill is the proper mode of making such a provision. I do not think it is, though others may think differently. If this is indeed the best mode, I should wish to see it carried into execution, for relief is wanted both by the Treasury and by the country, but first and chiefly by the country.

I do not say that by the law providing for this deposit the States have any fixed right to it; I prefer to put the matter entirely on the footing of convenience and expediency; and when it is considered what expectations have been raised—that this money has even been already disposed of in advance by the several States for different purposes, such as internal improvements, education, and other great objects—it becomes a question of expediency whether it would not be better to supply the wants of the Treasury by other means.

Another consideration of great importance in my view is this: There are already many disturbing causes in operation, agitating the transactions of society in all the various ramifications of business and commerce. Now, I would ask, sir, is it advisable, is it wise, is it even politic, to introduce, at such a time as this, another great disturbing cause, producing a reversed action, altering the destiny of this money, overthrowing contracts now entered into, disappointing expectations raised, disturbing, unsettling, and deranging still more the already deranged business transactions of the whole country? I would ask, is it worth while to do this? I think not.

We are to consider that this money, according to the provisions of the existing law, is to go equally among all the States, and among all the people; and the wants of the Treasury must be supplied, if supplies be necessary, equally by all the people. It is not a question, therefore, whether some shall have money and others shall make good the deficiency. All partake in the distribution, and all will contribute to the supply. So that it is a mere question of convenience, and, in my opinion, it is decidedly most convenient, on all accounts, that this instalment should follow its present destination, and the necessities of the Treasury be provided for by other means.

Again, if you pass this bill, what is it? It is a mere brutum fulmen; of itself, it will not produce any good if you do pass it. All admit there is no money; therefore, the bill will give no relief to the Treasury. This bill, Mr. President, will not produce to the Secretary one dollar: he acknowledges himself that at all events it will not produce him many, for he says he wants other aid; and he has applied to Congress for an issue of some millions in Treasury notes. He gets the money, therefore, just as well without this bill as with it; the bill itself, then, is unnecessary, depriving the States of a sum which the Secretary cannot avail himself of, and which sum, notwithstanding this bill, he proposes to supply by an issue of Government notes. He calls this collateral aid to the measure of postponement. But this evidently reverses the order of things, for the Treasury notes are his main reliance; to them only he looks for immediate relief, and this instalment now to be withheld is (as a productive source of revenue) only subsequent and collateral to the issue of the notes.

But now, sir, what sort of notes does the Secretary propose to issue? He proposes, sir, to issue Treasury notes of small denominations, down even as low as twenty dollars, not bearing interest, and redeemable at no fixed period; they are to be received in debts due to Government, but are not otherwise to be paid until at some indefinite time there shall be a certain surplus in the Treasury beyond what the Secretary may think its wants require. Now, sir, this is plain, authentic, statutable paper money; it is exactly a new emission of old continental. If the Genius of the old Confederation were now to rise up in the midst of us, he could not furnish us, from the abundant stores of his recollection, with a more perfect model of paper money. It carries no interest; it has no fixed time of payment; it is to circulate as currency, and it is to circulate on the credit of Government alone, with no fixed period of redemption! If this be not paper money, pray, sir, what is it? And, sir, who expected this? Who expected that in the fifth year of the experiment for reforming the currency, and bringing it to an absolute gold and silver circulation, the Treasury Department would be found recommending to us a regular emission of paper money? This, sir, is quite new in the history of this Government; it belongs to that of the Confederation which has passed away.

Mr. WRIGHT said it might become him to say a few words in relation to the bill before the Senate. His position in reference to this and other bills, perhaps, required him to do so. He would, however, confine himself strictly to the present subject, and to the most brief justification of his own course, and that of a majority of the Committee on Finance, who had concurred with him in reporting the bill.

Immediately upon the appointment of the committee, and the reference to it of the important subjects treated of in the Message of the President, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the committee found that the Treasury of the United States was, very soon, to be in want of means to meet the current demands upon it, without regard to any further transfer to the States. They also found that this fourth instalment of the deposits with the States was to become payable on the 1st day of October, and amounted to about nine and one-third millions of dollars.

The state of the Treasury, as developed by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was, as he now recollected, (and he thought he could not be materially mistaken,) that, at the time when the statement appended to that report was made up, about the first day of the present month, (he believed the exact date was the 28th of August,) there was in the Treasury, subject to draft, available and unavailable, but eight million one hundred and some odd thousand dollars. The report was printed, and upon the table of every Senator, and would verify his correctness in this particular. This amount was exclusive of the sums already deposited with the States, being some twenty-eight millions.

To arrive at what would be the condition of the Treasury on the 1st of October, the expenses of the present month, which, from drafts already made and anticipated, were estimated at about two and a half millions, must be deducted from the eight million one hundred and odd thousand; thus leaving in the Treasury, subject to draft on the 1st day of October, less than six millions, without the transfer of a dollar to the States towards the October instalment. This, too, included all the funds in the Treasury, subject to draft for payments, or transfers to the States, whether available or not, upon the drafts of the Treasurer; the funds on deposit with the States not being taken into the computation.

If, then, the October instalment was to be transferred to the States, all the means in the Treasury, of all descriptions, on the day when that instalment was, by the deposit law, made transferable, would not be equal to two-thirds of the amount; and money must be borrowed upon the credit of the United States, to supply the deficiency.

The honorable Senator seemed to suppose that the means to make this transfer to the States were in the Treasury; and that the only difficulty, separate from the other demands upon it, grew out of the present unavailable character of those means. The statements he had already made had shown the error of this hypothesis. He had already shown that the whole means in the Treasury, even when the Secretary of the Treasury made his report, at the commencement of our present session, of whatever character, whether available or not, were less, by more than a million of dollars, than the instalment required to be transferred to the States under the deposit law. He had further shown that those means, such as they were, were, before the 1st of October, when that transfer was required to be made, to be still further diminished by the whole expenses of the Government for the present month, ascertained and estimated to amount to two and a half millions of dollars. Hence it would follow, that the whole means in the Treasury on the 1st day of October next must be from three and a half to four millions less than the transfer required. It was in vain, therefore, Mr. W. said, to escape from the conclusion, that, if Congress should insist upon this transfer, it must authorize a loan of money upon the public credit, to enable the Treasury to make it: in other words, that it must authorize a loan of money upon the credit of the United States, in order that that money, when loaned, may be deposited with the States for safekeeping.

Another error of the honorable Senator (Mr. WEBSTER) which he felt bound to correct, was in his strictures upon the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the manner of issuing Treasury notes. The honorable Senator had criticized this part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury with some severity, and had held him up to the Senate and the country as striking out a new path for the supply of the Treasury; as recommending the issue of paper money, of a description of paper similar to that which we know by the denomination of "continental money;" and of doing this for the first time since the organization of the Government under the constitution. The fault complained of consisted in a recommendation, merely discretionary and alternative, to issue Treasury notes bearing no interest, and payable to the bearer, in case the public creditors should be found willing to receive such notes in payment of their demands against the Government, at par; otherwise, to give the notes such an interest as would bring them to par.

Mr. W. said, as the committee, in the bill they had reported, had not followed this recommendation of the Secretary, it would be seen that no question was depending before the Senate, either in the bill now under discussion, or in any other, which rendered this point material; but he was sure his object would be fully understood and appreciated in making this correction. It was simply to defend this public officer against a mistaken accusation. It was not necessary for him to defend, at this time, the soundness of the recommendation, but to protect the Secretary against the charge of being the author of a principle now supposed to be so new and so dangerous. To do this, it was only necessary for him to read the third section of the act of the 24th of February, 1815, authorizing an emission of Treasury notes, in which all these dangers would be found to be embraced, adopted, and made imperative, as a part of the laws of the land.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had often admired the dexterity with which the Senator from Massachusetts could extricate himself from a difficulty; in which, however, he was seldom involved. On such occasions he always made a skilful retreat. Feeling the respect which he (Mr. B.) did for his legal knowledge, he had received, as a matter of faith, his declaration that Treasury notes not bearing interest had never been issued under the present constitution; and when he called up the ghost of the ancient Confederation to act as godfather of these Treasury notes, Mr. B. remained satisfied that he had made himself fully acquainted with the laws in relation to that subject. But scarcely had he taken his seat, when the act of 1815 laid the ghost which he had conjured up; and by that it appeared that Congress had done the very thing which he had declared had not been done since the days of the Confederation. Thus much was due to the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. B., however, rejoiced that the Committee on Finance had proposed the issue of no notes not bearing interest.

In regard to this bill, a plain statement of facts would be the most conclusive argument which could be urged in its favor. He had voted for the deposit of June, 1836; and, upon a retrospect of all which had occurred since its passage, he had found no cause to repent of this vote. It was a choice of evils; and between the alternatives presented, he thought he had made the best choice. On the one side, after reserving five millions, nearly forty millions of dollars had accumulated in the deposit banks. This vast amount of money was used by them to increase the dividends of their stockholders, to expand extravagantly the paper circulation of the country, and to excite speculation to the greatest excess. On the other hand, strong objections existed against making the Federal Government an instrument for the purpose of collecting money, that it might be deposited with the States. The precedent might in many respects be dangerous. But the money was on hand. It had been collected under existing laws. Placed in this situation, he thought it was more just, more politic, more safe, to place it in deposit with the States, that it might be used for the benefit of the people, than to suffer it to remain with the banks for the benefit of their stockholders, and to the injury of the country.

But does the deposit law, from first to last, contain one sentence—nay, does it contain one word—which resembles a gift or a loan to the States? Is it not, in terms, a bare transfer of the deposits from the banks to the States? Under its provisions, the faith of all the States is pledged for the safekeeping and repayment of their respective proportions of this money, whenever they shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying the wants of the Treasury. The mode and manner in which he shall call for it are expressly prescribed. Nay, more; the case has actually occurred. If the Secretary had pursued the line of strict duty under the law, he would, ere this, have called on the States for a portion of the three instalments which have already been paid. He has acted wisely in not making this demand until the pleasure of Congress could be known. The States are not now in a condition to return immediately any portion of what they have already received.

Under these circumstances, the question is, whether we are bound, upon any principle, to deposit with them the fourth instalment, when the Secretary of the Treasury, the very next day, might demand a return not only of it, but of the three other instalments, in the manner prescribed by the law.

The Senator from Massachusetts had not contended that we were bound by any contract to deposit this fourth instalment with the States.

He had said, however, that if an individual, by his conduct, had induced a reasonable expectation that he would loan money to another, or give money to another, it might become his duty to borrow it, and pay interest for it, for either of those purposes. Mr. B. denied that the conduct of Congress was such as to afford any pretext for such an expectation. On the face of the act there was nothing but deposit written. Neither a loan nor a gift appeared upon it. It was a mere deposit, without interest, to be restored when demanded in the manner prescribed; and not a loan for a given period, much less an absolute gift. If the States, therefore, had entertained any such expectation, it was from other circumstances, and not from the solemn contract into which they had entered with the United States under this law.

Mr. WEBSTER, having obtained and examined the act of 1815, said: The honorable member from Pennsylvania has been kind enough to say that I do not often get into difficulties in debate, and that, when I do, I generally extricate myself better than I have done on the present occasion. He partakes in the supposed triumph of his friend from New York, (Mr. W.,) in having proved me incorrect when I said that this Government had never issued such paper money as the Secretary has now recommended. Now, sir, although I am pleased to see the happiness which the gentleman enjoys, yet I believe I must dash it a little. Most assuredly, sir, it authorizes no such paper as is now proposed. I was persuaded it could not, as I have a pretty good recollection of the proceedings of Congress on such subjects at that time.

The law of 1815 authorized the issue of two classes of Treasury notes: 1st. Such as bore no interest, but which, the very hour they were issued, might be funded in a 7 per cent. stock, to be redeemed like other stocks of the Government. 2d. Treasury notes bearing an interest of five and two-fifths per cent., capable of being funded in like manner, in a 6 per cent. stock. These stocks were to be issued on application by any commissioner of the revenue in any State. Now, what comparison is there between either of these classes of Treasury notes and those recommended by the Secretary, which bear no interest, and for which no fixed redemption is provided?

I affirm again, therefore, sir, all that I have said, namely, that the notes recommended by the Secretary are regular paper issues, like the old emissions of Congress and the States before the adoption of the present constitution; and that no precedent has been found for them, and I am sure none can be found, in the practice of this Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not think the Senator, with all his ingenuity, had got out of the difficulty. Under the section of the law of 1815, which he had just read, Treasury notes were to be issued without interest; they were to circulate as a currency without interest; they might continue to circulate for years without interest. It did not alter the case that the holder of them above a certain amount had the privilege of funding them, and converting them into a stock bearing interest. This interest did not commence from the date of their issue, but from the time they were funded. All the time they remained in circulation, they were Treasury notes without interest. They were what the Senator from Massachusetts had supposed never was issued under the present constitution. Mr. B., however, agreed with the Senator that at this time no Treasury notes ought to be issued which did not bear interest.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he was decidedly of the impression that, under the circumstances of the case, this postponement ought to be made. The object of the deposit law was to draw the revenue out of the grasp of the Government, and to restore it to those to whom it ought to be restored. And now, when there was no surplus, it was not contrary to the purpose of that law to withhold it. But the responsibility of doing so would rest on gentlemen of the administration and those of the opposition who made last year the extravagant appropriations of thirty-two millions, exceeding the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. They were then told of the folly of raising the revenue, and of raising the disbursements. The result now was, that the Government was bankrupt. Were they never to look ahead, and see the difficulties that threatened them?

Another era had now arisen. They had got through with the surplus, and Mr. C. trusted they were through with the extravagant appropriations. If they did not economize and retrench, he saw a new age commencing—perhaps that of Treasury notes—when the compromise act would be annulled, and the high tariff revived. But Mr. C. would agree that the fourth deposit should be withheld, since that law had fulfilled its main purpose, and since a new series of extravagances was now to arise unless they kept a good lookout.

Mr. WALKER moved an adjournment; when, a division being called for, the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BUCHANAN then rose to offer an amendment, if in order; the object of which was to take off from the Secretary the responsibility of calling upon the States, and to repose this responsibility where he (Mr. B.) thought it should be—namely, in Congress. For this purpose he proposed to insert “provided the three first instalments already paid do remain on deposit until further directed by Congress.”

Mr. NILES said he must ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and was sorry it had been offered. If it was to be fully considered, it would renew the debate on the deposit act, as it went to change the essential principles and terms of that act. A majority of those who voted for that act, about which there had been so much said and so much misrepresentation, had professed to regard it—and he could not doubt that at the time they did so regard it—as simply a deposit law; as merely changing the place of deposit from the banks to the States, so far as related to the surplus. The money was still to be in the Treasury, and liable to be drawn out, with certain limitations and restrictions, by the ordinary appropriation laws, without the direct action of Congress. The amendment, if adopted, will change the principles of the deposit act, and the condition of the money deposited with the States under it. It will no longer be a deposit; it will not be in the Treasury, even in point of legal effect or form: the deposit will be changed to a loan, or, perhaps more properly, a grant to the States. The rights of the United States will be changed to a mere claim, like that against the late Bank of the United States; and a claim without any means to enforce it. We were charged, at the time, of making a distribution of the public revenue to the States, in the disguise and form of a deposit; and this amendment, it appeared to him, would be a very bold step towards confirming the truth of that charge. He deemed the amendment an important one, and highly objectionable; but he saw that the Senate were prepared to adopt it, and he would not pursue the discussion, but content himself with repeating his request for the yeas and noes on the question.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not imagined this amendment would meet with opposition. He wished to know if it was right and proper that the Secretary should be made responsible for not calling upon the States for this money, as the law required him to do? The condition of the States was such that the Secretary cannot make such call upon them. He (Mr. B.) was therefore desirous to relieve him from this embarrassment. The substituting Congress instead of the Secretary would not, Mr. B. thought, make any change in the nature of the fund.

Mr. CALHOUN said he fully concurred in the proposed amendment. It was due to the States in their sovereign capacity not to subject themselves to be called upon for the money by any other authority than Congress.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN; and the yeas and nays being called for, were as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Young—33.

FRIDAY, September 15.

Fourth Instalment.

The bill to postpone indefinitely the payment of the fourth instalment of the deposit bill, was read a third time; and the question being upon its passage,

Mr. PRESTON, of South Carolina, said: My opinion decidedly is, that the casus fœderis has not arrived for Congress to encroach upon the fund set aside for deposit with the States; and I further am of opinion that, even if it had now arrived, yet this is not the course by which we shall best consult the interests of the country, in attempting to bring relief to the Treasury.

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

Fourth Instalment.

[SENATE.]

Let us briefly consider the history of the deposit act. That act was passed contemporaneously with other acts of most prodigal expenditure. We had a surplus which we knew not how to dispose of. To expend—to get rid of our overflowing funds—was then the order of the day. We were in the full tide of an inauspicious prosperity, and the departments were stimulated and goaded on to find out how much they could spend, while the majority in Congress seemed to be employed in finding out how much they could give. The departments asked for twenty millions; and Congress, eager to get rid of the surplus, outstripped even their extravagant demands, and gave them thirty millions. Then it was, sir, that this deposit bill was originated. It went hand in hand with bills of the most extravagant and prodigal expenditure.

Now, sir, under these circumstances, when we give so prodigally to the departments, at a time of high prices, it is well worth our while to inquire whether the time has not arrived to lop off and curtail from our expenditure, rather than to withhold this instalment from the States. I am of opinion we might save the nine millions of this instalment by curtailing the extravagant expenditures of the departments, and so pay the instalment—not by distressing the States in withholding it, but by introducing a wholesome measure of retrenchment in the expenditure of Government.

This, sir, is the ground I take: namely, that it would be far better to curtail our expenditure than to stop the payment of this instalment.

Again, I would ask, does the proposition contained in this bill go to relieve in any manner the pressure upon the people? Not in the least, sir. Neither will the Government place itself in funds by the operation of this law. The banks have laid violent hands on the deposits; they will pay them no longer in the medium they were expected to pay them in. Of what use, then, will this bill be to Government? The money is locked up in the banks; and the wildest enthusiast in favor of this measure would not go so far as to say that by the mere fiat of this body a bill such as this is going to fill the country with gold and silver. We have not got the magician's wand, by one touch of which we can make the gold come forth from its hiding places. We may call, indeed, by our enactments, the spirits from the vasty deep; but will they come when we do call them? Will money be obtained for the Government when you pass this law? No, sir; we all know that this bill will bring no money into the Treasury.

It would be better, therefore, under such circumstances, to let the law go on, and let the States receive the whole of the deposit. The States, sir, are willing to take the instalment in the only medium in which the State institutions are able to pay it. They are not going, at this crisis, to clamor for a hard-money currency. They will be satisfied with receiving the State currency—their own domestic currency. But the President says “no;” and by passing this bill, according to his recommendation, you will not let them receive a currency which they are willing to receive. The amount of the instalment now in the banks would be useful, in that currency, to them, for they would gladly receive it; but it will be of no use whatever to the Government, for the Government will not receive it. Then, sir, if I may use a homely similitude, by such an enactment as this you act the part of the dog in the manger—you will not take the money of the States yourselves, and you will not let them have it, though they wish to receive it. Is this a noble, or even a politic proceeding? Is this your reforming the currency? Is this aiding and relieving the embarrassments of the people, to stamp a bad name upon their currency, to refuse to receive it yourselves, to pass laws fixing a stigma upon it, and then to forbid others to receive it?

Again, sir: there is another view which I think ought to be taken of this subject; and, had it received its due consideration, such a measure as this could surely never have been proposed. In fifteen days from now, this instalment will be due to the States. They have already made their disposition of the money. It has been disposed of in various contracts, and been directed to various great and useful purposes; and now, suddenly, at this short notice, the expected sum—the sum which the law had pledged to them—is, by another law, to be withheld. But, by the terms of the deposit law, a specific time was fixed upon and accorded to the States, in which the States were to have notice of any demand to be made upon them for the sum deposited. By the law, therefore, they are entitled to a notice before this fourth instalment can be withdrawn from them—for they have already expended it; and this bill to withhold it is equivalent in its action to taking back the money from them, without the notice which the law provided for.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, said he fully concurred in the views just expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON.) In the State which he came from, he said, the general opinion was that retrenchment was wanting, and ought to be exercised in the several departments of the Government. The profusion to which they were becoming habituated it was time should be checked, and he (Mr. C.) agreed with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) that now was the time, if ever, to put in force such a necessary retrenchment. He (Mr. C.) could not well understand the reason why any other course should be resorted to; for it clearly appeared to him that, by proper retrenchment in the expenditures of Government, enough, and more than enough, might be curtailed from its superfluous disbursements to make up the amount which the payment of this instalment would require.

Mr. BROWN said: In addition to the arguments which had already been urged, and which to his mind were conclusive, in favor of withholding the fourth instalment payable to the several States on the 1st of October, under the deposit act, another argument, entitled to still more weighty consideration, had decided his mind in favor of that course. If we refuse to pass the bill having that object in view, the obligation will unavoidably devolve on Congress to provide the means to meet the payment of the instalment which will otherwise become due to the States, the available means of the Treasury being inadequate for that purpose. Now he (Mr. B.) could not see in any part of the constitution the power to raise money, and, of necessity, the power to tax our constituents to pay the money thus raised, for the mere purpose of depositing it in the treasuries of the several States. The power to raise money was limited to the objects and duties with which the General Government was charged by the constitution; and in no part of that instrument was the power to be found, either by express grant or implication, to raise it for any such purpose. It could not be pretended that to raise money for such purpose was to carry into effect any power belonging to the General Government. To his mind, therefore, it was a palpable violation of the constitution to exercise such power, which they unquestionably would have to do, in providing the means to meet the remaining instalment, if its payment should not be postponed. He drew a distinction between the power of Congress to authorize the deposit of a surplus in the State treasuries which already existed, and the power to raise money for the sole purpose of thus depositing it. It was in that point of view that he deemed the deposit act of last year justifiable; that act had, in the course of its execution, exhausted the surplus, which was the true object Congress had in view in passing it; and, having fulfilled its great end, he was of opinion its further operation should now cease. He thought the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PRESBURY) would have much difficulty in reconciling the vote which he had announced his intention to give on this question, with the doctrines of a strict construction of the constitution, of which he had heretofore professed himself a zealous advocate. He called on that gentleman to show what constitutional authority Congress had to pass a law raising money, not in execution of any of its conceded powers, but for the avowed purpose of being deposited with the States.

Besides the constitutional objection to raising money for the purpose of depositing it with the States, the unavoidable consequence of providing for the payment of the remaining instalment to them would be to lay the foundation of a new national debt; than which nothing, in his opinion, would be more preposterous, when resorted to for the unauthorized purpose of dividing money among the States. He would in no event vote for any measure leading to the creation of a national debt, unless it could be made to appear indispensable to aid the Government in the performance of its legitimate functions.

Mr. WALKER said: Disguise it as we may, the refusal to pass this bill is a determination on our part to borrow more than nine millions of dollars on the credit of the United States, to be deposited for safekeeping with the States of this Union. The constitution authorizes us to borrow money on the credit of the United States—but for what object? Clearly for no other than to carry into effect the powers delegated by the constitution. But that this Government could borrow millions, without limitation as to the amount, for the purpose of depositing it with, or distributing it among, the States, was to clothe this Government with the most alarming and despotic powers. If this Government can make such a loan for such a purpose, the taxing power is unlimited; for by taxes only can it raise the money to refund what it has borrowed. Mr. W. said he was one of a small minority of six in the Senate who had voted against this deposit bill. He had then predicted the disastrous consequences that he thought would follow from the passage of this bill; and his worst fears would be realized, if now, when there was a deficit in the Treasury, when many of the public creditors had to be paid in protested drafts on broken banks, a surplus was created by loans, for the purpose of distributing among the States of the Union.

Mr. W. said he well knew the voracious character of the surplus spirit; that it was ready to keep up the tariff, to keep up the price of the public lands, and to refuse all relief to the settlers of the West, for the purpose of creating a surplus for distribution; but he could scarcely have believed that now, when we must in any event replenish, by loans, an exhausted Treasury, new loans would be asked for to the amount of nine millions for distribution—loans to be refunded, if not from the lands of the West, from the tariff; by which Mississippi, now nearly the greatest exporting State of this Union, will receive but about one-fourth as much as she will be compelled to refund by the operation of the tariff—reducing the price of her great staple, to enrich the incorporated monopolists of other sections of the Union. Mr. W. said he must be blind indeed, who did not perceive that to raise, by loans, nine millions for deposit with the States, is, to the extent of nine millions, to render it necessary to augment the tariff. It is true, we talk of getting back this money from the States; whilst a majority of the Senate—as he (Mr. W.) thought most unwisely—have just taken from the Secretary of the Treasury the authority which he possessed, under the deposit act, to call upon the States to refund any portion of the money already deposited. And now he (Mr. W.) predicted that Congress never would make any requisition upon the States for this money, but that, when it was wanted, the South would be compelled to raise it through the operation of the tariff. Could any man doubt this result, when so bold an effort was now made to induce the Government to borrow money to pay the last instalment to the States?

The question was then put on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Kent, Knight, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Young—17.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the House of Representatives.

Treasury Notes.

The bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes was taken up as in Comité of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to fill up the first blank in the bill with the word "ten," thereby making the amount of notes to be issued ten millions of dollars.

Mr. W. said that it had not been possible for the committee to know the amount of the notes necessary until action had been had on the bill to postpone the fourth instalment to the States; which bill having now passed the Senate, he was able to fill up the blank. He had had an interview on the subject with the Secretary of the Treasury, and he had learned from that officer that, on the supposition that no more extension would be granted than was proposed by the bill for extending the duty bonds, he had thought the sum of eight millions would be sufficient. This was, however, on the supposition that the Bank of the United States would pay in October the instalment then due to the Government by that institution. But it was understood by the Secretary and the committee that this would not be done, that bank having bought up Treasury drafts issued in July for the payment of the third instalment to the States, and intending to give in those drafts in payment of the instalment then due from the bank. This being the case, the Secretary would require that the blank be filled up with nine million five hundred thousand dollars; and therefore, on this calculation, the committee had instructed him (Mr. W.) to move for ten millions.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, was very desirous of obtaining more full information relating to one point; and that was, that as a bill had now passed the Senate for arresting the payment of the fourth instalment to the States, and since the fund intended for the use of the States was now to be applied to the use of Government, if it was intended to employ the funds in the banks before being reduced in some way or other to a specie basis, whether Government intended by laws passed, or to be passed—such, for example, as a bankrupt law—to force the conversion of the funds now in the banks into metal, and then throw the sum thus obtained from the banks into the Treasury, there to lie without being used? His inquiry was not, he thought, useless, since it must be evident that the amount of the blank must depend upon the availability of the funds in the banks.

Mr. WRIGHT said it had been ascertained, and was so stated in the Secretary's report, that all the money in the banks subject to draft on the 28th of August last amounted only to eight million one hundred and sixty-six thousand dollars. Out of that sum the expenses for the month of September were to be taken, which would leave the sum reduced to about two millions and a half by the 1st of October. But, if the outstanding drafts should come in on the Treasury, (many of them being protested,) in that case the available amount would still be diminished, and the Treasury would be in want of means. There were, therefore, no ready means without the assistance of Congress. In all the Atlantic coast, the money in the banks had for the most part been withdrawn, (only a small sum subject to drafts being with them—say less than a million,) and creditors were not willing to receive drafts upon the South-western banks, where now almost all the funds in deposit with banks were placed.

Such being the case, and such the amount of unavailable money, the object of issuing Treasury notes was to anticipate the funds in deposit with the banks until Congress should say how those funds were to be made available. The Committee on Finance had reported a bill giving to those banks intervals of two, five, and eight months in which to pay the sums due; dividing the balance in their hands into three instalments. Again: the extension granted already, and proposed still to be granted, on bonds, would diminish the means of the Treasury; from all which considerations, the issue of these notes was rendered necessary to meet the current expenses.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, professed himself greatly obliged by the valuable information communicated by the honorable Senator, (Mr. WRIGHT;) but he still felt that the inquiry which he had wished to make was not yet answered. He meant to inquire if the money in the banks was to be used as bank notes, or if the banks were to be compelled to pay them in specie; and then, if these funds were to be left idle?

Mr. WRIGHT, in reply, said they would not be used as bank-notes unless the law should authorize them so to be used.

Mr. CLAY: Then it comes to this: we have passed a bill to take funds out of the hands of those who would have been glad to use them, to put them into the hands of others who refuse to acknowledge and make use of them. The States would have been glad to receive this money in the shape of bank-notes, and we have taken it from them. Again: Government refuses to call them funds in that shape; and to Government we have now made them over by the bill just passed! And as Government, though it receives those funds, and prevents their being paid to the States, will not acknowledge them as funds, there is a deficiency existing; and this deficiency is to be supplied by issuing Treasury notes, in order that Government may be able to get along. That is to say, Government will not receive the paper of the country, and is about to create a paper of its own, which the country is expected to receive! And thus, all the promises which have been made to us of the flowing of gold and silver all over the country—these promises of a better currency result in the issue of ten millions of paper money!

MONDAY, September 18.

Mr. RIVES gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill designating the funds to be received by Government in payment of public dues.

Mr. R. observed, that he had, on a former day, intimated his intention of proposing a bill of this description himself, in the event that no similar bill should be reported by the Committee on Finance. He viewed the neglect of this highly important subject likely to be of such serious consequence to the community at large, that he felt himself bound to act on the occasion by bringing in a bill calculated to do justice to the people in this particular.

Treasury Notes.

The bill for the issue of Treasury notes having been postponed to this day, in order to give Mr. CALHOUN an opportunity of preparing an amendment, and of offering his sentiments generally upon the subject, was now resumed by the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN, after a general view of the state of the country and of the causes which produced the distress, and of a national bank and local banks, as furnishers of currency, went on to say:

In supporting the bank of 1816, I openly declared that, as a question de novo, I would be decidedly against the bank, and would be the last to give it my support. I also stated that, in supporting the bank then, I yielded to the necessity of the case, growing out of the then existing and long-established connection between the Government and the banking system. I took the ground, even at that early period, that so long as the connection existed, so long as the Government received and paid away bank-notes as money, they were bound to regulate their value, and had no alternative but the establishment of a national bank.

I found the connection in existence and established before my time, and over which I could have no control. I yielded to the necessity, in order to correct the disordered state of the currency, which had fallen exclusively under the control of the States. I yielded to what I could not reverse, just as any member of the Senate now would, who might believe that Louisiana was unconstitutionally admitted into the Union, but who would, nevertheless, feel compelled to vote to extend the laws to that State, as one of its members, on the ground that its admission was an act, whether constitutional or unconstitutional, which he could not reverse.

In 1834 I acted in conformity to the same principle, in proposing the renewal of the bank charter for a short period. My object, as expressly avowed, was to use the bank to break the connection between the Government and the banking system gradually, in order to avert the catastrophe which has now befallen us, and which I then clearly perceived. But the connection, which I believed to be irreversible in 1816, has now been broken by operation of law. It is now an open question. I feel myself free, for the first time, to choose my course on this important subject; and, in opposing a bank, I act in conformity to principles which I have entertained ever since I have fully investigated the subject.

But my opposition to a reunion with the banks is not confined to objections limited to a national or State banks. It goes beyond, and comprehends others of a more general nature, relating to the currency, which to me are decisive. I am of the impression that the connection has a most pernicious influence over bank currency; that it tends to disturb that stability and uniformity of value which is essential to a sound currency; and is among the leading causes of that tendency to expansion and contraction, which experience has shown is incident to bank-notes as a currency. They are, in my opinion, at best, without the requisite qualities to constitute a currency, even when unconnected with the Government; and are doubly disqualified by reason of that connection, which subjects them to sudden expansions and contractions, and exposes them to fatal catastrophes, such as the present.

I will explain my views. A bank-note circulates not merely on account of the credit of the institution by which it is issued, but because Government receives it like gold and silver in all its dues, and thus adds its own credit to that of the bank. It, in fact, virtually endorses on the note of every specie-paying bank, "receivable by the Government in its dues." To understand how greatly this adds to the circulation of bank-notes, we must remember that Government is the great money-dealer of the country, and the holder of immense public domains; and that it has the power of creating a demand against every citizen, as high as it pleases, in the shape of a tax, or duty, which can be discharged, as the law now is, only by bank-notes or gold and silver. This, of course, cannot but add greatly to the credit of bank-notes, and contribute much to their circulation, though it may be difficult to determine, with any precision, to what extent. It certainly is very great. For why is it that an individual of the first credit, whose responsibility is so indisputable that his friend of equal credit endorses his note for nothing, should put his name with his friend's, being their joint credit, into a bank, and take out the notes of the bank, which is, in fact, but the credit of the bank itself, and pay six per cent. discount between the credit of himself and his friend and that of the bank? The known and established credit of the bank may be one reason, but there is another and powerful one: the Government treats the credit of the bank as gold and silver in all its transactions, and does not treat the credit of individuals in the same manner. To test the truth: let us reverse the case, and suppose the Government to treat the joint credit of the individuals as money, and not the credit of the bank; and is it not obvious that, instead of borrowing from the bank, and paying six per cent. discount, the bank would be glad to borrow from them on the same terms? From this we may perceive the powerful influence which bank circulation derives from the connection with the credit of the Government.

It follows, as a necessary consequence, that to the extent of this influence the issues of the banks expand and contract with the expansion and contraction of the fiscal action of the Government; with the increase of its duties, taxes, income, and expenditure; with the deposits in its vaults, acting as additional capital, and the amount of bank-notes withdrawn, in consequence, from circulation; all of which must directly affect the amount of their business and issues, and bank currency, and must, of course, partake of all those vibrations to which the fiscal action of the Government is necessarily exposed; and, when great and sudden, must expose the system to catastrophes such as we now witness. In fact, a more suitable instance cannot be selected to illustrate the truth of what I assert than the present, as I shall proceed to show.

To understand the causes which have led to the present state of things, we must go back to the year 1824, when the tariff system triumphed in Congress—a system which imposed duties not for the purpose of revenue, but to encourage the industry of one portion of the Union at the expense of the other. This was followed up by the act of 1828, which consummated the system. It raised the duties so extravagantly, that out of an annual importation of sixty-four millions, thirty-two passed into the Treasury; that is, Government took one-half for the liberty of introducing the other. Countless millions were thus poured into the Treasury beyond the wants of the Government, which became in time the source of the most extravagant expenditures. This vast increase of receipts and expenditures was followed by a corresponding expansion of the business of the banks. They had to discount and issue freely, to enable the merchants to pay their duty bonds, as well as to meet the vastly-increased expenditures of the Government. Another effect followed the act of 1828, which gave a still further expansion to the action of the banks, and which is worthy of notice. It turned the exchange with England in favor of this country. That portion of the proceeds of our exports, which, in consequence of the high duties, could no longer return with profit in the usual articles which we had been in the habit of receiving principally from that country in exchange for our exports, returned in gold and silver, in order to purchase similar articles at the North. This was the first cause that gave that western direction to the precious metals, the revulsive return of which has been followed by so many disasters. With the exchange in our favor, and consequently no demand for gold and silver abroad, and the vast demand for money attendant on an increase of the revenue, almost every restraint was removed on the discounts and issues of the banks, especially in the northern section of the Union, where these causes principally operated. With their increase, wages and prices of every description rose in proportion, followed, of course, by an increasing demand on the banks for further issues. This is the true cause of that expansion of the currency, which began about the commencement of the late administration, but which was erroneously charged by it to the Bank of the United States. It arose out of the action of the Government.

The bank, in increasing its business, acted in obedience to the condition of things at the time, and in conformity with the banks generally in the same section. It was at this juncture that the late administration came into power; a juncture remarkable in many respects, but more especially in relation to the question of the currency. Most of the causes which have since terminated in the complete prostration of the banks and the commercial prosperity of the country were in full activity.

Another cause, about that time, (I do not remember the precise date,) began to produce powerful effects. I refer to the last renewal of the charter of the Bank of England. It was renewed for ten years, and, among other provisions, contained one making the notes of that bank a legal tender in all cases except between the bank and its creditors. The effect was to dispense still further with the use of the precious metals in that great commercial country, which, of course, caused them to flow out in every direction through the various channels of its commerce. A large portion took their direction hitherward, and served still further to increase the current which, from causes already enumerated, was flowing in this direction; and which still further increased the force of the returning current, on the turn of the tide.

The administration did not comprehend the difficulties and dangers which surrounded it.

Instead of perceiving the true reason of the expansion of the currency, and adopting the measures necessary to arrest it, they attributed it to the Bank of the United States, and made it the cause or pretext of waging war on that institution. Among the first acts of hostility, the deposits were removed, and transferred to selected State banks; the effect of which, instead of resisting the tendency to expansion, was to throw off the only restraint that held the banking institutions of the country in check; and, of course, gave to the swelling tide, which was destined to desolate the country, a powerful impulse. Banks sprung up in every direction; discounts and issues increased almost without limitation; and an immense surplus revenue accumulated in the deposit banks, which, after the payment of the public debt, the most extravagant appropriations could not exhaust, and which acted as additional banking capital. The value of money daily depreciated; prices rose; and then commenced those unbounded speculations, particularly in public lands, which were transferred, by millions of acres, from the public to the speculators for worthless bank-notes, till at length the swelling flood was checked, and the revulsive current burst its barriers, and overspread and desolated the land.

The first check came from the Bank of England, which, alarmed at the loss of its precious metals, refused to discount American bills, in order to prevent a further decrease of its cash means, and cause a return of those which it had lost. Then followed the execution of the deposit act, which, instead of a remedial measure, as it might have been made if properly executed, was made the instrument of weakening the banks at the point of pressure, especially in the great commercial metropolis of the Union, where so large a portion of the surplus revenue was accumulated. And, finally, the Treasury order, which still further weakened those banks, by withdrawing their cash means to be invested in public lands in the West.

It is often easier to prevent what cannot be remedied, which the present instance strongly illustrates. If the administration had formed a true conception of the danger in time, what has since happened might have then been easily averted. The near approach of the expiration of the charter of the United States Bank would have afforded ample means of staying the desolation, if it had been timely and properly used. I saw it then, and purposed to renew the charter, for a limited period, with such modifications as would have effectually resisted the increasing expansion of the currency, and, at the same time, gradually and finally wear out the connection between the bank and the Government. To use the expression I then used, "to unbank the banks;" to let down the system easily, and so to effect the separation between the bank and the Government as to avoid the possibility of that shock which I then saw was inevitable without some such remedy. The moment was eminently propitious. The precious metals were flowing in on us from every quarter, and the vigorous measures I purposed to adopt in the renewal of the charter would have effectually arrested the increase of banks, and checked the excess of their discounts and issues; so that the accumulating mass of gold and silver, instead of being converted into bank capital, and swelling the tide of paper circulation, would have been substituted in the place of bank-notes, as a permanent and wholesome addition to the currency of the country.

But neither the administration nor the opposition sustained me, and the precious opportunity passed unseized. I then clearly saw the coming calamity was inevitable; and it has neither arrived sooner, nor is it greater, than I anticipated.

Such are the leading causes which have produced the present disordered state of the currency. There are others of a minor character, connected with the general condition of the commercial world, and the operations of the Executive branch of the Government, but which, of themselves, would have produced but little effect. To repeat the causes in a few words: the vast increase which the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 gave to the fiscal action of the Government, combined with the causes I have enumerated, gave the first impulse to the expansion of the currency. These, in turn, gave that extraordinary impulse to overtrading and speculation (they are effects, and not causes) which has finally terminated in the present calamity. It may thus be ultimately traced to the connection between the banks and the Government; and it is not a little remarkable that the suspension of specie payments in 1816 in this country, and that of 1797 in Great Britain, were produced by like causes.

Having now presented my views of the course and the measures which the permanent policy of the country, looking to its liberty and lasting prosperity, requires, I come finally to the question of relief. I have placed this last—not that I am devoid of sympathy for the country in the pecuniary distress which now pervades it.

After the best reflection, I am of the impression that the Government can do but little in the way of relief, and that it is a case which must be mainly left to the constitution of the patient, who, thank God, is young, vigorous, and robust, with a constitution sufficient to sustain and overcome the severest attack. I dread the doctor and his drugs much more than the disease itself. The distress of the country consists in its indebtedness, and can only be relieved by the payment of its debts. To effect this, industry, frugality, economy, and time, are necessary. I rely more on the growing crop—on the cotton, rice, and tobacco, of the South—than on all the projects or devices of politicians. I am utterly opposed to all coercion by this Government. But Government may do something to relieve the distress. It is out of debt, and is one of the principal creditors both of the banks and of the merchants, and should set an example of liberal indulgence. This I am willing to give freely. I am also prepared to vote freely the use of Government credit in some safe form, to supply any deficit in the circulation during the process of recovery, as far as its financial wants will permit. I see not what more can be safely done. But my vision may be obtuse upon this subject. Those who differ from me, and who profess so much sympathy for the public, seem to think that much relief may be afforded. I hope they will present their views. I am anxious to hear their prescriptions; and I assure them that whatever they may propose, if it shall promise relief, and be not inconsistent with the course which I deem absolutely necessary for the restoration of the country to perfect health, shall cheerfully receive my support. They may be more keen-sighted than I am as to the best means of relief, but cannot have a stronger disposition to afford it.

We have, Mr. President, arrived at a remarkable era in our political history. The days of legislative and executive encroachments, of tariffs and surpluses, of bank and public debt, and extravagant expenditure, are past for the present. The Government stands in a position disentangled from the past, and freer to choose its future course than it ever has been since its commencement. We are about to take a fresh start. I move off under the State-rights banner, and go in the direction in which I have been so long moving. I seize the opportunity thoroughly to reform the Government; to bring it back to its original principles; to retrench and economize, and rigidly to enforce accountability. I shall oppose strenuously all attempts to originate a new debt; to create a national bank; to reunite the political and money power—more dangerous than that of church and state—in any form or shape; to prevent the disturbances of the compromise, which is gradually removing the last vestige of the tariff system; and, mainly, I shall use my best efforts to give an ascendancy to the great conservative principle of State sovereignty, over the dangerous and despotic doctrine of consolidation. I rejoice to think that the Executive department of the Government is now so reduced in power and means, that it can no longer rely on its influence and patronage to secure a majority. Henceforward it can have no hope of supporting itself but on wisdom, moderation, patriotism, and devoted attachment to the constitution, which I trust will make it, in its own defence, an ally in effecting the reform which I deem indispensable to the salvation of the country and its institutions.

I look, sir, with pride to the wise and noble bearing of the little State-rights party, of which it is my pride to be a member, throughout the eventful period through which the country has passed since 1824. Experience already bears testimony to their patriotism, firmness, and sagacity; and history will do it justice. In that year, as I have stated, the tariff system triumphed in the councils of the nation. We saw its disastrous political bearings; foresaw its surpluses and the extravagances to which it would lead. We rallied on the election of the late President to arrest it, through the influence of the Executive department of the Government. In this we failed. We then fell back upon the rights and sovereignty of the States, and by the action of a small but gallant State, and through the potency of its interposition, we brought the system to the ground, sustained as it was by the opposition and the administration, and by the whole power and patronage of the Government. The pernicious overflow of the Treasury, of which it was the parent, could not be arrested at once. The surplus was seized on by the Executive, and, by its control over the banks, became the fruitful source of Executive influence and encroachment. Without hesitation, we joined our old opponents on the tariff question, but under our own flag, and without merging in their ranks, and made a gallant and successful war against the encroachments of the Executive. That terminated, we part with our late allies in peace; and move forward, lag, or onward who may, to secure the fruits of our long but successful struggle, under the old republican flag of 1798, which, though tattered and torn, has never yet been lowered, and, with the blessing of God, never shall be with my consent.

On concluding his speech Mr. C. submitted his amendment, which provided that from and after the 1st of January next, three-fourths of the money due to the Government may be paid in notes of specie-paying banks; that from and after the 1st of January, 1839, one-half might be paid in such notes; one-quarter after the 1st of January, 1840; and that, from and after the 1st of January, 1841, all sums due the Government for customs, lands, &c., shall be paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in such notes, bills, &c., as should by law be ordered.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and inquired of Mr. C. to what bill it was proposed to make this an amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, to one called the divorce bill between the Government and the banks, which he said was just ahead.

Mr. BENTON, after expressing his entire concurrence in the amendment of Mr. CALHOUN, sent to the Chair two amendments of his own, which he said comprised the substance of the bill introduced by him two years ago, "to re-establish the constitutional currency of the country." His first amendment provides that, after a day to be specified, all the public dues should be paid in gold and silver only, and in Treasury notes and land scrip, as might by law be authorized; and the second provides that, after the resumption of specie payments by the banks, the Treasury should begin with specie payments.

[These amendments, together with Mr. CALHOUN's, were ordered to be printed.]

Mr. B. said he should not have risen in this debate, had it not been for the misapprehensions which seemed to pervade the minds of some Senators as to the character of the bill. It is called by some a paper-money bill, and by others a bill to germinate a new national debt. These are serious imputations, and require to be answered, not by declamation and recrimination, but by facts and reasons, addressed to the candor and to the intelligence of an enlightened and patriotic community.

I dissent from the imputations on the character of the bill. I maintain that it is neither a paper-money bill, nor a bill to lay the foundation for a new national debt; and will briefly give my reasons for believing as I do on both points.

There are certainly two classes of Treasury notes—one for investment, and one for circulation; and both classes are known to our laws, and possess distinctive features, which define their respective characters, and confine them to their respective uses.

The notes for investment bear an interest sufficient to induce capitalists to exchange gold and silver for them, and to lay them by as a productive fund. This is their distinctive feature, but not the only one; they possess other subsidiary qualities, such as transferability only by endorsement—payable at a fixed time—not re-issuable—nor of small denomination—and to be cancelled when paid. Notes of this class are, in fact, loan notes—notes to raise loans on, by selling them for hard money—either immediately by the Secretary of the Treasury, or, secondarily, by the creditor of the Government to whom they have been paid. In a word, they possess all the qualities which invite investment, and forbid and impede circulation. The act of 1812 authorized an issue of notes of this description. They bore five and two-fifths per cent. interest, with an express clause that the Secretary of the Treasury might raise money upon them by loan. I presume there are Senators present who were members of the House of Representatives in 1812, who gave the sanction of their approbation to the Treasury note law of that year, and who would be very unwilling to hear the epithets applied to that law which are lavished upon this bill, which is copied from it.

The Treasury notes for currency are distinguished by features and qualities the reverse of those which have been mentioned. They bear little or no interest. They are payable to bearer—transferable by delivery—re-issuable—of low denominations—and frequently reimbursable at the pleasure of the Government. They are, in fact, paper-money, and possess all the qualities which forbid investment, and invite to circulation. The Treasury notes of 1815 were of that character, except for the optional clause to enable the holder to fund them at the interest which commanded loans—at seven per cent.

These are the distinctive features of the two classes of notes. Now try the committee's bill by the test of these qualities. It will be found that the notes which it authorizes belong to the first-named class; that they are to bear an interest, which may be six per cent.; that they are transferable only by endorsement; that they are not re-issuable; that they are to be paid at a day certain, to wit, within one year; that they are not to be issued of less denomination than one hundred dollars; are to be cancelled when taken up; and that the Secretary of the Treasury is expressly authorized to raise money upon them by loaning them.

These are the features and qualities of the notes to be issued, and they define and fix their character as notes to raise loans, and to be laid by as investments, and not as notes for currency, to be pushed into circulation by the power of the Government, and to add to the curse of the day by increasing the quantity of unconvertible paper money.

The execution of the act, and especially the cardinal feature of the quantum of interest, is left to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. I presume it will be executed as a law to borrow money; and in that point of view the interest was left open, under a maximum limit, as is proper to be done in all propositions for loans. Bids may be invited by advertisement; the competition of lenders may fix the interest; capitalists may fix it by competition, though nominally left to the discretion of the President and Secretary; and at whatever rate it is thus fixed—at whatever rate a loan of gold and silver is commanded—at that rate the whole issue, made at any one time, ought to go. There should not be two rates of interest—a high one for the independent and opulent capitalist, and a low one for the helpless and necessitous public creditor.

This is my opinion of the character of these Treasury notes, and of the mode of using them. I cannot doubt but that lenders will present themselves, and that the whole ten millions may be borrowed in gold and silver just as fast as the Government needs it. That opinion is formed upon data—upon the great amount of specie now in the country, its unproductiveness to its present holders, and the facility with which large amounts of specie were borrowed immediately after the bank suspensions and the commercial revulsions of 1819. The specie in the United States cannot now be less than it was six months ago, to wit, eighty millions of dollars; for it is shown by the Custom-house reports, and other data, that, notwithstanding the efforts to ship it to Europe, the imports and exports are about even during that time; and that, taking the whole fiscal year together, the imports now exceed the exports by nearly four millions of dollars; and that near $900,000 in gold have been coined in the first three quarters of the present calendar year. The specie in the country cannot, therefore, be less than $80,000,000, and, upon the calculation of last year, is more. The whole of this vast amount is lying idle, barren, and unproductive to its owners—not that they are all unwilling to lend it, and to receive interest, but for want of borrowers in whom they have confidence. The United States will present that borrower, and will bring forth the boarded treasures which the lack of general confidence now consigns to sterility in private chests and in special bank deposits. Thus it was in 1819-'20. The commercial and bank catastrophe of that period took place in 1819; in less than a year afterwards, from the collapse of business and the stagnation of commerce, money in the Atlantic cities was abundant, idle, and seeking investment at four or five per cent. So says Mr. Cheves—so we can all remember.

The bill has been denounced as the germ of a new national debt. It certainly proposes the creation of a debt. But for what purpose, and under what circumstances? To comply with the maxim, that a public debt is a public blessing? By no means! But to relieve the States from being called upon for a reimbursement of any part of the twenty-seven millions of dollars which have been deposited with them; to relieve the merchants from an immediate payment of four millions; and to relieve the late deposit banks from an immediate press for six millions. This is the object. The loan of ten millions on the Treasury notes comes in place of the four and six millions due from merchants and the banks. It is because we cannot collect the one, that we create the other. If we had the ten millions from the merchants and the banks, we should not want the Treasury notes; not being able to collect those ten millions, we give time to our debtors, and borrow an equivalent sum.

I trust I have vindicated the bill from the stigma of being a paper currency bill, and from the imputation of being the first step towards the creation of a new national debt. I hope it is fully cleared from the odium of both these imputations. I will now say a few words on the policy of issuing Treasury notes in time of peace, or even in time of war, until the ordinary resources of loans and taxes had been tried and exhausted. I am no friend to the issue of Treasury notes of any kind. As loans, they are a disguised mode of borrowing, and easy to slide into a currency: as a currency, it is the most seductive, the most dangerous, and the most liable to abuse of all the descriptions of paper money. "The stamping of paper (by Government) is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, or of borrowing money, that a Government in the habit of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any emergency, to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource, to avoid as much as possible one less auspicious to present popularity." So said General Hamilton; and Jefferson, Madison, Macon, Randolph, and all the fathers of the republican church, concurred with him. These sagacious statesmen were shy of this facile and seductive resource, "so liable to abuse, and so certain of being abused." They held it inadmissible to recur to it in time of peace, and that it could only be thought of amidst the exigencies and perils of war, and that after exhausting the direct and responsible alternative of loans and taxes. Bred in the school of these great men, I came here at this session to oppose, at all risks, an issue of Treasury notes. I preferred a direct loan, and that for many and cogent reasons. There is clear authority to borrow in the constitution; but, to find authority to issue these notes, we must enter the field of constructive powers. To borrow, is to do a responsible act; it is to incur certain accountability to the constituent, and heavy censure if it cannot be justified; to issue these notes, is to do an act which few consider of, which takes but little hold of the public mind, which few condemn and some encourage, because it increases the quantum of what is vainly called money. Loans are limited by the capacity, at least, of one side to borrow, and of the other to lend; the issue of these notes has no limit but the will of the makers and the supply of lamp-black and rags. The continental bills of the Revolution, and the assignats of France, should furnish some instructive lessons on this head. Direct loans are always voluntary on the part of the lender; Treasury note loans may be a forced borrowing from the Government creditor—as much so as if the bayonet were put to his breast; for necessity has no law, and the necessitous claimant must take what is tendered, whether with or without interest—whether ten or fifty per cent. below par. I distrust, dislike, and would fain eschew, this Treasury note resource. I prefer the direct loans of 1820-'21. I could only bring myself to acquiesce in this measure when it was urged that there was not time to carry a loan through its forms; nor even then could I consent to it, until every feature of a currency operation had been eradicated from the face of the bill.

Mr. WALKER said he had all along intended to offer a similar amendment, and would now (by leave of Mr. C.) do so. Mr. W. said he was opposed to allowing any interest whatever on the notes to be issued, and for the following reasons: First, because it appeared to him quite unnecessary to allow interest on them. This Government, possessed of a public domain of such vast extent and value, amounting to at least seven hundred millions of acres, and being out of debt, (the only Government of which such a proud circumstance could be related,) was not under the necessity of alluring credit to its notes by the offer of a trifling interest. Notes issued by such a Government would command full credit equal to gold and silver, and would freely pass as such without interest. This was his first reason against these notes bearing any interest.

His second reason was the following: If these notes are made to bear interest, they would, almost immediately on their issue, take their flight to Europe; they would be transmitted there, instead of specie; and, coming from a Government of such undoubted credit, they would be freely received there in payment of our debts, even without bearing any interest. Much more, therefore, would they be made welcome in Europe when they bore interest. This was his second reason for wishing to allow no interest upon them, because it would lead to their more rapid abstraction from circulation here.

A third reason Mr. W. would now state, which, indeed, was a branch of his second reason, but to which he earnestly solicited the attention of Senators. He thought that, in consequence of the issue of these bills, bearing interest, an immediate effect would be produced upon the price of cotton, highly injurious to the interests of planters in the South. There is now (said Mr. W.) a demand for cotton, and, consequently, a rise in its price. The cause of this he was disposed to attribute to the fact that cotton was a better remittance to Europe in payment of our debts than specie; and, therefore, merchants who had to remit to Europe, instead of buying specie, bought cotton, and remitted it in the place of specie. Hence a demand for cotton in the market. He (Mr. W.) understood that the Bank of the United States itself had gone into market and bought up cotton to send to Europe, instead of specie, setting the example of a remittance so highly conducive to the interests of the cotton-grower—having purchased (he believed) as much as three millions of dollars worth of cotton.

Now, the effects of this issue, with interest, would be, that the whole ten millions issued would be sent to Europe, instead of the produce of the country; and, consequently, ten millions less of cotton, or other produce, would be sold. This he (Mr. W.) considered absolutely the same thing as directly taking so much money out of the pockets of the Southern producers, because, but for this measure, so much money would be expended with them in the purchase of their produce. If the merchants who now remitted cotton instead of specie could find any thing more convenient for them to remit—more easily to be procured and transmitted—they would naturally avail themselves of it. Now, these notes bearing interest were precisely this convenient remittance which the merchants wanted; and, therefore, instead of buying up any more cotton, they will possess themselves of these notes, and remit them. And, on the other hand, they in Europe would prefer these notes to our cotton, as coming from a Government such as he (Mr. W.) had described, and bearing interest besides, which the cotton did not. Thus the effect would be to throw the cotton of the South out of the market, and thereby cause a fall in its price ruinous to the already ruined producers. Such a measure he, as coming from the great cotton-growing State, felt himself called upon most strenuously to oppose.

Another reason he would state why he wished this issue of notes bearing an interest should not take place; it was this: these notes being remitted to Europe, (as undoubtedly they would be,) would create a debt abroad against us. Our Government would thus be made a debtor to foreign Governments and people—a thing in his view by no means desirable. Mr. W. concluded by moving that so much of the bill as relates to allowing interest upon the notes be stricken out.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed himself taken by surprise with the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi. From the discussion which had already taken place on this bill, it was evident that there was much difference of opinion among Senators on this subject; some differed from views of policy, others on principle. He confessed it was his hope that the amendment just offered would not be agreed to. The object which he was anxious to attain was, to make these notes, as far as practicable, equal to gold and silver, and as acceptable to the public creditor. Now, it did not appear to him that this object could be attained unless the discretion allowed by this bill to the Secretary was retained in the bill. Mr. W. did not think that the country, at this peculiar juncture, was in a condition to bear the emission of notes without interest. The effect of such an issue would be to cause the notes to sink in value in the market; but if they bore interest, no risk of this kind he thought would be run. It was to be borne in mind that the interest was not fixed; it was only limited not to exceed six per cent.; in every other respect, the question was left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, must profess the high respect he entertained for the sentiments and opinions of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and of the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER.) It was, therefore, somewhat painful to his feelings to be obliged, on the present occasion, to differ from those honorable gentlemen. There was one principle of finance which appeared to him incontrovertible: namely, that whenever there existed two sorts of currency in circulation, of which the one, from any cause, possessed any advantages above the other, by answering any one purpose more than the other, then that would always command a small premium over the other. This truth was fully evidenced at the present moment, when drafts which had even been protested, yet, coming from the Government, commanded a premium little inferior to that of gold and silver. In order to place these Treasury notes in the most favorable position, and to prevent their depreciation, Mr. K. thought that the discretion allowed by the bill ought to be left with the Secretary, to be used according to the emergency of circumstances. The Secretary might then attach to the notes what interest might be necessary to make them acceptable to the creditors of the Government. He did not entertain the apprehensions of his honorable friend from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) that these notes would find their way to Europe. We had had kites enough, (and, indeed, too many,) which had been made to fly across the Atlantic; and now he thought no more of our paper would find its way to Europe—at least until our debt was paid off there.

Mr. K. proceeded further to combat the opinion of Mr. WALKER, urging that at the present state of the exchanges between the two countries, a better state of things could not perhaps be expected.

Mr. BENTON asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. WALKER's motion; which were ordered, and the amendment was rejected—ayes 6, noes 40, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, McKean, Strange, Walker, Young—6.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Ky., Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Ala., King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Conn., Smith of Ind., Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright—40.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Ala., King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, Young—42.

NAYS.—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Preston, Southard, Spence—5.

Merchants' Bonds.

The bill extending the time for the payment of merchants' revenue bonds, was next taken up.

Mr. SEVIER called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered, and it was carried in the affirmative—ayes 44, noes 1; Mr. SEVIER only voting in the negative.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, September 19.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

The bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes;

The bill to extend the time of payment on merchants' revenue bonds; and

The bill for adjusting the remaining claims on the late deposit banks.

Kinds of Money for Revenue.

Mr. RIVES, pursuant to notice, rose to ask leave to introduce a bill to designate the funds receivable in payment of the revenues of the Government.

Mr. R., on introducing the bill, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I rise, in pursuance of the notice I gave yesterday, to ask leave to bring in "A bill to designate the funds receivable in payment of the revenue of the United States." It will be borne in mind by the Senate that among the most prominent, and certainly not the least important objects presented both by the President's Message and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the "immediate attention" of Congress at their present session, is the expediency of some legislative provision defining the character of the funds to be received, in future, in discharge of the public dues. From the intimate connection between the collection of the public revenue and the general currency of the country, this question has, in my estimation, far more essential bearings on the great interests of the community than any which the President has submitted for our deliberations. The Committee on Finance, however, to whom the Message was referred, have not thought it proper to make any report on that portion of it, and we have been informed by the honorable chairman, that it is not their intention to make any report upon it at the present session. It is this omission on the part of the committee that it is the object of my motion now to supply.

The President recommends that henceforward the whole revenues of the United States shall be collected exclusively in gold and silver. A proposition of so marked a character, emanating from a source of such high authority, could not fail to excite deep anxiety in the public mind; and it seemed to me that all uncertainty in regard to the policy of the Government on so vital a subject, should be promptly settled one way or the other, by the action of the legislative department. It is my misfortune to differ with the President in his views of the expediency of this proposition. I am fully convinced that, in the actual condition of our circulating medium, and in what is likely for years to come to be its condition, the operation of such a measure would be distressing to the community, injurious to every branch of industry and enterprise, and, above all, would postpone indefinitely that return to specie payments by the banks, which is the great object of the public solicitude, and ought to be the end and aim of our deliberations here. Viewing the question in this light, I desired it should be met with promptitude, considered with candor, and decided with wisdom.

Since I gave notice yesterday of my motion, two gentlemen, the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) have submitted propositions intended to carry out the President's recommendation, differing somewhat in detail, but both founded on the principle of rejecting bank paper altogether in the operations of the Government, even though immediately convertible into specie, and issued by banks of unquestionable solidity. Both contemplate, as does the recommendation of the President, a thorough revolution in the policy and practice of the Government. From the origin of the Government it has been the practice of the Treasury Department to treat the notes of specie-paying banks as equivalent to specie; and the joint resolution of 1816 expressly placed bank notes convertible into specie on the same footing with specie, in the fiscal transactions of the Government. It is true that, under the construction given to that act by the law officer of the Government, the late President of the United States caused an order to be issued requiring payments for public lands to be made in gold and silver alone, still leaving the other branch of the revenue (the customs) to be collected as heretofore, in the notes of, or checks on, specie-paying banks. That order was understood at the time to be issued for objects purely of a temporary nature, and as such it may have been a salutary measure. But its continuance as a part of the permanent policy of the Government was almost unanimously repudiated by the voice of the representatives of the people and of the States.

You well remember, Mr. President, that the discussions to which this subject gave rise, during the last session of Congress, terminated in the passage of a bill, by overwhelming majorities of both Houses, distinctly reaffirming the principle of the joint resolution of 1816, in relation to the receivability of the notes of specie-paying banks, and containing also the significant provision that, in future, no discrimination should be made between the different branches of the revenue, as to the medium in which they were to be paid. This bill received the votes of nine-tenths of the members of this House, and near three-fourths of the other. Still it did not become a law. The circumstances under which it was arrested in the ordinary and regular course, and which alone prevented it from being now the law of the land, are fresh in the recollection of the country. I will not speak of them, for it is my sincere wish to keep out of the present discussion every thing which may awaken unpleasant feelings. But this I will say, that no act of legislation was ever the subject of a more watchful scrutiny, in the various stages of its progress; few, if any, have ever met a fuller discussion, or a more deliberate consideration; none, within my experience, have ever received a more unanimous and emphatic assent of the bodies by which it was passed. The country, too, so far as I have been able to learn, (and I have not been an inattentive observer of the evidence of public sentiment on the subject,) has responded with a general voice of approbation to the decision of Congress, and warmly and cordially sustained it. It is that measure, thus doubly sanctioned, with some modifications suited to the change of circumstances, that I beg leave to re-present as a compliance with the call of the President on Congress for further legislation, believing it to be adapted to the exigencies of the occasion, as well as useful and salutary in its general operation on the currency.

The principles of that bill were these: It declared that the public dues should be collected in specie, or in the notes of specie-paying banks, under certain restrictions in regard to small notes, which were intended to promote the suppression (ultimately but gradually) of all notes under twenty dollars; and it further provided, as I have already stated, that, in future, no discrimination should be made between the different branches of the revenue, as to the funds in which they were receivable. These principles are incorporated in the bill I now ask leave to present, and in the very language in which they stood in the bill of last session. The modifications of that bill which I have made with reference to existing circumstances are these: In contemplation of the contingency (now highly probable) of an issue of Treasury notes, I have introduced an alternative clause, declaring that, in addition to specie and the notes of specie-paying banks, the public dues may be collected "in any other medium specially authorized by law." The other modification has relation to the great desideratum of an early resumption of specie payments by the banks, and consists in a proviso that "the notes of no bank which now fails, or may hereafter fail, to redeem its notes in specie, shall, at any time, be received in discharge of the public dues, unless such bank shall, on or before a given day, have bona fide resumed payment in specie." The object of this proviso is to designate a fixed period for the resumption of specie payments by the banks, which may serve as a rallying point to them all, and produce that concert and harmony of movement, without which this most desirable end cannot be accomplished. There will be no difficulty, I think, from the data already in our possession, or easily attainable, in fixing that period understandingly and judiciously. The mere designation of a day by Congress will, itself, be powerfully operative in effecting the result we aim at. You doubtless recollect, Mr. President, what was the effect produced by a similar proceeding in 1816-'17. By the joint resolution of April, 1816, the 20th of February following was fixed as the day for the resumption of specie payments by the banks. The banks themselves determined, in a formal convention held for the purpose, not to resume until the 1st day of July, 1817; but the firm adherence of Congress to their original resolution forced the banks to yield, and they finally and simultaneously resumed specie payments on the 20th February, 1817, the day indicated by the act of Congress. I have, Mr. President, spoken of this matter in reference to the particular circumstances of the crisis, and what appears to me to be the pressing and paramount object to which the attention of every patriotic legislator ought to be directed at the present moment—an early resumption of specie payments by the banks. But, looking at it in a broader and more general point of view, I ask, sir, upon what principle of republican government is it that the Government can be justified in drawing a line between itself and the people—in saying there shall be one currency for the Government and its officers, and another for the great body of the community—that the better currency shall be for the governors, and the baser currency for the governed? Such I have shown must be the effect of demanding the public dues in gold and silver exclusively, while the great mass of the circulation shall consist of bank paper. Sir, I have always been taught to believe—my honorable colleague and myself learned it from the bill of rights of our own State as soon as we were capable of reading—that a common interest between the governors and the governed is a fundamental principle of free institutions, and that the best means of “restraining the former from oppression is to make them feel and participate in the burdens of the latter.” Let the Government share the same fate with the citizen, and you give it the strongest of all motives to watch over the general interests. On the other hand, place it in a position different from that of the great body of the community, especially in so vital a matter as that of its revenue and pecuniary support, and you make it at once callous and indifferent to the sufferings of the people, and even give it an interest to perpetuate those sufferings. You destroy all sympathy on the part of the Government with the people, and you alienate the confidence and affections of the people from the Government.

What, sir, is at this moment the ungracious attitude in which the Government is placed towards the people? Its officers and contractors are paid in gold and silver, or in Treasury drafts made receivable in discharge of public dues, and therefore nearly equivalent to gold and silver, while the community at large are left to conduct their business as they may, in an irredeemable paper currency. Does not this operate as a virtual increase of the salaries of public officers, in the midst of general distress affecting all the rest of the community? The gold and silver which they receive is at a premium of ten or twelve per cent., and the Treasury drafts at seven or eight per cent., above the actual and common currency of the country. This premium is, I repeat, an addition of so much to the amount of their salaries; for, in a practical sense, there has as yet been no depreciation in the value of current bank notes. They pass for as much in the ordinary business of life—in the payment of debts, in the purchase of necessities and conveniences, of whatever is worn, drank, or eaten—as they ever did. The premium, then, which the public officers and contractors obtain on their gold and silver, and Treasury drafts, is so much clear gain to them. And at whose expense is it acquired?

Vol. XIII.—24

Is it not at that of the great body of the people, the ultimate taxpayers and supporters of the Government. Does any one suppose that the importing merchant, who has to give ten or twelve per cent. for the gold and silver, and seven or eight per cent. for the Treasury drafts, with which he pays his duties to the Government, does not add an equal amount, with the usual profit upon it, to the price of his goods? It is, then, the consumer at last, or, in other words, the great body of the people, who are subject to increased taxation for the benefit of the office-holder and the contractor.

Sir, this is a state of things which I do not wish to see perpetuated. It is contrary to the genius and fundamental principles of our republican system. Of all schemes of policy I can conceive, that which proposes a permanent distinction between the Government and the people in their pecuniary interests—one currency, and that the better one, for the Government, and another, and inferior currency, for the people—such a system of discrimination is, to my mind, of all others, the most injurious and revolting in principle, the most heartless in character, and the most despotic in its tendencies. It is like quartering the Government, as a foreign enemy, on the heart of the country. You intrench it behind a frowning fortification, surround it with battlements, and lay the country, far and near, under contribution for the support of this garrison of office-holders. Desolation and oppression are without, while the tenants of the citadel are revelling in luxury and profusion within. I am not willing, for one, to see the Government of my country placed in this antisocial, if not belligerent, attitude towards the people. I am not willing that this favored land, to which the nations of the earth are looking for a successful example of the practical enjoyment of free institutions, should exhibit such a spectacle of inequality and oppression in the eyes of the world.

Much reliance, Mr. President, has been placed on the popular catch-word of divorcing the Government from all connection with banks. Nothing is more delusive and treacherous than catch-words. How often has the revered name of liberty been invoked, in every quarter of the globe, and every age of the world, to disguise and sanctify the most heartless despotism. Let us beware that, in attempting to divorce the Government from all connection with banks, we do not end with divorcing the Government from the people. As long as the people shall be satisfied in their transactions with each other, with a sound convertible paper medium, with a due proportion of the precious metals forming the basis of that medium, and mingled in the current of circulation, why should the Government reject altogether this currency of the people, in the operations of the public Treasury? If this currency be good enough for the masters, it ought to be so for the servants. If the Government sternly reject, for its uses, the general medium of exchange adopted by the community, is it not thereby isolated from the general wants and business of the country, in relation to this great concern of the currency? Do you not give it a separate, if not hostile, interest, and thus, in effect, produce a divorce between Government and people?—a result, of all others, to be most deprecated in a republican system.

We have been told, Mr. President, of the embarrassments and inconveniences to which the Government is exposed, by receiving its revenues in any thing but gold and silver, in such an event as has now overtaken the country and involved it in general distress. For one, sir, I cannot respond to this appeal. I do not desire to see the Government placed in a position that would exempt it from embarrassment when the people are embarrassed. Would it give any satisfaction to a patriotic mind, in the present calamitous condition of the country, to see treasures of gold and silver pouring into the coffers of the Government, while the people are suffering all the evils of an irredeemable and depreciating paper currency? For myself, I am free to say, that neither as a citizen nor as a representative, having it in my power, if I would, to participate, in some degree, in these peculiar advantages of the Government, could such a state of things minister the slightest gratification to me. No, sir, my heart disowns the thought. So far from it, the contrast would be but a new feature added to the mortifying and distressed condition of the country, and casting reproach upon our institutions, which admitted such an unnatural and anti-republican inequality. If any thing could make your Government a callous and indifferent spectator of the sufferings of the people, refusing a helping hand to their relief, and “mocking when their fear cometh on,” it would be to place it in a position like this. No, sir; whenever the people suffer embarrassment, embarrassment should be felt by the Government, that it may be stimulated, through experience of the common suffering, to do all it can to prevent or relieve that suffering. I am for holding the Government in all things to a common fate with the people, so that whatever touches the one shall be immediately felt by the other. Let the condition of the Government answer to the condition of the people, so that the conduct and policy of the one may, with equal fidelity, reflect the interests and sentiments of the other.

This, sir, is the principle which has always guided my views in regard to the great question of the currency. No one desires a sound reform of the currency more than I do; but I wish to improve it for the benefit of the people as well as of the Government. I desire to see a large infusion of the precious metals into the general circulation and business of the country, and not a monopoly of them by the Government. This great object can be effected only by the suppression of bank notes of the lower denominations, and not by demanding gold and silver alone in payment of dues to the Government. Let all notes under twenty dollars be gradually suppressed, and you will have an abundance of gold and silver in common circulation, passing from hand to hand in the common business of society. That will be a salutary and beneficent reform, enuring to the advantage of the great body of the people as well as of the Government; and when it shall have been accomplished, when gold and silver shall thus have become the common currency of the country, you may, without hardship or injustice, demand payment of the public dues in the precious metals. But this most desirable result—the general circulation of gold and silver in the common business of life—never can be effected (as I think I have fully shown on another occasion) without a previous suppression of bank notes of the lower denominations. In every scheme of reforming the currency, which looks to the benefit of the people as well as of the Government, this is the great point to be aimed at. It was the leading object of the measure I brought forward during the last session of Congress, and which then received the almost unanimous sanction of this House, and the assent of a large majority of the other, though, from causes to which I have already alluded, it failed to become a law. The same measure, in all its essential principles, I now again submit for the consideration of the Senate.

The President, sir, in his Message, tells us that the requisition of gold and silver in payment of the public dues would have “a direct tendency to produce a wide circulation of the precious metals, to increase the safety of bank paper, and to improve the general currency.” I desire to treat the opinions of the President with all possible respect—a respect felt alike for the individual and the magistrate; but unless I have wholly misconceived the elementary principles which belong to this subject, as well as their obvious practical operation, it is impossible to sustain any one of these positions. How, sir, can the collection of the revenue in gold and silver tend “to widen the circulation of the precious metals?” It is a well-known and invariable law of currency, that bank notes and coins of the same denomination cannot circulate together. It is in vain, then, to attempt to widen the circulation of gold and silver by any other means than by the suppression of bank notes of the lower denominations. But, not now to dwell on this view of the subject, (which I have fully developed and enforced elsewhere,) I maintain that the collection of public revenue in gold and silver, while the common currency of the country consists of bank paper, instead of widening the circulation of those metals, would have the effect of taking them out of general circulation altogether. In the remarks I have already made, I think it has been satisfactorily shown that the necessary effect of this policy would be to cause gold and silver to bear a premium. Bearing a premium, they would not circulate as currency at all, but would be at once converted into an article of merchandise. The public debtor would buy them of the broker to pay his dues to the Government; and when paid out to the public creditor, he would go and sell them again to the broker. Instead of entering into circulation, all of them that were seen would be restricted to this narrow round of traffic, while the great mass of them would be withdrawn from public view as well as use.

Then, sir, as to the tendency of this policy to "increase the safety of bank paper"—would you increase the safety of bank paper by abstracting the fund for its redemption? Yet such would be the plain operation of this policy. The Secretary of the Treasury has referred to the condition of the Treasury in 1834, as affording a general average to illustrate the operation of the new financial system he proposes. In looking at the Treasury statements for that year, I find that the average amount of public moneys on deposit in the city of New York, during that year, was about five millions, while the whole amount of specie in the banks of the city was about two millions. Taking this as a fair average for that city, what would be the influence of this new policy of collecting the public dues in gold and silver, on the safety of bank paper there? Where would you get the five millions of specie to meet this demand for the public revenue? It is evident the banks would be drained by it of their stock of the precious metals, and the community would thus be deprived of the security on which they relied for the soundness of the bank paper held by them. The "improvement of the general currency," then, which the President anticipates as the result of the policy he proposes, would, unless the principles heretofore received as incontestable truths on the subject of the currency be utter fallacies, amount to this, that the precious metals would no longer form a part of the general circulation; that they would cease to be currency, and become mere articles of merchandise, to be obtained only at a premium, and that the specie basis, on which the soundness and safety of bank paper so mainly depend, would henceforward, to a great extent, be withdrawn and monopolized by the Government.

The measure which I now offer to the consideration of the Senate, and which received the almost unanimous sanction of both Houses of Congress at the last session, is the result of these views. Permit me, for a few moments, to inquire what would be its practical effects on the general condition of the currency, if the policy it holds out should be carried into full effect by the co-operation of the States and the General Government, as I think it would be if sustained here. It contemplates the gradual suppression, after given periods, of all bank notes under ten and twenty dollars respectively. Supposing this last limit attained, how would the currency of the country then stand under its operation? According to a calculation I submitted last winter, founded on authentic data, it would in that case be constituted nearly as the currency of England is, that is, nearly one-half of the precious metals, and the residue of convertible paper. Would not such a constitution of the currency as this accommodate all the wants of the community? What are the real wants of the country in regard to currency? To have a sound, staple, and convenient medium of circulation, for ordinary and local purposes; and for occasional and more extended use, a medium which, in addition to these fundamental properties, shall be substantially of uniform value throughout the whole country. Now, for the first description of uses there could be no better currency than the policy of this bill would give us. There would be an abundance of gold and silver in circulation for the great mass of ordinary and daily transactions, while, for large payments and remittances, we should enjoy the conveniences of a sound, convertible paper medium. In regard to those distant uses which call for a medium of general and uniform credit, the occasions of them are either travelling or remittances. But for travelling, there could be no medium of more uniform and general credit than the gold coins, which, in the case supposed, could always be had without difficulty, while they would at the same time be perfectly portable and convenient. As to distant remittances, they are hardly ever made in money of any sort, but are effected through drafts and bills of exchange; and when the local currencies within their respective spheres shall be raised to par with specie, the rates of exchange, with the advantages of so portable a currency as gold to adjust balances between the States, would be next to nothing—certainly as cheap as it has ever been under the regime of a national bank.

Among the most important advantages of such a constitution of the currency as is contemplated by this bill, are the substantial securities it would afford against the peculiar dangers and evils of the banking system. Those evils are, a tendency to over-issues of paper, fluctuations in the quantity of currency and in the value of property as effected by them, and the liability to a suspension of specie payments. The suppression of the small notes would operate, in two ways, to check over-issues. In bringing a larger quantity of gold and silver into circulation, it would, of course, diminish in the same proportion the issues of paper to form a part of the circulation. The number of issuers, too, would be diminished; for, the small note circulation being a considerable source of profit, its suppression would take away one efficient motive to the multiplication of banks. Then as to fluctuations in the amount of the currency, and the often ruinous fluctuations that ensue in the value of property, this evil is greatly increased by the fact that, in the existing state of the currency in this country, whenever an unfavorable balance of trade creates a drain on the banks for specie, having no means of recruiting their supply but from abroad, for every dollar of specie that is drawn from them, they are forced to draw in their own circulation to three or four times the amount. But when the domestic channels are filled with gold and silver, as they would be if the small notes were suppressed, the banks, being always able to replace whatever specie is drawn from them, by a foreign drain, with an equal quantity obtained in the country, their circulation remains comparatively steady. The same circumstance, enabling the banks to meet any sudden run upon them by a prompt reinforcement of their resources, obviates the danger of a suspension of specie payments, and renders such a contingency next to impossible. If all bank notes under twenty dollars had been suppressed, who, for example, could suppose that, filled as the channels of circulation would in that case have been with gold and silver, and the quantity of bank paper comparatively small, the banks of this country would, in the late pressure, have been compelled to suspend specie payments?

The system of policy, then, proposed by this bill, if carried into full execution, would secure to the country a sound, stable, convenient, and substantially uniform currency—consisting nearly one-half of coin for the daily and ordinary transactions of life, and the residue of sound convertible paper, for large operations and commercial purposes. Without depriving the community of any of the advantages of the banking system, it would obviate the danger and cure the evils incident to that system. But the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) while acknowledging the high importance of the reform contemplated by the bill, objects that the means proposed for its accomplishment are inefficient. If that gentleman be right in supposing that the credit of bank paper is owing to its receivability in payment of the public dues, which, he says, operates as a general endorsement of it by the Government, then surely the means proposed by the bill are not inefficient. What more powerful inducements could be addressed to the banks to conform their issues to the provisions of the bill, than the announcement that, if they did not do so, the Government would withhold from them that which, according to the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina, alone gives credit to their paper? But, without agreeing with the Senator from South Carolina in the extent to which he carries his views of the credit of bank paper being solely derived from its receivability by the Government, I still believe that the sanctions of this bill, though I have never supposed them sufficient of themselves to fully accomplish the object, would exert a very considerable influence on the conduct of the banks. It must not be forgotten that the means proposed by this bill are the very means employed by the joint resolution of 1816, to bring the banks back to specie payments on that occasion, and which, notwithstanding the previously declared determination of the banks to the contrary, did bring them back to specie payments on the day fixed by that resolution. The same means, too, were employed with success by the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1815, to induce the banks to receive Treasury notes (which had sustained a considerable depreciation) at par, though they had before refused to receive them either in payment or on deposit.

One of the most alarming and portentous aspects of this sub-Treasury scheme still remains to be considered. To my view it has a squinting, an "awful squinting," towards a Treasury bank—a bank under the sovereign and exclusive control of Executive agents. It appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the contemplated fiscal agencies are to furnish "a paper medium" for the community, by "issuing certificates and drafts payable in specie to bearer or order, and made receivable for all public dues." After descanting on the advantages of "this kind of paper," he says: "If the demand for such paper increased, public and private convenience might be promoted, and an equal quantity of specie, at the same time, preserved in the country, by reserving for this purpose, from any accumulation in the Treasury, a sufficient sum, and placing it at a few important and convenient points, to render a greater number of certificates redeemable there with the very coin whose representative they are intended and honestly ought to be." These views of the Secretary are referred to, and impliedly sanctioned, by the President in his Message. Now, sir, is not this apparatus, to all intents and purposes, a Government bank? The fundamental idea of a bank is an institution which "issues and circulates a paper credit, founded on a deposit of coin or other property, which paper credit is to answer the purposes of money!" This project fulfils every feature of the definition. The officers of the Government are to issue a paper credit in the form of certificates and drafts founded on a deposit of specie in the Treasury and sub-Treasuries, which paper credit is to answer the purposes of money, or a general "circulating medium." It is a remarkable coincidence that this scheme is the precise embodying of the outline given by General Hamilton in 1791, of what he describes and avows to be a bank—a Government bank. Such, I believe, is the tendency and virtual operation of the sub-Treasury scheme.

I ask gentlemen, then, if they are willing to organize a great moneyed machine like this, and put it, for all future time, in the hands of the Executive; if they are willing, in the form of a fiscal agency, to create a Treasury bank, with its ramifications penetrating every part of the Union, to be managed, directed, and controlled exclusively by Executive agents? To my mind it presents a fearful conjunction—realizing that union between the moneyed and political power of the country, which reflecting men have hitherto considered the most fatal of all devices to the liberties of the people. I have revolved

Kinds of Money for Revenue.

the subject deeply and anxiously, and I can see but two possible issues to the scheme proposed. It will either terminate in a great Treasury bank, such as I have described, affording a fatal accommodation to the moneyed concerns of the country at the expense of its liberties, or otherwise failing in any degree to relieve the actual derangement of the currency—on the contrary, abandoning that currency to wild disorder and confusion; the people, finding the inconveniences of such a state of things no longer tolerable, will, with a voice extorted by their sufferings, call for a national regulator in the shape of an incorporated national bank! Either alternative is, to my mind, fearful and alarming; but, believing one or the other to be the destined result of the scheme proposed, I entreat gentlemen to pause and consider well the consequences of their decision.

I recur now, Mr. President, to the question more particularly involved in the bill I ask leave to introduce. I think I have shown, sir, that the exaction of the public dues in gold and silver, while the great mass of the circulation shall consist of bank paper, would be oppressive in practice; that it is anti-republican in principle, as drawing an invidious line of demarcation between the Government and people; and, especially, that, in the present circumstances of the country, it would indefinitely retard, if not render impossible, that resumption of specie payments by the banks which is the great and urgent object of the public solicitude. In considering the propositions which the occasion has brought forth, I have been strongly reminded of the words of a great man—of one born to serve and instruct mankind. Speaking of the province and duties of a practical statesman, that great oracle of political wisdom says: "A statesman differs from a professor in a university. The latter has only the general view of society; the former (the statesman) has a number of circumstances to combine with those general ideas, and to take into consideration. Circumstances are infinite, and infinitely combined, variable, and transient; and he who dares not take them into consideration is not erroneous, but mad, metaphysically mad. A statesman, never losing sight of principles, is to be guided by circumstances; and, judging contrary to the exigencies of the moment, may ruin his country forever." I ask, sir, is this the moment, when the country is weak and suffering, to subject it to the action of so violent a remedy (if remedy it can be called) as that involved in the proposition to collect the revenues in gold and silver? Does it show a wise regard to circumstances, at such a moment, when that credit system, under which the country has grown up to power and greatness, and with which, for the present, at least, its most vital interests are identified—at a moment when that credit system, thus incorporated with the country, has already sustained one of the severest shocks to which it has ever been exposed—is it wise and prudent, I say, to introduce an innovation in the fiscal policy of the Government, which aims a fatal blow at that system, and all the wide-spread and diversified interests connected with it? The effect of this innovation, at the present moment, must be, as I have already shown, to fix upon the country, for an indefinite period of time, the curse of an irredeemable and depreciating paper currency, or otherwise to force, violently and prematurely, an exclusive metallic circulation, by compelling the banks at once to wind up their concerns. But what would be the consequence of thus compelling the banks precipitately to wind up their affairs? They have vastly more debts due to them than they owe. Compel them, then, to wind up, and you turn them loose, or rather drive them, in necessary self-defence, upon the community. According to the most recent and authentic statements upon the subject, the aggregate amount of debts due to the banks is between four and five hundred millions of dollars. Force them by your policy to collect this vast sum from the community, and what a wide-spread scene of desolation, embracing every class of the community, must ensue! The banks will press upon the importing merchant, the importing merchant upon the retail trader, and the latter upon his customers—the laborer, the mechanic, and the farmer. If the result of this desolating process should not be, in the language of Burke, "the ruin of the country forever," it would be, at least, to inflict upon it, causelessly and heedlessly, a blow, from which recovery could be effected only through long years of suffering and distress.

I stand here, Mr. President, as no advocate of the banking system. I have been the constant enemy of its abuses, the correction of which, by salutary and progressive reforms, I have steadily pursued, without aiming, however, at the destruction of the system itself, which the country has chosen to adopt, and under which it has hitherto attained a prosperity unparalleled in any age or quarter of the world. The measure I now offer to the consideration of the Senate is, in my humble judgment, one of the most effective reform. I have no interest whatever in banks. I do not own, never have owned, and never expect to own a single share of stock in any bank, nor do I owe a debt, even of the smallest amount, to a bank. I mention these things, not because I could suppose that other gentlemen, who might happen to be differently situated, could, in the slightest degree, be influenced by considerations of this sort. I deem too highly of the patriotism of my fellow-citizens not to believe them above all personal considerations, as I am sure all with whom I have the honor to be associated on this floor are, in pronouncing on great public questions, involving the interests of the country. I know, however, that there are ungenerous minds, which impute other principles of action to public men; and, following the example of the Senator from South Carolina, who spoke yesterday, (Mr. CALHOUN,) I have thought it not improper to state what, from the nature of my pursuits, happens to be my situation in this respect. Those pursuits identify me by interest, as my feelings and tastes do by sympathy, with the great agricultural body of the community. I am under no bias to regard the interest of other pursuits or other classes of the community, except as I believe that, under our happy institutions, all pursuits and all classes are blended in one common interest, and must prosper or decline together. It is in this spirit, looking to the whole country and all its interests, that we shall, I trust, discharge our duties here. The occasion rises far above the narrow and fleeting interests of party, and demands the best exertions of all for the country. The measure which I have ventured to offer is one on which I have supposed all parties might unite, as all parties have heretofore united. Its effect, I persuade myself, will be both to revive confidence and to furnish security; and, with the language of encouragement and the pledges of a wise and stable policy, proceeding from the national councils here, we shall soon see our youthful and vigorous country rising from her momentary prostration, and, Antæus-like, gathering strength from her fall.

When Mr. RIVES concluded, he introduced his bill; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

WEDNESDAY, September 20.

The Great Fire in New York.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill for the relief of the sufferers by the great conflagration of 1835 in the city of New York; which received its first reading, and was ordered to a second reading to-morrow.

[This bill provides for allowing a remission of all duties already paid or remaining due, on all unbroken and entire packages of goods and merchandise consumed in the fire of New York; and it provides for a proportionate remission on packages which had been opened before the fire. Commissioners are to be appointed, consisting of the collectors and other officers in New York city, whose duty it will be to ascertain the amount of duties paid on packages destroyed by the fire, the names and residences of the sufferers, the amount of goods destroyed, &c. They are to meet in New York, and take testimony on oath respecting these particulars. No claim to be entertained which shall not be presented to the commissioners within four months of the opening of their commissions. The commissioners, on the completion of their investigation, shall make out their statement and send it to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it shall be from time to time to receive and examine the statements of claims presented and admitted by the commissioners, and which shall be subjected to his approval or disapproval. When the Secretary of the Treasury shall have made known his determination upon the claims presented, then the commissioners shall make out certificates of remission according to the amount remitted to the several merchants and claimants, and these certificates, signed by the commissioners, shall be received by the collectors and others as money in payment of duties, &c., to the full amount of the sums remitted. It is provided, however, that every individual receiving such certificates to pass in payment of bonds and dues, &c., shall give security in bond and penalty to pay double the amount of money remitted, with interest, if it should ever appear that the goods on which the remission is made were not in truth destroyed by fire. The commissioners are authorized to employ a clerk, whose salary, not exceeding $2,000, shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.]

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The bill imposing additional duties on public officers, as depositaries for receiving the public money, was then taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and moved the amendment of which he had given notice on Monday he should offer to this bill; which having been stated to the Senate, it was, at the instance of Mr. WRIGHT, with the consent of Mr. CALHOUN, modified to read as follows, the passages enclosed in [] being those added by Mr. W.

"Sec. — And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, three-fourths of the amount due to the Government for duties, taxes, sales of public lands, or other debts, may be received in the notes of specie-paying banks; and that from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, one-half may be so received; and from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty, one-fourth; and from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-one, all sums due for duties, sales of public lands, or other debts to the Government, [and all payments to the General Post Office Department, shall be paid in gold and silver coin only,] or in such notes, bills, or papers issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law; [and from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-one, all officers or agents engaged in the making disbursements for the United States or General Post Office Department, shall make all their payments in gold and silver only, or in such notes or papers as shall be authorized by law; and any revenue or disbursing officer neglecting so to do, shall be dismissed from his office, and forfeit all compensation which shall then be due.]"

Mr. NILES then rose and said: He considered the subject, viewed in all its bearings, in a constitutional, financial, and political aspect, as one of great importance, not inferior, perhaps, to any which, for many years at least, has occupied the attention of Congress. It was one to which he had given some attention, and on which he had reflected much; yet he should not probably have troubled the Senate with any remarks, had it not been for the observation of his distinguished friend from Virginia (Mr. Rives) in his speech yesterday. That Senator, in support of the bill which he had introduced for designating the public funds, which was similar in its provisions to the bill that passed both Houses of Congress last session, and which he (Mr. N.) and other friends of the administration then supported, made an eloquent appeal to himself and others to come out at this time in support of his present bill, or show good reasons why they could not do so.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

Mr. N. said he would respond to the call; he could not support the gentleman's bill, but he would endeavor to give his reasons why he could not. He last session gave his hearty support to the bill referred to, which passed with great unanimity. He did so because he considered that bill as containing no new principle, and only carrying out what was then the established policy of the Government; it left the funds receivable for the revenue as they were placed by the joint resolution of 1816, but contained some provisions intended to operate as inducements upon the State banks to discontinue the issue of notes of the lower denominations. It was true the bill superseded the Treasury circular; and he (Mr. N.) was then disposed to do that, for the same reasons stated by the gentleman from Virginia; he also regarded that as a temporary measure, intended for a particular emergency, to arrest a special mischief. But he could not agree with the Senator in the opinion that the failure of that act, and the continuance of the Treasury order, was one of the causes which had contributed to the pecuniary distress of the country. He had, at the last session, supposed that the exigency which had called forth the order had passed off, but had since become satisfied that he was mistaken. Such had been the condition of the finances of the Government, and the monetary affairs of the country, that he was fully persuaded the order had exerted a most salutary influence, alike favorable to the Government and to the country.

It has secured the revenue received from the public lands, and reinforced the Western banks with specie, which has enabled them to sustain themselves, until the general storm came upon them, as it swept over the whole country. But had it not been for the operation of the order, the Western banks would not merely have suspended payment, but would have exploded months before they, in common with others, suspended payments. Another good effect of the continuance of the order was, that it had drawn specie from the banks all over the country, and thrown it into circulation among the people in the Western States, where he understood more specie was to be found in circulation than in any other section of the Union. And the specie which had been received for the public lands had been an important resource to the Government in its present emergency.

Mr. N. said he gave his support to the currency bill because he did not then think the time had come to change the policy of the Government in respect to the funds in which the revenue was collected. Among the reasons why he could not go then with his distinguished friend from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) who so strenuously opposed the currency bill, was the important fact, that the entire financial concerns of the Government were then conducted through the agency of about ninety banks. It was, in his opinion, in vain to think to change our currency as long as we employed the agency of banks; as all public moneys deposited in them were immediately changed to bank credits. He then believed that, as a preliminary step to the collection of the revenue in specie, we must dispense with the agency of banks.

Sir, the late administration adopted a certain policy in regard to the finances of the Government, and he (Mr. N.) saw no occasion to change that policy at the last session of Congress; and the question on which he and the Senator from Virginia differ, is, whether the great changes which have since taken place, in the prostration not only of the deposit banks, but of the entire banking system of the country, the serious embarrassments to the finances, and the general derangement of the monetary affairs of the nation, require a change in that policy? Has the deposit bank scheme failed? The Senator from Virginia thinks not; he regards the present derangement as the result of temporary causes, some of which originated in the measures of the Government; he thinks that, notwithstanding a gust of wind may have capsized the deposit banks, they can be righted, refitted, and again put in service. But he (Mr. N.) thought the banks had failed in their duties both to the Government and to the public. They had proved themselves to be either weak or faithless agents, and perhaps both. They had suspended payment; they had been guilty of a voluntary act of bankruptcy, in a time of profound peace, and immediately following a period of unusual prosperity, (or what was so regarded,) and when they had in their vaults nearly thirty millions of the public funds. This suspension was entirely different from that of 1814, when the Government itself had been the principal cause of the vast and dangerous issues of the banks, by which they were broken down.

Whether the general and simultaneous failure of the banks was voluntary and fraudulent, as supposed by some, or a measure of necessity, arising from the over-action and imprudent management of those institutions, was not very material; in either case they must be regarded as unsafe depositories of the public revenues. They might answer in ordinary times, when we had a clear sky and smooth sea; when the commerce and finances of the country were stable and regular; but they could not be depended upon in times of difficulty. And in the present instance they had failed and violated their engagements to the Government and to the public without any apparent cause, other than their own mismanagement. He would not charge the banks of having voluntarily been faithless agents; but he would say that they had violated their high and solemn obligations to the Government and to the public, without any reasonable efforts—he might almost say without any effort at all—to save their own credit and that of the commercial community. When the crisis came, mainly brought on by their own imprudent action, how did they meet it? Did they breast the storm with the hearts and nerves which the occasion called for? Did they make any reasonable efforts to weather it and save the country from the calamities which have overwhelmed it? Far, very far from this. If we look to the point where the extended line of banks first gave way—the city of New York—we shall discover the strongest evidence of cowardice or treachery. What stand did the banks make? How long did they sustain themselves against a run? The Bank of England, in 1825, sustained itself against a run for an entire year, and when a general panic prevailed. Why, sir, a frail concern having first given way, and been docked, some of the people, as was natural, became alarmed; but there was no general panic; a crowd gathered round the banks; they were not depositors, or persons who had means to acquire any considerable demands against banks; most of them probably were “boot-blacks,” “chimney-sweeps,” and “wash-women,” with a single bill each of the lower denomination; or perhaps they were of that class of citizens who are becoming very notorious of late—the loco-focos; the officers of the banks look out at their windows and see this formidable array of persons, all armed with their “promises to pay,” about to make an assault upon the banks. What is to be done? Can we make a stand? Can we defend ourselves against this formidable enemy? They did not, however, hesitate long, but, concluding that “discretion was the better part of valor,” they determined to shut their doors, and keep their creditors out. This was certainly a convenient mode of paying debts. At other places the shutting up of the banks was equally sudden; and, what is not a little remarkable, and calculated to excite a suspicion that something was wrong, is the fact that the suspension at New Orleans, Mobile, and other places, occurred a few days after that at New York, but before there could have been any communication. These facts are at least calculated to excite a suspicion that there was a previous understanding among the principal banks in the different cities that they were to suspend payment about the time the explosion took place.

But, however this may be, he would ask whether any one can believe that the banks made any reasonable efforts to sustain their own credit and that of the country? Can the deposit banks, some of which possessed millions of the public money, which closed their doors and stopped payment under such circumstances, be regarded as faithful fiscal agents? Was it not the duty of these corporations to have attempted to sustain their credit, and to have paid out one-quarter or one-half of their specie before they shut their doors in the face of their creditors? If they had met the shock resolutely, and with a willingness to incur a sacrifice, who can say that they might not have gone safely through the crisis?

Whether, therefore, we look to the direct object of the deposit bank system, the safe-keeping and disbursement of the revenue, or the incidental advantage of improving the currency, it was (Mr. N. thought) not to be disputed that the measure had failed. The connection between the Treasury and the State banks is at an end; it has been dissolved by the banks themselves; and the only question now is whether it shall be renewed. He, for one, thought not.

Sir, said Mr. N., I have said all I propose to say in regard to two financial schemes, and it now remains for me to take some notice of the third, which the bill before us is intended to introduce. This last is characterized as a novel and untried experiment, although much older than either of the others. It is the system on which the ancient and most modern nations have conducted their finances; it is, at any rate, as ancient as 1789, as old as the constitution which we have all sworn to support and to regard as the rule and guide of our actions.

This plan consists of the employment of Federal officers to execute that portion of the Executive power which pertains to the keeping and disbursement of the revenue. This seems to be the natural course, and is, at least, recommended by its simplicity and conformity to the true spirit of the constitution. Can any one believe, on perusing that instrument, that its framers contemplated the agency of banks, either State or Federal, in the keeping and disbursement of the revenue? Has not the employment of banks from the first been a manifest departure from the plain and obvious course indicated by the constitution, and may not this departure be justly regarded as the source of all our financial embarrassments and difficulties?

But is the proposed system practicable? This is, perhaps, the most important question connected with the whole subject. Is there any thing in the constitution or in the nature of the fiscal duties of the Government, that renders the agency of banks appropriate and necessary? If that part of the Executive power which relates to the finances cannot be executed except by bank agency, then a system of banks becomes an essential part of the Government itself, and enters into its very elements. It becomes a bank Government, and cannot exist independent of banks in some form. And if it is not maintained that banks are absolutely necessary as fiscal agents, to insist that their agency is the most suitable and appropriate means of executing a portion of the Executive power, would seem to lead to the same conclusion, the same connection between the Government and banks. But those who profess to be opposed to a Bank of the United States, will do well to pause before they come to either of the above conclusions; for if the operations of the Government cannot be carried on without the agency of banks, or if banks are the most suitable and appropriate means for executing the powers relating to the revenue, does it not follow that we must have a Federal bank? Is it not apparent that to admit that bank agency is necessary in the management of the finances, is the strongest possible argument in support of a national bank? Sir, the two questions are identical; they are but one; for to say that a bank is necessary as a fiscal agent, is to say that we must have a national bank. This, sir, is a complete independent system of Government; it possesses within itself all the necessary functions of a Government. It is in no particular dependent on the States, so far as its own action is concerned; and least of all can it be in so important a function as that of its finances. If it has not within itself the power to manage its finances, then it is no Government; it is dependent on the States almost to the same extent as the old confederation, which had no power over a revenue but by requisitions upon the States. Has this Government any control over the State banks? Has it any right to command their services? And, in times of party excitement, might not many of the States prohibit their banks from acting as agents of the Government? What security can there be in a reliance on State institutions? Who control the banks and what is their spirit? Do they not present the embodied elements of aristocracy, and have they not usually been opposed to the Government, when administered by agents possessing the confidence of the great body of the people? Sir, there is no avoiding the conclusion, that, if bank agency is necessary, we must have a Federal bank, which we can control ourselves, or, at least, have a legal right to control. But no such agency is necessary. The proposed system is not only practicable, but natural and simple, and, Mr. N. did not hesitate to say, would be found, on trial, to be as convenient as the State bank machinery.

In the adoption of measures for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the revenue, Congress can take into consideration the effect which such measures may have on the general currency of the country. This is all we can do: we cannot directly interfere with the issues of the State banks. This incidental effect which may be produced by our financial measures, would naturally seem to be of secondary, but now appears to be regarded as of primary importance. Indeed, it is the real or supposed bearing of the financial measures of this Government on the general currency of the country that attaches to them so deep and extensive an interest.

It becomes, therefore, important to consider how the proposed measure will affect the currency or the paper issues of the State banks. He thought that its influence would be very salutary, and that, in this respect, it would have a decided preference over either a national bank or the State deposit banks. It may, it is true, in some degree diminish the profits of banking; but the present system of paper money cannot be improved in any degree, however small, without the reduction of the profits of banking enters into the measure of reform.

What is the great evil of our paper system of currency? It is its instability, its irregular action, its constant tendency to the most ruinous expansions and contractions. This is a point about which there is no controversy; all agree in it. Will the proposed measure, then, tend to render the currency more stable and less fluctuating? If so, its influence must be highly salutary. One of its immediate consequences will be to create and keep up a demand for specie to the extent of the revenue and disbursements of the Government. This constant demand for specie will operate as a continued check and restraint upon the banks in the commercial cities; it will compel them to be more cautious in their issues, and to keep themselves more strongly reinforced with specie. The more cautious action of the city banks will tend to restrain the country banks. How considerable this restraining influence upon the banks may be, it was impossible to say; but, so far as it exists, it would be salutary.

It seemed, however, to be feared that the proposed measure would impose too great a restriction upon the banks; that it would diminish their ability and limit their operations too much. But this was not to be feared; the only danger was the overaction and the irregular action of the banks; this is their natural tendency; it results from the principles of the system, and is an evil which cannot be removed without a change of its principles. A bank of the United States, as he had already said, is now asked for, solely on the ground of checking and controlling the State banks; but when it is proposed to do this in any other way, that is regarded as an insuperable objection to the measure. How is this? Can State banks only be regulated by Federal banks, or is it a mere pretext that a national bank is wanted as a regulator of the State institutions?

But this constant demand for specie in the transactions of the Government will promote the general circulation of coin, and improve the whole currency; it will render our currency, in some reasonable degree, a mixed currency, instead of an exclusive paper one, as it now is.

But there will be other consequences affecting the currency, equal, and perhaps more important, than those named. The proposed system, should it be adopted, will occasion a complete and entire separation of the Government from all banks. This is its distinguishing feature, and highest recommendation. This separation is not only important in a political point of view, but, if possible, equally so in its effect on the currency and the interest of the country. What have been the fruits of this connection? Sir, there is high authority on this point, which goes to show that it has been injurious both to the Government and the banks. Mr. Biddle, the President of the late Bank of the United States, who, in the opinion of some, is the greatest financier that now exists, or ever did, or ever will exist, has expressed this opinion. At the organization of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, in 1836, he congratulated the stockholders on the prosperous condition of their interests, the accumulation of a large surplus fund, and the purchase of a new charter, and boasted of the bank being "safer, stronger, and more prosperous than it ever was." He also adds, that "it was an original misfortune in the structure of the bank that it was in any way connected with persons in office. The instincts of all political power make that association dangerous—useful to neither party—injurious to both."

Sir, I repeat the question, what have been the fruits of this connection of bank and State? Let the experience of the country answer! He need not go back to the last war, when, in the negotiation of loans with banks to the amount of about fifty millions, at least fifteen millions of dollars were sacrificed by the Government. These loans consisted of exchanging the credit of the United States, which was vastly better than that of any bank, for the credit of the banks, at the rate of eighty and eighty-five dollars for a hundred. This occasioned the rapid enlargement of bank issues during the war, and led to the suspension of the banks in 1814, and to a long train of calamitous consequences, under which the country languished for five or six years. He had already alluded to these circumstances.

This connection has greatly increased the regular action of the banks, and stimulated their contractions and expansions. The first great and sudden expansion of the Bank of the United States, in 1817, was, in part, occasioned by the Government redeeming thirteen millions of its stock, then held by the bank, as part of its capital, which obliged it to loan it suddenly to individuals. The public deposits, as is well known, have always been used by the banks as the basis of discounts; and, as they increase and diminish suddenly, this produces a corresponding enlargement and curtailment of their loans.

In consequence of this unfortunate connection, as Mr. Biddle calls it, every measure of the Government, of a mere financial character, having no direct bearing on any commercial interest, has for years occasioned a disturbance in the monetary concerns of the country, which, under our credit system, are otherwise sufficiently unstable. Almost from the foundation of the Government, this has been one continued source of clamor and complaint—of agitation, of fierce denunciations, and of curses loud and deep against the Government, from the commercial portions of the community. Cause or no cause for these complaints, for his present purpose, was of little consequence. He believed that, in general, such complaints had been without any just foundation; but he wished to remove the pretext for them, and effectually to remove all grounds of charging, upon the mere financial measures of the Government, the disturbance of the currency, and the derangement of the business concerns of the country.

The banks have become an element of political power, and the basis of a moneyed aristocracy. The whole system is one resting on monopoly and exclusive privileges, in derogation of the equal and common right of the people. Experience has also proved that the system is founded on unsound principles, and its rapid and dangerous extension in the last few years, and the serious evils attending it, have produced a very general conviction, embracing, probably, a large majority of the people, that the system cannot long be endured as it is; that it must either be reformed or abandoned. From dear-bought experience, this had become the general sentiment. But this reform cannot be effected here; we have no jurisdiction over the subject; Congress did not create the State banks, and it cannot unmake them, or reform the system. This belongs to the people and the States; let us leave it there; they have the power, and are competent to the task. The accomplishment of this important measure—one which at this time excites a deeper and more universal interest than has ever before existed in relation to any reform in our civil institutions—will no doubt be resisted, violently, desperately, by the whole combined moneyed influence of the country. The issue is already made up; it is a great issue; one which will be likely to agitate the public mind for twenty years to come. On the one side is the popular will, the great mass of the people; on the other are the banks and the moneyed power. On the one side (if he might use the language of the London banker's circular) is the aristocracy of wealth; on the other, the democracy of numbers. The struggle will be arduous, and probably long, but the result cannot be doubtful. At a time like this, and under such circumstances, is it proper for this Government to become a party in this contest? As we cannot do it directly, is it proper, is it right, for us to interfere indirectly? As we cannot assist in carrying out this great reform, all that he asked was, that this Government should stand aside. It cannot rightfully become a party to this contest. It cannot promote the reform; but it may retard it. Shall Congress interpose itself between the people and this great measure? Shall it take sides with the banks against the people? Shall this Government become the endorser and the backer of the State banks? Shall we, by our improper connection with them, encourage them to look to us to sustain themselves against the popular voice? Shall we unite and league them together, and thus add to their power by combination? Sir, let this Government stand aloof from this contest, and leave the banks in the hands of the States and people from whom they derived their existence, and to whom they are amenable for their acts, and by whose will they must stand or fall.

THURSDAY, September 21.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the collection and custody of the public revenues, together with the amendment offered thereto by Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said: Sir, this is a subject of great importance to the interests of the country, and one that has caused great anxiety in the public mind. It is therefore highly important that the whole matter should be laid clearly and fully before the people, that they may have an opportunity of judging for themselves on the merits of the propositions made here, both in favor of, and against, the views of the Executive. For my own part, it is sufficient for me to say that, if I know my own heart, I came to this body with a sincere desire to co-operate with the Executive Government in any measures which may benefit the people, or restore the national prosperity; and towards the individual now in the Executive chair, and the other officers of the Government, I have none other than the kindest feelings. But in relation to measures proposed for the benefit of the people, I hold myself at liberty to examine them fully and freely, without being controlled by those trammels which have been too often used to force men to act contrary to their own convictions. When I took my seat in this body, it was with a full determination to examine carefully for myself the various propositions that might be presented, and to decide upon them according to their merits. Sir, we were called on to aid the Government, because it is obstructed in the exercise of its ordinary powers. And when we were told that the Government required our aid, that it was embarrassed for the want of money, and that it was necessary for Congress to grant it supplies to aid in the course of its ordinary operations, I did not hesitate, nor did I even examine very closely the propositions in relation to the means of those supplies; but, knowing that they came from the Committee on Finance, founded on the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any hesitation I voted for the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes. I preferred the bill as it was, without striking out the provision for interest on the notes. I was not willing to resort to a temporary expedient, such as issuing notes without interest, which, as heretofore, could serve only to delude the people, and end in disappointment, without any practical benefit.

The next bill in order was the one to postpone the fourth instalment of the deposits with the States. It may not be strictly in order, but as great latitude has been given to the debate, I beg leave here to give my reasons why I could not vote for that bill; and one of the strongest in my mind, was this: that the Government of the United States, through the medium of an act of Congress, had raised expectations on the part of the States which it ought not to disappoint. The States had prepared to receive the money; they accepted the proposition of the Government, proceeded to legislate on the subject, and many of the States appropriated the whole fund: some to the important cause of education; some to aid in their works of internal improvement; some in one way, and some in another, beneficial to the people. The States relied with full confidence on the receipt of the money; they had a right so to rely; and, although the facts may not strictly amount to a legal contract between the parties, it is certainly so nearly allied to one, that it would be doing the greatest injustice to the States and people to disappoint their just expectations, by withholding the instalment.

Again: It was admitted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that, if the instalment was retained, being in paper, it could not be made available in aid of the necessities of the Treasury, as the Government would not use paper, and we would still have to authorize an issue of Treasury notes, and a loan of at least $10,000,000. Why, then, withhold it from the States, who are willing to receive it in the very funds the Government rejects; and in many instances can accommodate the matter with their own deposit banks, beneficially to the Government, the banks, and the States?

But, viewing it as a question of inconvenience between the Government and the States, how stands the case? It would certainly be much less inconvenient to the Government to add the amount of the instalment to the amount of the loan she is compelled to make, at all events, than it would be to the States to lose the benefit of the money at this time. These, sir, are some of the reasons that induced me to vote against that bill. I thought it but justice to myself to state them, as I gave a silent vote on that occasion.

[Mr. Smith then spoke at much length upon the state of the country, the causes which produced it, and the necessity and advantage of a national bank; and then continued his speech on the bill before the Senate.]

I come now, Mr. President, to speak of the bill before the Senate, known here as the divorce bill. I was opposed, as I have told you, to the original divorce; I was still more opposed to the object of your then choice; and had

I been here, in the name of my country I would have forbidden the bans. But you married, and I now find the groom, and nearly all the wedding guests, in favor of another divorce. Sir, upon principles of common law, you are not entitled to it; you winked at—nay more, you seduced your bride from the path of virtue; and you ought not to be allowed to take advantage of your own wrong. But, sir, I am ready to confess that I am much more opposed to the object of your third union, than I am to a separation from the darling of your second choice.

Sir, this sub-Treasury scheme of divorcing the Government from the banks and people is, in my mind, the most alarming proposition that has ever been presented to the American people. In vain did our revolutionary sires shed their blood in the contest for liberty; in vain did the sages and patriots of that eventful epoch contend for the glorious privileges which we enjoy, if, at this day of the republic, we are to surrender up to the Executive, and to his immediate advisers, the liberties of this great people. Sir, when the patriot daily sees the immense powers claimed for, and exercised by, the Executive, has he not just cause for alarm? The veto power is his; the army is his; the navy is his; the appointing and removing power of all the inferior officers of Government is his; the sword is his; and he now asks for the purse. Shall we give it to him? Shall we surrender up the treasures of the nation—the hard earnings of the people—into his hands, as is proposed by this bill? Never, Mr. President, with my consent—never, never. I speak not with reference to the present Chief Magistrate. I am discussing this matter upon principle. Sir, I have reason for alarm, when I see the other powers of the Government surrendered up, one at a time, either before or after the exercise of the veto, to the will of one man. How can I forbear to look with jealousy and alarm at a power so inordinate in its desires, and so engulfing in its effects? This bill, sir, surrenders up the remnant of power which we had still left with us. I object to it because of the vast increase of Executive power and patronage it confers, first, by giving up the sole control of the revenues of the nation; and, secondly, by the vast increase of officers it authorizes. In addition to the land and custom-house offices now in existence, it will be necessary to establish a great many more as sub-treasuries; add to these the twelve thousand post offices, all of which are to be little treasuries, and, sir, then come the visitors and examiners of these offices—as the bill requires an examination once, at least, each year—and you have an army of officers traversing every part of the country at the bid of the Executive, paid from the public moneys by the President, and bound, upon pain of dismissal from office, to obey the Executive or party fiat. Sir, I am unwilling, by any vote of mine, to contribute to this result. But, sir, will the public money be safe? This is a question of great importance. Experience tells us that it will not; and, my word for it, when it shall have been tried to the satisfaction of those who are now pressing it upon us, the defalcations will be found a much more formidable item in the unavailable funds than what appears against the national bank. But, in addition to this, you give up the bonus paid by the United States Bank. You give up the advantages resulting to the country from a well-regulated currency and a wholesome state of the exchanges, and you pay not less than $100,000, annually, to carry on the “expedient,” without one countervailing benefit.

Sir, there is another objection to this measure more formidable, in my mind, than any of those I have attempted to urge. You propose to separate your fortunes from the destinies of the great body of the people; to make this Government, which I have always understood to be a Government of the people, an alien to their interest; you propose to give the Government and its officers gold and silver, and leave the people to struggle on with such a currency as the States may furnish. Sir, I know this people love the Government; I am not unapprised of their deep-rooted devotion to the institutions under which they live. Have they not on all occasions, in times of peril, when the existence of the nation was threatened by a hostile foe, rallied to the standard of their country, and laid down their lives a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of liberty? And shall they then be told, in times of difficulty and embarrassment, that this Government will take care of itself—that it has no power to assist the people—that it will provide for its own officers the precious metals, although the consequence may be ruin to the people? Sir, let those who are pressing this matter upon them not presume too far. It is not your parchment roll, called a constitution, that holds this people together; it is a supposed community of interest; and whenever you shall satisfy them that the Government of their choice has no common interest with the people, the governed, that moment they will lose all attachment to the constitution, and either dissolve themselves from a Government of requisitions and burdens, and not of benefits, or they will seek redress in a change of rulers. Sir, I am no prophet; yet, judging from the voice you have heard from the West, and the responsive echoes from the East, if you carry these measures, in the course of my senatorial term of six years you will see these tables turned, and a confident majority reduced to a harmless minority here; and in that event—mark my words to-day—you will hear a voice long and loud coming from that minority crying for another divorce from the evils of this measure. I hope in this I may be mistaken; but such are my opinions of the evil consequences which must result from this measure, that I hazard the opinion.

But, sir, as the representative in part of one of the Western States, I protest against this measure as being of the most noxious character to our interest. Does not every Western man see that its practical effect must be to drain all our specie from us, through the land offices and post offices, and expend it here and on the Eastern waters in the creation of a navy, breakwaters, light-houses, fortifications, &c.? Since you have abandoned the doctrines of internal improvement, we have no objects for national expenditure, except, to be sure, the Cumberland road; and the expenditure on that is a drop in the bucket when compared with the amount received by the Government from the people of the State. Again: I object to this bill as being wholly illusory, and presenting a false issue to the people. It is not a question now, whether the people will have specie or paper in their common business transactions. This Government has no power over the State banks; they are the creatures of the Legislatures of the different States; and whether this bill passes or not, the people of the States will have a paper currency: and the true question for them to decide is, whether they prefer a local paper exclusively, or whether they would prefer a national paper of universal circulation, controlling the State issues within wholesome bounds, and convertible into specie at the will of the holder.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

Sir, let us examine for a moment the consequences that must necessarily result from any measure, at this time, reducing the property of this nation to a metallic value. Would it not at once amount, in effect, to a confiscation of at least two-thirds of the property in the country? Would it not increase, as two to one, the debts of the people? And how, let me ask, do gentlemen suppose the debtors—either merchants, banks, or people—can pay their debts, if specie should be required? Property must come to the hammer of the auctioneer; and the sacrifice would create ruin, wide-spread ruin. Sir, I would rather see a foreign army in your country, than to see the property of every debtor brought to the hammer on a specie demand. The desolation would be far less. Innocent and unoffending families, who are in supposed affluence to-day, would be beggars to-morrow; thrown upon the cold charity of an unfriendly world. Sir, I cannot see it. I would avert it if I could. But, if gentlemen will go on, let them take the responsibility. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) told you that the disease was debt, and he knew of no cure but to pay it. This may be true; but does not that Senator know that it is in vain to tell men to pay their debts, if you take from them the ability and means of payment? If you render the property with which they might pay valueless, how do you expect them to pay? Do gentlemen suppose that there is specie enough in this nation to pay the one-fourth of the debts, independently of answering the ordinary medium of circulation? If they do, I can only say that they have surely not examined the subject.

Mr. STRANGE, of North Carolina, rose and said:

Mr. President: That our country is now in a most extraordinary and interesting crisis seems to be conceded on all hands; and the public mind is greatly distracted as to the causes of this crisis, its nature, and the course it behooves Congress to pursue under it. In this state of things, every man to whom a high trust is committed in relation to these subjects, and especially each member of this body, ought openly and frankly to offer his views and opinions concerning them. By public opinions all the measures adopted by Congress must ultimately be tested; and, that public opinion may have fair play, and our constituents an opportunity of judging of the fidelity of their representatives on every measure so important as the one under consideration, the reasons which have determined them should accompany their votes. It is this consideration that impels me to ask the attention of the Senate on the present occasion; for I know full well that I might as well address the marble pillars which surround us, as this honorable body with any reasonable hope of bringing conviction to a single mind. But I am solicitous that public opinion should be sound in the State which I have the honor in part to represent; and while I bring my own opinions in review before my constituents, I shall make an effort, feeble though it may be, to furnish them with the reasons on which they are founded.

I have now adverted to the causes and nature of the present crisis, matters in themselves of little consequence, and altogether inadequate to the time they have consumed, except so far as they may assist us in the determination of the third question, namely, what it behooves us to do in the present exigency. The evils we have seen are twofold: first, to the United States Government as a body politic, affecting its vital principle, the very current of its existence, its fiscal soundness; secondly, to the individuals, or some of them, composing the nation, in blasting their present pecuniary prosperity and their hopes for the future. These it behooves us to consider with a due sense of our responsibilities, and, if in our power, to provide for them a remedy. And here permit me to remark that the President has been most unjustly accused of having recommended nothing adequate to the occasion; of having indicated no relief for the sufferings of the people. Will no relief be found, I ask, in the emission of $10,000,000 in Treasury notes to be thrown into circulation? If the wants of a sound circulating medium be part of the distress, will it not be thus supplied to the amount I have mentioned? And will it not be farther beneficial in infusing more vigor into the whole mass of the circulating medium, in increasing the proportion of undepreciated currency to that which is already depreciated? Is there no relief in extending for four, six, and nine months, the credits upon the duty bonds? Is there no relief in giving to the deposit banks additional time for settling the balances they owe? Let not gentlemen say, because the relief does not tally with their own unreasonable expectation, that therefore no relief at all has been extended. Great relief has, in my humble judgment, been afforded, and all that I think could in reason have been asked. But our first inquiry is, what it behooves us to do in reference to the revenue. And it is evident that the first thing is to make immediate provision for the supply of the exhausted Treasury, and put aside such claims as, in the present state of things, ought not to be made upon it. This, so far as the action of this House is concerned, has already been done in the passage of the bills for the suspension of the fourth instalment to the States under the deposit law, and the emission of the $10,000,000 in Treasury notes, as before mentioned; and it is next to be decided what course shall be taken to avert, if possible, a recurrence of the present catastrophe to the revenue. For this three plans are presented to our consideration: First, a national bank; secondly, a continuance of the present deposit bank system, with some modifications; and, lastly, the plan recommended by the President and Secretary of the Treasury, and proposed by the Committee on Finance, of an independent Treasury.

I have suggested objections which present themselves to my mind, to two of the plans: and the question may be asked—and it is proper it should be answered—whether any of them apply to the third and only remaining alternative measure? and my response is, no. It is not, like the United States Bank, at war with any declaration of public opinion. To that ordeal it is yet to be submitted, and I am well content that it shall be brought to so just a standard, and that it shall be pressed no longer than it is found in accordance with it. It has no hostility from the Executive to encounter; for it is his own offspring, and he stands pledged to give it a fair chance for existence. It implies the assumption of no powers not clearly granted by the constitution; and whether expedient or not, is the only question for which, I trust, before I have finished, I shall have succeeded in making at least a show of probability. It has never failed; for, so far as this Government is concerned, it is yet a matter of trial, and we are doomed to hear, in relation to it, the cry of experiment! experiment! until the ear aches with the sound. Like every thing human, it is liable to mal-administration, and of course to failure; but it carries within itself no principle of inevitable fallibility, like the banking system. Scattered as your treasure will be, under it, from one end of the continent to the other, it will not be likely to meet with any co-extensive agent of destruction; and, although some inconsiderable rill may be dried up here and there, the great river of your revenue will be supplied from others, and flow on copiously and freely. Times of difficulty will not disappoint you in the use of your fund in hand, for it will be in the solid metals—the most unchangeable and indestructible of sub-lunary things—and therefore so fitly chosen as standards of value. Being in the hands of the immediate agents of the Government, no party combination can be strong enough, without an actual revolution, to divert it from the use to which the people, through their constituted representatives, shall think proper to direct its application, and thereby subject those representatives to other domination than that of the will of their constituents, constitutionally expressed. Neither can any great difficulty be interposed by those who may be your depositaries, in the way of delivering it up. There will be no middle man to stand between the actual custodian of the money and responsibility; there will be no community to back him in contumacious refusal to comply with his duty; no real or fancied inability to meet your demands can be offered in extenuation of neglect; no honest men, unconsciously enlisted by interest, by gratitude, by innumerable insidious appeals to ardent natures, be induced to step forward, and oppose their bodies to the execution of the laws. No party spirit can be rallied in behalf of the delinquent. No shout of party triumph will be heard to animate his soul to bold defiance; but he will stand alone, a conspicuous mark for that approbation which fidelity is sure to win, or the sober condemnation which is as certainly visited by enlightened public opinion upon a faithless or factious public servant.

The plan is recommended to us by its simplicity, according in this with the whole genius of our institutions. One main object of our political forefathers was to deprive Government of all that mysticism with which kingcraft had invested it. It was intended that our system of Government should be so simple that every citizen (as all take part in its action) should be capable of comprehending it; that whosoever could read, or hear read, our excellent constitution, should understand its meaning, and be able to judge of the fidelity of those to whom its administration was committed. The simplicity of this plan, then, is in beautiful conformity with the rest of the system of which it is intended to constitute a part.

But it has the decision of time in its behalf. For aught we know to the contrary, it has been substantially the practice of all Governments, except our own, up to the present day. To various modifications it has doubtless been subjected, but, even in England, wide space is kept between the exchequer and the bank.

But although the Government, whether united or not to the banks in her fiscal operations, can do but little legitimately towards regulating their paper currency, she can, by that union, do much to inflame the evils, and, by so doing, work much injustice. She can by that union greatly increase the credit of those institutions, and give a wider circulation to their paper issues, and in this way increase what are called mercantile facilities. The Senator from South Carolina has illustrated this matter by a figure so strong and forcible, that it could not fail, I think, to have brought conviction to all who heard him. Yes, sir, take the beggar from the street, and stipulate with him that nothing but gold and silver and his notes will be received in payment of debts to this Government, and Cræsus himself was never richer than he would instantly become.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Government, I have already said, cannot continue her connection with the banks without stimulating them into factitious credit, and increasing the tendency to commercial and speculative enterprise, which is already great enough, Heaven knows, and subtracting from the laboring and productive classes, the real bone and sinew, the true human matériel of the country. This is too obvious, and the mischief too great to require elaboration. But besides this, extravagance will be the natural offspring of the system. We have already seen the tendency of this evil to increase; and increase it will under the continuance of the system, until republican simplicity will be annihilated among us. Extravagance, and its companion, idleness, were the overthrow of all the ancient republics; ay, and of the modern ones, too; and little San Marino shines forth a phenomenon for admiration, saved from the wreck which has overtaken others, by her poverty and parsimonious economy.

The union of the Government with the banks, is calculated, I have said, greatly to influence the natural evils of the banking system. Some of them I have already mentioned; but one remains for me to advert to, not among the least, if not the very greatest. This is the mischief of sudden expansions and contractions. To this mischief no one can be insensible, for all have in one way or other felt its force. It has a tendency to make us a nation of gamblers, by the constant stimulus to that spirit which finds a place in almost every bosom, from the savage to the sage, and which it is one of the great objects of a wholesome education to subdue. But the frequent and sudden reverses to which every man is exposed, of being rendered a nabob to-day by an expansion, and a beggar to-morrow by a contraction, must, in process of time, engender all that loose morality which characterizes the professed worshippers at the shrine of fortune. Such is the effect upon holders of property; and upon the laboring man it is, if possible, still more baneful; for him there is no hour of prosperity, but he suffers greatly, if not equally, both in the ebb and flow of the tide. In a contraction, money of course becomes scarce, and the laborer, whose only commodity is his labor, is compelled to bring it daily into the market, and take whatever price it may command; while the holders of provisions, less limited in point of time for the conversion of their commodities into money, hold them back, not willing to submit to the diminished prices, and in the mean time the laborer must starve, or buy at the price demanded. On the other hand, when an expansion takes place, and money becomes plenty, labor is the last thing to find the level. The continual necessity which the laborer is under to bring his commodity into the market, prevents any competition in demand, and it is not until the general spring which is given to enterprise has opened for it new resources, that an increased demand for labor makes an increase in price. In the mean time the laborer must purchase those commodities upon which speculation is most apt to seize—the necessities of life. It is impossible for the Government to remain connected with the banks without contributing to this mischief; for when the supplies exceed much the necessities of the Government, they must lie in the banks, whose directors must resist the strongest, or, at least, most general passion of the human heart—cupidity—if they suffer them to remain unused, and in using them, an artificial expansion of the currency is of course created. On the other hand, when the Government shall find it necessary to make heavy drafts upon the deposit banks, a great contraction is the inevitable consequence. These are evils which the Government cannot prevent, but she should abstain, as far as possible, from exciting them; and this she can do only by disconnection.

When Mr. STRANGE had concluded his remarks,

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, September 22.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the collection and custody of the public revenue.

Mr. TALLMADGE said: Mr. President, I have bestowed upon this subject all that reflection which is due to it, from the high source from which it emanates. Every consideration, both personal and political, would incline me to its support, if my judgment could be satisfied that its adoption would promote the great interests of the country. Natives of the same State and of the same county, the President and myself have been, from my first entrance into political life down to the present time, on terms of intimacy. In his political career he has on all occasions received my cordial support. It has been my fortune to be placed in situations, at certain trying periods of his history, which have enabled me to render him "some service." It is with no ordinary sensation, therefore, that I find myself constrained, by higher considerations than those of political attachment or personal friendship, to differ from him on the question now before us—considerations of public duty which involve the public weal. But, I have the satisfaction to know, that he neither expects nor desires me to support this or any other measure merely because it bears the stamp of an Executive recommendation. In submitting this sub-Treasury system, the President has only obeyed an injunction of the constitution, which he is sworn to support, and which declares that “he shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.” This is one of those measures—the President has discharged his duty in recommending it to our consideration, and I trust we shall discharge ours by giving to it that calm investigation and free discussion which are so well calculated to produce correct results, in regard to measures that involve the great and vital interests of the people.

The President himself anticipated much diversity of sentiment on this subject. He anticipated also that Congress might, in its wisdom, adopt some other system; and he gave the assurance of his co-operation in any other plan which might be “ultimately established.” He says:

“With these views, I leave to Congress the measures necessary to regulate, in the present emergency, the safe-keeping and transfer of the public moneys. In the performance of constitutional duty, I have stated to them, without reserve, the result of my own reflections. The subject is of great importance, and one on which we can scarcely expect to be as united in sentiment, as we are in interest. It deserves a full and free discussion, and cannot fail to be benefited by a dispassionate comparison of opinions. Well aware myself of the duty of reciprocal concession among the co-ordinate branches of the Government, I can promise a reasonable spirit of co-operation, so far as it can be indulged in without the surrender of constitutional objections which I believe to be well founded. Any system that may be adopted, should be subjected to the fullest legal provision, so as to leave nothing to the Executive but what is necessary to the discharge of the duties imposed on him; and, whatever plan may be ultimately established, my own part shall be so discharged as to give to it a fair trial and the best prospect of success.”

I trust, then, that the friends of the administration will view this question as one of expediency, and not suffer any difference of opinion between themselves to become a difference of principle upon which they are to divide. If it be not so viewed, who will take the responsibility, and who will vouch for the consequences of a contrary course? It is a subject on which men may honestly differ; and it is for that reason amongst others, that such difference should be expressed with perfect frankness and with the utmost freedom. My mind has long been made up against it; and the reasoning of the Message, whilst it has not convinced me to the contrary, has only served to confirm my previous opinions—I am therefore bound to say, from a sense of the most imperative duty, that, in my judgment, this measure is fraught with more mischief than any scheme which has heretofore been broached in reference to the finances of the Government and the currency of the country. In saying this I certainly intend none other than the most profound respect for the distinguished individual who has, in an official form, brought it to our notice.

The banks are now as able, with the aid and confidence of the Government, to perform all the duties required of them as they were before. We have the testimony of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury that they performed them as well as the Bank of the United States. They are capable of doing the same again in the same way. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that, on account of the calamity which has befallen the country, the experiment has failed, and they ought not to be employed a second time. No, sir; such a catastrophe may not occur again in the course of a century. One reason assigned for it now was the existence of an enormous surplus in the Treasury. This cause is not likely to exist hereafter, for every man is willing to bring down our receipts to the measure of our wants; and under that, as a general rule, such a catastrophe might never happen again. The banks have abundance of means to meet all their engagements. Such being the case, all that is necessary is, to create confidence, to restore confidence, and they will be found able to perform all that is required of them. Let that confidence be extended to them by the Government in good faith, and let them be placed on their former footing. Let the Government pursue a system which has been tried, and which we know will prove effectual, instead of attempting an “untried expedient,” the disastrous consequences of which cannot be anticipated, and which, I fear, imagination can scarcely depict.

This new experiment consists in a “divorce of bank and State.” This is a mere catchphrase, which was originally introduced by artful and designing politicians to impose upon the credulity and honesty of the people. Many have adopted it without reflecting or inquiring as to its import, or its consequences. First impressions are favorable to it; it summons to our recollection our early impressions of a “divorce of church and State.” But it is the duty of wise statesmen and discreet politicians to consider well the evils which must follow the adoption of any system heretofore untried and of doubtful policy, however euphonious the phrase may be which designates its character before the people.

The proposition contained in these few catchwords, strikes at the very foundation of the credit system of the country. It does not stop with the destruction of bank credit, but strangles, in its withering grasp, commercial credit also. It establishes a depreciated paper currency for the people, and an appreciated specie currency for the incumbents of office, and for Government contractors. It gives the baser currency to the master, and the "better currency" to the servant. In a Government like ours, it is impossible long to preserve our institutions or our liberties, if such distinctions are to prevail. It separates the Government of the people from the people themselves, as if those whom the people have chosen to direct their affairs were of a superior order, or distinct class in society, endowed with peculiar privileges beyond the rest of the community. It has a tendency to alienate the affections of the people from the Government. They will come to consider it not as a Government identified with their feelings and interests, but as something foreign to them. This is not all. The Government itself will lose in a measure, the idea of dependence on the people. This want of dependence is too much felt already. Put this additional power into its hands, and the identity of interests which exists, or ought to exist between them, is done away.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) admits that the people will, under this system, have a depreciated currency, whilst the Government will enjoy the benefits of gold and silver, whatever they may be. But he says they make that currency for themselves—they need not take it except at their own option. Sir, it is the common ordinary currency of the country. It has hitherto been good enough for the Government, for the people, for us all; but now, by your own act, you depreciate it, and, after making it the worse currency, you leave it to the people, and take the gold and silver to yourselves! The result is, that you give to the servants of the country a kind of money worth more than the people's currency. You isolate the Government, so that it becomes no longer a part of the people. You reverse the relation which has always existed between them: the Government becomes the master, and the people become the servants. By this means, the salary of every officer is raised several per cent., according as specie is more valuable than paper; and this difference, too, created by your own act! Sir, it is a distinction which will not be tolerated; and those who undertake to make it, will find, in the end, that they have presumed too far on the want of intelligence, and on the subservency of the people of this country.

But the project does not stop here. It does not merely give to the people a depreciated currency, but, by-and-by, they will be deprived of any currency which will be adequate to carry on the business of the great and diversified interests of this community. Under this system, the specie of the country will be drawn from circulation, and from the vaults of the banks, where it is the basis of circulation and of confidence, and deposited in these sub-Treasury vaults, till the country is left without a sufficient circulating medium to transact its ordinary business. The farmer, the merchant, the manufacturer, and the mechanic, will be unable to command the means to pursue their ordinary avocations, no matter what their property may be. They may be rich in houses and lands, in goods and merchandise, in manufactures and machinery, in materials, in tools and implements of trade, nay, they may possess the best of bonds and mortgages, and every species of stock which has heretofore been deemed equivalent to money, and still they will be unable to carry on their ordinary business for want of a circulating medium by which to transact it. Credit is the poor man's capital, as well as the auxiliary of the rich. Deprive him of this, and his habits of industry, his character for probity, his good name and reputation avail him nothing. He has no means by which he can rise above the ordinary occupation of a day laborer. With a growing family, and the increased expense of living, he is doomed to abject poverty, without the slightest hope of ever gaining that standing and that condition in society which a "well-regulated credit system" always holds out to the enterprising, the honest, the industrious portion of the community.

Sir, I was surprised to hear the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) condemn our whole banking system as an utter absurdity, and which he predicted would be looked upon by those who come after us with as much astonishment as we look upon the South Sea bubble. In this enlightened age, at this late period of our history, after what we have seen of the effects of the credit system upon the country, with the evidence of our own senses, and the testimony of all Europe in favor of it, I confess my amazement at hearing such sentiments uttered on this floor. I have no language, consistent with the high respect which I entertain for that honorable Senator, (Mr. STRANGE,) to express my astonishment; and I, therefore, can only say,

"'Tis Strange, 'tis passing Strange!"

The tendency of this scheme is to bring the country, virtually, to an exclusive metallic currency. Whatever gentlemen may say on this subject, this wild and visionary theory is gaining ground with a certain portion of our population. It is propagated by reason of the countenance which it is supposed to receive from men in high places. Meetings have been held in New York and elsewhere, at which an exclusive metallic currency has been resolved on as the only true policy. All paper money of every description has been repudiated, as contrary to the genius of our Government and the spirit of our institutions. In the same resolutions, men in elevated stations have been applauded by name for maintaining the same doctrines. The proceedings of such meetings have been responded to in terms of approbation, thereby tacitly acquiescing in all the principles set forth in them, and thus giving currency to them with the people. It is the belief that such principles are recognized by those to whose approval they are submitted, that excites the alarm and apprehension which pervades the rational and thinking portion of the community. It is this, too, which gives countenance to the idea that the sub-Treasury scheme is intended to bring about an exclusive metallic currency.

Gentlemen are very anxious, apparently, for this divorce, as they are pleased to term it. I would remind them, however, that whilst they are talking of a divorce, they are getting up an incestuous union between members of the same family—a marriage which is unlawful; and which I would say comes within the Levitical degrees, and therefore ought to be forbidden.

This union which is now proposed is a most unsafe and dangerous one. It reminds me of an anecdote of a captain of a packet with whom I was acquainted, who informed me that he always found it indispensably necessary, for the safety of his ship's stores, to have his cook and his steward of different families, and if possible of different colors, and if he could get up a fight between them, it was all the better; for if they were connected together in a common bond of interest or affection, the stores were apt to be wasted. So here, I think our stores, the stores of the ship of State, will not be safe, if a union take place between the Government and the public Treasury, which ought to be separated in different sets of hands, and those, too, antagonist hands.

The officers to be employed under this system, so far from being antagonist to the Government, are officers appointed by the Government, entirely dependent on it, and who may be removed by its fiat at any moment from their offices. There is positive danger in the scheme. All the deposits of the public money, all the Treasury, together with the other Executive powers, will now be united in the same family, and in the same hands. I see no security, but absolute insecurity, absolute danger, in the proposed system. But let us consider the chances of security which the system offers for the safety of the public moneys. The Senator from North Carolina tells us the public funds will hardly fail to be safe, for if the officer should appropriate them to his own use, he may be hung up by the neck until, to use the forcible repetitions of that gentleman, he is dead, dead, dead! What security is there here, sir, when the money is already gone? Will the dead body answer any of the purposes of security? Or does the gentleman really imagine that the penalty of death itself will prevent the possibility of defalcation? Does not the experience of all countries show that the severest penalties do not operate as preventives of crime of any kind? We have only to look to our own country for illustrations of the insufficiency and insecurity of the proposed system. What, for example, is thought to be the best system for the collection of the tolls on the New York canals. It is the system of deposit with the banks. The money is rapidly brought into the banks, and the least possible means are left in the power of the collectors. The great mass of the funds collected are therefore always on deposit in the banks, which credit the Government with the amount. It is owing to this system of removing responsibility for such large sums of money from individuals, and reposing it upon banks, that from the very first period of the formation of the canals down to the present moment the State has not lost one single dollar of the canal funds, though millions and millions have been collected. If the system were proposed in the State Legislature to take the personal responsibility of the officers employed in the collection, together with security, such as is proposed to be done by the present scheme, it would not be able to command a single vote! How then can it be here maintained by gentlemen that such an objectionable plan, rejected altogether by prudent and experienced legislators, is the best plan, and ought to be adopted? There is a law now on the statute book that certain disbursing officers shall deposit whatever public funds come into their hands, in the bank nearest to them until required to be paid out. Whence comes the necessity of such a law? why does the law exist, if penalties and securities make the money as safe as when deposited in the banks.

Every fact goes against the system as proposed by this bill, and at the same time every fact goes in favor of the system which it is now suddenly proposed to cast aside! Can it be possible that gentlemen wish to expose the Treasury as it will be exposed by this scheme? I do not wish to disparage our public officers or those who may be employed under this system. But, I look at human nature as it is. I look at the temptations to which they are exposed. The confidence of individuals in their own integrity may be unbounded, and they will never suspect it till put to the test of such temptations as will be presented under this system. I mean no unnecessary or improper disparagement when I say, I have no faith in the safety of the public money if this scheme goes into operation. There is danger in every stage of it. And no opportunity will pass unimproved where the temptation is sufficiently presented. There is no safety in it.

"You may as well spread out the unsunn'd heaps
Of miser's treasure by an outlaw's den,
And tell me it is safe, as bid me hope Danger will wink on opportunity."

Mr. BENTON rose to offer the aid of his voice in favor of the amendment, and in favor of the bill to which it was proposed to be attached. He considered the amendment and the bill as one measure, indissolubly connected in their nature; and that the bill would be of little value, unless the amendment was made. There might have been some difference of opinion as to the time and mode of adopting the provisions contained in the amendment—whether it should be done at this session, or at the next; and whether it should be effected by an amendatory clause, or by a separate bill. There might have been room for difference of opinion on these points a few days ago; but, since the amendment is offered, and opposed, it must be carried, or the bill itself considered as lost.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The bill is to divorce the Government from the banks, or rather is to declare the divorce, for the separation has already taken place by the operation of law and by the delinquency of the banks. The bill is to declare the divorce; the amendment is to exclude their notes from revenue payments, not all at once, but gradually, and to be accomplished by the 1st day of January, 1841. Until then the notes of specie-paying banks may be received, diminishing one-fourth annually; and after that day, all payments to and from the Federal Government are to be made in hard money. Until that day, payments from the United States will be governed by existing laws. The amendment does not affect the Post Office Department until January, 1841; until then, the fiscal operations of that department remain under the present laws; after that day they fall under the principle of the bill, and all payments to and from that department will be made in hard money. The effect of the whole amendment will be to restore the currency of the constitution to the Federal Government—to re-establish the great acts of 1789 and of 1800—declaring that the revenues should be collected in gold and silver coin only; those early statutes which were enacted by the hard money men who made the constitution, who had seen and felt the evils of that paper money, and intended to guard against those evils in future by creating, not a paper, but a hard money Government.

I am for this restoration. I am for restoring to the Federal Treasury the currency of the constitution. I am for carrying back this Government to the solidity projected by its founders. This is a great object in itself—a reform of the first magnitude—a reformation with healing on its wings, bringing safety to the Government and blessings to the people. The currency is a thing which reaches every individual and every institution.

Great are the evils, political, pecuniary, and moral, which have flowed from this departure from our constitution. Through the Federal Government alone—through it, not by it—two millions and a half of money have been lost in the last four months. Thirty-two millions of public money was the amount in the deposit banks when they stopped payment; of this sum twenty-five millions have been paid over to Government creditors, or transferred to the States. But how paid, and how transferred? In what? In real money, or its equivalent? Not at all! But in the notes of suspended banks—in notes depreciated, on an average, ten per cent. Here then were two and a half millions lost. Who bore the loss? The public creditors and the States. Who gained it? for where there is a loss to one, there must be a gain to another. Who gained the two and a half millions, thus sunk upon the hands of the creditors and the States? The banks were the gainers; they gained it; the public creditors and the States lost it; and to the creditors it was a forced loss. It is in vain to say that they consented to take it. They had no alternative. It was that or nothing. The banks forced it upon the Government; the Government forced it upon the creditor. Consent was out of the question. Power ruled, and that power was in the banks; and they gained the two and a half millions which the States and the public creditors lost.

The Senator from New York, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) who had just spoken with so much ability, and who is opposed both to this bill and this amendment, has predicted an argument in favor of the local banks on account of the small amount of the public money which has been lost in their hands; but here is two and a half millions in a single operation, and without going back to the period of bank stoppages in 1819 and 1814. He confines himself to direct losses, but that is a most imperfect view of the question. The full view embraces, besides direct losses, all that are incidental to the use of depreciated paper money; increased prices—disappointed operations by sea and land in time of war—and embarrassed operations in time of peace; per centums shaved off at every step; the ignorant, the helpless, the necessitous, imposed upon; and one vast scene of pushing off bad paper on each other exhibited all over the country.

I do not pretend to estimate the moneyed losses, direct or indirect, to the Government alone, from the use of local bank notes, in the last twenty-five years, including the war, and covering three general suspensions. Leaving the people out of view, as a field of losses beyond calculation, I confine myself to the Federal Government, and say, its losses have been enormous, prodigious, and incalculable. We have had three general stoppages of the local banks in the short space of twenty-two years. It is at the average rate of one in seven years; and who is to guaranty us from another, and from the consequent losses, if we continue to receive their bills in payment of public dues. Another stoppage must come, and that, reasoning from all analogies, in less than seven years after the resumption. Many must perish in the attempt to resume, and would do better to wind up at once, without attempting to go on, without adequate means, and against appalling obstacles. Another revulsion must come. Thus it was after the last resumption. The banks recommenced payments in 1817—in two years, the failures were more disastrous than ever. Thus it was in England after the long suspension of twenty-six years. Payments recommenced in 1823—in 1825 the most desolating crash of banks took place which had ever been known in the kingdom, although the bank of England had imported, in less than four years, twenty millions sterling in gold, about one hundred millions of dollars, to recommence upon. Its effects reached this country, crushed the cotton houses in New Orleans, depressed the money market, and injured all business. Why was this? Why was it that, within two years after resumption, both in England and in our America, these disastrous revulsions ensued? Loss of confidence was the cause; and that loss resulting, not from the act of Government, but from the conduct of the banks themselves. The banks had failed, and, therefore, could fail. The people had seen them fail, and, therefore, they feared they might do so again. There was no confidence in them; no more than the coachman places in the balking horse when he comes to the hill. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) wishes the Government to do something to reanimate confidence in these banks. Could a law of Congress inspire confidence into his coachman, and give him faith in the balking horse? No more can it be done in relation to these banks. They have stopped, universally and simultaneously, in a season of profound peace and general prosperity—no war, no pestilence, no famine—with four times as much specie in the country as ever was in it before; and this stoppage has killed confidence. It is dead by the act of the banks, and cannot be legislated into existence again by act of Congress. Confidence is a plant of voluntary and not of forced existence. It is said by an eminent man to be a plant of slow growth. We all know it to be so; and we know, besides, that when this plant is once pulled up by the roots, it rarely takes root again in the same place.

The Senators from New York and Virginia (Messrs. TALLMADGE and RIVES) push this point of confidence a little further; they address a question to me, and ask if I would lose confidence in all steamboats, and have them all discarded, if one or two blew up in the Mississippi? I answer the question in all frankness, and say, that I should not. But if, instead of one or two in the Mississippi, all the steamboats in the Union should blow up at once—in every creek, river, and bay—while all the passengers were sleeping in confidence, and the pilots crying out all is well; if the whole should blow up from one end of the Union to the other just as fast as they could hear each other's explosions; then, indeed, I should lose confidence in them, and never again trust wife, or child, or my own foot, or any thing not intended for destruction, on board such sympathetic and contagious engines of death. I answer further, and tell the gentlemen, that if only one or two banks had stopped last May in New York, I should not have lost all confidence in the remaining nine hundred and ninety-nine; but when the whole thousand stopped at once; tumbled down together—fell in a lump—lie there—and when one of their number, by a sign with the little finger, can make the whole lie still, then, indeed, confidence is gone! And this is the case with the banks. They have not only stopped altogether, but in a season of profound peace, with eighty millions of specie in the country, and just after the annual examinations by commissioners and legislative committees, and when all was reported well. With eighty millions in the country, they stop even for change! It did not take a national calamity—a war to stop them! They fell in time of peace and prosperity! We read of people in the West Indies, and in South America, who rebuild their cities on the same spot where earthquakes had overthrown them; we are astonished at their fatuity; we wonder that they will build again on the same perilous foundations. But these people have a reason for their conduct; it is, that their cities are only destroyed by earthquakes; it takes an earthquake to destroy them; and when there is no earthquake, they are safe. But suppose their cities fell down without any commotion in the earth, or the air—fell in a season of perfect calm and serenity—and after that the survivors should go to building again in the same place; would not all the world say that they were demented, and were doomed to destruction? So of the Government of the United States by these banks. If it continues to use them, and to receive their notes for revenue, after what has happened, and in the face of what now exists, it argues fatuity and a doom to destruction.

Resume when they will, or when they shall, and the longer it is delayed the worse for themselves, the epoch of resumption is to be a perilous crisis to many. This stopping and resuming by banks is the realization of the poetical description of the descent into hell, and the return from it. Facilis descensus Averni—sed revocare gradum—hoc opus, hic labor est. Easy is the descent into the regions below, but to return! this is work, this is labor indeed! Our banks have made the descent; they have gone down with ease; but to return—to ascend the rugged steps, and behold again the light above—how many will falter and fall back again into the gloomy regions below!

The day of resumption will be a day of peril, and of death, to many. It is a penalty which their extraordinary stoppage has imposed. Many must fail in the trial; probably a new panic and pressure take place; and those who must attribute every calamity to the misrule, the ignorance, and the misgovernment of the republican party, had as well be preparing their accusations in advance; for the contingency will come, and a cause for it must be found in the misconduct of the Government. Let them prophesize in advance, and show their capacity for political divination by vaticinating beforehand, and exhibiting now a political cause for an event to arise hereafter out of the natural progress of banking.

Banks of circulation are banks of hazard and of failure. It is an incident of their nature. Those without circulation rarely fail. That of Venice has stood seven hundred years; those of Hamburg, Amsterdam, and others, have stood for centuries. The Bank of England, the great mother of banks of circulation, besides an actual stoppage of a quarter of a century, has had her crisis and convulsion in average periods of seven or eight years, for the last half century—in 1783, '93, '97, 1814, '19, '25, '36—and has only been saved from repeated failure by the powerful support of the British Government, and profuse supplies of exchequer bills. Her numerous progeny of private and joint stock banks of circulation have had the same convulsions; and, not being supported by the Government, have sunk by hundreds at a time. All the banks of the United States are banks of circulation; they are all subject to the inherent dangers of that class of banks, and are, besides, subject to new dangers peculiar to themselves. From the quantity of their stock held by foreigners, the quantity of other stocks in their hands, and the current foreign balance against the United States, our paper system has become an appendage to that of England. As such, it suffers from sympathy when the English system suffers. In addition to this, a new doctrine is now broached—that our first duty is to foreigners! and, upon this principle, when the banks of the two countries are in peril, ours are to be sacrificed to save those of England!

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The power of a few banks over the whole presents a new feature of danger in our system. It consolidates the banks of the whole Union into one mass, and subjects them to one fate, and that fate to be decided by a few, without even the knowledge of the rest. An unknown divan of bankers sends forth an edict which sweeps over the empire, crosses the lines of States with the facility of a Turkish firman, prostrating all State institutions, breaking up all engagements, and levelling all law before it. This is consolidation of a kind which the genius of Patrick Henry had not even conceived. But while this firman is thus potent and irresistible for prostration, it is impotent and powerless for resurrection. It goes out in vain, bidding the prostrate banks to rise. A veto power intervenes. One voice is sufficient to keep all down; and thus we have seen one word from Philadelphia annihilate the New York proposition for resumption, and condemn the many solvent banks to the continuation of a condition as mortifying to their feelings as it is injurious to their future interests.

But what excuse, what apology, what justification have we for surrendering, abandoning, and losing the precise advantage for which the present constitution was formed? What was that advantage—what the leading and governing object which led to the abandonment of the old confederation, and induced the adoption of the present form of Government? It was revenue! independent revenue! a revenue under the absolute control of this Government, and free from the action of the States. This was the motive, the leading and governing motive, which led to the formation of this Government.

The reason was, that the old confederation, being dependent upon the States, was often left without money. This state of being was incompatible with its existence; it deprived it of all power; its imbecility was a proverb. To extricate it from that condition was the design, and the cardinal design of the new constitution. An independent revenue was given to it—independent even of the States. Is it not suicidal to surrender that independence, and to surrender it, not to States, but to money corporations? What does history record of the penury and moneyed destitution of the old confederation, comparable to the annihilation of the revenues of this Government in May last, when the banks shut down, in one night, upon a revenue in hand of thirty-two millions; even upon that which was in the names of disbursing officers, and refuse a nine-pence or a picaillon in money from that day to this? What is there in the history of the old confederation comparable to this? The old confederation was often reduced low—often near empty handed—but never saw itself stripped in an instant, as if by enchantment, of tens of millions, and heard the shout of triumph thundered over its head, and the notes of exultation sung over its supposed destruction! Yet, this is what we have seen—what we now see—from having surrendered to corporations our moneyed independence, and unwisely abandoned the precise advantage which led to the formation of this Federal Government.

I do not go into the moral view of this question. It is too obvious, too impressive, too grave, to escape the observation of any one. Demoralization follows in the train of an unconvertible paper money. The whole community becomes exposed to a moral pestilence. Every individual becomes the victim of some imposition, and, in self-defence, imposes upon some one else. The weak, the ignorant, the uninformed, the necessitous, are the sufferers; the crafty and the opulent are the gainers. The evil augments until the moral sense of the community, revolting at the frightful accumulation of fraud and misery, applies the radical remedy of total reform.

Thus, pecuniary, political, and moral considerations require the Government to retrace its steps, to return to first principles, and to restore its fiscal action to the safe and solid path of the constitution. Reform is demanded. It is called for by every public and by every private consideration. Now is the time to make it. The connection between bank and State is actually dissolved. It is dissolved by operation of law, and by the delinquency of these institutions. They have forfeited the right to the deposits, and lost the privilege of paying the revenue in their notes, by ceasing to pay specie. The Government is now going on without them, and all that is wanting is the appropriate legislation to perpetuate the divorce which, in point of fact, has already taken place. Now is the time to act; this the moment to restore the constitutional currency to the Federal Government; to restore the custody of the public moneys to national keepers; and to avoid, in time to come, the calamitous revulsions and perilous catastrophes of 1814, 1819, and 1837.

And what is the obstacle to the adoption of this course, so imperiously demanded by the safety of the republic, and the welfare of the people, and so earnestly recommended to us by the Chief Magistrate? What is the obstacle—what the power that countervails the Executive recommendation, paralyzes the action of Congress, and stays the march of reform? The banks—the banks—the banks, are this obstacle, and this power. They set up the pretension to force their paper into the Federal Treasury, and to force themselves to be constituted that Treasury. Though now bankrupt, their paper dishonored, their doors closed against creditors, every public and every private obligation violated, still they arrogate a supremacy over this Federal Government; they demand the guardianship of the public moneys, and the privilege of furnishing a Federal currency; and, though too weak to pay their debts, they are strong enough to throttle this Government, and to hold, in doubtful suspense, the issue of their vast pretensions.

And what new power is this, so formidable and so daring, and the name of which is not seen in our constitution?

Whence its origin, its progress, and its present pretensions? Sir, its origin is humble; its first progress slow; its vast pretensions of recent date. In the year 1780, the first petition was presented to the Congress of the confederation for the establishment of a bank; ten years afterwards there were but three in the country; in twenty years more, there were only a few dozen; now nearly a thousand, and constantly multiplying. The first petition was bottomed solely upon patriotism, without the least design of pecuniary advantage to the projectors, and intended wholly to aid in furnishing supplies to a detachment of the revolutionary army. I will read the report of the committee of Congress upon that petition, that the Senate may see the progress which banks have made since that day, and the change which has since taken place in their character and views.

CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATION, June 22, 1780.

Report of a committee.

“Whereas, a number of the patriotic citizens of Pennsylvania have communicated to Congress a liberal offer, on their own credit, and by their own exertions, to supply and transport three millions of rations, and three hundred hogheads of rum, for the use of the army, and have established a bank for the sole purpose of obtaining and transporting the said supplies with the greater facility and despatch; and whereas, on the one hand, the associators, animated to this laudable exertion by a desire to relieve the public necessities, mean not to derive from it the least pecuniary advantage, so, on the other, it is just and reasonable that they should be fully reimbursed and indemnified: Therefore, resolved, That Congress entertain a high sense of the liberal offer of the said associators to raise and transport the before-mentioned supplies for the army, and do accept the same as a distinguished proof of their patriotism. Resolved, further, That the faith of the United States be, and the same hereby is, pledged to the subscribers to the said bank, for their effectual reimbursement in the premises.”

Such is the recent and humble origin of banking in this country. How gigantic has been its progress since that day! It is now the predominating power in our America. Great as it now is, what must it be in a few years more, if it continues growing and expanding at the same rate? What must it be in a few years, if it succeeds now in this contest with the Federal Government, and imposes its paper currency upon the Federal Treasury, and continues to be the keeper of the public moneys? The administration is accused of making war upon the local banks. Was it war to give them forty millions of money to keep? Was it war to receive their notes in payment of revenue? Is it war now to give them time for the payment of balances? Is it war upon them to ask to be separated from them? Is divorce war? Is it war to decline receiving their paper promises instead of the gold and silver of the constitution, and to decline the further deposits of public money with them? Is it war? No, sir, it is peace, and the means of preserving peace. It is concord and amity that this Government wants, and is taking the safest way to secure, by declining to have any more causes of collision with them. It is the local banks, and especially the miscalled Bank of the United States, which are pursuing the Federal Government, refusing to let her alone, offering their notes for currency, and their vaults for depositories, and laboring to force these favors upon us. This is the state of the contest. The local banks are the actors, the pursuers, the assailants; the Federal Government is on the defence. All she asks is to be exempted from the future causes of collision with them. They have incurred the penalties of separation. They have incurred the penalties. The very act which created them depositories, and made their notes receivable, denounced the loss of both in the event of failing to meet their liabilities in specie. That act is but little more than one year old; it was not a year old when the condition was violated, and which remains yet violated. Separation has resulted from their own conduct; separation now exists; cause for separation still continues; the Government says, let it be perpetual; the banks say no! Receive us again; receive us before we reform, before we repent, before we make amends; and if you do not, it is war upon us. This is the state of the contest between the Government and the banks. It is attack, or at all events, forcible embrace and conjunction on their part; it is defence and refusal on ours.

The President, in his Message, recommends four things: first, to discontinue the reception of local bank paper in payment of federal dues; secondly, to discontinue the same banks as depositories of the public moneys; thirdly, to make the future collection and disbursement of the public moneys in gold and silver; fourthly, to take the keeping of the public moneys into the hands of our own officers.

What is there in this but a return to the words and meaning of the constitution, and a conformity to the practice of the Government in the first years of President Washington's administration? When this Federal Government was first formed, there was no Bank of the United States, and no local banks, except three north of the Potomac. By the act of 1789, the revenues were directed to be collected in "gold and silver coin only;" and it was usually drawn out of the hands of collectors by drafts drawn upon them, payable at sight. It was a most effectual way of drawing money out of their hands; far more so than an order to deposit in banks; for the drafts must be paid, or protested, at sight, while the order to deposit may be eluded under various pretexts.

The right, and the obligation of the Government to keep its own moneys in its own hands, results from first principles, and from the great law of self-preservation. Every thing else that belongs to her, she keeps herself; and why not keep that also, without which every thing else is nothing. Arms and ships—provisions, munitions, and supplies of every kind—are kept in the hands of Government officers; money is the sinew of war, and why leave this sinew exposed to be cut by any careless or faithless hand? Money is the support and existence of the Government, the breath of its nostrils, and why leave this support, this breath, to the custody of those over whom we have no control? How absurd to place our ships, our arms, our military and naval supplies in the hands of those who could refuse to deliver them when requested, and put the Government to a suit at law to recover their possession? Everybody sees the absurdity of this; but to place our money in the same condition, and moreover to subject it to the vicissitudes of trade, and the perils of banking, is still more absurd; for it is the life blood, without which the Government cannot live—the oil, without which no part of its machinery can move.

England, with all her banks, trusts none of them with the collection, keeping, and disbursement of her public moneys. The Bank of England is paid a specific sum to manage the public debt; but the revenue is collected and disbursed through subordinate collectors and receivers general; and these receivers general are not subject to the bankrupt laws, because the Government will not suffer its revenue to be operated upon by any law except its own will. In France, subordinate collectors and receivers general collect, keep, and disburse the public moneys. If they deposit any thing in banks, it is at their own risk. It is the same thing in England. A bank deposit by an officer is at the risk of himself and his securities. Too much of the perils and vicissitudes of banking is known in these countries to permit the Government ever to jeopard its revenues in their keeping. All this is shown, fully and at large, in a public document now on our tables. And who does not recognize in these collectors and receivers general of France and England the ancient Roman offices of quæstors and pro-quæstors? These fiscal officers of France and England are derivations from the Roman institutions; and the same are found in all the modern kingdoms of Europe which were formerly, like France and Britain, provinces of the Roman Empire. The measure before the Senate is to enable us to provide for our future safety, by complying with our own constitution, and conforming to the practice of all nations, great or small, ancient or modern.

Coming nearer home, and looking into our own early history, what were the "continental treasurers" of the confederation, and the "provincial treasurers and collectors," provided for as early as July, 1775, but an imitation of the French and English systems, and very near the plan which we propose now to re-establish? These continental treasurers, and there were two of them at first, though afterwards reduced to one, were the receivers general; the provincial treasurers and collectors were their subordinates. By these officers the public moneys were collected, kept, and disbursed; for there were no banks then! and all Government drafts were drawn directly upon these officers. This simple plan worked well during the Revolution, and afterwards, until the new Government was formed; and continued to work, with a mere change of names and forms, during the first years of Washington's administration, and until General Hamilton's bank machinery got into play. This bill only proposes to re-establish, in substance, the system of the Revolution, of the Congress of the confederation, and of the first years of Washington's administration.

The bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance (Mr. Wright of New York) presents the details of the plan for accomplishing this great result. That bill has been printed and read. Its simplicity, economy, and efficiency strike the sense of all who hear it, and annihilate without argument, the most formidable arguments of expense and patronage, which had been conceived against it. The present officers, the present mints, and one or two more mints in the South, in the West, and in the North, complete the plan. There will be no necessity to carry masses of hard money from one quarter of the Union to another. Government drafts will make the transfer without moving a dollar. A Government draft upon a national mint, will be the highest order of bills of exchange. Money wanted by the Government in one place, will be exchanged, through merchants, for money in another place.

Thus it has been for thousands of years, and will forever be. We read in Cicero's letters that, when he was Governor of Cilicia, in Asia Minor, he directed his quæstor to deposit the tribute of the province in Antioch, and exchange it for money in Rome with merchants engaged in the Oriental trade, of which Antioch was one of the emporiums. This is the natural course of things, and is too obvious to require explanation, or to admit of comment.

Objections are taken to the capacity of the country to furnish the quantity of gold and silver necessary to pay the revenues of the Government in coin. It is supposed there is not hard money enough for that purpose? This objection induces two inquiries. First, how much specie will be required for that purpose? Secondly, what is the present amount in the country, and what the prospect of increase? In reply to the first of these inquiries, it is to be remembered that the President, in his Message, supposes ten millions will be enough; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report upon the finances, supposes that eight or ten millions will do. Having paid some attention to this point, I have come to the conclusion that the one-fourth part of the amount of the annual revenue will be sufficient to pay the whole; and this opinion is formed upon an observation of the fact, that in a regular state of the finances, when no more revenue is raised than the Government needs, about one-fourth of the whole is always on hand, of course that not more than one-fourth is taken out of circulation. Upon this data, a revenue of twenty millions would require but five millions to pay it; and a revenue of twenty-five millions would require but six and a quarter millions to meet it. A reduction of revenue to the wants of the Treasury is the policy of the administration; no more surpluses is the language of the republican party. About twenty-five millions may, therefore, be the maximum; and the payment of this sum, it is shown, will not employ above six or seven millions. Now, what is the capacity of the country to furnish this amount? How much specie have we, and what is the prospect for more? It is well remembered that eighty millions was the computed supply at the end of the last fiscal year; to that amount we have to add the increase of the present fiscal year, being about five millions; namely, an excess of imports over exports of above four millions, and the coinage of near a million of gold. The future prospect is most encouraging. The export of specie is over; it is a drug in London; it can be borrowed there at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, and three per cent. is a common interest. What has been forced out is ready to flow back. A large import must be expected; and if this bill passes to increase the demand for it at home, and if the suspending banks are made to resume payment, not less than fifteen or twenty millions of dollars may be expected within the ensuing year. This, then, is our condition; upwards of eighty millions now in the country, and the means in our power to increase it largely. Now, cannot a revenue of twenty-five millions, which will never require a greater amount than six or seven millions to be taken out of circulation at any one time; cannot such a revenue be met from these resources? I say it can; and I say this upon data, and will exhibit that data to the Senate, that they may judge of the correctness of my opinion. First, I take the evidence furnished by the history of our own country. The first revenue act of 1789 prescribed "gold and silver coin only" for the payment of the Federal revenue; the revenue was then about four and a half millions of dollars; and the whole amount of specie in the Union was estimated at ten millions of dollars. Here then was a revenue, nearly half the amount of specie in the country, ordered to be collected in specie. I speak of the law which ordered it to be so collected, and to which there was no objection, on account of the inadequacy of specie, either in Congress or out of Congress. The revenue was paid without complaint, and without difficulty, and, in all probability, did not abstract, at one time, a million of dollars from circulation. General Hamilton, the Secretary of the Treasury, permitted notes of banks to be received. Certainly he did, and, just as certainly, for no reason founded on the inadequacy of the specie circulation to meet the demands of the Government. His reasons, as seen in his report to Congress, were altogether of a different class; they were to enable the banks to increase their paper circulation; to increase paper money; and to diffuse it generally over the Union. There were then but three banks in the United States, and those three to the north of the Potomac; they issued no small notes; their aggregate circulation was inconsiderable; and it was the plan of General Hamilton to increase their number, and diffuse their paper. This was his reason for admitting bank paper to be received; and to do so, he had to nullify, by construction, the clear enactment of positive law.

The next piece of evidence I furnish is drawn from the history of England, in the reign of William III., immediately preceding the establishment of the Bank of England, and the introduction of the paper system, and the funding system, into that kingdom. The taxes were then four millions, and the specie of the kingdom sixteen millions. These taxes were paid without difficulty; for they probably did not abstract one million sterling from circulation. The last data I shall produce is from the history of France, during the first administration of Neckar, which about covered the period of our Revolution. I speak of the first administration of Neckar, and when the finances of France were in a regular state, and not of his subsequent administration, when the extravagances of the day and the subservience of the ministers Calonne and Brienne had involved those finances in a ruin from which the talents of Neckar could not extricate them. What was the revenne and the specie circulation of France at that time? I say specie circulation; for the Mississippi scheme of John Law had cured the nation of paper money, until the assignats of the Revolution came upon the stage, and lived their brief day. What was the revenue, and the specie circulation out of which it was paid, in the prosperous period of the French finances to which I have alluded? Twenty-two millions sterling of revenue; about 110,000,000 of dollars; and ninety millions sterling of circulation; about 450,000,000 of dollars. This vast revenue, equal to one-fourth of the whole circulation, was regularly paid; and this establishes the only point for which I refer to it. Now, to apply this historical experience to our own country, and to the present times. Our revenue may be about 25,000,000; one-fourth of that sum will pay it; we have upwards of eighty millions of specie in the country, annually increasing, and certain to increase to the utmost extent of our wants, if we create a demand for it. One hundred millions of exportable productions will bring back just as much specie as the country wants. The objection, then, to the inadequacy of the specie in the country falls to the ground. We have more than enough for that purpose. We have but two branches of revenue—the lands and the customs, and both voluntary sources of income; for no person is under compulsion to purchase the public lands, and no one is under compulsion to import foreign goods. These are the sources of our revenues. Their payment is voluntary; and even during this summer, since the suspension of specie payments, the income from one of these sources (the lands) has been equal to the best years before the two great years of speculation. I will answer for this branch of revenue. Bring the new lands into market, and reduce the price of the old lands, and the Government will get ten or twelve millions of gold and silver from them in the next year.

I am free to admit that the whole of this eighty millions is not now in the hands of the people; that much of it is locked up in the vaults of the banks. But this is temporary; it cannot last much longer; public opinion is omnipotent, and must prevail; that opinion is against the conduct of the banks; and in the progress of it they must see their own doom. Their vaults are shut, but their eyes must be opening; and with these eyes they must begin to see what the public is beginning to think of a banking system which, in a season of peace, tranquillity, and general prosperity, and with a hundred millions of exports, and four times as much specie as ever was in the country before, are either unable, or unwilling, to meet any part of their obligations in specie—even to pay out picayunes—and have driven the people to the use of irredeemable paper and shimplasters, and the Federal Government itself to an issue of Treasury notes.

We are taunted with these Treasury notes; it seems to be matter of triumph that the Government is reduced to the necessity of issuing them; but with what justice? And how soon can any Government that wishes it, emerge from the wretchedness of depreciated paper, and stand erect on the solid foundations of gold and silver? How long will it take any respectable Government, that so wills it, to accomplish this great change? Our own history, at the close of the Revolution, answers the question; and more recently, and more strikingly, the history of France answers it also. I speak of the French finances from 1800 to 1807; from the commencement of the Consulate to the peace of Tilsit. This wonderful period is replete with instruction on the subject of finance and currency. The whole period is full of instruction; but I can only seize two views—the beginning and the end—and, for the sake of precision, will read what I propose to present. I read from Bignon, author of the civil and diplomatic history of France during the Consulate and the first years of the empire; written at the testamentary request of the Emperor himself.

After stating that the expenditures of the republic were six hundred millions of francs—about one hundred and ten millions of dollars—when Bonaparte became First Consul, the historian proceeds:

“At his arrival at power, a sum of 160,000 francs in money [about $32,000] was all that the public chests contained. * * * * *

In the impossibility of meeting the current service by the ordinary receipts, the Directorial Government, had resorted to ruinous expedients, and had thrown into circulation bills of various values, and which sunk upon the spot fifty to eighty per cent. A part of the arrearages had been discharged in bills two-thirds on credit payable to the bearer, but which, in fact, the Treasury was not able to pay when due. The remaining third had been inscribed in the great book, under the name of consolidated third. For the payment of the forced requisitions to which they had been obliged to have recourse, there had been issued bills receivable in payment of the revenues. Finally, the Government, in order to satisfy the most imperious wants, gave orders upon the receivers general, delivered in advance to contractors, which they negotiated before they began to furnish the supplies for which they were the payment.”

This, resumed Mr. B., was the condition of the French finances when Bonaparte became First Consul at the close of the year 1799. The currency was in the same condition—no specie—a degraded currency of assignats, ruinously depreciated, and issued as low as ten sous. That great man immediately began to restore order to the finances, and solidity to the currency. Happily a peace of three years enabled him to complete the great work, before he was called to celebrate the immortal campaigns ending at Austerlitz, Jena, and Friedland. At the end of three years—before the rupture of the peace of Amiens—the finances and the currency were restored to order and to solidity; and, at the end of six years, when the vast establishments, and the internal ameliorations of the imperial Government, had carried the annual expenses to eight hundred millions of francs, about one hundred and sixty millions of dollars; the same historian copying the words of the Minister of Finance, thus speaks of the Treasury, and the currency:

"The resources of the State had increased beyond its wants; the public chests are full; all payments are made at the day named; the orders upon the public Treasury have become the most approved bills of exchange. * * The finances are in the most happy condition; France alone, among all the States of Europe, having no paper money."

What a picture! how simply, how powerfully drawn! and what a change in six years! Public chests full; payments made to the day; orders on the Treasury the best bills of exchange; France alone, of all Europe, having no paper money; meaning no Government paper money, for there were bank notes of one hundred francs and one thousand francs. A Government revenue of one hundred and sixty millions of dollars was paid in gold and silver; a hard-money currency, of five hundred and fifty millions of dollars, saturated all parts of France with specie, and made gold and silver the every-day currency of every man, woman, and child in the empire. These great results were the work of six years, and were accomplished by the simple process of gradually requiring hard-money payments; gradually calling in the assignats; increasing the branch mints to fourteen, and limiting the Bank of France to an issue of large notes—five hundred francs and upwards. This simple process produced these results, and thus stands the French currency at this day; for the nation has had the wisdom to leave untouched the financial system of Bonaparte. I have repeatedly given it as my opinion—many of my speeches declare it—that the French currency is the best in the world. It has hard money for the Government; hard money for the common dealings of the people; and large notes for large transactions. This currency has enabled France to stand two invasions—the ravaging of 300,000 men—two changes of dynasty, and the payment of a milliard of contributions; and all without any commotion or convulsion in trade. It has saved her from the revulsions which have afflicted England and our America for so many years. It has saved her from expansions, contractions, and ruinous fluctuations of price. It has saved her, for near forty years, from a debate on currency. It has saved her even from the knowledge of our sweet-scented phrases, "sound currency, unsound currency; plethoric, dropsical, inflated, bloated; the money market tight to-day, a little easier this morning;" and all such verbiage, which the haberdasher's boys repeat. It has saved France from even a discussion on currency; while in England, and with us, it is banks! banks! banks! morning, noon, and night; breakfast, dinner, and supper; levant and couchant; sitting, or standing; at home, or abroad; steamboat, or railroad car; in Congress, or out of Congress, it is all the same thing; banks! banks! banks! currency! currency! currency! meaning, all the while, paper money and shimplasters; until our very brains seem as if they would be converted into lampblack and rags.

The Senator from New York, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) in his very able speech, has referred to the overthrow of Bonaparte, effected by the paper system of England. Without going into the question of the causes of that overthrow—without looking to the ice of Russia and the non-arrival of Grouchy on the field of Waterloo, and without considering the numerous incidents, often trivial in themselves, on which the fate of battles and of empires depend—it will be sufficient to consider what would have been the fate of this paper system of England, if, like the system of France, it had been exposed to the shocks of invasions, conquests, and changes of dynasty; and, leaving out this supposed view, it will be sufficient to look at it under its real aspect, and to see its present effects on the condition of the British empire. What are those effects? They are, in brief, an increase of taxes from 1694, when the Bank of England was chartered, from four millions sterling (twenty millions of dollars) to forty-five millions sterling, (two hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars;) an increase of the public debt from twenty-one millions five hundred and fifteen thousand seven hundred and forty-two pounds, thirteen shillings, eight pence, and two farthings, (to be precise,) in round numbers about one hundred millions of dollars, to near nine hundred millions sterling, or four thousand five hundred millions of dollars; and the increase of pauperism, until three millions of people grace the list. These are some, for I omit, as too well known, the average septennial convulsions of that system; these are some of the evils of the paper system in England. But take another view; take some points of comparison between the national expenditures of France and England, when contending together, and see how the account, in point of economy between paper money and hard money, will stand. Let us take the year 1806, when England was subsidizing Russia and other powers against France, and when the great Emperor frustrated the effect of all these subsidies, and consolidated his power by the victory of Friedland, and the peace of Tilsit. What were the expenses of the two contending empires for that year? They were these: For England one thousand seven hundred and seventy-two millions of francs, (about three hundred and sixty millions of dollars;) for France, seven hundred and seventy eight millions of francs, (about one hundred and sixty millions of dollars;) in other words, the expenses of England exceeded those of France by about one thousand millions of francs, or two hundred millions of dollars. Such was the difference between the economy of paper money and hard money; and the same proportion holds good in every station in life, from the Emperor and his empire, to the washerwoman and her household.

The amendment now depending, on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) is the same in substance with the bill which I brought in upwards of a year ago, to re-establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government. That bill was in these words:

"That bank notes and paper currency of every description shall cease to be received, or offered in payment, on account of the United States, or of the Post Office, or in fees in the courts of the United States, as follows: of less denomination than twenty dollars, none shall be so offered after the 3d day of March, 1837; of less denomination than fifty dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1838; of less denomination than one hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1839; of less denomination than five hundred dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1840; of less denomination than one thousand dollars, none after the 3d day of March, 1841; and none of any denomination from and after the 3d day of March, 1842.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person holding an appointment under the laws of the United States, and any bank employed to keep public moneys, which person or bank shall neglect, evade, violate, contravene, or in any way elude, or attempt to elude, the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of an offence against the laws; and the person so offending shall be liable to be dismissed from the service, and the bank so offending shall, on satisfactory information, be discontinued as a depository of public moneys."

The only direct action of this bill would have been on the receipts of the Federal Treasury. It has been extensively represented as a bill to impose hard money upon the States, but such is not its character, but the reverse; it was to prevent the local paper of the States from being imposed on the Federal Government. Its indirect and consequential action has been to increase the specie circulation of the whole Union by creating a demand for it. The present amendment will operate the same way; it will increase the quantity of hard money everywhere. Yet two objections, neither of them well founded, and each inconsistent with the other, have been taken to it; one is, that it proposes to take the better currency for the Government, and leave the baser to the people; the other is, that it is going to impose this better currency upon the people also; and so destroy all paper money at once, reduce everything to the specie standard, and ruin all debtors. Each of these objections are equally unfounded. Taken singly, they are each erroneous; taken together, as we often find them in the same speech, and they belong to that class of arguments which the logicians call the argumentum ad ignorantiam: that is to say, an argument addressed to the supposed ignorance of the hearers. This class of arguments has been freely used by gentlemen of the opposition for a long time; with what effect the issue of the elections has often told. It is time to quit it, and to address the intelligence of the community. Take the better currency to itself. Why, the Government does not eat the money, but pays it back again the next day to the people. Impose hard money upon the States! The mere reading of the amendment, or my bill, which is the same in substance, disproves the assertion. No, the effect of the measure will be to increase the gold and silver circulation for the whole country. Thus it has been already. Five years ago we began our system of measures to revive the gold currency, and to increase the specie circulation. There was then twenty millions of silver in the country, and no gold; there is now upwards of eighty millions, of which fifteen is gold. True, the banks have suppressed all this circulation for the present; they have shut down the hatches upon the whole of it; but this suppression cannot continue much longer. The law of the land, or of public opinion, will soon prevail, and these institutions will have to submit. The bill before the Senate dispenses with the further use of banks as depositories of the public moneys. In that it has my hearty concurrence. Four times heretofore, and on four different occasions, I have made propositions to accomplish a part of the same purpose. First, in proposing an amendment to the deposit bill of 1836, by which the mint, and the branch mints, were to be included in the list of depositories; secondly, in proposing that the public moneys here, at the seat of Government, should be kept and paid out by the Treasurer; thirdly, by proposing that a preference, in receiving the deposits, should be given to such banks as should cease to be banks of circulation; fourthly, in opposing the establishment of a bank agency in Missouri, and proposing that the moneys there should be drawn direct from the hands of the receivers. Three of these propositions are now included in the bill before the Senate; and the whole object at which they partially aimed is fully embraced. I am for the measure, fully, cordially, earnestly for it.

Some Senators suppose that it will be a great injury to the local banks to refuse their notes in revenue payments; I think otherwise, and that it will be a great injury to receive them; for they will be taken out of circulation, and returned in masses on the banks for redemption. They cannot be paid out by the Government, and, therefore, will have to be presented for redemption to the banks. The act of 1836 cuts them off from all payments from the Federal Government, or the post offices. That act contains three limitations upon the payment of these notes: first, no note under twenty dollars is to be paid out; and that cuts off the greater number: secondly, no note is to be paid out which is issued at one place, and made payable at another; thirdly, no note of any kind is to be paid out, unless it is equal to gold and silver at the place where offered, and convertible into specie upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without loss or delay to him. This is the strongest limitation, and cuts off all payment in notes unless where the bank itself is situated. The three limitations taken together, and they are all in full force, cut off bank paper from nearly every payment to be made, either by the United States or by the Post Office Department.

I do not pretend to exhaust this subject; I only touch the leading objections to the further use of bank notes by the Government, and the future use of banks as depositories of public moneys. It is a practice fraught with mischief to both parties, and has been so proved by repeated experience. To receive the notes of banks for revenue, if they are to be paid in good faith, is merely to take them out of circulation, and return them in masses for redemption, to the great peril and alarm of the bank. If they are not to be paid, their receipt is a fraud upon the Government. So said Mr. Crawford, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, and when members of Congress, marching in columns upon him, backed by legislative petitions, were demanding this privilege for so many local banks. Importunity and legislative interference most usually prevailed; and in almost every instance to the injury of the bank, and to the loss of the Government. So will it be again, if the practice is resumed.

Again: It is tempting the banks into ruinous expansions, thus to give them the credit and the domain of the United States to bank upon. They put out floods of notes, because receivability at the custom-house, the land-office, and the post office, gives them credit and circulation. After some months, pay-day comes. Federal credit, which got the notes into circulation, will not pay them; the bank stops; depreciation ensues; the loss falls upon the Government, and upon the uninformed holders of the notes.

Again: It is a false credit given by the Government to the whole issues of any bank whose paper is so received. It is endorsement without responsibility. People take it, because the Government takes it; and when the bank fails, the Government does not indemnify those who have been deceived by an endorsement, valid for deception, and invalid for responsibility.

Again: This Government receivability enables notes to stray from their known orbit of circulation; to go off into distant parts, where they are unknown; to live there awhile in the sunshine of Federal favor; to circulate awhile on land-office and custom-house credit; and, finally, to sink as insolvents upon the hands of strangers.

Again: There must be selection of banks, or universality of reception. If selection, then favoritism, patronage, caprice—refusal to-day, reception to-morrow—imposition on some, undue advantage to others—come into play. If receivability is universal, then a thousand banks now in existence, and thousands more to be created, all become furnishers of Federal currency; and in a few years the public lands are changed into paper—the custom-house revenue becomes a bale of paper—and this paper worth as little as it would be if it was decomposed and restored to its original state of lampblack and rags.

Again: To take the promissory notes of the banks for lands, customs, and postages, is to extend a credit to the banks which is denied to the community. The farmer is required to pay ready money for the public lands; but if the note of the bank is received, this is a credit to the bank—a credit to a barren moneyed corporation, which is denied to a productive, meritorious citizen. The same of postages; and the same is, in some degree, the case at the custom-houses now, and will be fully, when ready money payments are required there, as another bill before the Senate now proposes.

Again: To make the banks depositories of our moneys, involves the use, or the prohibition of the use, of these moneys. If the former, then the revenues are as much jeopardized as ever; if the latter, then the bank has no benefit from the deposit.

Again: To continue these banks as depositories, is to create an interest—a powerful, active, concentrated interest, in Congress and out of Congress—in favor of high taxes and low appropriations. The late Bank of the United States was such an interest during the whole time of its existence. It was the ally of high tariffs, and the enemy of appropriation bills. Its principle of action was, take from the people, and leave with us! and so it will be with a league of local depository banks. Their presidents and directors; their stockholders and attorneys, with all their friends and debtors, will be a unit, to keep up taxes and to keep down appropriations. The Government should not create, for itself and for the people, so formidable an antagonist.

The friends of the banks treat it as their ruin, as a grievous outrage and indignity, for the Government of the United States to refuse to take their notes, and to refuse to use them as depositories; yet this was their condition during the whole time of the existence of the Bank of the United States, and yet they made no objection to it then. This is strange! but what is more so is, that while thus struggling against the Government, they are, many of them, in favor of re-establishing a national bank; the first act of which will be to strip them of Government deposits, and exclude their paper from Government receivability!

Congress has a sacred duty to perform in reforming the finances, and the currency; for the ruin of both has resulted from Federal legislation, and Federal administration. The States, at the formation of the constitution, delivered a solid currency—I will not say sound, for that word implies subject to unsoundness, to rottenness, and to death—but they delivered a solid currency, one not liable to disease, to this Federal Government. They started the new Government fair upon gold and silver. The first act of Congress attested this great fact; for it made the revenues payable in gold and silver coin only. Thus the States delivered a solid currency to this Government, and they reserved the same currency for themselves; and they provided constitutional sanctions to guard both. The things to be saved, and the power to save it, was given to this Government by the States; and in the hands of this Government it became deteriorated. The first great error was General Hamilton's construction of the act of 1789, by which he nullified that act, and overturned the statute and the constitution together. The next great error was the establishment of a national bank of circulation, with authority to pay all the public dues in its own paper. This confirmed the overthrow of the constitution, and of the statute of 1789; and it set the fatal example to the States to make banks, and to receive their paper for public dues, as the United States had done. This was the origin of the evil—this the origin of the overthrow of the solid currency which the States had delivered to the Federal Government. It was the Hamiltonian policy that did the mischief; and the state of things in 1837, is the natural fruit of that policy. It is time for us to quit it—to return to the constitution and the statute of 1789, and to confine the Federal Treasury to the hard money which was intended for it.

I repeat, this is a measure of reform, worthy to be called a reformation. It goes back to a fundamental abuse, nearly coeval with the foundation of the Government. Two epochs have occurred for the reformation of this abuse; one was lost, the other is now in jeopardy. Mr. Madison's administration committed a great error at the expiration of the charter of the first Bank of the United States, in not reviving the currency of the constitution for the Federal Treasury, and especially the gold currency. That error threw the Treasury back upon the local bank paper. This paper quickly failed, and out of that failure grew the second United States Bank. Those who put down the second United States Bank, warned by the calamity, determined to avoid the error of Mr. Madison's administration; they determined to increase the stock of specie, and to revive the gold circulation, which had been dead for thirty years. The accumulation of eighty millions in the brief space of five years, fifteen millions of it in gold, attests the sincerity of their design, and the facility of its execution. The country was going on at the rate of an average increase of twelve millions of specie per annum, when the general stoppages of the banks in May last, the exportation of specie and the imposition of irredeemable paper upon the Government and the people, seemed to announce the total failure of the plan. But it was a seeming only. The impetus given to the specie policy still prevails, and five millions are added to the stock during the present fiscal year. So far, then, as the counteraction of the Government policy, and the suppression of the constitutional currency might have been expected to result from that stoppage, the calculation seems to be in a fair way to be disappointed. The spirit of the people, and our hundred millions of exportable produce, are giving the victory to the glorious policy of our late illustrious President. The other great consequences expected to result from the stoppage, namely: the recharter of the Bank of the United States, the change of administration, the overthrow of the republican party, and the restoration of the federal dynasty, all seem to be in the same fair way to total miscarriage; but the objects are too dazzling to be abandoned by the parties interested, and the destruction of the finances and the currency, is still the cherished road to success. The miscalled Bank of the United States, the soul of the federal dynasty, and the anchor of its hopes—believed by many to have been at the bottom of the stoppages in May, and known by all to be at the head of non-resumption—now displays her policy on this floor; it is to compel the repetition of the error of Mr. Madison's administration! Knowing that from the repetition of this error must come the repetition of the catastrophes of 1814, 1819, and 1837; and out of these catastrophes to extract a new clamor for the revivification of herself. This is her line of conduct; and to this line the conduct of all her friends conforms. With one heart, one mind, one voice, they labor to cut off gold and silver from the Federal Government, and to impose paper upon it! they labor to deprive it of the keeping of its own revenues, and to place them again where they have been so often lost! This is the conduct of that bank and its friends. Let us imitate their zeal, their unanimity, and their perseverance. The amendment and the bill, now before the Senate, embody our policy. Let us carry them, and the republic is safe.

SATURDAY, September 23.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the collection and custody of the public revenue. The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN, to separate the Government from the banks,

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said two plans were urged upon the Senate: one reported by the Committee on Finance, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from South Carolina; the other the State bank system, which had already been tried, and failed.

As to the last, various apologies had been made here and elsewhere, for its failure; and it had been insisted that it had not had a fair trial, and therefore could not be said properly to have failed. The most able and ingenious advocates and apologists of this system that he had heard were his friends from Virginia and New York. If they had not succeeded in convincing the Senate that the system should be re-adopted, (with the modifications proposed,) conviction might be considered hopeless. He certainly agreed with them, that the system had not had a fair trial. The pets had certainly a hard time of it under their Executive patron; but he had never had confidence in them from the beginning, and, in truth, the system had never succeeded for one moment.

Mr. K. said he would not detain the Senate by going fully into the capabilities of the State bank system to perform the services promised by it. He stood upon firm ground on this subject. His friends could not charge him with change or inconsistency in this matter; and, as was well known, he had generally predicted, step by step, the consequences that would follow from the financial experiments that had afflicted the country, beginning with that unfortunate and unnecessary measure, the removal of the deposits in 1834. It would be seen that he had no strong predilection for the State bank deposit system, though he admitted that it might have done, and still could do much better than heretofore, if the Executive would consent to let it alone, and cease the continual interferences by which the banks have been tormented, and the commerce of the country deranged, ever since the Executive had taken the control of the finances.

Mr. K. then proceeded to notice the plan of the committee as proposed to be amended. This he looked upon as a new experiment, though it had been alleged to be otherwise by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator insisted that we were ahead of our destiny, and ought to go back to the glorious days of the Roman empire to learn lessons on finance and political economy. This plan was strongly recommended as having been that under which the Roman quæstors made their mild exactions from the people. It was recommended most warmly by the Senator, because it was that under which the war levies of Napoleon were made, and the finances of Spain and Turkey collected and disbursed. Upon the first recommendation, the Senator had given us a most eloquent discourse upon Roman heroism; bloody battles, and the levies of the quæstors. He had spoken of the great pleasure with which he read Roman history on these subjects, and the delight with which he contemplated the renown of this great people. Well, Mr. K. said he had read some Roman history too, though certainly not as good a historian as his friend from Missouri. But if any thing in Roman history had made a strong impression upon his republican mind, it was the heartless cruelty, the unfeeling rigor, and pitiless tyranny with which exactions were made upon the people by the Roman quæstors; and, unfortunately for the Senator's Roman precedent, when these exactions had been made by plundering the Roman people and provinces to support heroism in the trade of conquering and plundering the rest of mankind, these exactions were deposited with Roman bankers appointed for the purpose.

As the Roman precedent was not found exactly satisfactory to Mr. K., he proceeded to notice the system so warmly recommended as the plan of that great democrat and ardent lover of liberty and free institutions, the Emperor Napoleon. His friend from Missouri had stated that when the Emperor mounted the throne of power, he found the State coffers empty, or nearly so; but in a short time they were filled to overflowing. Thereupon the Senator produced a book, or a document, to prove the important fact. The fact was not doubted; but how were these wonders of finance accomplished? Let his impoverished country and the blood and tears of unhappy Germany answer the question. However, perhaps the financiering of this great economist was strongly recommended from the fact that the largest and most timely accession to his finances was made by the robbery of a bank; and that too a bank belonging to one of the freest and most commercial cities of Europe.*

Mr. K. said he saw nothing in these imperial precedents, ancient or modern, very applicable or very captivating; and as he saw nothing in the happy and prosperous condition of the people of those free and commercial nations (Turkey and Spain) to excite his envy, he would rather consider this as a new and untried experiment, and digest it a little better before it was adopted. Mr. K. added, that the system was already in operation, as the changes proposed did not alter essentially the specie system adopted by the Executive since the suspension of specie payments. The postponement would give us a little more time to observe the workings of the system, and ascertain the wishes of the people. He was glad to see the finances restored to Congress, their lawful guardian, on almost any terms; but really they were in such a worthless and ragged condition, from Executive manipulation, that it was difficult to say what disposition had better be made of them.

Mr. K. said he doubted whether he ought to detain the Senate to say any thing upon the causes of the present distress, which had called Congress together. As this subject had been dwelt upon, however, by every speaker who had preceded him, and was certainly of great importance to the country, it was perhaps the duty of every member to give his views upon the subject. The subject, said he, is too important to be trifled with. It comes to the doors and dwellings, and reaches the bread and business of every citizen, of every condition; and I shall give my views, however unwillingly, uninfluenced by all personal friendships and party associations. Unless we ascertain the causes which have so strangely brought the country into its present distressed condition, in a time of profound peace, we shall neither know how to apply present remedies nor avoid similar evils in future.

[Here Mr. King entered into an extended examination of the causes which produced the present distress, exploring for that purpose the financial and commercial operations of England as well as of the United States; and continued:]

Let us now return to the United States. In June, 1836, the ruin threatened by so large an accumulation of the public money, and the uses that were made of it, and the unsound state of the currency generally, was so manifest that all parties united in the opinion that something must be done with it. After full discussion and great deliberation, Congress, with uncommon unanimity, adopted the law to distribute the deposits among the States. Though no measure could be free from objection, this was certainly the wisest that could have been adopted in reference to the end proposed. It depleted the Treasury, and checked over-issues, by a public law, with full notice, easy terms, and ample time for its execution. The President was, unfortunately, opposed to it, and seemed determined, not only to use every means to prevent its efficiency, but to prevent its operation on the Western and South-western deposit banks, which, in fact, most needed its operation. With this view, he adopted the famous specie circular—a sort of order in council—though the identical measure had been a few days before proposed as a legislative measure, and, with almost perfect unanimity, rejected by the Senate.

The principal, perhaps only, object of this measure was to save from explosion some of the tottering deposit banks in the West and South-west, when they should be called on to comply with the deposit law, and surrender the public money. His object could not have been to prevent over-issues, such an object being inconsistent with his opposition to the deposit bill, which was certainly, of all others, the best conceived for that purpose. Whatever might have been the motive, the measure was an unwise and unfortunate one, deranging the whole internal commerce of the country, producing panic, breaking up exchanges, and destroying credit, at the very time, of all others, when the country should have been permitted to make the best of its resources, without violence or surprise.

Mr. K. said the United States Bank, though no longer in existence, had been the theme of every gentleman who had addressed the Senate. He should say no more of it than was necessary to justify and defend himself, and the numerous friends of the administration who had believed in the utility of that institution. His defence was fully justified; for, although that institution was established by the democratic party, every friend of it was placed, in sweeping denunciations, among aristocrats, rogues, and conspirators; ranked with the "Biddles and the Barrings, and the banks," and set upon in full cry by dunces and demagogues, anxious only to turn attention from their own mischievous blunders and errors.

When he came to maturity, he said, he found the Bank of the United States in successful and happy operation. He learned its history, and found that it was established by the party to which he had always been attached, with the immortal Madison at their head; who after fatal experience had changed his opinion on the subject. This paternity recommended it, but reflection as well as experience convinced him of its great utility as a financial agent to the Government, as an aid to internal and external commerce, and a wholesome regulator of an otherwise unregulated paper system. As an original question, he was and ever had been opposed to the whole paper system, but the system certainly had many advantages in a free country, and moreover was fixed upon us, and no one generation either could or would bear the sacrifices it would cost to get rid of it. And (added he) the progress we should make in getting rid of the system and its abuses, by putting down the Bank of the United States, was predicted by me in the Senate in 1834. Sir, the great temperance president, or temperance reformer, Mr. Delavan, who sends us so many temperance papers, might just as well have undertaken to encourage the cause of temperance in which he is engaged, by breaking up one respectable grocery in Chestnut street, that he might raise up 500 grog shops in the Liberties, the villages, and the Western wilderness. He thought it the part of wisdom not to waste itself on impracticable extremes, but to secure the blessings of the system, and avoid as many of its evils as possible. This he thought was best effected by a national bank, with the aid of the Treasury. The vast extent of our country gave full time to such an institution to lop off redundancies and fill up deficiencies on notice of an irregularity in the currency, in any particular sections before the effect became general. It was clearly the interest of such an institution to perform these duties faithfully. Its own successful operation in a great measure depended on it; which was the best guaranty to the public that they would be so performed. He also believed that the money of the nation could be entrusted to no agency so little dangerous to liberty, or so unlikely to use it for political purposes. Experience proved the truth of this opinion. We had, again, the best of all security—that is, the security of interest. To engage in politics, or unite itself with a political party, is death to the institution. What evidence had been shown, or could be shown, that the bank ever hinted an interference with politics, until it supposed the Executive to make an overture for that purpose? In 1829 the Executive commenced a correspondence with the bank to procure a change in the president of the New Hampshire branch. He did not say that any thing improper was intended by the Executive, but it was the first interference of the kind, and the bank supposed it to be an attempt to enlist it in politics, and unite the power of the bank with the power of the Government. It declined on the ground that the bank never had and could not now think of interfering in the politics of the country. The rest is known. The Message followed with a charge of what nobody had ever heard of before, and recommending a Treasury bank, uniting the power and patronage of a bank to that of the Government. From that time forth the Executive continued to struggle for the money power until it took possession of it in 1833, by the removal of the deposits. I only mention these facts, sir, to prove the great reluctance with which such an institution will always engage in politics. Its interest requires the custom and friendship of both political parties, and it cannot prosper against a war by either. The money power of the Treasury is great, let it be lodged where it will; but, for the reasons stated, I believe it is less in a national bank, connected with and dependent on the business of the country, than in any other. There was no danger of the political influence of a bank, if the Executive would let it alone. Some admitted that the bank had been improperly attacked, but that, being attacked, it had over-issued and otherwise mismanaged in its struggles for a recharter. This might be true to some extent; but, if so, it is more an objection to the direction than the institution, and might be prevented by a simple provision in the charter, which the old charter ought to have contained.

Sir, these are the opinions I have always entertained, and were the opinions of my then colleague, when I came into the Senate; they were known to our constituents. But as this was a matter of expediency, on which they had a right to judge, they expected to be, and shall be, represented; and their wishes, when I last heard from them, were against a national bank. In fact, although I believe it unfortunate that the old bank was destroyed, the question of establishing a new one, at this time, is a very different question. Under our anti-bank administration, the bank capital has been much more than doubled in a few years. Is it expedient to add to it? If so, the practicability of controlling it, by a national bank of permissible size, and the manner of doing it, are important questions. The present rate of exchange, too, would render it difficult to procure specie for the institution, and create a demand for it, that would, for the present, add to the distress. There were some other reasons that had been referred to, but which he could not, at this time, notice.

But, we are gravely told, sir, that the "Bank of the United States, with its 'still greater strength,' has not been able to prevent the present state of affairs; that it 'has not been able to check other institutions, or save itself.'"

This reference to the bank would have done very well for a party newspaper; but, I must confess, I was somewhat astonished to find it in a Message of the President of the United States. Can it be supposed that the most ignorant can be deceived by this catch at a mere name? Who ever thought of holding the Bank of the United States responsible for the currency, or as a financial regulator, after the withdrawal of its branches, or even after the removal of the deposits? What obligation was it under to the public, after the public had taken away the deposits and dispensed with its services? Was it under any very strong obligation, if it had the power, to aid the Executive in an experiment made at its expense, and intended for its destruction? I should think not; and to hold a State bank responsible because it is called "the Bank of the United States," is absolutely ridiculous. It has fallen into line with the multitude of State banks created under the late administration. It has supported his "policy" by importing specie on credit, that it might hatch more paper upon it. It has gloried in the confusion of the exchanges, by which it has made millions. In short, like the rest of the State banks, it has gone for making money; it has joined its fortunes with the State banks; it has borrowed specie like the State banks; has expanded with the State banks; has shaved with the State banks; has failed with the State banks, and is a State bank, and yet it is held responsible to the country as a national bank. Sir, it is no more a United States Bank, and not so much as the little Burlington bank, which produced such a happy effect with a modicum of the spoils sent to it, and pressingly sent for more to operate on the elections, "in anticipation of the wool clip." There is a United States Bank for ye, established by the Executive to prevent the public money from being employed to operate on the politics of the country!

Why, then, these valiant charges upon a ghost? this war upon a sign? these tilts upon a tombstone? They are about as useful, and about as rational, as the charges of the redoubtable Don Quixote upon the windmills.

In connection with these perpetual efforts to frighten us with ghosts and "things that are not," Mr. K. said he had never had his democratic feelings so shocked as they had been by a sentiment of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) warmly applauded by his friend near him, (Mr. STRANGE.) We were told that, though expedient, we should not make this State bank a depository, "because it would be a triumph over the Government!" What Government? The "Government" at the Hermitage, or the Government at the White House? These Governments were both, to be sure, supposed to be inimical to the present State bank, because they did not like Mr. Bidle, its president, who was formerly president of the national institution. But what had the Government to do with the present State institution? He had supposed, until lately, that the Government meant the legislative power, as established by the constitution; and, if the people, through their representatives, according to the forms of the constitution, should deem it expedient to make any State institution a depository, it would be no objection with him that either the ex-President or present Executive was supposed to be inimical to one of its officers. I do not propose (said he) to make this institution a depository, and nobody has proposed or thought of proposing it, so far as I know. Why, then, this war-whoop against it? To show our devotion to the supposed Executive will? "A change, what a change," has been produced in the tone of American feeling by these violent encroachments and recent triumphs of the Executive over the Legislative authority, in relation to the finances! All eyes are turned to the Executive. The spirit of our fathers has fled. The blood of '76 has run out. Sir, there have been more gray hairs brought upon the head of our youthful and vigorous republic in the last four years, than ought to have grown upon it in one entire century of quiet and peaceful administration, with the constitutional co-operation of the legislative departments.

My friends need not be astonished at the freedom with which I express these sentiments. They believe with me, they have acted with me. We have vainly stood up together against the will of the Executive. Our efforts have been impotent. We have been trampled under foot. The Executive has had his way, and we see the result. I only wish my friends to join me in making a firm stand, to teach the Executive that his friends are to be consulted in measures of such immense importance to the people as those by which our finances have been ruined. I have no idea of deserting them, sir; they need not apprehend that. I am only expressing freely sentiments I and they have entertained, and not very carefully concealed. I am a party man, sir. All I am as a politician I was made so by party. I have no sympathies with any other party except that with which I have always acted, and by which I have been honored. I respect my political opponents as my fellow-citizens, living under the same laws, subject to the same Government, and equally honest and patriotic with myself. But I differ with them in some of the essential and fundamental principles upon which our Government should be administered, and have nothing to ask, and nothing to expect from them.

I am a democrat, a real democrat. I do not make the profession ad captandum; I fear it is becoming rather unpopular; but my early habits and youthful associations made me so. In fact, the sentiment was planted in my heart by nature, cultivated by education, and approved by reason. I believe a democratic republic to be the most philosophical government, and best calculated to develop the energies and sustain the dignity of man, so long as the people have sufficient intelligence to qualify them for self-government. I, therefore, abhor tyranny and irresponsible power in every possible form in which it can be presented; whether it be presented in the hypocritical garb of republican homespun, or tinselled over in the glittering trappings of royalty. I go for a strict construction of the constitution, limited Executive patronage, and an economical administration of the Government; and you will never find me here, sir, with democracy and economy upon the lips, and tyranny and plunder in the heart. "I borrow no false liveries from heaven to serve the devil in."

Mr. K., after some further remarks, concluded this branch of the subject by saying, that he had full confidence that the President, when some present difficulties were removed, would administer his department with wisdom and patriotism, and he hoped and expected to be able to give him his feeble support. But he just wished to tell him now that, if he intended "to tread in the footsteps" of his predecessor, in trampling on the legislative authority, in the management of a subject of all others of the most importance to the people, he should feel it his duty to jostle him out of them. He never would consent (he said) to surrender the finances to the exclusive control of the Executive. If we did this, we should share the fate of every other nation who had submitted to Executive financiering: we should first become a nation of beggars, and then a nation of slaves.

Mr. K. said he had been led on to a length altogether unexpected to himself, and he feared tiresome to the Senate. Several other topics had been suggested by the remarks of other gentlemen, that he would like to touch, but he would dispense with them, and come to a conclusion, after a few words more upon the bill and amendment under consideration. As to the separation from the State banks as depositories, he conceived that a matter of no great consequence, if in the details we could provide safety to the money, and guard against too much patronage and expense. But the bill he thought imperfect and obscure on both these points. And when we had passed the bill, we should have but little idea of what we had done.

As to the amendment proposed, which restricted the receipts of the Government to gold and silver, he could never consent to think of it, without hearing from his constituents, so long as specie is not the common currency, used by the people in the business transactions of the country. They are never prepared with a currency not in common circulation, and would often and truly be reminded of the Roman quaestors, who were in the habit, among other acts of tyranny, of demanding particular kinds of money for the purposes of extortion. Here, 11,000 specie gatherers, demanding a currency not furnished the people by their own States, or by the ordinary circulation, will give them more trouble than all their other pecuniary transactions, and, being different to the demands made upon them for State taxes, will give to the Federal Government an alien character of tyranny and oppression. He could not conceive, he said, of a measure better calculated to give to the Government of the Union the appearance of a foreign Government, and alienate the affections of the people from it, than the measure proposed.

Mr. RIVES rose, and said he would ask leave of the Senate to say a few words which he meant to say yesterday, but was prevented by the speaking of another Senator, (Mr. BENTON.) Mr. R. said he rose to protest against the manner in which this question had been, and continued to be, treated by the Senator from South Carolina. That gentleman argued as if there were some proposition before the Senate to re-establish the Bank of the United States, or to confer upon the existing Pennsylvania Bank of the United States some special and important privilege. But, sir, is there any question of that sort really before the Senate? The question presented by the proposition on your table is, whether the notes of banks generally, when they shall have resumed specie payments, ought not, under certain limitations, to be received in payment of the public dues, as they heretofore have been from the origin of the Government down to the present time, or whether they shall be altogether excluded in future, and nothing be received in payment of the public revenue but gold and silver? The question, then, is one which involves alike the whole eight hundred State banks in the Union, constituting that system of credit under which, whatever may have been its occasional excesses, the country has heretofore attained an unparalleled height of prosperity, and has no special reference whatever to the Bank of the United States.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that this perpetual and gratuitous introduction of the Bank of the United States into this debate, with which it has no connection, as if to alarm the imaginations of grave Senators, is but a poor evidence of the intrinsic strength of the gentleman's cause. Much has been said of argument ad captandum in the course of this discussion. I have heard none that can compare with this solemn stalking of the ghost of the Bank of the United States through this hall to "frighten Senators from their propriety." I am as much opposed to that institution as the gentleman or any one else is or can be. I think I may say I have given some proofs of it. The gentleman himself acquits me of any design to favor the interest of that institution, while he says such is the necessary consequence of my proposition. The suggestion is advanced for effect, and then retracted in form. Whatever be the new-born zeal of the Senator from South Carolina against the Bank of the United States, I flatter myself that I stand in a position that places me, at least, as much above suspicion of an undue leaning in favor of that institution as the honorable gentleman. If I mistake not, it was the Senator from South Carolina who introduced and supported the bill for the charter of the United States Bank in 1816; it was he, also, who brought in a bill in 1834, to extend the charter of that institution for a term of twelve years; and none were more conspicuous than he in the well-remembered scenes of that day, in urging the restoration of the Government deposits to this same institution. In every situation of public trust in which I have been placed I have been the constant and unvarying opponent of that institution; and in this body, in 1834, while the Senator from South Carolina, with his accustomed ability, was urging the restoration of the public deposits to it, (a triumph, indeed, over the Government of the country, which the honorable Senator now so bitterly deprecates,) I stood up here and resisted that measure with every faculty I possessed, and sacrificed, as is well known, my political existence to the force of my convictions on the subject; convictions which, I take leave to say, have strengthened with every day's observation and reflection since. When I recollect these things, it seems to me "strange, passing strange," that the Senator from South Carolina should now appear as the especial and sworn adversary of the Bank of the United States, while I am held up in the attitude of promoting the views and favoring the interests of that institution.

While I am up, (said Mr. R.) I beg leave to say a word in answer to an observation of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON.) That gentleman said, if I wished to understand the true character of my proposition, I had only to look over my right shoulder, and see who were likely to support it. [Mr. CLAY, Mr. WEBSTER, and other gentlemen of the Opposition, sit in that direction from Mr. RIVES.] I thank God, Mr. President, that I have a higher rule of action on this floor than any consideration of who is, or who is not, to vote with me. I look at the merits of the proposition itself; and if it be for the good of the country, I go for it, whoever may vote with me or against me. If the Senator knows that I am to derive support to my proposition from gentlemen over my right shoulder, he knows more than I do. I have had no communication with any of those gentlemen, which authorizes me to expect their support. Many of them voted, during the last session, for the same proposition, in common with five-sixths of the friends of the administration, and they may do so again. I occupy the same position now that I did then. If other gentlemen have seen cause to change their views, I have not. On the contrary, the present condition of the country furnishes, in my estimation, new motives to bring forward the proposition, which then received nearly the unanimous sanction of both Houses of Congress. It is impossible that the banking institutions of the country, on whose speedy return to specie payment the soundness of the currency and every other interest of society now depend, can rise up from their prostrate condition, without some measure of this sort. The people wish to see an end of this paper money, (properly so called when inconvertible into specie,) which the gentleman from Missouri so much deprecated. No one has a stronger sense of its evils and dangers than I have. But we shall in vain attempt to get rid of it, in my humble judgment, without some measure of the character I have proposed. I am unwilling to go back to my constituents without having first done something for the relief of the people, as well as the Government. I am unwilling that the American people shall witness an adjournment of this body without the passage of some measure of a healing and salutary character, in relation to the currency of the country.

When the sub-Treasury scheme was introduced into the House of Representatives in 1834, out of the meagre number of 33 votes it then received, there was but one friend of the administration who voted in favor of it. It was then denounced, under the auspices and in the name of the administration, as revolutionary, disorganizing, anti-republican, and tending to enlarge Executive power, and place in its hands the means of corruption. Believing now, as I did then, that such is the true character and tendency of the measure, I adhere to the ground taken by the republican party in 1834; and I will use every weapon which reason and argument can furnish in opposition to it. I, for one, will not be afraid to act with any individual, or any party, in resisting a scheme which, however it may be viewed by others, I firmly believe to be fraught with danger to the best interests of my country; and in doing so, so far from abandoning, I but maintain the more closely, my republican faith.

MR. CALHOUN said this attack of the Senator is very extraordinary. Yesterday, in the course of my argument, I endeavored to show that his proposition would inure to the benefit of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, and I stated my reasons. I believed he did not contemplate it in that light, but I did; and I said to the Senator, you hold out a powerful temptation to the banks. I stated that the strong banks, and they alone, would take the benefit of this measure, with the United States Bank at their head. Their predominating influence over every other bank was inevitable; and if they got it, they would hold it in perpetuo. They would make the necessary sacrifice in the resumption of specie payments, and this bill would serve as the motive; and, if Mr. Biddle tried, he would get it. And now, twenty-four hours afterwards, I am surprised at this storm of passion and personal attack, when I acquitted the gentleman of all improper intentions.

The gentleman says that in 1834 I was in favor of restoring the deposits. I was so; and I now, as then, think they were unnecessarily and illegally removed, and that it was one of the accelerating causes of the catastrophe which he so much laments. New zeal! A new convert! I never made stronger declarations in my life of the banking system than at that time. I said the whole system was hostile to liberty. I was then in favor of the Bank of the United States; but not so as to qualify my position relative to banking. I went farther, and told the Senator and others, your system will fail if you retain a connection with the banks; there must be a Bank of the United States. With me the question of bank or no bank had reference to the whole banking system. Has he any foundation on which he can now call me a convert? No, sir, I have seen, not for four, but fourteen years, that the issue must be that the banks will be the Government, or the Government the banks; that, by the constant tendency to increase the issues of paper, the banks or the Government must be prostrated. I hardly expected to see that issue in my day; but come I knew and declared it would, sooner or later; and when the question should arise, it would be the greatest of modern times. I would lay a hundred to one, if the Senator's bill should pass, the United States Bank will monopolize its benefits. Of his remarks I will only say that they were unworthy of him, and the State from which he comes.

MR. BENTON. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) repeats what has been often told, and answered, that the friends of the administration voted in a body against Mr. GORDON's sub-Treasury proposition in 1834. They did so, and for a reason both notorious and good at that time, but not good now. The administration could not cut loose from the local banks then; they were allies against the Bank of the United States, and, as such, had to be saved. They were the "Half-way House" in getting from the National bank to the sub-Treasury; and, as such, had to be maintained. They are no longer allies, or a half-way station, but foes and deserters. They have cut loose from the government, and are weight in favor of a national bank; and as such the government is now done with them. It was expedient to maintain the connection in 1834: it is expedient to let it remain dissolved now.

MONDAY, September 25.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill imposing additional duties, as depositories of the public moneys, on certain officers of the General Government; together with Mr. CALHOUN's and Mr. BENTON's amendments.

MR. CLAY commenced by observing that, feeling an anxious desire to see some effectual plan presented to correct the disorders in the currency, and to restore the prosperity of the country, he had avoided precipitating himself into the debate now in progress, that he might attentively examine every remedy that should be proposed, and impartially weigh every consideration urged in its support. No period had ever existed in this country, in which the future was covered by a darker, denser, or more impenetrable gloom. None, in which the duty was so imperative to discard all passion and prejudice, all party ties, and previous bias, and look exclusively to the good of our afflicted country. In one respect—and he thought it a fortunate one—our present difficulties are distinguishable from former domestic troubles, and that is their universality. They are felt, it is true, in different degrees, but they reach every section, every State, every interest, almost every man in the Union. All feel, see, hear, know their existence. As they do not array, like our former divisions, one portion of the confederacy against another, it is to be hoped that common sufferings may lead to common sympathies and common counsels, and that we shall, at no distant day, be able to see a clear way of deliverance. If the present state of the country were produced by the fault of the people; if it proceeded from their wasteful extravagance and their indulgence of a reckless spirit of ruinous speculation; if public measures had no agency whatever in bringing it about, it would nevertheless be the duty of Government to exert all its energies and to employ all its legitimate powers to devise an efficacious remedy. But if our present deplorable condition has sprung from our rulers; if it is to be clearly traced to their acts and operations, that duty becomes infinitely more obligatory; and Government would be faithless to the highest and most solemn of human trusts should it neglect to perform it. And is it not too true that the evils which surround us are to be ascribed to those who have had the conduct of our public affairs?

In glancing at the past, (continued Mr. C.,) nothing can be further from my intention than to excite angry feelings, or to find grounds of reproach. It would be far more congenial to my wishes that, on this occasion, we should forget all former unhappy divisions and animosities. But, in order to discover how to get out of our difficulties, we must ascertain, if we can, how we got into them.

Prior to that series of unfortunate measures which had for its object the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, and the discontinuance of its fiscal agency for the Government, no people upon earth ever enjoyed a better currency, or had exchanges better regulated, than the people of the United States. Our monetary system appeared to have attained as great perfection as any thing human can possibly reach. The combination of United States and local banks presented a true image of our system of General and State Governments, and worked quite as well. Not only within the country had we a local and a general currency, perfectly sound; but, in whatever quarter of the globe American commerce had penetrated, there also did the bills of the Bank of the United States command unbounded credit and confidence. Now we are in danger of having fixed upon us, indefinitely as to time, that medium—an irredeemable paper currency, which, by the universal consent of the commercial world, is regarded as the worst. How has this reverse come upon us? Can it be doubted that it is the result of those measures to which I have adverted? When at the very moment of adopting them, the very consequences which have happened were foretold as inevitable, is it necessary to look elsewhere for their cause? Never was prediction more distinctly made; never was fulfilment more literal and exact.

Let us suppose that those measures had not been adopted; that the Bank of the United States had been rechartered; that the public deposits had remained undisturbed; and that the Treasury order had never issued: is there not every reason to believe that we should be now in the enjoyment of a sound currency; that the public deposits would be now safe and forthcoming; and that the suspension of specie payments in May last would not have happened?

The Message, to reconcile us to our misfortunes, and to exonerate the measures of our own Government from all blame in producing the present state of things, refers to the condition of Europe, and especially to that of Great Britain. It alleges, that “in both countries we have witnessed the same redundancy of paper money, and other facilities of credit; the same spirit of speculation; the same partial successes; the same difficulties and reverses; and, at length, nearly the same overwhelming catastrophe.”

Whatever of embarrassment Europe has recently experienced may be satisfactorily explained by its trade and connection with the United States. The degree of embarrassment has been marked, in the commercial countries there, by the degree of their connection with the United States. All, or almost all, the great failures in Europe have been of houses engaged in the American trade. Great Britain, which, as the Message justly observes, maintains the closest relations with us, has suffered most; France next, and so on, in the order of their greater or less commercial intercourse with us. Most truly was it said by the Senator from Georgia, that the recent embarrassments of Europe were the embarrassments of a creditor, from whom payment was withheld by the debtor, and from whom the precious metals have been unnecessarily withdrawn by the policy of the same debtor.

Since the intensity of suffering, and the disastrous state of things in this country, have far transcended any thing that has occurred in Europe, we must look here for some peculiar and more potent causes than any which have been in operation there. They are to be found in that series of measures to which I have already adverted.

1st. The veto of the bank.

2d. The removal of the deposits, with the urgent injunction of Secretary Taney upon the banks to enlarge their accommodations.

3d. The gold bill, and the demand of gold for the foreign indemnities.

4th. The clumsy execution of the deposit law; and

5th. The Treasury order of July, 1836.

[Here Mr. CLAY went into an examination of these measures to show that the inflated condition of the country, the wild speculations, which had risen to their height when they began to be checked by the preparations of the local banks necessary to meet the deposit law of June, 1836, the final suspension of specie payments, and the consequent disorders in the currency, commerce, and general business of the country, were all to be traced to the influence of the measures enumerated. All these causes operated immediately, directly, and powerfully upon us, and their effects were indirectly felt in Europe.]

The Message inquires to the deposit law an agency in producing the existing embarrassments. This is a charge frequently made by the friends of the administration against that law. It is true, that the banks having increased their accommodations, in conformity with the orders of Secretary Taney, it might not have been convenient to recall and pay them over for public use. It is true, also, that the manner in which the law was executed by the Treasury Department, transferring large sums from creditor to debtor portions of the country, without regard to the commerce or business of the country, might have aggravated the inconvenience. But what do those who object to the law think ought to have been done with the surpluses which had accumulated, and were daily augmenting to such an enormous amount in the hands of the deposit banks? Were they to be incorporated with their capitals, and remain there for the benefit of the stockholders? Was it not proper and just that they should be applied to the uses of the people from whom they were collected? And whenever and however taken from the deposit banks, would not inconvenience necessarily happen?

The great evil under which the country labors is the suspension of the banks to pay specie, the total derangement in all domestic exchanges, and the paralysis which has come over the whole business of the country. In regard to the currency, it is not that a given amount of bank notes will not now command as much as the same amount of specie would have done prior to the suspension; but it is the future, the danger of an inconvertible paper money being indefinitely or permanently fixed upon the people, that fills them with apprehensions. Our great object should be to re-establish a sound currency, and thereby to restore the exchanges and revive the business of the country.

The first impression which the measures brought forward by the administration make, is, that they consist of temporary expedients, looking to the supply of the necessities of the Treasury; for so far as any of them possess a permanent character, its tendency is rather to aggravate than alleviate the sufferings of the people. None of them purpose to rectify the disorders in the actual currency of the country; but the people, the States, and their banks, are left to shift for themselves as they may or can. The administration, after having intervened between the States and their banks, and taken them into the federal service, without the consent of the States; after having puffed and praised them; after having brought them, or contributed to bring them, into their present situation, now suddenly turns its back upon them, leaving them to their fate! It is not content with that; it must absolutely discredit their issues. And the very people who were told by the administration that these banks would supply them with a better currency, are now left to struggle as they can with the very currency which the Government recommended to them, but which it now refuses itself to receive!

The professed object of the administration is to establish what it terms the currency of the constitution, which it proposes to accomplish by restricting the Federal Government, in all receipts and payments, to the exclusive use of specie, and by refusing all bank paper, whether convertible or not. It disclaims all purposes of crippling or putting down the banks of the States; but we shall better determine the design or the effect of the measures recommended, by considering them together as one system.

1. The first is the sub-Treasuries, which are to be made the depositories of all the specie collected and paid out for the service of the General Government, discrediting and refusing all the notes of the States, although payable and paid in specie.

2. A bankrupt law for the United States, levelled at all the State banks, and authorizing the seizure of the effects of any of them that stop payment, and the administration of their effects under the federal authority exclusively.

3. A particular law for the District of Columbia, by which all the corporations and people of the District, under severe pains and penalties, are prohibited from circulating, sixty days after the passage of the law, any paper whatever, not convertible into specie on demand, and are made liable to prosecution by indictment.

4. And lastly, the bill to suspend the payment of the fourth instalment to the States, by the provisions of which the deposit banks indebted to the Government are placed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is impossible to consider this system without perceiving that it is aimed at, and, if carried out, must terminate in the total subversion of the State banks; and that they will be all placed at the mercy of the Federal Government. It is in vain to protest that there exists no design against them. The effect of these measures cannot be misunderstood.

And why this new experiment or untried expedient? The people of this country are tired of experiments. Ought not the administration itself to cease with them. Ought it not to take warning from the events of recent elections? Above all, should not the Senate, constituted as it now is, be the last body to lend itself to further experiments upon the business and happiness of this great people? According to the latest expression of public opinion in the several States, the Senate is no longer a true exponent of the will of the States or of the people. If it were, there would be thirty-two or thirty-four whigs to eighteen or twenty friends of the administration.

We are told that it is necessary to separate, divorce the Government from the banks. Let us not be deluded by sounds. Senators might as well talk of separating the Government from the States, or from the people, or from the country. We are all—people—States—Union—banks, bound up and interwoven together, united in fortune and destiny, and all, all entitled to the protecting care of a parental Government. You may as well attempt to make the Government breathe a different air, drink a different water, be lit and warmed by a different sun from the people! A hard-money Government and a paper-money people! A Government, an official corps—the servants of the people—glittering in gold, and the people themselves, their masters, buried in ruin, and surrounded with rags.

No prudent or practical Government will in its measures run counter to the long-settled habits and usages of the people. Religion, language, laws, the established currency and business of the whole country, cannot be easily or suddenly uprooted. After the denomination of our coin was changed to dollars and cents, many years elapsed before the old method of keeping accounts, in pounds, shillings, and pence, was abandoned. And, to this day, there are probably some men of the last century who adhere to it. If a fundamental change becomes necessary, it should not be sudden, but conducted by slow and cautious degrees. The people of the United States have always been a paper-money people. It was paper money that carried us through the Revolution, established our liberties, and made us a free and independent people. And, if the experience of the revolutionary war convinced our ancestors, as we are convinced, of the evils of an irredeemable paper medium, it was put aside only to give place to that convertible paper which has so powerfully contributed to our rapid advancement, prosperity, and greatness.

The proposed substitution of an exclusive metallic currency, to the mixed medium with which we have been so long familiar, is forbidden by the principles of eternal justice. Assuming the currency of the country to consist of two-thirds of paper and one of specie; and assuming also that the money of a country, whatever may be its component parts, regulates all values, and expresses the true amount which the debtor has to pay to his creditor, the effect of the change upon that relation, and upon the property of the country, would be most ruinous. All property would be reduced in value to one-third of its present nominal amount; and every debtor would, in effect, have to pay three times as much as he had contracted for. The pressure of our foreign debt would be three times as great as it is, whilst the six hundred millions, which is about the sum now probably due to the banks from the people, would be multiplied into eighteen hundred millions.

But there are some more specific objections to this project of sub-treasuries, which deserve to be noticed. The first is its insecurity. The sub-treasurer and his bondsmen constitute the only guaranty for the safety of the immense sums of public money which pass through his hands. Is this to be compared with that which is possessed through the agency of banks? The collector, who is to be the sub-treasurer, pays the money to the bank, and the bank to the disbursing officer. Here are three checks; you propose to destroy two of them, and that most important of all, the bank, with its machinery of president, directors, cashier, teller, and clerks, all of whom are so many sentinels. At the very moment when the Secretary of the Treasury tells us how well his sub-Treasury system works, he has communicated to Congress a circular, signed by himself, exhibiting his distrust in it; for he directs, in that circular, that the public moneys, when they amount to a large sum, shall be specially deposited with those very banks which he would repudiate. In the State of Kentucky, (other gentlemen can speak of their respective States,) although it has existed but about forty-five years, three treasurers, selected by the Legislature for their established characters of honor and probity, proved faithless. And the history of the delinquency of one is the history of all. It commenced in human weakness, yielding to earnest solicitations for temporary loans, with the most positive assurances of a punctual return. In no instance was there originally any intention to defraud the public. We should not expose poor weak human nature to such temptations. How easy will it be, as has been done, to indemnify the sureties out of the public money, and squander the residue?

2. Then there is the liability to favoritism. In the receipts, a political partisan or friend may be accommodated in the payment of duties, in the disbursement, in the purchase of bills, in drafts upon convenient and favorable offices, and in a thousand ways.

3. The fearful increase of Executive patronage. Hundreds and thousands of new officers are to be created; for this bill is a mere commencement of the system, and all are to be placed under the direct control of the President.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) thinks that the Executive is now weak, and that no danger is to be apprehended from its patronage. I wish to God I could see the subject in the same light that he does. I wish that I could feel free from that alarm at Executive encroachments by which he and I were so recently animated. When and how, let me ask, has that power, lately so fearful and formidable, suddenly become so weak and harmless? Where is that corps of one hundred thousand office-holders and dependants whose organized strength, directed by the will of a single man, was lately held up in such vivid colors and powerful language by a report made by the Senator himself? When were they disbanded? What has become of proscription? Its victims may be exhausted, but the spirit and the power which sacrificed them remain unsubdued. What of the dismissing power? What of the veto? Of that practice of withholding bills, contrary to the constitution, still more reprehensible than the abuses of the veto? Of Treasury orders, put in force and maintained in defiance and contempt of the legislative authority? And, although last, not least, of that expunging power which degraded the Senate, and placed it at the feet of the Executive?

Which of all these enormous powers and pretensions has the present Chief Magistrate disavowed? So far from disclaiming any one of them, has he not announced his intention to follow in the very footsteps of his predecessor? And has he not done it? Was it against the person of Andrew Jackson that the Senator from South Carolina so ably co-operated with us? No, sir, no, sir, no. It was against his usurpations, as we believed them; against his arbitrary administration; above all, against that tremendous and frightful augmentation of the power of the Executive branch of the Government, that we patriotically but vainly contended. The person of the Chief Magistrate is changed, but there stands the Executive power, perpetuated in all its vast magnitude, undiminished, reasserted, and overshadowing all the other departments of the Government. Every trophy which the late President won from them now decorates the Executive mansion. Every power which he tore from a bleeding constitution, is now in the Executive armory, ready, as time and occasion may prompt the existing incumbent, whoever he may be, to be thundered against the liberties of the people.

Whatever may have been the motives or the course of others, I owe it to myself and to truth to say, that, in deprecating the election of General Andrew Jackson to the office of Chief Magistrate, it was not from any private considerations, but because I considered it would be a great calamity to my country; and that, in whatever opposition I made to measures of his administration, which more than realized my very worst apprehensions, I was guided solely by a sense of public duty. And I do now declare my solemn and unshaken conviction that, until the Executive power, as enlarged, extended, and consolidated by him, is reduced within its true constitutional limits, there is no permanent security for the liberties and happiness of this people.

4. Lastly, pass this bill, and whatever divorce its friends may profess to be its aim, that perilous union of the purse and the sword, so justly dreaded by our British and Revolutionary ancestors, becomes absolute and complete. And who can doubt it who knows that over the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and every sub-Treasurer, the President claims the power to exercise uncontrolled sway? To exact implicit obedience to his will?

The Message states that, in the process both of collection and disbursement of the public revenue, the officers who perform it act under the Executive commands; and it argues that, therefore, the custody also of the Treasury might as well be confided to the Executive care. I think the safer conclusion is directly opposite. The possession of so much power over the national treasure is just cause of regret, and furnishes a strong reason for diminishing it, if possible, but none for its increase, none for giving the whole power over the purse to the Chief Magistrate.

Entertaining the views which I have presented, it may be asked why I do not at once propose the establishment of a national bank. I have already adverted to the cause. Constituted as Congress now is, I know that such a proposition would be defeated; and that it would be therefore useless to make it. I do not desire to force upon the Senate, or upon the country, against its will, if I could, my opinion, however sincerely and strongly entertained. If a national bank be established, its stability and its utility will depend upon the general conviction which is felt of its necessity. And until such a conviction is deeply impressed upon the people, and clearly manifested by them, it would, in my judgment, be unwise even to propose a bank.

Of the scheme of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) I think now as I thought in 1834. I do not believe that any practicable connection of State banks can supply a general currency, be a safe depository of the public moneys, or act efficiently as a fiscal agent of the General Government. I was not then opposed to the State banks in their proper sphere. I thought that they could not be relied upon to form exclusively a banking system for the country, although they were essential parts of a general system.

The amendment of the Senator, considered as a measure to bring about the resumption of specie payments, so much desired, I think must fail. The motive which it holds out of the receivability in all payments to the Government, of the paper of such banks as may resume by a given day, coupled with the conditions proposed, is wholly inadequate. It is an offer to eight hundred banks; and the revenue payment of which in their notes is held out as the inducement, amounts to some twenty or twenty-five millions. To entitle them to the inconsiderable extension of their circulation, which would result from the credit given by Government to the paper of all of them, they are required to submit to a suppression of all notes below five dollars, and at no very distant period to all below twenty. The enlargement of their circulation, produced by making it receivable by Government, would be much less than the contraction which would arise from the suppression of the prohibited notes. Besides, if the quality proposed again to be attached to the notes of these local banks was insufficient to prevent the suspension, how can it be efficacious enough to stimulate a resumption of specie payments?

I shall, nevertheless, if called upon to give a vote between the project of the administration and the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, vote for the latter, because it is harmless, if it effects no good, and looks to the preservation of the State banks; whilst the other is fraught with mischiefs, as I believe, and tends, if it be not designed, to the utter destruction of those institutions. But, preferring to either the postponement moved by the Senator from Georgia, I shall, in the first instance, vote for that.

Such, Mr. President, are the views which I entertain on the present state of our public affairs. It is with the deepest regret that I can perceive no remedy, but such as is in the hands of the people themselves. Whenever they shall impress upon Congress a conviction of that which they wish applied, they will obtain it, and not before. In the mean time, let us go home and mix with and consult our constituents. And do not, I entreat you, let us carry with us the burning reproach, that our measures here display a selfish solicitude for the Government itself, but a cold and heartless insensibility to the sufferings of a bleeding people.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded his remarks,

The question was taken on Mr. KING's motion to postpone the bill until December next, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright, Young—27.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the action on the sub-Treasury bill was informally suspended till to-morrow, by unanimous consent, and the two following bills were successively taken up and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, viz:

The bill to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by the great fire in New York; and

The bill making further provision for the suppression of Indian hostilities for 1837.

Mr. WRIGHT further stated, that though he was anxious for the bill authorizing the deposit of merchandise in public stores to be acted on without delay, yet, as the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) had expressed a wish for its further postponement, unless the Senate wished otherwise, he should pass it by at present, and call it up in a few days.

TUESDAY, September 26.

A National Bank.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, reported by the Committee on Finance, on petitions from New Orleans, St. Louis, and other quarters, for a United States bank.

“Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.”

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he did not see much utility in acting on a negative resolution of this kind. He recollected but one example of a similar resolution, and that was during the session of Congress when the declaration of the late war was made against Great Britain. The resolution was offered by that most extraordinary man, now no more, Mr. Randolph, of Virginia. Learning that the Message of Mr. Madison to Congress would recommend a declaration of war, he rose in his place, two or three days before it was presented, and offered a resolution similar to this, that it was inexpedient to declare war against Great Britain. It was, however, got rid of, in some way or other, without a vote upon it.

Mr. C. did not think, as he had declared yesterday, that it was expedient to express any opinion on this subject at this time; and he would submit it to gentlemen whether it were not better that it should lie on the table. He thought there would be no difference of opinion as the resolution now stood under present circumstances. Mr. C. thought they had better not now establish a bank of the United States, much as it appeared to be necessary to relieve the country. But, if it was not to be laid on the table, Mr. C. moved to amend it by the following substitute:

Resolved, That it will be expedient to establish a United States bank whenever it shall be manifested that a clear majority of the people of the United States are in favor of such an institution.

On this he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After debate, the question was taken on each proposition, and on Mr. CLAY's substitute first, which was rejected by the following vote :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Webster—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—26.

The original resolution as reported by the committee, was then adopted, as follows :

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The bill imposing additional duties on public officers, making them depositaries of the public revenue, together with Mr. CALHOUN's amendment thereto, being taken up,

[Mr. Walker followed Mr. Clay, and replied to him, point by point, on all the causes alleged by him as producing the present distress ; and then proceeded :]

But the Senator from Kentucky tells us that the bill under consideration would increase Executive patronage. Now, the bill creates no additional officers ; it gives to the President no additional control over the existing officers ; it merely imposes additional duties upon existing officers, requiring them not only to receive, but to keep safely, without use or loan, till the period of disbursement, the public moneys. I can see here no increase of Executive patronage. But this question must be examined by comparison with the proposed substitute, namely, a re-adoption of the deposit bank system. Now, no argument has heretofore been more strongly urged by the opponents of the administration, than the vast and increasing patronage the deposit bank system would confer upon the President of the United States. These banks were denominated pet banks—the President's banks—and again and again was it said that the late President desired to retain the surplus in these banks, (these miserable deposit banks, as they were then expressly called by the Senator from Kentucky,) with a view to influence the approaching election. Nor was this argument confined to this chamber ; but in the House of Representatives, at the last session, a committee was raised by the opposition to prove, among other things, the corrupt and corrupting influence of the deposit bank system, as connected with the agent of that system, and the Treasury Department. It would be really amusing to read some of the speeches of the opposition members at that period, denouncing the corrupting influences of the deposit bank system, and the vast patronage it conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury. I have not time to read these speeches to the Senate ; but, from the documents presented by this committee, I will refer to two letters by them published. The first is from the cashier of the deposit Bank of Burlington, Vermont, under date of January 25, 1836. The cashier says : " Being located in the same place where a branch of the United States Bank was established, and as we are a deposit bank, when the branch here discontinued its operations, the public seemed to expect that we could at once afford the same facilities and accommodations that they enjoyed when the branch was doing business. There has been, on the part of our directors, a desire to meet this expectation ; and the consequences have been that a very sensible change has taken place, politically, in favor of the Government : and, as it is our desire to strengthen that sentiment, we feel that it is important to afford our farmers and merchants, the coming spring, a pretty extensive accommodation, in anticipation of the wool clip."

Here the sensible political change in favor of the Government, produced by this bank depositary, is clearly stated, and the importance of augmenting it, by enabling the bank to discount more freely on the Government deposits, is strongly urged by the cashier of the bank. I might detain the Senate for weeks by quotations from similar letters ; but only make one other reference. It is to the letter of the president, directors, and cashier of the Seventh Ward Bank of New York to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated December 16, 1833, and is as follows :

" We, the subscribers, officers and directors in the Seventh Ward Bank, in the city of New York, friends of the administration, and of the revered chief at the head of the Government, do solicit a portion of the fiscal patronage of the United States Treasury for the Seventh Ward Bank ; the terms as those most favorable to the Government."

Can any man peruse this letter without feelings of loathing and disgust ?—yet it is from fourteen of the most respectable bankers of our great commercial metropolis. Does it not demonstrate the dangerous tendencies and influences of this deposit bank system ? An entire bank, through all its officers and directors, soliciting " a portion of the fiscal patronage of the United States Treasury," on the grounds that they were " friends of the administration ! " This report, published in March last, containing these documents, I never perused till after the close of the last session of Congress. The deposit bank system, it is well known, in Mississippi was, in its origin, no favorite measure of mine; in fact, it was the first measure of our patriotic President to which I had ever expressed any dissent; and I only afterwards gave it my reluctant assent as an alternative to what the developments of the spring of 1834 demonstrated to be a greater evil, and still more dangerous measure, the establishment of any bank of the United States. But who can peruse these letters, and deny, in the face of the American people, that this deposit bank system did enormously increase the power and fiscal patronage of the Government, and that in the hands of a corrupt Secretary, and aspiring President, it might be made a political engine of the most dangerous and alarming character? That it was not so used, or attempted to be used, by our venerable President, or incorruptible Secretary, is proved by the documents accompanying the reports to which I have referred; but that it was susceptible of such abuse is also as clearly demonstrated. And what is the extent of this "fiscal patronage?" Why, by the last return of the Secretary of the Treasury we see, under the last law, the number of deposit banks increased to eighty-nine, with upwards of eighty millions of capital, and discounts of notes and bills of exchange amounting to one hundred and thirty millions of dollars; and this immense moneyed power was subjected to the influence and control of the Secretary of the Treasury: for the whole bank correspondence will clearly demonstrate that many of these banks, from time to time, owed their very existence to the forbearance of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that often a Treasury draft or transfer warrant would have reduced them to a state of bankruptcy. True it is, that all of the deposit banks could not thus have been destroyed by the Secretary; yet the profits of all would be greatly influenced by the amount of revenue he deposited with, or withdrew from them. What, then, was this power? It was a power over eighty-nine of the strongest confederated banks in the Union, with this enormous amount of loans and capital, and with stockholders, debtors, and customers, at least one hundred thousand in number, all affected by the movements of the Secretary of the Treasury in the distribution or withdrawal of the deposits. In May last, the Secretary of the Treasury had necessarily distributed among these institutions more than thirty millions of public deposits. What a tremendous extent of power and patronage! Why, sir, it was almost the lever of Archimedes; and, if this system had gone on progressing and augmenting, soon, very soon, the banks, by their power, must have controlled the Government, or the Government controlled the banks. And now, when the President proposes to surrender all this money, and power, and patronage, to dissolve this dangerous connection between the banks and the Government, shall he be opposed in this measure by those who so lately denounced the whole deposit bank system as the very climax of political corruption? And what do we see now? Why, this career of illimitable discounts by banks on Government deposits is closed for the present, and the still more dangerous attitude is exhibited, in which it is but too probable that very many of the banks may soon be sued by the Government to recover the public moneys, or rather the States that own in whole or in part so many of these banks, and the debtors that owe them; for, as the banks can only collect their moneys by suits against their debtors, to sue the banks at present is to sue the people. It was in view of this state of facts that I succeeded, a few days since, in prolonging the time given to the deposit banks to make payment to the Government from two, five, and eight, to four, six, and nine months, being the longest extension I could obtain for them; and, upon payment of the first instalment, the two last ought to be, and I hope will be, still further prolonged at the next session. But I could not but feel humiliated, by the reflection that so many of my most worthy constituents—including two of our largest State institutions, and the State itself the principal proprietor of one of them—should be placed in a position in which a suit against any of them could in any event be resorted to—a position arising out of this most unholy connection between the banks and the Treasury—a connection of unmixed evils, disastrous to the banks, the States, the people, and the Government.

Well, then, may the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who has on this floor so repeatedly opposed the augmentation of Executive power—well may he support the bill now under consideration; because it not only adds nothing to Executive patronage, but takes from it that alarming patronage and power that it could have acquired through the deposit bank system. Sir, the Senator from South Carolina is right; and I hail him back with pleasure, on this question, to the ranks of the democracy, of which he was so long the pride and ornament, when in March, 1824, I assisted in the great democratic convention of my native State in nominating him upon the Jackson ticket for the second office in the gift of the people. Sir, if he can go no further with us, let him at least aid us in breaking down this overshadowing Executive power, this dangerous and corrupting fiscal patronage, growing out of this unhallowed confederacy of bank and State, throwing aside all other considerations, and sacrificing his personal prejudices on the altar of his country's good. Sir, I have heard much about Executive patronage as lurking in some of the features of this bill; but if it be so, it must be deeply concealed indeed, for no one has pointed out how it is accomplished. Vague and general denunciation we have indeed had, but how one iota of power or patronage will be conferred on the

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

President by this bill, in addition to that which he already possesses, has not been designated; but were it so, the bank patronage, of which this bill deprives him, would be infinitely greater. The receivers, who are made depositories for safe-keeping only until disbursement, were already depositories until the transfer of the public moneys to the banks; and this bill only dispenses with one class of this double set of depositories—the banks. The machinery was thus made more complex and dangerous. The money collected by the Government from the people was not loaned out to the people who paid it, but deposited with banks, to be loaned out by them to bank favorites, and to increase the dividends of a few incorporated stockholders. The people were taxed for revenue, to be converted into bank capital, stimulating their over-issues, and rendering their condition more fluctuating and precarious. The fluctuation of banking business is bad enough under any circumstances. Why, then, should we augment their natural tendency to over-issue by Government deposits? Will not the banks issue enough of paper without this artificial stimulus? Why, then, should the Government inflate their issues, and drive them on more rapidly to explosion? Why not let them bank upon their own capital and their own credit, without depending upon the Government for both—for capital in Government deposits, and for credit in Government endorsement for all their notes, as receivable in revenue payments? Is it not seen that the most insolvent bank in the Union might thus be puffed by the Government into great and extensive temporary importance, and then, when the Government patronage was withdrawn, their depreciated paper fall dead and worthless in the hands of an unsuspecting community?

The President's Message is against the extension of Executive patronage. Its cardinal doctrine is this: "A limitation of the expenses of the Government to its actual wants, and of the revenue to those expenses." This, then, is the President's doctrine, openly avowed in his Message—reduce your expenses, reduce your revenues. This was the flag under which I have fought ever since entering this chamber; it is the flag under which I opposed your extravagant bills for local and sectional improvements; it is the principle I espoused at the first session of my service, contained in my resolution to reduce the revenue from the tariff and public lands to the wants of the Government. It is the great principle contained in the land bill proposed by me, reducing to settlers the price of the public lands, and confining the sales to them; it is the great principle upon which I relied for the reduction of the tariff, and especially the abolishing of the duty upon salt, that most odious duty upon light and heat, in forming salt from solar evaporation; and, lastly, it is the great principle upon which, at the first as well as the last session, I opposed, in every form, the surplus distribution policy, that mother of tariffs, banks, and of the very catastrophe which now overwhelms us. Reduction of the expenses and of the revenue, economy in all public expenditures, and no "interference with the pursuits of the citizen." "No special favors to individuals or any classes of them, to create systems of agriculture, manufactures, or trade." These are the doctrines of the Message; and do they enlarge Executive patronage? How is Executive patronage enlarged? It is chiefly by extending the powers of this Government, and augmenting its revenues; for every increase of the powers and revenue of the Government, is an augmentation of the power of the Executive functionary. This the Message avoids; but what measures would the Senator from Kentucky give us to reduce Executive patronage? His policy would give us a quadruple alliance between the surplus, the bank, the tariff, and internal improvements, all certainly tending to, and terminating in, a national debt, to create a new tariff. The tariff to regulate the whole industry of the whole people of the Union, and build up vast manufacturing establishments by the extension and perversion of the taxing power of this Government. A great national bank, to grow rich upon the revenue deposited from the proceeds of the tariff, deriving its profits from Government moneys, and, of course, the ally of the administration which feeds and created it. The internal improvement policy, growing and extending with the increase of the tariff, and making roads and canals in some favored States, by taxes collected from the whole people; and, lastly, to give universality to the principle, the surplus—the annual surplus for distribution, from sales, by townships and counties at an entry, to speculators in the public lands—a system calculated to debauch and corrupt the States; to break down every feeling of State independence; to feed them annually, from the public Treasury, mere stipendiaries upon our bounty; supporting even their State Governments and State officers from the revenues of this Government. And at the head of this mighty system, this consolidation of all powers in this Government, would stand the Executive of those powers—the President of the United States, a monarch in every thing but a name. And, sir, this league of State banks, confederated by the Government, and fed by the tariff, increasing its deposits and profits, would be the next most potent ally of these systems. It would station some hundred bank fortresses throughout the States, armed and equipped by Government deposits, and extending Executive power and influence. All this President Van Buren would avoid. No, sir, no; it is not the principle or policy of this administration—Give us patronage and we will make ourselves popular.

But it has been said that this bill establishes, in fact, a Treasury bank. And why? Because, although these depositories can neither use nor loan the public moneys, where disbursements are to be made at distant points, to avoid the expense and patronage arising from a new army of officers, constantly engaged in transporting the specie, drafts in payment of its dues may be drawn by the Government on these distant depositories—drafts drawn on actual deposits of gold and silver; and this is called a Treasury bank, and that too, by the advocates of the deposit bank system, by which Treasury drafts, checks, and warrants upon and by the banks may be drawn upon and by the deposit banks in the transactions of the Government. It is true, these drafts will constitute the best exchange in the world, and thus far operate incidentally for the great convenience and benefit of the people; but this is no objection to the system, for the Government neither loans nor discounts, but simply pays the public creditor in gold and silver, or an order upon a depository, on which he receives the specie.

But it is said this bill, separating the Government from the banks, will divorce the Government from the people. Are the banks the people? No, sir; this bill will elevate the people, and the Government of the people, and of the States, above the banks, and prevent them from arresting the Government, as they now do, by withholding the public revenue. It will have a still greater tendency to elevate the people above the banks, by diminishing, by its incidental operation, the amount of bank paper, and increasing the circulation of gold and silver—for the payment of it into the Treasury will be as constantly flowing out, enriching and fertilizing the whole country.

But the Senator from Virginia (MR. RIVES) says this bill will furnish one currency for the Government, and another for the people. Is it contended that the Government should take and pay out the broken bank notes and local shiplasters, because the people take them? No: the Senator from Virginia does not propose this, but only that we should receive the notes of banks that resume specie payments under the existing law. Now, what is that law? I find it embraced in the Senate journal under date of the 6th of April, 1836, as follows:

“The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill entitled ‘An act making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1836.’

The following amendment, proposed by Mr. BENTON, being under consideration:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no bank note of less denomination than twenty dollars shall hereafter be offered in payment in any case whatsoever in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department; nor shall any bank note, of any denomination, be so offered, unless the same shall be payable, and paid, on demand, in gold and silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him.”

This provision was adopted, and is the law: the vote in the Senate being yeas 22, nays 13, my own vote being recorded in its favor. Now, this is the law, and the Senator from Virginia does not propose to change it. Now, are these bank notes that the Senator from Virginia would permit the Government to pay out and receive, actually “equivalent to specie, and convertible into gold or silver on the spot at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him?” Then the result of the law, as that Senator would have it remain, is the same in its operation in this respect as the bill now before us: gold and silver, or its full equivalent, being the effect of either system. But if this be not so, and these bank notes be in fact a baser currency than gold or silver, what right or power has this Government to force this baser currency upon the people by public disbursements, when this Government can make nothing but gold or silver a legal tender in the payment of debts? No, sir: the operation of this bill will be to improve the currency of the whole people by its incidental effects in diminishing bank paper issues, and enlarging, at least to that extent, the general circulation of gold and silver. But the deposit bank system will, indeed, force a doubtful and uncertain bank paper circulation upon the people, convertible into specie one day, and inconvertible and depreciated to-morrow.

We have been told that the terms divorce of Bank and State, as reminding the people of the divorce of church and State, are popular catchwords. I have not used these terms, although I firmly believe that the union of bank and State would soon prove as fatal to liberty as the union of church and State; but, let me ask, are not the terms used upon the other side—one currency for the people, and another for the Government, and the terms separating the Government from the people, mere popular catchwords, which will not bear, as we have seen, the slightest examination. It is said this bill will destroy credit, by impairing confidence in banks. Have not we had too much confidence in banks, and have they not proved the greatest and universal destroyers of all credit and all confidence? Yes, these very banks, by their expansions, contractions, and failures, destroyed all confidence and all credit, not only in themselves, but also between man and man, and almost between nation and nation. It is the banks that render prices, confidence, and credit, fluctuating and uncertain; and, before their existence, the page of history tells that confidence and credit, between man and man, were infinitely more universal, and that protest of bills of exchange and mercantile failures were then almost wholly unknown. Specie was not hoarded, nor credit withheld from honest industry, but universally extended, unchecked by that overthrow of all confidence and all credit, arising from expansions, contractions, and explosions of the bank paper system. We are told that confidence, confidence, is the magic word, and the Government has only to breathe into these banks the breath of confidence, and all will be well. Sir, if these banks, limited and restrained by the State Legislatures, ought to be continued, I would rather, by the ultimate incidental operation of this bill, push a little more of their paper out of circulation, and much more specie into the vaults, than all the false and delusive confidence that could be excited by the Government endorsement of eight hundred and twenty-three suspended State banks.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

This Government's endorsement, with its mighty surplus deposited in State banks, has been the fruitful cause of nearly all our disasters, and I shall never attempt to renew them by re-adopting the system from which these evils flowed. The danger is not of our having too few banks, and too little paper, but precisely the reverse. To repress this evil tendency, should be the ultimate aim of every patriotic statesman. It is too many banks, and too much paper, that has involved us in too much debt, and more banks and more bank paper would only aggravate the evils.

The State banks, so far as regards their mere discontinuance immediately as Government depositories, will be precisely where they were before the removal of the deposits. And as to the exclusion of bank paper from revenue payments, it takes effect only in full on the 1st of January, 1842. The bill proceeds, as regards its operation on bank paper, by wise, salutary, cautious, and progressive steps, keeping in view the existing difficulties, and the necessity of abstaining from any measure calculated to injure or embarrass the people. The operation of this measure upon the banks is much less than is generally supposed. It is much less than the regulating and checking power claimed for the United States Bank; for that, if faithfully executed, would demand weekly balances in gold and silver or its equivalent, from all the State banks, not only for "their notes received in revenue payments," but also for "their notes received for the engagements to the bank," creating thus a double check upon their issues.

I have shown that this article never was or would be faithfully executed; but the precise ultimate effect upon State banks of this measure would be this: Supposing the annual public revenues to be twenty millions of dollars, of which six millions would be the average amount in Treasury depositories received for public dues, the banks would be required to check their issues so as always to be ready to furnish six millions of specie annually for revenue payments. Now, the entire moneyed transactions of this country in a year are estimated at twelve thousand millions of dollars, so that if the demand of the Government upon the banks for six millions be the criterion, it will be equal only to less than one per cent. of the moneyed transactions of the whole country; or if twenty millions, to less than two per cent. of these transactions, leaving all this vast field of trade and business open for the action of the banks.

They lose the Government deposits and Government credit, and are left to bank, as they ought, on their own capital and their own credit. But what is most important in separating the banks and the Government, is the separation of money, business, and politics, the fatal union of which must always be the fruitful source of panics and pressures.

Whilst, then, this measure, I sincerely believe, will have a most beneficial effect upon the whole country, it is to me an inexpressible gratification, that to the sunny South it will prove a fountain of wealth and prosperity. The war of over-expanded credit upon labor and its products, aided by a great national bank at some distant capital, or by the concentration at or near the same point of the great northern banking capital, sustained by the Government deposits and endorsements, must cease, and paper credit and the products of labor left a fair field, without artificial aid, will find labor and its products rising in the scale of importance and influence, and leaving the great staple States a fair opportunity of carrying out their own exports, and introducing their own imports, and the balances in gold and silver, the real, solid, substantial business of their banks being more safely augmented than all the ruinous aid they can ever receive from Government patronage. And now, sir, if the distinguished Senators opposed to the administration on this floor will go home to their constituents, and explain the full and precise effects of this measure, they can, in aiding the establishment of a sound credit on sound principles—aiding in inspiring a just confidence in the relief this great measure will ultimately extend to all the great interests of the country—they can have almost a moneyed millenium dawn upon the country at once. I appeal to them, then, as patriots, with hearts overflowing with sympathy for the distress of the country, as we have so repeatedly heard on this floor, to unite with us in producing this great, this glorious result; and the thanks of millions of grateful freemen will give them more real happiness, more genuine consolation, and more true and durable applause, than all the party triumphs that could adorn the proudest political conquerors. Let them imitate the noble example of the distinguished Senator and statesman from South Carolina, in laying down, in support of this bill, his personal and political prejudices, as a burnt offering upon the patriot's altar of his country's good, and for them, also, the swelling heart of a mighty nation will throb with love and gratitude. But should they esteem it their duty to determine otherwise—should their inspiring eloquence and great intellectual power be exerted in appeals to the people against this measure—should it be represented as a tropical tornado, about to sweep in its destructive career over all the great and cherished institutions of our common country, panics and pressures may follow for a time; but soon, yes, very soon, the great principles involved in this bill must and will triumph, and it will then go forth with healing on its wings, hailed by the approving voice of the people. The measure itself will be justly viewed as a third declaration of American independence, and the day of its passage be celebrated in all time to come as a great and glorious national jubilee.

THURSDAY, September 28.

The Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the collection and custody of the public revenue, together with Mr. CALHOUN's amendment thereto.

MR. WEBSTER said: Mr. President, I am opposed to the doctrines of the Message, to the bill, and to the amendment of the member from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) In all these, I see nothing for the relief of the country; but I do see, as I think, a question involved, the importance of which transcends all the interest of the present occasion.

It is my purpose to state that question; to present it, as well to the country as to the Senate; to show the length and breadth of it, as a question of practical politics, and in its bearing on the powers of the Government to exhibit its importance, and to express my own opinions in regard to it.

A short recital of events and occurrences will show how this question has arisen.

The Government of the United States completed the forty-eighth year of its existence, under the present constitution, on the third day of March last. During this whole period, it has felt itself bound to take proper care of the currency of the country; and no administration has admitted this obligation, more clearly or more frequently, than the last. For the fulfillment of this acknowledged duty, as well as to accomplish other useful purposes, a national bank has been maintained for forty, out of these forty-eight years. Two institutions of this kind have been created by law: one commencing in 1791, and limited to twenty years, and expiring, therefore, in 1811; the other commencing in 1816, with a like term of duration, and ending, therefore, in 1836. Both these institutions, each in its time, accomplished their purposes, so far as currency was concerned, to the general satisfaction of the country. But before the last bank expired, it had the misfortune to become obnoxious to the late administration. I need not, at present, speak of the causes of this hostility. My purpose only requires a statement of that fact, as an important one in the chain of occurrences. The late President's dissatisfaction of the bank was intimated in his first annual Message, that is to say, in 1829. But the bank stood very well with the country, the President's known and growing hostility notwithstanding; and in 1832, four years before its charter was to expire, both Houses of Congress passed a bill for its continuance; there being in its favor a large majority of the Senate, and a larger majority of the House of Representatives. The bill, however, was negatived by the President. In 1833, by an order of the President, the public moneys were removed from the custody of the bank, and were deposited with certain selected State banks. This removal was accompanied with the most confident declarations and assurances, put forth in every form, by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, that these State banks would not only prove safe depositories of the public money, but that they would also furnish the country with as good a currency as it ever had enjoyed, and probably a better; and would also accomplish all that could be wished in regard to domestic exchanges. The substitution of State banks for a national institution, for the discharge of these duties, was that operation, which has become known, and is likely to be long remembered, as the "experiment."

For some years all was said to go on extremely well, although it seemed plain enough to a great part of the community that the system was radically vicious; that its operations were all inconvenient, clumsy, and wholly inadequate to the proposed ends; and that, sooner or later, there must be an explosion. The administration, however, adhered to its experiment. The more it was complained of the louder it was praised. Its commendation was one of the standing topics of all official communications; and in his last Message, in December, 1836, the late President was more than usually emphatic upon the great success of his attempts to improve the currency, and the happy results of the experiment upon the important business of exchange. But a reverse was at hand. The ripening glories of the experiment were soon to meet a dreadful blighting. In the early part of May last, these banks all stopped payment. This event, of course, produced great distress in the country, and it produced also singular embarrassment to the administration.

The present administration was then only two months old; but it had already become formally pledged to maintain the policy of that which had gone before it. The President had avowed his purpose of treading in the footsteps of his predecessor. Here, then, was difficulty. Here was a political knot, to be either untied or cut. The experiment had failed, and failed, as it was thought, so utterly and hopelessly, that it could not be tried again.

What, then, was to be done? Committed against a Bank of the United States in the strongest manner, and the substitute, from which so much was expected, having disappointed all hopes, what was the administration to do? Two distinct classes of duties had been performed in times past by the Bank of the United States; one more immediately to the Government, the other to the community. The first was the safe-keeping and the transfer, when required, of the public moneys; the other the supplying of a sound and convenient paper currency, of equal credit all over the country, and everywhere equivalent to specie, and the giving of most important facilities to the operations of exchange. These objects were highly important, and their most perfect accomplishment by the experiment had been promised from the first. The State banks, it was declared, could perform all these duties, and should perform them. But the "experiment" came to a dishonored end in the early part of May. The deposit banks, with the others, stopped payment. They could not render back the deposits; and so far from being able to furnish a general currency, or to assist exchanges, (purposes, indeed, which they never had fulfilled with any success,) their paper became immediately depreciated, even in its local circulation. What course, then, was the administration now to adopt? Why, sir, it is plain that it had but one alternative. It must either return to the former practice of the Government, take the currency into its own hands, and maintain it, as well as provide for the safe-keeping of the public money by some institution of its own; or else, adopting some new mode of merely keeping the public money, it must abandon all further care over currency and exchange. One of these courses became inevitable. The administration had no other choice. The State banks could be tried no more, with the opinion which the administration now entertained of them; and how else could any thing be done to maintain the currency? In no way but by the establishment of a national institution.

There was no escape from this dilemma. One course was, to go back to that which the party had so much condemned; the other, to give up the whole duty, and leave the currency to its fate. Between these two, the administration found itself absolutely obliged to decide; and it has decided, and decided boldly. It was decided to surrender the duty, and abandon the constitution. That decision is before us, in the Message, and in the measures now under consideration. The choice has been made; and that choice, in my opinion, raises a question of the utmost importance to the people of this country, both for the present and all future time. That question is, whether Congress has or ought to have, any duty to perform in relation to the currency of the country, beyond the mere regulation of the gold and silver coin.

Mr. President, the honorable member from South Carolina remarked, the other day, with great frankness and good humor, that, in the political classifications of the times, he desired to be considered as nothing but an honest nullifier. That, he said, was his character. I believe, sir, the country will readily concede that character to the honorable gentleman. For one, certainly, I am willing to say, that I believe him a very honest and a very sincere nullifier, using the term in the same sense in which he used it himself, and in which he meant to apply it to himself. And I am very much afraid, sir, that (whatever he may think of it himself) it has been under the influence of those sentiments, which belong to his character as a nullifier, that he has so readily and so zealously embraced the doctrines of the President's Message. In my opinion, the Message, the bill before us, and the honorable member's amendment, form, together, a system, a code of practical politics, the direct tendency of which is to nullify and expunge, or, perhaps, more correctly speaking, by a united and mixed process of nullification and expunging, to abolish a highly important and useful power of the Government. It strikes down the principle upon which the Government has been administered, in regard to the subject of the currency, through its whole history; and it seeks to obliterate, or to draw black lines around, that part of the constitution on which this principle of administration has rested. The system proposed, in my opinion, is not only anti-commercial, but anti-constitutional also, and anti-union in a high degree.

You will say, sir, that this is a strong way of stating an opinion. It is so. I mean to state the opinion in the strongest manner. I do not wish, indeed, at every turn, to say, of measures which I oppose, that they either violate or surrender the constitution. But when, in all soberness and candor, I do so think, in all soberness and candor I must so speak; and whether the opinion which I have now expressed be true, let the sequel decide.

Now, sir, Congress has been called together in a moment of great difficulty. The characteristic of the crisis is commercial distress. We are not suffering from war, or pestilence, or famine; and it is alleged by the President and Secretary, that there is no want of revenue. Our means, it is averred, are abundant. And yet the Government is in distress, and the country is in distress; and Congress is assembled, by a call of the President, to provide relief. The immediate and direct cause of all is, derangement of the currency and the exchanges; commercial credit is gone, and property no longer answers the common ends and purposes of property. Government cannot use its own means, and individuals are alike unable to command their own resources. The operations, both of Government and people, are obstructed; and they are obstructed because the money of the country, the great instrument of commerce and exchange, has become disordered and useless. The Government has funds; that is to say, it has credits in the banks, but it cannot turn these credits into cash; and individual citizens are as bad off as Government. The Government is a great creditor and a great debtor. It collects and it disburses large sums. In the loss, therefore, of a proper medium of payment and receipt, Government is a sufferer. But the people are sufferers from the same causes; and inasmuch as the whole amount of payments and receipts by the people, in their individual transactions, is many times greater than the amount of payments and receipts by Government, the aggregate of evil suffered by the people is also many times greater than that suffered by Government. Individuals have means as ample, in proportion to their wants, as Government; but they share with Government the common calamity arising from the overthrow of the currency. The honorable member from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) has stated, or has quoted the statement from others, that while the payments and receipts of Government are twenty millions a year, the payments and receipts of individuals are two or three hundred millions. He has, I think, underrated the amount of individual payments and receipts. But even if he has not, the statement shows how little a part of the whole evil falls on Government. The great mass of suffering is on the people.

Now, sir, when we look at the Message, the bill, and the proposed amendment, their single, exclusive, and undivided object is found to be, relief to the Government. Not one single provision is adopted or recommended with direct reference to the relief of the people. They all speak of revenue, of finance, of duties and customs, of taxes and collections; and the evils which the people suffer, by the derangement of the currency and the exchanges, and the breaking up of commercial credit, instead of being put forth as prominent and leading objects of regard, are dismissed with a slight intimation, here and there, that, in providing for the superior and paramount interests of Government, some incidental or collateral benefits may, perhaps, accrue to the community. But is Government, I ask, to care for nothing but itself? Is self-preservation the great end of Government? Has it no trust powers? Does it owe no duties but to itself? If it keeps itself in being, does it fulfil all the objects of its creation? I think not. I think Government exists, not for its own ends, but for the public utility. It is an agency, established to promote the common good, by common counsels; its chief duties are to the people; and it seems to me strange and preposterous, in a moment of great and general distress, that Government should confine all its deliberations to the single object of its own revenues, its own convenience, its own undisturbed administration.

I cannot say, sir, that I was surprised to see this general character impressed on the face of the Message. I confess it appeared to me, when the banks stopped payment, that the administration had come to a pass, in which it was unavoidable that it should take some such course. But that necessity was imposed, not by the nature of the crisis, but by its own commitment to the line of politics which its predecessor had adopted, and which it had pledged itself to pursue.

It withdraws its care from the currency, because it has left itself no means of performing its own duties, connected with that subject. It has voluntarily and on calculation, discarded and renounced the policy which has been approved for half a century, because it could not return to that policy, without admitting its own inconsistency and violating its party pledges. This is the truth of the whole matter.

Now, sir, my present purpose chiefly is to maintain two propositions:

1. That it is the constitutional duty of this Government to see that a proper currency, suitable to the circumstances of the times, and to the wants of trade and business, as well as to the payment of debts due to Government, be maintained and preserved; a currency of general credit, and capable of aiding the operations of exchange, so far as those operations may be conducted by means of the circulating medium; and that there are duties, therefore, devolving on Congress, in relation to currency, beyond the mere regulation of the gold and silver coins.

2. That the Message, the bill, and the proposed amendment, all, in effect, deny any such duty, disclaim all such power, and confine the constitutional obligation of Government to the mere regulation of the coins, and the care of its own revenues.

I have well weighed, Mr. President, and fully considered, the first of these propositions, to wit: that which respects the duty of this Government in regard to the currency. I mean to stand by it. It expresses, in my judgment, a principle, fully sustained by the constitution, and by the usage of the Government, and which is of the highest practical importance. With this proposition, or this principle, I am willing to stand connected, and to share in the judgment which the community shall ultimately pronounce upon it. If the country shall sustain it, and be ready, in due time, to carry it into effect, by such means and instruments as the general opinion shall think best to adopt, I shall co-operate, cheerfully, in any such undertaking; and shall look again, with confidence, to prosperity in this branch of our national concerns. On the other hand, if the country shall reject this proposition, and act on that rejection; if it shall decide that Congress has no power, nor is under any duty, in relation to the currency, beyond the mere regulation of the coins; then, upon that construction of the powers and duties of Congress, I am willing to acknowledge, that I do not feel myself competent to render any substantial service to the public councils, on these great interests. I admit, at once, that if the currency is not to be preserved by the Government of the United States, I know not how it is to be guarded against constantly occurring disorders and derangements.

[Mr. Webster then argued at great length in favor of his first proposition, and to show that it was the duty of Congress to regulate the paper as well as the metallic currency, and that the proper regulation of the paper currency was a national bank; and continued:]

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

When the bill for the late bank was called up, the honorable member from South Carolina explained its objects in an able speech. He showed the absolute necessity of a national currency; the power of Congress over such currency, whether metallic or paper; and the propriety and expediency of establishing a bank, as the best means of exercising these powers and fulfilling these duties. I agreed then, and I agree now, to the general sentiment expressed in that speech, heartily and entirely. I would refer to it, on this occasion, both as an able argument and a high authority; and beg to adopt it, as setting forth, in a strong light, the sentiments which I am now endeavoring to enforce.

[Mr. CALHOUN here rose to make an explanation. He said that he never saw the reporter's notes of his speech on that occasion, and, therefore, what he did say, may not have been what he would have said. There were points of omission in that speech which occupied a column and a half of the National Intelligencer. Mr. C. said that he took care then, as now, to fortify himself, and to leave a road open to oppose, at any coming time, a national bank. He then said that he was opposed to a bank, but that he submitted to the necessity of the case. There was then a connection between the Government and the banks; and, if the Government had a right to regulate the currency, there was no means of doing it but by a national bank. He had, both then, and since then, contended that Government had no right to have any connection with any banks. In his opinion, the United States Bank (which he then advocated, and assisted to establish) was not established according to the constitution. Congress had no right to establish such a bank. He acted contrary to his own impressions of right. Many people may do things which they do not believe to be lawful, from necessity. He acted from necessity.]

Mr. WEBSTER, resuming his remarks, said he thought the gentleman had said, formerly, that in consequence of the decision of the question, he felt thenceforward precluded from opposing the bank as being unconstitutional.

[Mr. CALHOUN again explained: He (Mr. C.) thought the connection between Government and banks was now broken, and that set him at liberty; so that now he could oppose what he had then, and since, earnestly advocated.]

It is not my desire, sir, to hold the gentleman to a report of his speech, which he may choose, even now to disclaim. I have never heard of his disclaiming it before; and even now, sir, I do not understand him as being desirous of retracting or denying any thing contained in the printed report of his speech, respecting the importance of a uniform national currency. That topic makes up the sum and substance of his whole speech. It was the topic of the occasion; it was the express purpose for which his committee had been raised, and for the accomplishment of which the whole proceeding was gone into. It was all currency, currency, currency; and, whether the gentleman now thinks the law constitutional or unconstitutional, he cannot deny that his own object, and the object of Congress, was to furnish a circulating medium for the country. And here, again, so unimportant, relatively, was the mere custody, or deposit of the public moneys in the bank, that the bill, as originally introduced, contained no provision for that object. A section was afterwards introduced, in Committee of the Whole, on my motion, providing for the deposit of the public moneys with the bank, unless the Secretary of the Treasury should, at any time, otherwise order and direct; a reservation of power to the Secretary, which, as I think, and always have thought, was greatly abused, by the removal of the deposits in 1833.

By reference to the debates, sir, it will be found that other friends of the measure followed up the general ideas of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, and supported the bank, as a necessary agent or instrument for establishing, anew, a national currency, for the uses of commerce and exchange.

It was my second proposition, sir, that the Message, the bill, and the amendment, taken together, deny, in substance, that this Government has any power or duty connected with the currency, or the exchanges, beyond the mere regulation of the coins.

And, sir, is this not true? We are to judge of the Message by what it omits, as well as by what it proposes. Congress is called together in a great commercial crisis. The whole business of the country is arrested by a sudden disorder of the currency. And what is proposed? Any thing to restore this currency? Any thing with a direct view of producing the resumption of payment by the banks? Is a single measure offered, or suggested, the main purpose of which is general relief to the country? Not one. No, sir, not one. The administration confines its measures to the Government itself. It proposes a loan, by the means of Treasury notes, to make good the deficiency in the revenue; and it proposes secure vaults, and strong boxes, for the safe-keeping of the public moneys; and here its paternal care ends. Does the Message propose to grapple, in any way, with the main evil of the times? Seeing that that evil is one affecting the currency, does the Message, like that of Mr. Madison, in 1815, address itself directly to that point, and recommend measures of adequate relief? No such thing. It abstains from all general relief. It looks out for the interest of the Government, as a Government; and it looks no further. Sir, let me turn to the Message itself, to show that all its recommendations, and, indeed, all the objects in calling Congress together, are confined to the narrow and exclusive purpose of relieving the wants of Government.

The President says, that the regulations established by Congress, for the deposit and safe-keeping of the public moneys, having become inoperative by the suspension of payment by the banks; and apprehending that the same cause would so diminish the revenue, that the receipts into the Treasury would not be sufficient to defray the expenses of Government; and as questions were also expected to arise respecting the October instalment of the deposit to the States, and doubting whether Government would be able to pay its creditors in specie, or its equivalent, according to law, he felt it to be his duty to call Congress together. These are the reasons for calling Congress. They are all the reasons; and they all have exclusive regard to the Government itself.

In the next place, let us see what measures the Message recommends to Congress. In its own language, the objects demanding attention are:

"To regulate, by law, the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys; to designate the funds to be received and paid by the Government; to enable the Treasury to meet promptly every demand upon it; to prescribe the terms of indulgence, and the mode of settlement to be adopted, as well in collecting from individuals the revenue that has accrued, as in withdrawing it from former depositories."

These are all the objects recommended particularly to the care of Congress; and the enumeration of them is followed by a general suggestion, that Congress will adopt such further measures as may promote the prosperity of the country. This whole enumeration, it is obvious, is confined to the wants and convenience of the Government itself.

And now, sir, let us see on what grounds it is that the Message refrains from recommending measures of general relief. The President says:

"It was not designed by the constitution that the Government should assume the management of domestic or foreign exchange. It is, indeed, authorized to regulate, by law, the commerce between the States, and to provide a general standard of value or medium of exchange in gold and silver; but it is not its province to aid individuals in the transfer of their funds, otherwise than through the facilities afforded by the Post Office Department. As justly might it be called on to provide for the transportation of their merchandise."

And again:

"If, therefore, I refrain from suggesting to Congress any specific plan for regulating the exchanges of the country, relieving mercantile embarrassments, or interfering with the ordinary operations of foreign or domestic commerce, it is from a conviction that such measures are not within the constitutional province of the General Government, and that their adoption would not promote the real and permanent welfare of those they might be designed to aid."

The President, then, sir, declines to recommend any measure for the relief of commerce, for the restoration of the currency, or for the benefit of exchanges, on the avowed ground that, in his opinion, such measures are not within the constitutional power of Congress. He is distinct and explicit, and so far entitled to credit. He denies, broadly and flatly, that there is any authority in this Government to regulate the currency, and the exchanges, beyond its care of the coin. The question, then, is fairly stated. It cannot be misunderstood; and we are now to see how Congress, and, what is much more important, how the country, will settle it.

Mr. President, if, in May last, when specie payments were suspended, the President of one of the banks had called his council of directors together, informed them that their affairs were threatened with danger, that they could not collect their debts in specie, and might not be able to pay their creditors in specie, and recommended such measures as he thought their interest required; his policy, in all this, would have been no more exclusively confined to the interests of his corporation, than the policy of the Message is confined to the interests of this great corporation of Government. Both in practice, therefore, and on principle, in reality, and avowedly, the administration abandons the currency to its fate. It surrenders all care over it, declines all concern about it, and denies that it has any duty connected with it.

Sir, the question, then, comes to be this: Shall one of the great powers of the constitution, a power essential to it, on any just plan or theory of Government, a power which has been exercised from the beginning, a power absolutely necessary and indispensable to the proper regulation of the commerce of the country, be now surrendered and abandoned forever? To this point we have come, sir, after pursuing the "experiment" of the late administration for five years. And from this point, I am persuaded, the country will move, and move strongly, in one direction or another. We shall either go over to the gentleman from Missouri, and suffer him to embrace us in his gold and silver arms, and hug us to his hard money breast; or we shall return to the long-tried, well-approved, and constitutional practice of the Government.

As to the employment of the State banks, for the purpose of maintaining the currency, and carrying on the operations of exchange, I certainly never had any confidence in that system, and have none now.

I think the State banks can never furnish a medium for circulation, which shall have universal credit, and be of equal value everywhere.

I think they have no powers, or faculties, which can enable them to restrain excessive issues of paper.

I think their respective spheres of action are so limited, and their currencies so local, that they can never accomplish what is desired in relation to exchanges.

Still, I prefer the employment of State banks to the project before us; because it is less of a project; because it is less dangerous; and, chiefly, because it does not surrender, effectually, and in terms, a great power of the constitution.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

In every respect this project is objectionable. It is but another "experiment;" and those who recommend it so zealously, were the authors of the last, and were equally full of confidence and assurance in regard to that.

Who invite us to try this experiment? What voices do we hear raised in its recommendation? Are they not the well-known voices which we heard so often when the late "experiment" was begun? We know of but one accession. The voice of the honorable member from South Carolina is heard, it is true, now mingling with the general strain; and that is all. Where, then, is the ground for confidence in this experiment, more than there was for it in the last?

This scheme, too, is against all our usages, and all our habits. It locks up the revenue, under bolts and bars, from the time of collection to the time of disbursement. Our practice has been otherwise, and it has been a useful practice. In 1833, the Secretary of the Treasury admonished the deposit banks, since they had obtained the custody of the public funds, to accommodate the public, to loan freely, especially to importing merchants. And now, a system is proposed to us, according to which any use of the public funds, by way of loan or accommodation to the public, is made a criminal offence, and to be prosecuted by indictment! Admirable, admirable consistency!

MR. HUBBARD said: The bill reported by the Committee on Finance, if carried into full effect, cannot fail to relieve the Government from present financial embarrassment. I am fully aware that it is the purpose of the chairman of the committee to present his own views in relation to the measure; it will be his province to give a very detailed statement of the character and effect of that bill—its benefits to the Government, to the banking institution of the country, and to the people themselves. It cannot but have occurred, however, to every individual, that if this bill should now be adopted, it would in effect be but the same measure, so far as it relates to the collection and to the disbursement of the public money, which has existed almost from 1789, until the joint resolution of April, 1816. This bill, if carried into effect, would give to the Government the certain and absolute control of its own funds. So did the act of 1789. This bill, if adopted, would sever the Government from any connection with the pecuniary concerns of the local banks of the country. So did the act of 1789; and, notwithstanding the existence of the Bank of the United States from 1791 to 1811, there was no legal provision which created that institution, or any other bank, the receiver and disbursor of the public revenue. If this bill should be adopted, the fiscal agents of the Government will collect, hold, and disburse the public revenues upon their own responsibility. So did the collectors under the act of July, 1789. If this bill be passed, the fiscal agents will be immediately accountable to the Government. So were the collectors of the revenue from the foundation of the Government to the recharter of the United States Bank, in 1816. The advantages the Government will derive from the operation of this measure will be the certain control of its own funds, the direct responsibility and accountability to the Government of its own fiscal agents; and another benefit which will result from the adoption of this measure, will be the unchangeable character of its own means, and the fixed value of its own revenues—not liable to depreciation by the casualties and misfortunes to which the moneyed institutions of the country are more or less liable. The utter failure of this, or the severe losses of that bank, can, in nowise, deteriorate the value of the Government funds. So it was for the first quarter of a century after the adoption of our constitution. Independent of all banks, we would manage our finances in our own way, and with perfect security to the Government. So it was under the act of 1789. The revenues then were collected and disbursed independent of the Bank of the United States. These are some of the benefits which would result to the Government by the adoption of this bill; and, acting independent of local banks in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, it would also, in its operation, be beneficial to the banks themselves. If this measure be carried into effect, no longer will the money of the Government be used by the State banks in their banking operations; no longer will the money of the Government be employed in increasing the paper issues of the banks, by increasing their discounts, and their credits; and certain it is that this deposit with the local banks cannot be required for the transactions of the necessary business of a business community. The pecuniary aid of the Government is not needed for the legitimate operation of the local banks. There is not, Mr. President, any want of bank capital in the country; if there was, there is no want of a disposition to create bank capital. The complaint is, and has been, that banks have multiplied too rapidly, and beyond the necessities and wants of a commercial and trading community. The complaint is well founded. Certain the fact is, that there is not at this time, within the limits of New England, any want of bank capital. If this be so, what occasion can there be, where is the necessity, of requiring the deposit of the public money to carry on the proper operations of these local banks? There can be no necessity; and the sound, stable, substantial institutions will be essentially benefited by giving up this trading upon the money of the Government, and by returning to the good old safe practice of managing their own business upon their own capital. There is too much uncertainty attending the use of the public money to justify any bank doing business upon the strength of Government deposits. It is true that a half of a million may be placed with a public depository to-day for safe-keeping: and may it not be so, that a public appropriation for some unexpected and unlooked-for event may render it indispensably necessary to withdraw at once the whole amount of such a deposit; and if the bank had previously put this deposit out on loan—as it certainly would do, under the deposit act, to indemnify it against the claim of the Government to interest—might it not be embarrassing to the banks to answer such a call from the Treasury Department?

The great uncertainty, then, both as to amount, and to time, which must attend the deposits of the public money, cannot fail to be regarded by sound and well-regulated banks as a great objection to the reception of the Government deposits. If the banks which have been selected under the deposit act of June 23, 1836, should be called upon to answer the inquiry whether the Government money received by them in deposit has been a benefit to their respective institutions, the answer of the solvent and stable deposit banks would be—no; they have been an injury, rather than a benefit. Trace the history of the deposits which have been made with the banks in New England, and it must result, from the great uncertainty and instability which has attended the moneyed operations of the Government, that the deposits have served but to augment their pecuniary embarrassments. Better, then, would it be for them and for the Government to dissolve the connection. And, Mr. President, the people themselves, for whose interest there has been much feeling manifested pending the debate upon this bill, would also participate in the benefits which would result from the adoption of this measure. Men would become steady and settled in their operations; there would no longer be given to property an inflated and factitious value; business would resume its accustomed channels; and the excitement, always temporary and always dangerous, (the fruit of any extraordinary expansion of paper currency,) would be done away; the spirit of speculation and overtrading would be checked; a sound discretion and a guarded prudence would mark the conduct of business men, and give character to all their operations. There would not, and there could not be, that constant change and revolution in the value of property, necessarily involving in its consequences the fortune and the fate of thousands. Let the Government, through its own agents, collect and hold its revenues exclusively for public purposes; let the Government withhold from the local institutions the use of the public funds, and that wild, extravagant, and adventurous spirit which has pervaded our country for the last two years, will be controlled by the power of sober judgment; and if such would be the consequences resulting from the adoption of this measure, surely the people would greatly participate in the benefits of the system. In my belief, the Government, the banks, and the people, would derive essential advantages from the adoption of this measure. I shall, therefore, Mr. President, give to it my best support. As a member of the Committee on Finance, I agreed to report the bill. The discussion which has taken place since the bill has been before the Senate—to all of which I have given my constant attention—has served to satisfy my own mind of the necessity, policy, and justice, of the measure. I deeply regret that a different view has been taken of this matter by other gentlemen, for whose opinions I have ever entertained a profound respect; but it is, I trust, but an honest difference of opinion on a leading measure of public policy. I have no belief that any change of sentiment can be accomplished; but, sir, I must be excused for noticing some of the objections which have been made on this floor to the bill now under consideration.

First. It is objected that the bill provides that the revenues of the Government should be collected and disbursed in gold and silver; and from the consequence given to this objection to the measure pending the debate, the inference must be that in this particular a great innovation upon the practice of the Government is contemplated, and that a new principle is to be introduced into our legislation; but, so far from that being the fact, this same principle—this special provision—has been coexistent with the Government itself. By the act to regulate the collection of duties, &c., approved July 21, 1789, it is provided “that the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of said act, shall be received in gold and silver coin only.” And by the tenth section of the act of February, 1791, creating the Bank of the United States, it is provided “that the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, in gold and silver coin, shall be received in all payments to the United States.” The corporation was not, by the terms of its charter, made the fiscal agent of the Government; nor was the bank made the depository of the public revenues. The responsibility of the collectors, created by the act of 1789, was not transferred to the Bank of the United States. They, and they alone, were directly accountable to the Government. Their duties were prescribed by the act, and were not, by the charter of the bank, changed. This feature of the bill, should the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina be adopted, would contain no new principle, nor introduce any new practice. From 1789 to 1816, such was the usage of the Government, and such was the law of the land. And I would confidently appeal to the experience of the people, whether the material change in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues which took place on the recharter of the United States Bank in 1816, and the subsequent changes which have taken place, have advanced their peace, prosperity, and happiness. Under the system which was established in 1789, and practised on by the Government, the revenues were collected and disbursed in a currency not subject to change or deterioration, by its own fiscal agents, directly responsible to the Government. By the act of 1816, rechartering the United States Bank, that corporation was made the responsible fiscal agent of the Government. All the bills or notes of the corporation, without any discrimination, were made receivable in all payments to the United States. And the act provides further, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches;" and "that during the continuance of the act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charge," &c. These provisions were introduced, by way of amendments to the bill, after it had been reported by the committee, and were, I believe, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, thereby materially and, as it has operated, injuriously changing the whole practice of the Government in relation to the collection and disbursement of the public funds.

Had the bank been vested with no other powers by the act of 1816, than were conferred by the act of 1791, the evils which have since been experienced would probably have been avoided. It was its intimate connection with the finances of the country—it was the control it possessed over the public funds—it was the political influence it was supposed to exercise—that awakened the jealousy of the American people, and excited feelings and established opinions hostile to the continuance of such an institution.

A second objection made to the bill is, that it in effect repeals the act depositing the money of the Government with the local banks, and thereby producing great injury to those institutions. I have already expressed my own views as to the effect this measure would have upon State banks. And all I wish to add is, that, until local banks were selected as public depositories, for the first forty years of the existence of this Government, the local banking institutions of the country did not count upon any such aid from the Government as essential to their prosperity, or necessary to their success.

A third objection to the bill is, that it creates one currency for the Government and another for the people.

Was there any complaint of this sort made under the act of 1789? Was there then one currency for the Government and another for the people? If the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina be adopted, after 1841, the revenues will be received in gold and silver only. And what would be the effect of such a proceeding? Would the gold and silver received for the public revenues be abstracted from the general currency? Would it be locked up from circulation? Would it be salted down in the vaults of the sub-Treasury officer? No, sir: the revenues and the public dues would come from the people, and they would be disbursed to the people. If paid in a metallic currency to our fiscal agents, the same currency would, by the same agents, be disbursed to the public creditors. The history of the Government shows, that at the commencement of each fiscal year, there is not on an average in the public Treasury, subject to draft, a sum exceeding six millions of dollars. If, in the course of the year, twenty more millions have been received, a like amount has been disbursed. A sum not exceeding six millions of specie, then, would ordinarily be the balance of the account of receipts and expenditures at the commencement of the fiscal year; and can the abstraction of six from more than eighty millions now in the country, so alarm the fears of gentlemen as to lead them to the conclusion that the consequence of this measure will be the establishment of one currency for the Government, and a different currency for the people? And are not all of the people? Are men holding office a distinct race from the people? And can it be seriously contended that the revenues received and paid out to public creditors are withdrawn from circulation, and from the care of the people? No, sir, it cannot. Debtors and creditors to the Government are parts of the same community. They are of the people; and their relation to the Government is constantly changing. To-day one may be a creditor—to-morrow he may be a debtor; and I cannot conceive in what way or manner the adoption of this bill would create one currency for the Government and another for the people—would establish those high or low in office—all who have claims upon the Government—as an order of men possessing peculiar and exclusive privileges. It cannot so be. The objection has no foundation in truth.

A fourth objection is made, that the bill divorces the Government from the banks. The bill separates the Government from the banks in no other way than it says, that no longer shall the banks have the public deposits for the purpose of expanding and enlarging their paper currency. This is the divorce about which Senators complain. The propriety of such a separation I have already discussed.

Another objection made to this measure is, that it in effect destroys the credit system, under which the country has enjoyed so much prosperity.

There can be no doubt that credit, as contradistinguished from cash payment, has been, and may be, attended with consequences most beneficial to the prosperity of a community; that it stimulates enterprise, and, when properly restrained, cannot fail to advance private interest; but such a credit system needs not the protecting care of the Government. It is the excess of credit that brings danger, distress, and dismay. It is that uncontrolled and uncontrollable spirit of adventure which leads to disaster, embarrassment, and ruin. It is that bold and daring passion for speculation, sustained for a time on credit, which puts in jeopardy the fortunes of individuals, prostrates the best efforts of enterprise, and scatters firebrands and death among an active business community. Whence this general desolation which now pervades our land? Whence this general, this universal embarrassment, which now prevails through the country? It is to be traced to a most injudicious and unwarrantable expansion of the credit system. This has been the efficient and producing cause of the pecuniary distress that now extends from Maine to Florida. A judicious, a well-regulated system of credit, has its advantages in every community, and among every class of our citizens; but I submit whether, from the woful experience we have had, we ought to wish to return to the local banks the public deposits, if thereby an enlargement of individual credit could be obtained, and a corresponding increase of a paper medium? I cannot doubt what would be the response.

The accommodation proposed to be extended to the deposit banks is a relief measure, giving time to those institutions, and enabling those institutions to give time to their debtors. The warehouse bill is a great relief measure, requiring cash payment for importations which shall enter into the consumption of the country, and relieving the people and the Government from the very evils under which we are now laboring—the abuse of the credit system.

Each and all these measures look directly to the relief of the Government and the people; and notwithstanding the speculations of gentlemen here and elsewhere, with respect to the true character of these measures, let them but be adopted—the banks, the merchants, the people, will all unite in expressing to their authors their deep sense of gratitude.

FRIDAY, September 29.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Sub-Treasury bill.

MR. BUCHANAN said: Mr. President, it cannot be denied that the commercial and manufacturing classes of our people throughout the Union are now suffering severely under one of those periodical pressures which have so often afflicted the country. Neither has the agricultural and other interests escaped without injury, although they have not suffered to the same extent. The exhaustion of the human system does not succeed a high degree of unnatural excitement with more unerring certainty than that a depression in the business of the country must follow excessive speculation. The one is a law of nature, the other a scarcely less uniform law of trade. The degree of this depression will always bear an exact proportion to the degree of overaction. As many degrees as the system has been elevated above the point of healthy action, so many degrees must it sink below, after the effects of the stimulus have passed away.

What has been the history of the country in this respect? One of constant vibration. I can speak positively on this subject in regard to the period of time since I came into public life. What has been will be again. The same causes will produce the same effects. We can cherish no reasonable hope of a change unless the State Legislatures should take a firm and decided stand. The history of the past will become that of the future. This year we have sunk to the extreme point of depression. The country is now glutted with foreign merchandise. There will, therefore, be but few importations. All our efforts are now directed towards the payment of our foreign debt. The next year the patient will begin to recruit his exhausted energies. Domestic manufactures will flourish in proportion as foreign goods become scarce. The third year, a fair business will be done. The country will present a flourishing appearance. Property of all descriptions will command a fair price, and we shall glide along smoothly and prosperously. The fourth or the fifth year the era of extravagant speculation will return, again to be succeeded by another depression. At successive periods the best and most enterprising men of the country are crushed. They fall victims at the shrine of the insatiate and insatiable Moloch of extravagant banking. It is an everlasting cycle. The wise man says there is no new thing under the sun; and we are destined, I fear, again and again to pass through the same vicissitudes. The aspect is perpetually changing, but is never new.

Senators have plumed themselves, and their admirers throughout the country have applauded them, as being wonderfully sagacious in their predictions. Their respective partisans are ready to exclaim—

"The spirit of deep prophecy he hath,
Exceeding the nine Sybils of old Rome;
What's past and what's to come he can descry."

But no deep penetration into futurity was required to make these prophecies. Until existing causes shall be removed, the future must be the counterpart of the past.

Whence this eternal vicissitude in the business of the country. What is the secret spring of all these calamities? I answer, the spirit of enterprise, so natural to American citizens, excited into furious action by the stimulus of excessive banking. It operates as does the inhaling of oxygen gas upon the human mind, urging it on to every extravagance and to every folly.

I do not deny that several subordinate circumstances have operated in unison with this grand cause to make the present catastrophe more severe than it otherwise might have been. Still it is the root of all the evil. It is the chief and almost the only source from which the existing distress has flowed.

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

I was not a member of this body when the discussion took place on the veto of the bank charter, or the removal of the deposits. Although both these measures received my cordial approbation, yet I refrain purposely from replying, at this late period, to the remarks which have been made on these subjects. They have already passed into history, and been sanctioned by the public approbation.

Amongst these subsidiary causes of the existing distress may be enumerated the destruction of capital by the great fire at New York, in December, 1835. The wild speculations in public lands, and in splendid towns and cities, upon paper throughout the Western States, which withdrew capital from the commercial cities, where it was most wanted, to portions of the country where it was not required; and the specie circular, if you please, which, however wise it may have been in its origin, ought not, in my opinion, to have been continued in force after it had performed its office and had checked the wild speculations in public lands. I voted in favor of the bill at the last session which repealed this circular; and, under the same circumstances, I would again act in the same manner. But permit me to say that its effects have been greatly exaggerated. It did not carry to the West any thing approaching the amount of gold and silver which Senators have estimated. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, all the specie in all the Western deposit banks, including Michigan, but little exceeded four millions of dollars at the date of the suspension of specie payments; and in the south-western deposit banks it did not amount to one million two hundred thousand dollars. I shall not stop to inquire how much less gold and silver there would have been in these depositories had the specie circular never existed. Certain it is that the comparatively small amount of specie which came into these banks in consequence of this circular, could have produced but an inconsiderable effect on the business of our commercial cities, and still less upon the suspension of specie payments.

These causes may have made the revulsion a little more severe; but, had they never existed, still it must have come with desolating force.

Senators have attributed some portion of the existing distress to the act of 1834, regulating the standard of our gold coins. They have not told us, and they cannot tell us, how this act could have produced such an effect. It was no party measure, and, upon its passage, there were but few, I believe seven, votes against it in the Senate. It was a measure of absolute necessity, if we desired that our own gold coins should ever circulate in this country. Before its passage, a half eagle, as an article of merchandise, was intrinsically worth about five dollars and thirty-three cents in silver, whilst its standard value, as currency under our laws, was only five dollars. It is manifest, therefore, that eagles and half eagles never could have entered into general circulation had it not been for the passage of this act, which is now condemned. It was a mere adjustment of the relative value of gold to silver, according to the standard of other nations; and, if I am not greatly mistaken in my memory, conformed exactly in this particular with the laws of Spain and Portugal.

I have been utterly at a loss to conceive the cause of the hostility of Senators to this necessary measure, unless it be from a feeling similar to that which, it is said, made a distinguished gentleman desire to kill every sheep which came in his way. He could feel no personal hostility to these innocent and harmless animals; but was such a violent anti-tariff man, that the sight of them always reminded him of our woollen manufactures. Certainly no gentleman can entertain any objection to the eagle and half eagle themselves; but they may remind Senators of the efficient and untiring exertions of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) to introduce a gold currency into circulation. As gold, they may like these coins; but, as Bentonian mint drops, they are detestable.

Senators have also contended that the present depressed condition of the country has been produced, in some degree, by the large importations of specie which were encouraged by the administration of General Jackson. I shall not be diverted from my main purpose by answering this objection in detail. Even if their position were correct, which I by no means admit, that more gold and silver had been forced into the country than our necessities demanded, or the fixed laws of trade would have justified, still the effect would have been transient and trifling. It would have immediately flowed back through the channels of commerce to the places from whence it came, until the par of exchange had been restored. This is one of the fixed and invariable laws of trade, from the obligation of which we can never be released.

The Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) in the course of his remarks upon this subject, involved himself in a strange contradiction. At the commencement of his speech he deprecated, with his usual eloquence and ability, the policy of the past administration in forcing specie into this country, contrary to the laws of trade. Towards the conclusion, when his fancy became excited by the contemplation of the splendid Bank of the United States which it was his purpose to establish, he seemed entirely to have changed his opinion. In order to obtain the necessary amount of specie capital, he proposed that some twenty or twenty-five millions of this bank stock should be transmitted to Europe and sold to foreigners in exchange for gold and silver. It was a violation of the laws of trade, which must recoil upon us, to force a greater amount of specie into the country than our just proportion, for the purpose of putting it into circulation among the people; but when the purpose is to furnish a specie capital of twenty or twenty-five millions for a new bank of the United States, then all difficulties vanish from the mind of the gentleman.

No, sir, said Mr. B., without the agency of any of these secondary causes, the present distress must have come. It was inevitable as fate. No law of nature is more fixed, than that our over-banking and our over-trading must have produced the disastrous results under which we are now suffering.

In this crisis, all which the General Government can effect is, in the first place, to withhold its deposits from the banks, and thus refrain from contributing their funds to swell the torrent of wild speculation; and, in the second place, to restrain the extravagance of their credits and issues, in some small degree, by collecting and disbursing our revenue exclusively in specie, or in the notes of banks which will pay the balances due from them in specie, at short intervals. To accomplish these two purposes, as well as to render the public revenue more secure, are the objects of the bill and amendment now before the Senate.

The evils of a redundant paper circulation are now manifest to every eye. It alternately raises and sinks the value of every man's property. It makes a beggar of the man to-morrow who is indulging in dreams of wealth to-day. It converts the business of society into a mere lottery; whilst those who distribute the prizes are wholly irresponsible to the people. When the collapse comes, as come it must, it casts laborers out of employment, crushes manufacturers and merchants, and ruins thousands of honest and industrious citizens. Shall we, then, by our policy, any longer contribute to such fatal results? That is the question.

The system of extravagant banking benefits no person except the shrewd speculator, who knows how to take advantage of the perpetual fluctuation in prices which a redundant paper currency never fails to produce. He sees, in the general causes which operate upon the commercial world, when money is about to be scarce, and when it will become plenty. He studies the run as a gambler does that of the cards. He knows when to buy and when to sell, and thus often realizes a large estate in a few happy ventures. Those who have been initiated into the mysteries of the paper money market, can thus accumulate rapid fortunes at the expense of their less skilful neighbors.

The question before the Senate is not, whether we shall divorce the Government from the banks. The banks themselves have done that already. The alliance is already dissolved. The question now is, shall we, with all the experience of the past, restore this ill-fated union? No propitious divinities would grace the new nuptials; but the fatal sisters would be there ready again to cut the cord at the first approach of difficulty and danger.

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) has appealed to us in the name of consistency to support his amendment. But circumstances have entirely changed since we voted for it at the last session. Then the union existed between the banks and the Treasury, and his bill prescribed the relative duties of the contracting parties. Now the contract is at an end. The banks have violated its fundamental obligations, and the Government is free. The preliminary question now is, shall we enter into a new alliance. We must first determine that we shall, before any question of consistency can arise. Should we again connect ourselves with the banks, then, and not till then, can we be called upon to adopt rules regulating the union. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia proceeds upon the assumption that our former relations are to be restored. I oppose the amendment mainly because I am hostile to this re-union. If Congress should first determine to restore the old relations between the parties, then, and not till then, might there be some force in an appeal to our consistency.

We are left at this moment entirely free to decide what is best to be done with the public money. To use the language of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) we have reached a point from whence we are about to take a new departure. But three courses have been, or in the nature of things can be, presented for our selection. We must either deposit the public money in a bank of the United States, to be created for that purpose; or restore it to the State banks; or provide for its safe custody in the hands of our own officers, without the agency of any bank, State or national.

And, first, in regard to the creation of another bank of the United States. It was not my purpose, at this time, to offer my objections in detail to such an institution. Even if I had intended to present my views fully upon this subject, the overwhelming vote of the Senate on Tuesday last, against the establishment of such a bank, would warn me to forbear. It would be labor lost and time expended in vain. I shall content myself, therefore, with a few general observations upon this branch of the subject, and a short reply to some of the remarks which have been made by the advocates of a new bank.

In my opinion, the most alarming dangers which would result from such an institution, have never yet been presented in bold relief before the people. This has arisen from the unnatural position of that institution towards the Government. We have seen it struggling against Executive power; and its efforts have been tremendous. They would have been irresistible against any other President than Andrew Jackson. As it was, the conflict was of the most portentous character, and shook the Union to its centre. But we have witnessed the exception, not the rule. It is the natural ally, not the enemy, of power. Wealth and power necessarily attract each other, and are always ready to rush to each other's embrace. In the language once used by a distinguished orator, now no more, (Mr. Randolph,) "male and female created he them." Suppose General Jackson and the bank had been in alliance, and not in opposition. What, then, might have been the consequences, had he been an enemy to the liberties of his country? Armed with all the power and all the patronage which belong to the President of the United States, enjoying unbounded popularity, and wielding the combined wealth of the country through the agency of this all-powerful bank and its branches, planted in every portion of the Union; can any man say that our liberties would not have been in danger? All the forms of the constitution might have remained; the people might still have been flattered with the idea of electing their own officers; but the animating spirit of our free institutions would have departed forever. A secret, an all-pervading influence, would have sapped the foundations of liberty and made it an empty name. Under such circumstances, a President might always select his successor. But, thank heaven, the danger has passed away, and I trust forever.

If any of my friends on this side of the House who advocate the establishment of a national bank, should be elected President—and if their political principles are to prevail with a majority of the people of this country, that majority could not make a better selection—in what situation shall we be placed? One of the first measures of the administration would be to establish a magnificent bank of the United States, with a capital of at least fifty millions of dollars, and with branches throughout the different States. A feeling of gratitude towards their creator would render them subservient to his will. It would be their pride and their pleasure to promote his influence and extend his power. We should have no more wars between the bank and the Government. They would move on harmoniously together. In other days, the time might arrive when the bank would be used by some bad and aspiring President as a powerful instrument to subvert the liberties of his country.

Even if such a bank could better regulate the currency and the domestic exchanges of the country than any other instrument, still it would be infinitely better to bear the ills we have, than to endanger the existence or the purity of our free institutions.

But would such a bank control and regulate the issues of the State banks? I answer, no. It would not, if it could; it could not, if it would. In the affairs of human life, if you expect one agent to restrain and control another, you ought to render either their interests or their inclinations different and counteracting. To accomplish this purpose, they must be "antagonistical" to each other. When such agents are corporations, this is emphatically true. Peculiarly governed by self-interest, they feel no enthusiasm unless it be to make large dividends for their stockholders. Now, a bank of the United States would have precisely the same interest with the State banks in making extravagant loans and issues. Whenever, in their estimation, they could extend their accommodations, without endangering their own security, they would pursue that course. This is the powerful instinct of self-interest. You cannot change the fixed laws which govern human nature, by making men directors and stockholders in a bank of the United States. It is absurd to suppose that a large moneyed corporation, having in view solely its own interests, will voluntarily become the regulator of the paper currency of a great nation, and prevent those ruinous contractions and expansions under which both England and this country have periodically suffered. It would be easy for me to prove, at least to my own satisfaction, that, in point of fact, neither the first nor the last Bank of the United States ever did exercise a regular and efficient control over the issues of the State banks. On the contrary, whenever their interest impelled them to extend their own issues, they have pursued this course, and thus, instead of checking, they have given loose reins to the State banks. Both the one and the others have thus rushed together, and have together ministered to that spirit of over-trading and extravagant speculation which has so often desolated our country. To pursue such a course of illustration would, however, be to revive the old controversy; to tread the ground which has been so often trodden, and to divert me from that which more essentially belongs to the present question.

The mistake committed in regard to the deposit banks, was the belief that they would be able and willing to restrain the issues of the other State banks. Fortified with the public deposits, and numerous as they were, they might possibly have done something towards the accomplishment of such a purpose. But, bank like—human nature like—instead of aiming at any such result, the Government deposits became the instrument in their hands of still more extravagant credits and circulation. Their objects seemed to be not to restrain, but to give loose reins to the other banks and to themselves, and thereby increase their own profits.

Apprehensions have been expressed, and no doubt felt, in the course of this debate, lest a perpetuation of the divorce which now exists between the Treasury and the banks, might lead to the establishment of a bank of the United States. This event would, in my opinion, be much more probable should the late system be restored. It is, therefore, natural that the friends of such a bank should be in favor of this restoration. In such an event, let war come when it may, you will then not only be deprived of your own treasures, but specie payments will be suspended, the currency of the whole country will be deranged, and you will not be able to collect taxes from the people, unless it be in depreciated paper. At such a crisis, a Bank of the United States becomes inevitable. Let us then keep our money under our own control. Let us always have it ready for use when it is required. Let us depend upon no banks, whether State or national, for this purpose.

It may be said that although the banks have suspended specie payments, yet the deposits which we have made with them will eventually be paid. This may, or it may not be. I doubt extremely on that point. If the event were certain, however, this is no answer to the objections against employing such depositories. In the day of danger they cease to be banks. Your money, which is the sinew of war, is withheld from you at the hour of your utmost need. Your resources are dried up, and your energies paralyzed, at the very moment when the utmost energetic energies are demanded. It would be but a poor consolation, either to the Government or people of this country, that, after having suffered all the evils and calamities of such a catastrophe, the commissioners of insolvency should finally pay them twenty shillings in the pound.

In the second place, I am opposed to returning to the system of deposit banks, because I feel no confidence that, upon a second trial, it would prove better than it did on the first. From the very nature and present organization of our State banking institutions, they must go from bad to worse. Their tendency is downward, and unless arrested by the vigorous action of the State Governments, the whole system must rush to inevitable ruin. I defy the art of man to devise a worse banking system than that which prevails throughout this country. The model of it upon paper was the Bank of England; but the whole capital of this bank is vested in loans to this Government, and is therefore as secure as the Government itself. Such is not the condition of any of our institutions. The public have no security that the whole amount of their capital stock may not be squandered; and the fact is, according to the statement of Mr. Gallatin, that one hundred and sixty-five of our banks broke between 1811 and 1830.

These banks, or all of them with which I am acquainted, enjoy, under their charters, a privilege which exempts their stockholders, in their individual capacity, from the payment of any of the notes or debts due by the corporation, in case it should become insolvent. There is, I believe, no restriction anywhere upon the amount of their profits or dividends, unless it be a trifling tax. And they are nowhere required to have any fixed proportion of specie in their vaults, compared with the amount of their circulation and deposits; certainly they are not in the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

If the Senator from Massachusetts and myself enter into a partnership to prosecute any business, and the partnership should fail, the private fortunes of each of us would be responsible for the debts of the concern. The partners and shareholders in the private or joint-stock banks of England are placed in the same situation. No holder of such bank notes in that country, none of their depositors, can lose one dollar, until after the private fortunes of all the stockholders shall have been exhausted. This is a great security to the public. Not so the bankers in this country. They are a privileged class. That business which is more profitable than any other is conducted without any such risk. Cupidity is unrestrained by any such apprehension. It has a fair field to display itself. Each man puts into the concern the amount of his stock. When that is paid, the bank proceeds to make money as fast as it can, without the fear of future responsibility. How great is the temptation to excess! These banks create money as if by magic, in the form of bank notes or bank credits. These they exchange with individuals for their own notes or bills of exchange, discounting a high rate of interest from their face. Their extravagant issues and credits gave a stimulus to extravagant speculations; and our past history proves that the more they loan, the greater is the demand for new loans. The supply never equals the demand. The last few years has been the golden age for banks. I have no means of ascertaining their profits in different portions of the Union. I am sorry that the deposit law did not require the deposit banks to return to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of their dividends. From all the information which I have received, they have been enormous. The Senator from Georgia (Mr. KING) has informed us that the banks in the city where he resides (Augusta) have divided, during the last year, at the rate of fifty per cent. per annum.

When a bank fails, what classes of society are most likely to suffer from the explosion? Who do you suppose, Mr. President, held the notes of the hundred and sixty-five banks that proved insolvent between 1811 and 1830? Not the shrewd man of business, not the keen speculator; because they snuff the danger from afar. It was the honest and industrious classes of society, who are without suspicion, and whose pursuits in life do not render them familiar with the secret history of banking.

We are now just experiencing another great evil which has resulted from the extravagant loans and issues, and consequent suspension of specie payments by the banks. The country is now deluged with small notes, vulgarly called shin plasters. They are of every form and every denomination between five cents and five dollars; and they are issued by every individual and every corporation who think proper. It is impossible for the poor man to say he will not take them; for there is scarcely any silver change in circulation anywhere. He must receive them for his labor, or starve.

The paper on which these small notes are printed is often so bad, and they are so inartificially got up, that it is almost impossible to distinguish between the counterfeit and the genuine. To counterfeit them has become a regular business, and it has been carried to a great extent.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

Our currency below five dollars now consists of this combined mass of genuine and counterfeit shin plasters; and many of the counterfeits are intrinsically of equal value with the genuine. Some are payable in one medium and some in another. Some on demand, and others have years to run before they reach maturity. The very moment the banks resume specie payments, this mass of illegal and worthless currency will be rendered entirely useless. It will fall dead in the hands of its holders, and these will be chiefly the very men who are least able to bear the loss. A scene of confusion and distress will then be presented which I need not describe. Such is one of the effects of extravagant banking.

There is a class of society for whom I have ever felt a deep interest, whose attention I should gladly awaken to the evils of an excessive issue of paper currency—I mean our domestic manufacturers. Do they not perceive that all the protection which our laws afford them is rendered almost entirely useless by the extravagant amount of bank notes now in circulation?

It has been stated in general terms, by those who best understand the subject of political economy, that if you double the amount of the circulating medium of a country, you thereby double the nominal price of every article. "If, when the circulating medium is fifty millions, an article should cost one dollar, it would cost two, if, without any increase of the uses of a circulating medium, the quantity should be increased to a hundred millions." Although we cannot apply strict arithmetical rules to this subject, yet all will admit that the proposition is substantially correct. Let us then suppose that our currency has reached such a point of depreciation, when compared with that of our rivals in foreign countries, that an article which could be manufactured abroad for one dollar, would cost one dollar and fifty cents at home; and what is the consequence? A premium of fifty per cent. is thus, in effect, given to foreign manufactures over those of domestic origin. For example: A piece of broadcloth costs one hundred dollars to the French manufacturer; he brings it here for sale; and, on account of the depreciation in our currency, he receives for it one hundred and fifty dollars; what advantage does he thus obtain? Being the citizen of a foreign country, he will not accept our bank notes in payment. He will take nothing home except gold and silver, or a bill of exchange, which is equivalent. He does not expend this money here, where he would be compelled to support his family, and to purchase his labor and materials, at the same rate of prices which the domestic manufacturer is compelled to pay. The depreciation in our currency below the standard of that of France or England is, therefore, equivalent to a proportionate direct protection to the foreign over the domestic manufacturer. The conclusion is inevitable. It cannot be denied. It is impossible that our manufacturers should long be able to sustain such an unequal competition. They, above all men, ought to exert their great influence for the purpose of confining the paper currency of our country within some reasonable limits. The fate of the great interest in which they have embarked depends upon it.

Our farmers in the grain-growing States are placed in a similar situation. The amount of our currency must be diminished, or foreign wheat will continue to be imported for domestic consumption. The farmer in the north of Germany will be able to undersell us in our own markets.

The banks, by their refusal to pay specie, have now placed themselves in the power of the State Governments. They have forfeited their charters, and it now remains for the different Legislatures to decide upon what terms they shall be restored. Amidst the general misfortunes of the country, it is one source of consolation that the banks have placed themselves within the power of the people. Had they not done this by their own conduct, we know that a numerous and powerful party exists in this country who consider a charter of incorporation so sacred that no State Legislature, by any future law, could ever restrict their own banks from issuing notes under ten dollars, if their charter authorized them to issue notes of a less denomination. According to the doctrines of this party, all power over the paper circulation of the country, which is one of the highest attributes of sovereignty belonging to the States, has, by them, been irrevocably transferred to eight hundred banks. Thank Heaven! every difficulty on that subject is now removed; and it will depend upon the wisdom and firmness of these Legislatures, whether we shall have a sound paper currency in time to come, proportioned in amount to the wants of the people, and placing the banks themselves in a secure condition; or whether we shall again be overwhelmed with a deluge of paper money and all its attendant evils. If they will but secure a specie basis for our paper circulation, by prohibiting the issue of bank notes, at first under ten dollars, and afterwards under twenty; if they will render the stockholders of banks personally responsible, at least for the amount of notes which they may issue; if they will limit the dividends of the banks to a reasonable profit on the investment of the stockholders; if they will require the banks to keep a just proportion of specie in their vaults compared with their circulation and deposits; and, above all, if they will adjust the whole amount of bank notes to be issued to the wants of the people, upon principles which have been sanctioned by experience, so as to prevent ruinous fluctuations in the amount of our currency—then, indeed, the evils which we have suffered will be compensated by the benefits we are destined to enjoy. But I confess I dread the result. We are a strange people. The lessons of experience make but a feeble impression on our minds. We rise with so much buoyancy from our misfortunes, that when they have passed away they are instantly forgotten. Should the banks resume specie payments before or shortly after the next meeting of our State Legislatures, and the current begin to run smoothly again, I fear that no such changes will be made in the existing bank charters, and that we must await the event of another crisis, which would then be inevitable.

Until these or some such restrictions shall have been imposed by the States on their banks, they never can, they never will, become secure depositories for the revenues of the Government.

In the third place, the union, which is now dissolved, between the banks and the Treasury, ought not to be restored; because the public deposits would again become the fruitful source of over-issues and extravagant speculation. We have no power to regulate the State banks; but we can withhold from them our revenue, and thus prevent them from using our means for the purpose of deranging the business of society. If we cannot eradicate, we are not bound to aggravate the radical sin of their constitution. If we cannot prevent, we need not become accomplices in their misconduct. But I have already incidentally said so much in the course of my remarks on this branch of the subject, that I need not trouble the Senate with any further observations.

In the fourth place the divorce now subsisting between the Treasury and the banks ought to be rendered perpetual, because of their supposed or actual subservency to the Government, and the dangerous influence which might be exerted over them by the Executive.

I am not one of those who believe that, hitherto, any attempt has been made to exert such an influence; yet every effort has been used by a portion of the press to produce such an impression. These institutions have been denounced as "the pet banks" of the Government, and they have been charged with granting peculiar favors to the minions of Executive power. True or false, this charge has produced some effect on the public mind. Besides, all the transactions of the Secretary of the Treasury with these banks, rendered necessary by existing laws, have been denounced as tampering with the currency. And thus the administration is always blamed for every disaster which occurs in the money market. A connection with these banks is thus made to assume a political character, and is mixed up with all the party strife of the day. The public mind is inflamed upon the subject, and the public suspicion is excited. This is an evil which can only be avoided by a permanent divorce between bank and State.

But again: If a Secretary of the Treasury were disposed to exert an improper influence over these banks, with what prodigious effect might they not be used to accomplish his purposes. At the time of the suspension of specie payments there were eighty-six deposit banks planted throughout our country. The letters which were read the other day by the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) prove how low some of the State banks were willing to cringe in order to obtain the deposits. Their language is unworthy of the proud bearing which ought to characterize American freemen. It proves at least, that some of them are not very scrupulous, when "thrift will follow fawning." Such was the anxiety to obtain a portion of this boon, that two of the most respectable banks of the city of Philadelphia procured resolutions to be passed in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, recommending them to the Secretary of the Treasury as depositories of the public money; and these resolutions were sent to my colleague and myself, with a request that we might exert our influence to accomplish this purpose. Eighty-six affiliated banks, scattered over every State, and intent upon a common object, could exert an immense political power. An ambitious and able Secretary of the Treasury might use them with prodigious effect in order to make himself President. And this could be done with the greater effect because it would escape detection. The agent of the banks at Washington city might be used as the instrument, and all the necessary measures might be adopted in the secret parlors of the bank directors throughout the country. A concerted movement might thus be made in every portion of the Union at the same moment, which would almost be irresistible.

I do not know but that such a league of associated banks might be rendered more dangerous than even a bank of the United States. This bank would have its rights and its duties defined by law. It could claim the Government deposits, and that its notes should be received in payment of the Government dues, under the provisions of its charter. But the selection of these depositories, the amount of the public money which they shall receive, how long they shall retain it, in what manner they shall conduct their banks, all, all is left to Executive discretion. What a boundless field for Executive patronage! And yet the administration which anxiously desires to surrender this fruitful source of political power, has been charged with designs of extending Executive patronage? And for what reason? Simply because it proposes that the existing officers of the Government, without adding one to their number, should be substituted as the depositories of the public money instead of these banks. Even if it should become necessary to appoint some ten or twenty additional officers at the most important points to perform this duty, I would not compare this increase of Executive patronage with that which the Executive Government is now voluntarily willing to abandon. It would be but as a drop compared with the ocean. Talk not, then, to me of the increase of patronage which the bill upon your table would confer on the Executive. They form a very unjust estimate of the intelligence of our citizens who would attempt to make them believe that a few Executive officers, known to be such to all the surrounding community, can exercise an influence over the people at all to be compared with that of a league of eighty-six banking institutions.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

This now brings me to the bill upon your table. This bill is the only remaining plan to which we can resort. It recommends itself to public approbation by the simplicity of its provisions. The existing officers of Government already collect and disburse our revenues. It merely superadds to these duties, that of safely keeping and transferring the public money, according to the exigencies of the Government, during the time which must necessarily intervene between its receipt and disbursement. This is the whole bill. If it be justly liable to any criticism, it is that the security of the public money might require the appointment of a very few additional officers in our large commercial cities. It has, perhaps, been framed more exclusively with a view to economy, than is consistent with the public interest. The object is a great and important one, and no moderate additional expense ought to be spared which may be necessary for its accomplishment. Such is the bill.

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has proposed an amendment to this bill, prescribing the funds which shall be received in payment of the public dues. And here permit me to observe, that, in discussing that amendment, I shall not inquire whether the Senator has come over to us, or we have gone over to the Senator. This is a question of but small moment, so that we are now together. The first extended effort which I ever made in Congress was in defence of the conduct of that Senator, when I thought he had been unjustly assailed as Secretary of War. We stood together shoulder to shoulder in 1827, and throughout the trying conflict which resulted in the election of General Jackson. I rejoice that he is now found sustaining the leading recommendation of the Message at this important crisis, and I trust that on future occasions we may receive his able and efficient support.

With all these feelings of distinguished respect for the Senator, I am still sorry that he has offered his amendment. I should have been glad if the vote of the Senate could have been taken upon the simple proposition to divorce bank and State. On this single question we should have, I think, presented a more united front than when it shall be connected with the Senator's amendment. It would have been better first to have established the divorce, and afterwards to have determined, by a separate bill, the nature of the funds which our depositories shall receive.

For my own part, as to the funds receivable, I feel strongly inclined to support the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. In page 23 of his report, when speaking on this subject, he says:

"This could be effected by directing what alone appears safe, and what is understood to be the practice in both England and France. It is, that the bills of no local banks be taken, which shall not, from the near location of the bank, be equivalent to specie; be able to be converted into specie at very short periods by the receivers and collectors, so as to pay the public creditors legally, if demanding specie; and be thus accounted for at par, and without expense to the Government. Another advantage from this course would be its salutary check on over-issues by the neighboring banks."

If the depositories were authorized to receive and disburse the notes of such banks, calling upon them at short intervals to settle the balances in specie, it might, I think, have promoted the convenience of the public, as well as afforded a salutary check upon the issues of the surrounding banking institutions. I understand such was the course pursued by the late Bank of the United States. I was willing to proceed cautiously, and not, at the first, go the length of demanding exclusive specie payments.

But the Senator from South Carolina has thought differently, and I shall be compelled to vote for or against his amendment. Giving every consideration its proper weight, I have, since he has agreed to modify it, determined to yield it my support. As it now stands, the notes of specie-paying banks will be receivable in the payment of all the public dues up till the last day of the year 1838; during the year 1839, one-fourth will be required in specie; during the year 1840, one-half; during the year 1841, three-fourths; and not until the year 1842 shall we reach the point of exclusive specie payments. Its operation will be slow and gradual; and if, in the mean time, we should discover, at any stage of its progress, that it is too severe, we can easily change the law.

Mr. PRESTON said: Mr. President, I deprecate this mad and ferocious warfare against any of the institutions of the country, against the United States Bank formerly, against the State banks now. It does not appear to me that this root and branch policy, this tearing up things established, to supply their places with new theories, however neatly constructed, or carefully elaborated, is the part of prudence and wisdom. My nature and habits of thought, confirmed by the terrible experience of the last four years, make me a conservative. I hesitate at every proposition to destroy, that you may build again. If any of our institutions have suffered damage, let us repair them; if any portion of the vast edifice of our prosperity has been injured, let us with a cautious and reverend hand restore what has been lost, strengthen what remains, adjust the proportions, if you choose, proceeding in all with a sedate and steady purpose of not weakening the deep foundations. Let us not, sir, with a fantastic caprice tear down the solid, and let me say glorious fabric of our prosperity, that we may try, by as futile a device as the lamp of Aladdin, to build up another in one night, of fairy marble, and gold, and gems.

It is the part of statesmen to deal with the circumstances around them. In the closet of a philosopher, in the desk of a professor, speculation may discuss what is best, and genius indulge its aspirations for the "chief good;" but the practical politician is fenced around by inexorable necessities. He has to deal with things, not with ideas. He must control, not create. He must govern himself by the circumstances amidst which he finds himself, use the instruments that are presented to him, and be content with such results as he can attain, without attempting such as he can imagine. The genius and temper of Napoleon might aspire to a different destiny; but ours, thank God, is humbler and safer. We administer a limited Government, for free and self-willed States, whose bidding and whose business we are to do. They have placed us their servants in the midst of a great banking system; a system of credit, surrounding, pervading and penetrating the whole body politic.

Mr. President, we must conform to our condition, we must work upon the platform prepared for us, we must use the materials furnished to our hands. It is in vain to try to extricate ourselves from the condition of our existence. We have not the strength (God forbid that we should have it!) to disconnect ourselves from the circumstances in which the States place us. And if we attempt to tear ourselves loose from them, there may be much suffering, a struggle, an agony—but you will have at length to come back to your allegiance, and content yourself with reform instead of revolution. Let us, then, wisely and at once, begin to correct, control, regulate, modify, adjust, do any thing but destroy.

SATURDAY, September 30.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate took up the sub-Treasury bill, with Mr. CALHOUN's amendment.

Mr. BROWN said, in rising to address the Senate, after the very able and luminous investigation which the subject then before them had undergone, he did so from no vain expectation that he should be able, by any thing he might say, to impart any new interest to the debate, which had been listened to so attentively, or to add any thing of force to the argument by which it had been sustained. The acknowledged importance of the question they were called on to decide, the powerful influence it would exert on the future destinies of the country, either for good or evil, and the deep interest felt in relation to it by the citizens of the State which he in part represented, would, he trusted, excuse him for presenting some of the leading considerations which would govern his course on that occasion.

Mr. B. would present some of the principal considerations which had induced him to give the bill then before them, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) his cordial sanction and support. The same considerations of wisdom and of common prudence, which would induce an individual to change an agent in whom he had reposed a trust, and who had proved unfaithful or incompetent, should admonish us, in our public capacity, to withdraw our confidence from those fiscal agents of the Government, who had so signally failed in performing the duties undertaken by them. The State banks had been tried as fiscal agents of the Government, under circumstances the most favorable to success. The nation had seen, with astonishment, in a period of profound peace, with no public debt burdening our resources, and with a Treasury abounding in means beyond all former example, the Government of the United States suddenly deprived of the means to carry on its ordinary operations, by the determination of the banks having possession of its revenues to suspend specie payments. Was it the part of wisdom, under such circumstances, to renew the connection between the Government and the banks? Was it proper for those entrusted with the duty of conducting public affairs, again to subject the Government to the recurrence of the same evil, with perhaps still more aggravated injury?

For one, he wished to see the Federal Government taken out of the keeping of irresponsible banking corporations and subject to be controlled alone by the will of the people, its only legitimate masters. So long as banks were made the depositories of the public revenue, the Government was dependent on them in conducting its most important operations, either in peace or war. Its action might be arrested by their withholding its means in periods of the greatest public emergency. It could not in war command a squadron to sail, or put a battalion in motion, if the banks entrusted with its revenue should determine to withhold it. Its very existence might be endangered by being brought to a pause for the want of means. The reflection was humiliating, that a Government, which was noble in the republican simplicity of its structure, and destined to solve the problem of the capacity of man to govern himself, should be made to depend on the will of banking corporations for so important an element of its success as the certain command of its revenue. In placing it, in this way, at their mercy, it was exposed in its financial affairs to all the evil influences which they might exert, whether arising from caprice, political hostility, or the vicissitudes of trade. Nor was this exhibiting the danger arising from this system in its true extent. It could be demonstrated that the banks of any single one of the large commercial cities, in a period of overtrading, would have it entirely in their power, by suspending specie payments, to compel a general suspension of all the banks throughout the United States; and, by doing so, arrest the regular operations of the Government! The banks of a single city in one of the Eastern States, at a very gloomy period of the last war, availing themselves of the balances which had accumulated in their favor, in the course of trade, against the large commercial cities of the Middle States, had, by a demand on them for payment in specie, caused a suspension by the banks throughout the United States! This movement struck a blow at the Government, which had well nigh proved fatal to the success of all its operations in the great contest in which it was then engaged. That it was, in a great degree, the result of hostility to the cause in which the country had embarked, was then extensively believed, nor has that impression to this day been removed.

The State banks are, from the course of commercial transactions, so intimately and closely connected together, that what affects any portion of them in any one of the principal cities, is, to a greater or less extent, felt by all. The stoppage of the banks at either of the great commercial points, almost with the quickness of electricity, is felt by all and is followed by all throughout the country, as a measure of self-protection. If this was proven to have been the case by the occurrence of that kind which took place in the last war, the circumstances of the country which now exist, are still more peculiarly calculated to produce such a result. The great increase in our internal trade, as well as foreign commerce, and the rapidity of communication now existing between the remotest points of our country, had produced a still closer connection and sympathy between the banks than formerly existed, and doubly subjected all to the danger of being affected by causes operating on a few at a single great commercial point.

He had shown the great uncertainty and danger which the Government, by depositing its revenue with the banks, would be continually liable to, in its financial affairs. He had shown that these results might be brought about by the determination of the banks, at a single leading commercial city. Was it the dictate of wisdom thus to place this already great and rapidly growing republic under the control of a few great commercial cities, in a matter so materially involving its success, as well as its very being? Was it sound policy in that way to expose its financial action to the deleterious influence of the national Bank of England, and the great moneyed power of that country? Much the larger portion of the foreign commerce carried on by our great cities, was with England. He was informed that even a very large portion of the trade carried on by American merchants with other foreign countries, was conducted by means of credit obtained through the great banking houses in that country.

It was the misfortune of our great cities, if it was to be regarded as such, almost continually to stand indebted to England in a very large amount. Whenever our merchants overtraded with her to any considerable extent, her national bank could, if she chose it, produce a pressure through them on our city banks, and produce the hazard of their stopping specie payments. Her powerful agency to accomplish such a catastrophe may be seen in the suspension of specie payments by all our banks, which has lately occurred in this country. The first movement which led to that unfortunate result was that made by that bank, by which she compelled the great banking houses of England, connected with the American trade, to discredit American merchants. Indebted to England as they were in a sum estimated at about thirty millions, and unable longer to draw bills to meet their payments on her banking houses, which had before given them almost unlimited credit, they were driven to the only other expedient left them of making remittances in specie, the demand for which compelled the banks first in our great commercial emporium to close their vaults.

Nor would a national bank have shared a different fate, if one had been in existence, under the same overwhelming causes. It would, no doubt, have been forced, under the great and extraordinary pressure for specie, to have yielded to the storm. To reunite the Government with the banks, would be, therefore, to subject it, in a period of overtrading, to the dangerous influence of the great moneyed power of England, operating at such a time, first on our merchants engaged in foreign trade, next on the banks, and, through them, on the finances of the Government. If its independence was to be preserved—if its regular constitutional action was to be kept up, impelled alone by the vigor of the public will—then the separation of its financial interests from the banks entirely was a measure indispensable. That alone could secure to the people, in its administration, those great and important ends in a republican form of Government to which he had alluded, and free it from the extraneous influences which threatened such serious mischief.

He had noticed some weeks previous to the banks having stopped specie payments, the simultaneous movements of certain presses devoted to the interests of the Bank of the United States, tending to produce that result. They predicted that the banks would stop, and some of them zealously urged them to that course. He did not positively know that it was their design through the instrumentality of a panic, to bring about that result, to which their labors had powerfully tended for so long a time; but the time, the manner, and the circumstances, all went strongly to favor that supposition. The time selected for this movement, when mercantile failures were daily occurring, was of all others the most favorable to produce distrust and alarm in the public mind, as to the solvency of the banks, and, consequently, to cause a general demand on them for specie, by depositors, and those who held their notes. The manner of the attack, by commencing it about the same time at three or four important points, distant from each other, showed it to be, if not a matter of concert, at any rate a singular coincidence. The circumstances under which it was made, were exceedingly well calculated to produce the political effect doubtless ardently desired by those engaged in the crusade against the administration. Very many of our citizens were involved in heavy pecuniary embarrassments, the fruits of the wildest speculation. The States—many of them in the anticipation of receiving their proportion of the surplus revenue—had embarked in expensive plans of improvement; and the whole of the public revenue belonging to the General Government was deposited in the banks, thus liable to be affected. In this state of things, it was no doubt imagined by many of those who are desperately determined on producing a political revolution, that to stop the banks was to pull down the administration. It was a blow which, by the sufferings it inflicted, was to awaken the slumbering community to the merits of a national bank. It would disappoint the States in their expectations of receiving the surplus revenue. Finally, that it would stop the wheels of Government, and afford the enemies of those in power the opportunity of exultingly pointing to its bankruptcy, and proclaiming the mismanagement of its revenues. He regarded the great body of those in opposition as honest and patriotic citizens, and was far from believing that they were prompted by such motives as he had alluded to; but, at the same time, he felt regret at being compelled to express the belief, forced on him by the circumstances he had described, that there were some to be found among them ready to compass their objects at the expense of the prosperity and best interests of their country.

It would not, he thought, be doubted, on a candid review of the history of the last three or four years, that the connection between the Government and the banks had invited and been made the cause of the harassing warfare which, to subserve party purposes, had been, in that space of time, almost constantly kept up against the deposit banks, and, consequently, affecting to a great extent the interests and business of the country. The streams of the money circulation never can run clear or smooth while they are liable to be muddled and lashed into impetuous violence by being mingled with political excitement. The country will be perpetually liable to experience inundations at one time in its circulation, and at another to suffer sudden reactions. The true remedy is, then, to remove the cause by severing the connection between the Government and the banks. By doing this, many of the most powerful motives to produce agitation on this most delicate and sensitive question will be effectually removed.

The President, in recommending a severance of the connection between the Government and the banks, had assumed an attitude of dignified firmness and moral elevation worthy the character of the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It carried out the doctrine into practice, that simplicity in the administration of a Government founded on the will of the people, while it is the readiest means of perpetuating its principles, is the surest way of securing their esteem and approbation. It voluntarily proposed to relinquish whatever of power and influence might be derived to the Executive branch of the Government from a connection with moneyed institutions, and, in doing so, would leave it to repose on the wisdom of its policy, and the merits of its measures, for public support.

Mr. B., in conclusion, said it was now very apparent that the decision of Congress would be ultimately narrowed down to a choice between the plan of fiscal agency then proposed, and the establishment of a national bank. The State banks had, on a fair trial, proved themselves incapable of fulfilling the duties of such a trust, and if again resorted to, would, in all probability, sooner or later, present a repetition of the difficulties in which they had recently involved the Government and the country. To the creation of a national bank, in any form, he had objections of an insuperable character. The argument made by gentlemen who had preceded him in debate, against its constitutionality, was unanswered and unanswerable. The objections to it, as a measure of expediency, were equally strong and decisive. The remedy which it would afford would be worse than the disease, which its friends professed its capacity to relieve. Besides its tendency to produce pecuniary distress for some time before it could go into operation, if established under the pressure of the present pretended necessity, it would be fixed on the country, notwithstanding any abuses it might commit, for ages to come. The argument would be constantly and readily used by its advocates, that it must be continued, or the prosperity of the country ruined.

Renewal of Revenue Bonds.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill to regulate the fees of District Attorneys for the renewal of custom-house bonds. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

This bill fixes the fees at five dollars for each renewal.

MONDAY, October 2.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The sub-Treasury bill being resumed, Mr. BAYARD, of Delaware, addressed the Senate.

Mr. President: The bill now before us proposes three measures: the first of which is, to dissolve all connection with the banks; sec-only, to substitute the agency of certain officers, thirteen or fourteen thousand in number, for that of the banks in keeping the revenues of the Government; and, thirdly, to receive, after a certain period, nothing but gold and silver coin in payment of Government dues. The objects which are said to be contemplated as the results of these measures are, first, to secure the Government against loss in the keeping of its treasure; and, secondly, to provide a currency of gold and silver coin, which is declared to be the constitutional currency. The measures themselves have nothing to recommend them beyond their supposed tendency to accomplish these objects. Before proceeding, however, to the discussion of these matters, it is necessary to have a just and precise conception of the objects, the accomplishment of which is said to be contemplated.

The first, which respects the fact of security against loss in keeping the public treasure, is easily understood, but the other, the favorite object, of providing a currency of gold and silver coin, requires some explanation. It has been supposed, sir, and I confess I entertained the same opinion, that some of those who advocate these measures were bent on procuring a purely metallic currency for the country, to the exclusion of all paper; while others were aiming only at a larger infusion of the precious metals into the circulating medium, being perfectly satisfied that a considerable part of it should still consist of convertible paper. I am convinced, however, from a closer attention to what has heretofore passed on this subject, that the views of all of us are directed merely to the enlargement of the metallic portion of the currency, by changing the ratio of the mixture of paper and coin, as it existed before the suspension of specie payments. The case is not, therefore, rightly presented by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) when he states it to be a contest between opposite systems of paper and coin; but, in fact, whatever difference of opinion exists in relation to the currency is merely as to the relative proportions in which paper and coin should compose it.

No one, at least to my knowledge, Mr. President, has professed to countenance, much less to recommend, an inconvertible paper medium, except, indeed, the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who seems to think that a Government paper is the only safe one. I shall proceed, therefore, to show what are the different views entertained on this subject, and the probable effect which the different propositions heretofore made for the suppression of notes of a low denomination would have upon the currency. The Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) who has taken the lead upon this subject of metallic currency, may very fairly be taken as the exponent of the views of those who are most partial to the precious metals. His proposition is to suppress all notes under one hundred dollars, as appears from the speech delivered by him on the 27th January, 1837, on the resolution to rescind the Treasury order, in which he cites his speech on the subject of the District banks in the preceding session, as containing his views on the subject. The following is an extract from that speech:

"Mr. Benton said that the proposed limit of twenty dollars for the minimum size of bank notes was not an arbitrary assumption or a fanciful designation; but was a limit ascertained by experience and proven by results to be the lowest that would suffice to accomplish the ends intended: these ends are, 1st. To re-establish the gold currency. 2d. To make gold and silver the common currency for all the small dealing of the country. 3d. To extend and enlarge the specie basis of the paper circulation. 4th. To save the laboring and small dealing part of the community from the effects of contractions and expansions from bank issues. 5th. To save them from the impositions of counterfeiters, from losses when banks fail, and from bearing the whole burden of the wear and tear of small notes. 6th. To save hard money enough in the country to make it safe to have such paper currency as commerce and large dealings may require. These are the objects to be accomplished, and less than $20 will have no adequate effect. Far better would the limit be of $100, as it is nearly in France, and where that limit ensures a circulation of nine-tenths gold and silver and one-tenth paper."

It thus appears, Mr. President, that the most zealous advocates of a hard-money currency do not contend for the entire expulsion of paper, but desire a larger infusion of precious metals into the circulating medium. We are all agreed as to the odious and unconstitutional character of a mere paper currency, for a mixed currency of coin and convertible paper cannot be denominated a paper currency. The different views, then, which are entertained as to the ratio of this mixture of paper and coin in the circulating medium, may be reduced to three classes: first, of those who, with the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) are in favor of a suppression of all bank notes under $100; secondly, of those who, with the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) are in favor of a suppression of all notes under $20; and, thirdly, of those who are of opinion that the suppression of all notes under $10 will be sufficient to ensure a due proportion of coin in the circulation. Before proceeding to my argument, I think it important to the perfect comprehension of the matter, that we should first settle, as nearly as practicable, the effect which would be produced upon the actual currency of the country by the adoption of either of the above suggestions. Fortunately, sir, we are not without the means of doing so. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the condition of the State banks, made at the last session of Congress, in that part of it which relates to the banks in the State of New York, furnishes some data for that purpose. I take the instance of the New York currency, because it is the only one, the component parts of which are stated, and I presume that those facts which are found to be true in relation to the paper part of that currency, will be found to be nearly so in relation to the paper part of the currency of the whole country, although it is very probable that a difference, more or less considerable, may be found to exist in the currency of some particular States. But, so far as my argument is concerned, it is of no consequence whether the statement be precisely accurate or not; the object being to give some definite idea of the practical effect of those views. In that report the entire paper currency, on the 1st of January, 1836, of the State of New York, is stated to be $21,123,089, which, with the sum of $4,000,000, the probable amount of coin in circulation, would make the entire currency of paper and coin about $25,000,000. It appears from that report, that the whole number of bank notes in circulation of the denomination of $100 and upwards, amounted to $5,230,200, which is about one-fifth of the whole currency; that the whole number of notes in circulation of the denomination of $20 and upwards, amounted to the sum of nearly $8,000,000, or about one-third of the whole currency; and that the whole number of notes in circulation of the denomination of $10 and upwards, amounted to the sum of $12,265,765, or about one-half of the entire currency. It will follow, then, that to suppress all notes under $100 would give four parts of coin, and one of paper, of the whole currency; while the suppression of all notes under $20 would give two parts of coin and one of paper, and the suppression of all notes under $10 would give a currency one-half of coin, and the other of paper.

It is of no consequence to my argument whether these ratios be exactly correct: it is sufficient if they be an approximation to the truth. Let us then apply them to the whole currency of the United States, and observe the result.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report on the state of the finances, made at the commencement of the last session of Congress, estimated the entire currency of the United States on the 1st of December, 1836, to be $148,000,000, of which $120,000,000 were paper, and $28,000,000 coin. As it is necessary to take some specific amount for the purpose of calculation, we will take that to be the actual amount of the entire currency of the country. The effect upon that currency, of the proposition to suppress all notes under $100, would, from the analogy of the New York currency, be, to give us $118,400,000 of coin, and $29,600,000 of paper, as the relative proportions. The proposition to suppress all notes under $20 would give nearly $99,000,000 of coin, and $49,000,000 of paper; while that to suppress all notes under $10 would give $74,000,000 of coin, and $74,000,000 of paper. This view of the matter is entirely distinct from the question of how much coin it is proper for the banks to keep in their vaults as the basis of their paper circulation; and which experience would seem to indicate to be about one-third.

Now, sir, I propose to show that, whether the object be to increase the ratio of the mixture of coin in the whole circulation as it existed on the 1st of December last, or to provide an exclusive metallic currency, the means now proposed by the bill before us will not only not promote that object, but defeat it altogether. To do this, it is only necessary to advert to a few simple principles, which are established laws of currency. The purpose of a currency being to effect the aggregate payments of the nation, a given amount in value, less than the amount of those payments, but having a proportionate relation to them, is necessary for that purpose. It is also true that gold and silver are the standards of value over the whole world, and are, at the same time, objects of commerce and materials of currency. From these facts results a law of mixed currency, that paper will expel the coin unless it be restrained in its numerical amount and denomination. Of this fact abundant evidence may be found in the history of every civilized nation. But, sir, I will not trouble the Senate by referring to the elementary writers as authorities upon that point. I shall content myself with authorities nearer home. I mean to forage in the enemy's country; and I will cite one, which I presume will be satisfactory, not only to the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) but to those also who are most zealous on the subject of the gold and silver coin, being no other than the speech of that Senator upon the District banks, delivered in the session of 1835-'6, to which I have before referred, and from which I now read the following extract:

"The great evils of a small paper currency are: 1. To banish gold and silver; 2. To encourage counterfeiting; 3. To destroy the standard of values; 4. To throw the burdens and the evils of the paper system upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community. The instinct of banks to sink their circulation to the lowest denomination of notes which can be forced upon the community is a trait in the system universally proved to exist wherever banks of circulation have been permitted to give a currency to a country, and the effect of that instinct has always been to banish gold and silver. When the Bank of England was chartered, in the year 1694, it could issue no note less than £100 sterling; that amount was gradually reduced by the persevering efforts of the bank to £50; then to £20; then to £15; then to £10; and at last to £5; and, finally, to £2 and £1. Those denominations were not reached until the year 1797, or until one hundred and three years after the institution of the bank; and, as the several reductions in the size of the notes, and the consequent increase of paper currency took place, gold became more and more scarce, and, with the issue of £1 and £2 notes, it totally disappeared from the country. This effect was foretold by all political economists, and especially by Mr. Burke, then aged and retired from public life, who wrote from his retreat to Mr. Canning, to say to Mr. Pitt, the Prime Minister, these prophetic words: 'If this bill for the £1 and £2 notes is permitted to pass, we shall never see another guinea in England.' The bill did pass, and the prediction was fulfilled; for not another guinea, half guinea, or sovereign was seen in England for circulation, until the bill was repealed two-and-twenty years afterwards."

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The report of the New York bank commissioners, made on the 23d of January, 1836, is to the same effect, showing that the practical experience of our own country corresponds with that of England. The commissioners say:

"The measures adopted at the last session of the Legislature for the suppression of the small bank notes have, so far as they have yet gone into operation, occasioned as little inconvenience as was to have been expected. The effects of the change were not sensibly felt until about the 1st of September, and, since that time, a large amount of specie has been put into circulation, which will be very much increased after the issues of the three dollar notes shall have ceased. Our Canadian neighbors, however, circulate a very large amount of small bank notes, which are taken as freely on the adjoining frontier of the State as our own notes or specie. In a considerable portion of St. Lawrence county, where the intercourse of the inhabitants is chiefly with Canada, the law is entirely disregarded. It is more or less so in the counties bordering upon Vermont, in the extreme western counties, and in the city of New York. It will be found impossible, we apprehend, to enforce the law effectually so long as the small notes are issued by the banks of the adjoining States."

There can, therefore, I think, sir, be no doubt upon this point, that it is the inflexible law of a mixed currency of paper and coin, that the cheaper material supplants the more costly one, and that the only mode by which you can secure a proper admixture of coin is by the suppression of the small notes. I am thus particular as to this practical truth, because upon it is based the whole structure of my argument. I have before stated that the whole currency of the country is assumed to be what it was on the 1st of December last, as appears from the Secretary's report, $148,000,000, of which $28,000,000 was coin and $120,000,000 bank notes. The Government furnishes the coin—the banks furnish the paper part of the currency. We are all agreed that, to constitute a sound currency, there should be a larger admixture of the precious metals. Those who are in favor of the suppression of notes under $10 wish, as I have shown, to raise the amount of coin in circulation from $28,000,000 to $74,000,000; those in favor of the suppression of notes under $20, to raise the amount of coin to $99,000,000; and the Senator from Missouri, and those who think with him that all notes under $100 should be suppressed, wish to raise that amount to $118,000,000. And yet, sir, what means do they now propose to take in order to accomplish this purpose? Why, sir, to separate the Government from the banks! To divorce the Government from the banks! To leave the banks to themselves! The Senator says they have fallen into the sea, and he will not assist to angle them out! And this, too, after we have been told by the Senator himself, and the proposition is undoubtedly true, "that the instinct of banks to sink their circulation to the lowest denomination of notes which can be forced upon the community, is a trait in the system—and the effect of that instinct has always been to banish gold and silver." No, sir, you cannot leave the banks to themselves; you cannot divorce the Government from them! You must watch over and regulate them, if you mean to accomplish the object which you profess to have in view, namely, the improvement of the currency.

But it is said that, by requiring payments to the Government to be made in coin, you will compel its circulation. Well, sir, to what extent do you compel that circulation? To the extent only of the amount that is absolutely necessary to effect those payments. The President tells us in his Message that the amount of coin which would be necessary for that purpose is about $10,000,000. Then, I say, in the event of the non-resumption of specie payments by the banks, your currency would consist of $138,000,000 of paper, and, what is worse, of inconvertible paper, without a limit to its extension; and of $10,000,000 of coin, and that coin would be confined to the channel of Government receipts and Government payments. The currency would submit to the force you put upon it, just to the extent of that force, and no further. Your action would resemble in its effect a proviso to a general law, which is a restraint only to the extent of the proviso; and your coin would circulate only in the channel which you had dug out for it. If, on the other hand, the banks should resume specie payments, and the currency should be again composed, as it was on the first of December last, of $28,000,000 of coin and $120,000,000 of paper, then, I say, sir, that, as there would be specie more than enough, in circulation, to answer the payments of the Government, the measure of demanding payment in coin would have no tendency whatever to increase the amount. The reason of all this is apparent, and is to be found in the fact which I have stated, that paper will banish coin from circulation unless restrained, and will always do so up to the point of that restraint.

But it is not necessary to resort to any speculative reasoning in proof of these positions. You have now, sir, in the present state of things, the most positive proof of their truth. Does not the Government at this moment demand payment of its dues, of its duties, its postages, and its sales of public lands, in coin? And yet does that coin enter into the general circulation? Is it not confided entirely to Government debtors and Government creditors, to those who consume the revenues and those who pay them? I say, then, sir, that the result of your measure is this, and this only, to secure coin as the currency for the Government, and leave paper as the currency of the people. It is no unusual thing, Mr. President, to see those at the head of the Government profess one thing and do another.

I come now to the consideration of my second proposition, which is, that Congress is bound to furnish a sound currency of coin and convertible paper for the people of the United States. To any one read in the history of this country, and in the text of the constitution, it would seem strange that it should be deemed necessary to formally propound such a proposition, much more so to prove it. But the peculiar tone of the Message, and the doctrines of some of the supporters of the administration on this floor, would lead one to suppose that the constitution had been formed, and the Government created, for no other purpose than to take care of itself. Is it then true, sir, that this Government was created, merely that Martin Van Buren might be President, and enjoy the dignity and emoluments of his office; that you, sir, should be Vice President, and we Senators of the United States, with the privilege of franking our letters and receiving a per diem of eight dollars in gold and silver? Was that the end and purpose of all the anxious deliberation of that band of patriots who assembled in Philadelphia to form the constitution, and of the cession, in that instrument, on the part of the States, of almost all the high attributes of sovereignty? I had hitherto thought the object had been "to promote the general welfare of the people of the United States." I was taught to think that the powers of this Government were trusts for the benefit of the people, and that the end and object of the constitution was to promote their welfare. It seems, however, sir, that those who administer the Government read that instrument differently, and have come to the enlightened, profound, liberal, and statesman-like conclusion, that the Government was created merely for their benefit, and that the people have no part or lot in the field of its operations. Let us, then, examine for a moment the soundness of this opinion, so far at least as the currency is concerned, that being the matter immediately under consideration.

Every one familiar with the history of the revolutionary war, knows that we came out of that conflict with a ruined commerce and a debased currency of inconvertible paper; that the States refused to confer on the old Congress the power to levy duties on imports, and were unable to enjoy the benefit of that indirect mode of taxation themselves. That if New York, for instance, sought to raise a revenue from her commerce, New Jersey interfered and defeated her plans by throwing open her ports. That, in the same manner, the commercial regulations of Pennsylvania were at the mercy of the State of Delaware, and were, in fact, frustrated by the legislation of that State; and so of the other States. In the hopeless imbecility of commercial enterprise which grew out of this condition of things, the people saw the necessity of a General Government, which should have the power to regulate commerce, and provide a uniform and sound currency for the country. The main and immediate inducement for the formation of the present form of Government was the desire to escape from these distresses and embarrassments, which, from their all-pervading character, could only be cured by a National Government. Hence we find that the express power is given in the constitution to regulate commerce, as well as the express power to regulate the standards of value and quantity, which are the legs of commerce.

I shall not, sir, after the luminous and powerful argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) upon this power to regulate commerce, attempt to say any thing in illustration or support of it. I would not be chargeable with attempting "the wasteful and ridiculous excess of adding perfume to the rose, or gilding refined gold," but will content myself with remarking, that one might fairly conclude that as commerce in modern times is no longer carried on by barter, but is conducted, in its minuter details, by means of money; and, in its larger operations, by the commercial currency of bills of exchange and promissory notes, the power to regulate commerce gives the right to regulate the means by which it is conducted. I proceed, therefore, to consider other provisions of the constitution. My proposition is, that Congress is bound to furnish a sound currency of coin and convertible paper for the people of the United States. I say of coin and convertible paper, for I consider the latter as equivalent to coin in the matter of currency. If, therefore, any one should be of opinion that Congress is bound to furnish an entire metallic currency, that opinion does not weaken the strength of my argument, the views which I am about to present being applicable to both positions.

In the first place, the power is given to Congress "to coin money." For what purpose is money to be coined? Not that it may be melted down, and manufactured into plate; not that it may be exported, and pass into foreign mints, to assume some other form, or receive some other impression; nor that it may be hoarded as a matter of curiosity or avarice; but that it may be used for the purpose for which coined money is used, namely, the currency or circulating medium of the country. I say of the country, because, as the power is a trust for the general welfare, its execution must have reference to the end of its existence. In the second place, Congress is authorized to punish the offence "of counterfeiting the current coin of the United States." In the third place, the States are prohibited from coining money. And, in the fourth place, nothing "but gold and silver coin" can be made a tender in payment of debts. As the great business of currency is to pay debts, and Congress has the exclusive power of furnishing the coin, in which alone those debts can be legally paid, it follows that it is their constitutional duty to furnish such currency of coin, or what is equivalent, of convertible paper; for, if they do not furnish it, no other power can; and the whole business of society must be suspended. The purpose of currency is to make the aggregate payments of the country; and its amount in value has reference to the amount of those payments; at the same time, every payment presupposes an antecedent debt, though it exists but for a moment, and it is Congress alone that can furnish the legal means of making those payments.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

What, then, sir, is the consequence of the existence of this power and this constitutional duty as regards the existing condition of the currency of this country, composed, as it is assumed to be, of coin furnished by the Government, and paper furnished by the banks? What, I ask, is the consequence of the existence of that duty on the part of this Government? Why, sir, clearly, the obligation so to regulate the issues of paper by the banks as to ensure its convertibility at all times into coin, and thus to provide a sound currency of coin and convertible paper for the people. If it be the duty of Congress to furnish either a metallic currency, or a mixed currency of coin and convertible paper, which is equivalent to a metallic currency for the purpose of business, then it is bound to guard against whatever may tend to defeat the performance of its duty; and I have already shown that it is the tendency of banks to extend their issues of paper, which has the effect of banishing the coin from circulation. If Congress does not regulate the issues of bank paper, then the banks control the power of Congress over the currency, and involve it in the violation of a constitutional duty. You cannot, then, abandon the banks to themselves without being recreant to that duty. You must watch over them, and regulate their issues of paper, or else they defeat one of the great purposes for which this Government was created. As matters stand at present, you are bound to cause them to return to specie payments, and afterwards by your parental care to guard against another suspension. This duty I have expressed in the phrase "to provide a sound currency," that is, a currency free from the danger of degenerating into inconvertible paper. As to the question of the proportion of the precious metals which may be necessary to ensure that result, some difference of opinion may and does exist. I have already explained the different views entertained on that subject; but all are agreed that for that purpose there should be a larger infusion of coin into the circulation than existed at the time of the suspension of specie payments.

Then, sir, I ask if you must watch over the State banks and regulate their issues of paper, why not use them as fiscal agents? The Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) proposes to do so. I shall vote, Mr. President, for his amendment, though I am free to say I do not think it the best that could be offered.

From what has been said, it is apparent that it is the constitutional duty of Congress to regulate the issues of bank notes, which can only be done in one of two ways, either by means of a bank of the United States, or by means of a stamp duty on the notes. As to a bank of the United States, it is out of the question at this time; and I am free to say, sir, that I consider it altogether inexpedient, in a political point of view. For I hold it to be extremely unwise in a Government constituted like ours to attempt to force public opinion. No system can be successfully administered which is repugnant to the public will; and it is sufficient for me, in this instance, that there is strong reason to believe that the majority of the people are opposed to a national bank. I have no constitutional scruples on the subject; on the contrary, I believe that it is necessary and proper as a fiscal agent of the Government, and the most gentle and effectual means of furnishing a sound and uniform currency to the country, composed, as I have before stated, of coin and convertible paper. But, sir, I will not consent to vote for such an institution, until I am satisfied that it is not repugnant to the wishes and feelings of the majority of the people. There is no other mode of suppressing the small notes, in the absence of a bank of the United States—I mean, of course, by the action, direct or indirect, of this Government—than a resort to the taxing power by imposing a stamp duty on them. To this there cannot, I presume, be any constitutional objection, as it is an express power, justified in its use by the great object of promoting the general welfare, but in this instance used to sustain and enforce another express power and high constitutional duty, of supplying the country with a sound currency of coin or its equivalent.

Mr. BAYARD continued his argument at much length, reviewing the plan of the Government, and condemning the sub-Treasury system of keeping the public moneys as unsafe in itself, and leading to fraud and speculation.

Mr. WRIGHT rose and said he would examine, for a moment, the measures which the committee had reported to the Senate, that, in that way, it might be seen what was their tendency and effect, and how far the committee had been derelict in their attention to the wants of the citizens generally, or in proposing such measures of relief as the Government could adopt. He certainly did not intend to discuss now measures which had passed the Senate and gone to the House many days since, but he trusted a reference to these measures, for the purpose he had avowed, would be not only pardonable, but proper.

The first was the bill to postpone the transfer of the fourth instalment of the deposit with the States. The committee found that the existing law made it the duty of the Secretary to make this transfer to the States, of about nine and one-third millions of dollars, on the first day of the present month; on yesterday.

They found that the means in the Treasury, from which alone it could be made, were in the late deposit banks, and in the deferred and unpaid merchants' bonds for duties. If the transfer must be made, the banks and the merchants must be called upon for immediate payments, to enable the Treasury to make it. Consequently, the customers of the bank, and of the merchants, must be called upon to pay them, that they might be able to pay the Government. The committee supposed it impolitic to make the call, and oppress the debtor citizens, merely that the Treasury might obtain the money to transfer for safe-keeping. They considered it wiser and better to postpone the transfer and give time to the banks and merchants to pay. Therefore, they presented the bill in question: and was it not a relief bill? Did any one look on it as a relief to the banks and merchants only? Did any one suppose that the banks actually had in their possession, locked up in their vaults, the money they owe to the Government, or that the merchants were in funds to pay their deferred bonds, without a call upon their customers? On the contrary, did not all know that the banks had loaned these moneys in the ordinary course of their banking operations, and that they could not pay without collecting these loans at this difficult period for borrowers to pay? Did not all know that the inability of the importing merchants to pay, proceeded from the inability of their customers to pay, and that, if pressed for payment by the Government, they must press those customers? And who are the customers of the banks and the merchants? Are they not the people, and the whole people? Would any one say, then, that this was not a relief bill? That this was a bill for the Government, and not for the people?

The second bill reported by the committee, was to authorize the emission of ten millions of dollars in value of Treasury notes; in this form to borrow, upon the credit of the United States, the sum of ten millions of dollars in money—and for what? To enable the Treasury to get on, and grant time to the debtor banks and merchants. The committee found the Treasury in want of means to answer the ordinary calls upon it, and that those means must be realized, either from a prompt collection of the demands due to it, or from moneys raised upon public credit. For the reasons which induced them to recommend a postponement of the further deposits with the States, they were also induced to present this bill to the Senate, and thus, so far as the current calls upon the Treasury should require it, to interpose the public credit between the wants of the Government and the rigid collection of its dues. Was this bill to be considered in the mere light of a care for the Government, without regard for the interests of the citizens? Who were to be affected by a prompt and rigid collection of the public dues? Not the Government, or the Treasury, but the public debtors. Who were the public debtors? The banks and the merchants immediately: the borrowers from the banks and the customers of the merchants substantially. And who were the borrowers from the banks and the customers of the merchants but the people of the country.

The third bill reported by the committee was to grant time to the importing merchants upon their bonds due, and to become due, for a year from the present time. The extension, assented to by the committee, and ordered by the Senate, was nine months upon each bond. Would any one question that that was a relief measure to the merchants? Did any one suppose that the relief afforded by that bill was designed to reach no further than the merchants who owed the bonds? No, sir. It was the customers of those merchants, the persons who had purchased for consumption and use the goods upon which the duties were payable, that the bill was to relieve. Few, comparatively, of those who occupy these seats would have voted for that measure, had its influence and action been confined to the merchants only. But they could not indulge their debtors unless they could be indulged by the Government, because they must collect if they must pay. To enable them to grant the indulgence which the state of the times and the condition of the monetary affairs of the country demanded, was the design and object, and would be the effect, of the bill. Who, then, would deny to it its relief character?

The fourth bill which the committee presented for the acceptance of the Senate, was one to extend a proportionate indulgence to the late deposit banks for the payment of the balances remaining due from them to the public Treasury. It was true that these institutions stood upon a different footing from the merchants. They had merely received the public moneys for safe-keeping. The moneys were legally and technically in the Treasury, but were they there in fact? Could the Treasurer command them for the uses of the Government or the people? No. They were unavailable funds in the Treasury. And why were they unavailable funds? Because the banks had got them locked in their vaults, and were not willing to pay them upon demand? No, sir: but because the banks had them not; because they were loaned to the customers of the banks, the citizens of the country, who could not pay on demand. The relation of debtor and creditor, in its ordinary acceptance, was not intended to be created by the law establishing the late bank deposit system. It was a mere agency for the safe-keeping of the money, which the law recognized, but that agency had been turned into the relation of debtor and creditor by the failure of the banks to fulfil on their part—into the most unpleasant relation of debtor and creditor; a creditor who wants and debtors who cannot pay. Indulgence, therefore, became a matter of interest to the creditor, as adding to the chances of eventual payment; and of favor to

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[SENATE.]

the debtors, as giving them time to collect the means for payment. To whom, then, was the favor, the relief, extended? To the banks or to their customers? Most assuredly to the latter. The banks could pay if they could collect; and, if compelled to pay, they would be compelled to collect. Their power to indulge depended upon the indulgence extended to them; and could it be said that a measure giving to them four, six, and nine months, to pay their balances to the Treasury, was a measure solely confined to the protection of the Government, without regard to the relief of the people?

These were the first four bills presented by the committee to the Senate, and yet they were told that they had forgotten the suffering interests of our great community in their exclusive care for the Government and its officers. Was the charge just or merited? These bills had all received the final action of the Senate, and all, save one, had passed this body by nearly unanimous votes, while that one had passed by a large majority. It was true that the connection between them was intimate, and that, to a greater or less extent, each subsequent one was predicated upon the success of its predecessor, while all were most intimately connected with the condition and action of the public Treasury.

Indeed, it was but candid to say that the committee knew of no direct relief which Congress could properly afford to the distressed of the people of the country, but such as should grow out of the existing connection between the means of the Treasury and the banking and mercantile interests. These bills covered all that ground, and no difference of opinion could possibly exist as to them, unless it should arise upon the principle of indulgence, or the time of indulgence. No such difference had been manifested in the action of the Senate upon the respective measures, and therefore it was right to assume that none existed. Some had supposed that it was the duty of Congress to borrow the nine and one-third millions, covered by the first bill, that it might be transferred to the States for safe-keeping; and propositions having that tendency had been presented to, and acted upon by, the Senate, but they did not meet with favor. The body did not seem to suppose that such a disposition of the public credit would be a measure of relief either to the Government or the people, and it was rejected.

Take, then, the four measures referred to, sum them up in their combined action, and to what do they amount as relief to the community? The first is equal to a forbearance to collect nine and one-third millions of dollars from the customers of the banks and the merchants, to be transferred to the States for safe-keeping. The three last authorize a loan, upon the public credit, to the amount of ten millions of dollars, to pay the expenses of the Government and meet the public appropriations, and a forbearance of the collection of that sum from the public debtors, that they too may be able to forbear collections, at this trying period, from those who are indebted to them. Here, then, is direct and positive relief to the amount of nineteen and one-third millions of dollars. Might he not, then, ask, with some force and some justice, whether the committee were obnoxious to the charge of having forgotten the interests of the people in their care for the Government? He would here dismiss this topic.

The next and only remaining charge against the committee which he proposed to notice was, that in their action they had entirely overlooked, or wholly neglected to act upon, one of the most, nay, the very most, important of the subjects presented for their action in the Message of the President referred to them; that they had reported no bill declaring the description of currency which should be receivable in payment of the public dues. He did not refer to this complaint against the action of the committee for the purpose of representing it as unjust or ungenerous; not even for the purpose of refuting it. It had come from opposite sides of the House, and it might be well founded. The fact was certainly as alleged; and his only purpose was to give the reasons which governed himself, and which, he was certain, governed the majority of the committee, in the conclusion to report no bill upon the subject of the currency to be received into the public Treasury. Those reasons had been, and still were, satisfactory to himself, as he doubted not they were to his colleagues upon the committee; but the course of action of the Senate upon this bill, seemed to indicate, and its final action would probably show, that they were not satisfactory to the majority of the body. Should this be so, the committee would be content, when their reasons had been placed fairly before the Senate and the country.

They found the Message presenting, among others, two distinct points, both, in the judgment of the committee, most deeply interesting to the public Treasury, the Government, and the country. The first was the continuance of the separation between the moneys of the people and the State banks, which the operation of the existing laws and the conduct of the banks had already produced. The other was a gradual and safe discontinuance of the reception of the bills of the State banks in payment of the public dues, and an eventual return to the collection of gold and silver and such paper as should be issued upon the faith and credit of the United States, and be, by the laws of Congress, made receivable for debts due to the United States. The laws as they are, upon the subject of the deposit and safe-keeping of the public moneys, seemed to the committee to require immediate action, if the recommendation of the President was to be carried out and made a part of our permanent policy. Hence they reported to the Senate the bill now under discussion. They were not unmindful that some regulation as to the descriptions of currency to be received in payment of the public dues might become necessary, in case the new system of deposits should be adopted and the present condition of the banks should be changed; but in the present condition of the banks and of the law upon this point, they could see no necessity for immediate action, or for any present change of the existing laws. They felt that the two subjects were somewhat connected, but not so intimately as to require or demand that both should be embraced in the same bill. They knew that great diversity of sentiment prevailed as to both, and that different opinions were held by those who had hitherto been friends and supporters of the administration, as well as between them and their common political opponents. Under these circumstances, and with the distinct expression of a desire, on the part of a large majority of the Senate, that the present session should be terminated at the earliest possible day, the committee felt bound to present every subject from their hands in the most simple and distinct form, and in a shape which might receive the definitive action of the body with the least possible consumption of time. With this view they reported separate bills upon every subject upon which they did report, and the same consideration influenced them to omit reports upon all subjects which they supposed might be deferred to the regular annual session, without injury to any important interest, public or private. By the law, as it stands, the notes of non-specie paying banks can neither be received in payment of the public dues, nor paid to the public creditors. He was sorry to be compelled to say that, for all practical purposes either to the Government or the people, there were, at this time, no other banks in the country, and he was much more sorry to be compelled to believe that there would not, in a practical sense, be any such banks until after the time when Congress would be again in session. No one had proposed, and he was happy to know that no one would propose, to make the inconvertible notes of non-specie paying banks receivable at the public Treasury, and surely no one could have expected such a proposition from the committee. The revenues, then, to every practical extent, are now receivable in gold and silver only, unless Congress shall, at its present session, create a paper upon the faith and credit of the Government, and make it receivable for the public dues. Hence the absence of any immediate necessity for legislation upon this point. The committee further believed, what has already been proved to be true, that any bill upon this subject would lead to long and grave discussion, and tend to protract the session. For these reasons they had omitted to report upon this subject, and he had as yet seen nothing to change his opinion of the wisdom of their course. He still believed that the connection of these two subjects in the same bill was undesirable; that it would retard action, and he greatly feared embarrass the bill which the committee had reported, and the passage of which they considered to be of high public importance. The matter, however, was now with the Senate, and he should cheerfully submit to its choice. If called upon to vote upon the proposition before it, he was ready to vote, whether they should be insisted upon as amendments to the committee's bill, or as an independent measure.

Having said thus much by way of explanation, and he hoped, to some extent, in justification, of the course and action of the committee, he would now pass to a brief discussion of the bill before the Senate.

The crisis, he said, was one of the deepest interest. Every man in these seats, every citizen of the country, felt it to be so. Still, its peculiar character could not be too often adverted to, or too firmly fixed in the memory of all. During a period of profound peace; after a series of years of unexampled abundance in every production of the earth, and every product of labor; with a currency more abundant than our young country had ever before witnessed, and standing as strong in the public confidence as our paper currency had ever stood; with ready markets, and prices higher than any former period of peace had sustained; under the influence of all these elements and evidences of prosperity and wealth, national and individual, and at the entrance upon another of those rich and fruitful seasons with which a kind Providence so frequently blesses our fertile soil—a season not surpassed by any which has preceded it in the abundance it has returned to the husbandman for his labor—at such a time, and under such circumstances, the revulsion came, and in an instant, as it were—in a single night—the whole beauty of this rich scene was changed. That currency, so abundant and creditable, became depreciated, inconvertible, and debased. Those markets, so quick and active, and profitable, became stagnant and deserted. Those prices, so alluring to enterprise and industry, were changed to a priceless mass of unsalable commodities.

That all should have inquired after the causes of this sad and sudden change, was most natural. That statesmen should have done so, was necessary to the discharge of their delicate and responsible duties. The President of the United States, to qualify himself for the performance of his constitutional duty of giving to Congress "information of the state of the Union, and recommending to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient," has done this. In his Message, he has given to us his opinion of the causes which have brought upon our country this sudden and sweeping revulsion. It was not his purpose to examine the correctness of these opinions of the President. No one had expressed a doubt that they were honestly entertained, and all admitted that they had been clearly, frankly, and firmly expressed. They had been the subject of able and extended criticism in the course of this debate, and he thought also the subject of equally able and perfectly triumphant defence. Entertaining this opinion, he had but a single remark to make in regard to them, and that was, that he had heard criticism and contradiction from some quarters of the House delivered in a manner and in language which excited his profound regret—in a manner and in language which he would not, if he could, (and he was most thankful he could not,) imitate, towards friend or opponent.

He had listened to the debate, however, with profound attention; and while all had their peculiar views of the causes of the present derangement in our monetary affairs, and while the views of the different speakers differed materially as to the immediate and most active causes, he thought there were certain general positions substantially conceded by all; which, being drawn out and placed in their proper order, would advance us very far in the wide field of discussion presented and occupied by the various members. He had endeavored, therefore, to place these positions upon paper, and to give them an order best calculated to promote this object. They were as follows:

1. That wide-spread and highly injurious derangements have been, and are experienced, in the banking concerns, and in most of the business transactions of the country.

2. That the present embarrassments in the affairs of individuals are, to a greater or less extent, caused, or greatly increased, by the existing embarrassments in the affairs of the banks.

3. That an undue multiplication of banks by many of the State Legislatures, and excessive issues of paper money by the State banks, are among the most prominent of the causes which have brought about these embarrassments of the banks, and consequently of business generally.

4. That a material enlargement of the specie basis for our paper circulation, is indispensable to the security of the banks, and the stability of the paper currency.

5. That all banks of issue and circulation are liable to excesses, and that the State banks, from their distant locations, rival interests, and the variety and diversity of their business and associations, are peculiarly so liable, which renders it desirable and important that the fiscal action of this Government should never be so directed as to promote these excesses, while, so far as that can be safely and constitutionally done, it should be so directed as to have an equal tendency, in all parts of our extended confederacy, to check them.

6. That the powers of Congress, to prevent the evil of excessive banking by the State institutions, are, in no sense, direct and positive, but are, in whatever form they may be exercised, incidental and consequential, growing out of the expressly granted powers.

So far he thought all could agree and walk together in this trying crisis. He was not aware that any one would controvert either of these positions, while he was sure that most of those who had addressed the Senate, in the course of this debate, upon whatever side of the House, had substantially assumed them.

The difference seemed to arise as we passed the last proposition, and came to inquire how this incidental power of Congress should be exercised. The late catastrophe to the banks and business of the country, had satisfied all that something was wrong in the working of our monetary system, but the seat of the disease, and the appropriate remedy, were questions upon which opinions differed.

The President was bound, in recommending to the consideration of Congress such measures as he judged necessary and expedient, to point out his view of the evil, so far as he should consider it connected with and remediable by federal legislation, and to present his plan of remedy. He has done so frankly and fully, and as the majority of the Committee on Finance have agreed with him, and have reported the bill under consideration to carry out his recommendation upon this point, it would be his duty, Mr. W. said, to examine that bill in its favorable and unfavorable influences upon the Treasury, upon the Government, upon the banks, and upon the currency generally. The safe keeping of the public moneys became separated from the State banks, in May last, by the voluntary suspension of specie payments by the banks, and the operation of the existing laws upon that act, and the bill proposes to continue the separation.

He would now proceed to inquire what influences, favorable or unfavorable, the bill to make this separation between all banks and the public money permanent, would exert upon the public Treasury. It would give to the Treasury direct possession, and a perfect knowledge of its means at all times, and under all circumstances. They would consist not of bank credits, but of money, and would, therefore, not be subject to any of the fluctuations to which bank credits must be always liable. The means of the Treasury would be the value received, and not the mere representation of that value in account.

It would give to the Treasury the perfect command of its means. It would no longer be troubled with unavailable funds, a description of funds well known to it for the last twenty years; which have always grown exclusively out of its connection with banks; which now constitute almost its only resource for the payment of the public creditors; and the consequence of which character given to the means of the Treasury, so far as he was informed, had, more than any other single cause, compelled the convention of Congress at this inconvenient, and he thought he might safely say dangerous, season of the year. It might be well here to define this term "unavailable funds," as applied to the means in the public Treasury. He understood them to consist, now and upon all former occasions, either of bank notes, which the banks issuing them could not redeem in specie, or any thing else which would pay the debts of the Government; or of moneys received by the banks for safe keeping, and which they could not pay, upon demand, in the legal currency of the country, or in any currency, which the creditors of the Government would consent to receive as money. An entire separation from banks would of course relieve the public Treasury from this embarrassment for the future. It would, at all times, enable the Treasury to pay the demands upon it, when the money of the people had been collected and placed in its keeping for that purpose; whereas, under the connection, these moneys were liable to become unavailable in the hands of the banks, and the people again to be called upon to raise, either from their pockets, or upon their credit, the means to pay those very debts for the payment of which they had once provided by depositing the money in bank.

A continuance of the separation would further relieve the Treasury from the necessity of using its means to sustain the credit of banks, when revulsions in trade, and general shocks to credit, should bring the banks in jeopardy. These revulsions must be always more or less frequent in every commercial country, and most frequent and most severe in those which most extensively adopt a system of paper or credit circulation and currency. If, then, the means of the National Treasury are confided to the safe keeping of the banks which furnish that paper or credit circulation and currency, they must be always subject to the fluctuations, revulsions, and incidents, to which the credit of the banks are subject. They become mere credits with the banks, and cannot be exempted from the influences which affect its other credits. Can the fiscal officers of the Government, then, neglect to put forth their exertions, and the means at their command, to sustain the credit of those banks, when occasion shall call; whose credits constitute the means of the public Treasury itself? He was not ignorant of the fact, that loud and startling complaints had been made in this hall against a late Secretary of the Treasury, upon the mere suspicion that he had used the means of the Treasury to sustain the credit of the deposit banks; but would any gentleman deny that, under this concise and practical view of the consequences of a connection between the Treasury of the people and the banks, it must frequently become the imperious duty of that officer, a duty as binding as that of keeping the Treasury in a situation to answer the calls upon it, to exert this power, and so to locate the means of the Treasury, as to render it as effective as possible? The consequence was unavoidable, and still the exercise of such a power would always be odious in a political sense, and must always be more or less invidious in a financial sense. It could never be exerted equally towards all the banks, but must be used especially in favor of those which should be, for the time being, the depositories of the public funds. Its influence, then, might often be unfavorable, and even injurious towards institutions which had promoted as much as any other, the collection and prompt payment of the public revenues, but which should not, on the day of trouble, be safe keepers of any portion of those revenues. Is it not desirable, if it can be done with safety to all interests to be regarded, to relieve the Treasury, and the head of the fiscal department of this Government, from this always so delicate, and frequently so odious, an exercise of the power and influence of the public funds, upon the credit of the banks and the business of the country? He must say that a proper national pride, and a just feeling of patriotism, seemed to him to demand it, at any expense short of the positive sacrifice of some paramount public interest.

A further benefit to be derived from a system which shall make the Treasury the keeper of its own means, and especially if those means shall be collected and disbursed in the legal currency of gold and silver, or of paper issued upon the faith and credit of the Government only, will be a perfect uniformity of value in the collections and disbursements of the Treasury, wherever made. Its operations will become stable and certain in every sense, and all the contracts with the Government may be made without the customary deductions on account of the anticipated receipt of a depreciated medium of payment. Every citizen can make his proposals for the public works or public supplies, wherever may be the place of his residence, or the place of payment under the contract, based upon the par of money, and will not be driven to an uncertain calculation upon the fluctuations of exchange and the uncertainties of credit.

These are some of the benefits to be anticipated to the public Treasury from a permanent separation from the banks. What are the injuries, the unfavorable influences, if any, to stand against these benefits? He had heard but one suggested, so far as the interests and conveniences of the Treasury are concerned, and he must say but that one had occurred to his mind. The expense and trouble of remitting specie, in cases where that should become necessary, was, he believed, the only drawback upon the Treasury for all these benefits, and a short examination would show the weight of this objection.

Under the system of bank deposits, drafts from the Treasurer, upon the different depositories, and from one depository upon another, are made the medium of remittance in all ordinary cases, and, where the drafts are fully credited, supersede the necessity of an actual transportation of the money in almost all the operations of the public Treasury. Nothing in the system proposed, prevents the use of the same medium for remittance and exchange. The drafts of the Treasurer of the United States upon a receiving officer of the Government, will certainly have as good credit as his drafts upon a deposit bank, and when they are known to be drawn upon the specie in safe-keeping, and upon nothing else, they cannot fail to be as acceptable to the public creditor as any similar drafts have heretofore been. The trouble and expense, therefore, of transporting specie funds from one portion of the country to the other, for disbursement to the public creditors, will not probably be more extensive under this bill than under the bank system which it proposes to supersede.

He would now look at the influences of this measure upon the Government.

It would discharge its legislation from bank influences of all sorts. He spoke not of improper or corrupt influences, but of those constituent interests, which must be represented in Congress so long as the connection between the public Treasury and banks of any description was maintained. He addressed those who must understand him, and who must have seen and felt these influences in our official action here. Who, he would ask, had occupied one of these seats for the last five years, and had not seen the power of this influence upon our deliberations? Who had failed to see that it was an influence more nearly overpowering and beyond our control than any we had been called to encounter? Who did not see and feel it now as pressing upon us with a giant force? It was true, we had formerly and most usually encountered it in the consolidated form of a national bank, and that it now presented itself to us in State detachments; but it was the same influence similarly exerted. It was the effort of cupidity on our free institutions—an effort to make money out of the money and means and credit of the people.

He uttered these sentiments with extreme reluctance, and with the most extended charity towards all those who differed from him. He knew well that not only political opponents, but those who had ever been political and personal friends—those towards whom he had ever entertained, and still did entertain, the kindest feelings, did differ with him upon these points. He most cheerfully yielded to their integrity, sincerity, and patriotism, every indulgence which he asked for himself; but the crisis, the importance of the questions presented, and our imperious duty to our constituents, demanded from us frank and fearless action.

Was it not, then, in case he was right, most desirable to free the legislation of Congress from bank influence altogether? Would it not tend more than any other single act we could perform, to take from our debates and deliberations that bitterness and acrimony which had too strongly characterized them for the last few years, but which, he was proud to say, had entered, in a much less degree, into the present debate in the Senate, than into any similar debate for many years? For himself he felt that this consideration alone demanded the passage of this bill; that it was entirely paramount to any objections he had yet heard urged against it; that it was as much superior to considerations of financial convenience and pecuniary profit, as were the purity and permanency of our political institutions to the temporary advantages of a bargain or the facilities of borrowing money.

This was not the only advantage the Government would derive from a permanent separation of its finances from the banks. It would discharge it from that eternal round of imputations to which, under the connection, its every fiscal action is subjected. If it be a time of prosperity and plenty, all are struggling for the profits arising from the safe-keeping of the Government funds; and the failure on the part of its fiscal officers to select a given bank as a public depository, is not only matter of personal offence, but is immediately converted into the active cause of all the pecuniary calamities which the friends and customers of that bank may experience through all time to come. If it be a time of scarcity and pressure, like the present, the drafts of the Treasurer upon the money of the people in safe-keeping with the banks is a ruthless attack, a war upon them, and is intended to prostrate the institutions. The former keeping of the funds becomes a merit and a virtue, and to ask for their payment to the public creditors is ingratitude and injustice.

If the Executive, in the exercise of a sound discretion, sees proper to issue an order requiring payment in money for the whole, or any portion of the public revenue, this is converted into an attack upon the banks, a distrust of their credit and solvency, and a wrong inflicted by the Government upon the whole people. Can it be desirable to preserve a connection which is the subject of incessant complaint on the part of the banks and their friends, and of constant embarrassment to the operations of the public Treasury, and of imputation upon the most faithful and worthy public officers? He thought not. He considered this connection of the fiscal affairs of the Government with the credit and business of the banks, and of business and commercial men, and the constant imputations brought upon the Government thereby, as promoting a political morality in the public mind most dangerous to our institutions; as doing more to weaken the confidence of the people in the Government of their choice, than any and all other causes of distrust combined. If we would listen to the slander and misrepresentations of the times, we must believe that all our misfortunes, public and private, are imputable to our Government—all our prosperity to a resistance to its measures and its policy. And whence do these imputations come, but from our connection with the banks? They all emanate from that source, and from no other. That connection is now dissolved, by the operation of law and the voluntary action of the banks themselves; and he would say, let it be perpetual—let it never be renewed.

The effect of this measure upon the banks should next occupy his attention.

It had been considered as a measure of open and violent hostility to those institutions; as fraught with unmixed evil to them. Was this the true view of it? Had it these exclusive tendencies? He thought not, and he would attempt to point out some positive benefits to the banks from its adoption.

It would leave the State banks to operate upon their own means—upon the capitals which the respective State Legislatures had thought proper to give to them, and upon the funds derived from their private depositors. These means would be perfectly certain and uniform, so far as they consisted of the capital of the banks, and would be subject to no dangerous fluctuations, so far as they consisted of private deposits. Hence the action of the institutions could always be regulated by a certain standard—the extent of their means for the accommodation of their customers. This would discharge them from the inducement to those dangerous expansions and contractions, which not only promote, but cause, revulsions such as that under which the country now suffers.

The Government has been charged with being the cause of the present pecuniary embarrassments of the country, and he thought not without some foundation; but he considered the connection between the Treasury and the banks the only foundation for such a charge. What had we done? We had deposited our funds in the State banks. A period of unexampled prosperity had visited our country. Importations had become excessive, and the duties thereupon had swelled the public revenue from that source beyond all reasonable anticipation. The banks received the excess of revenue which the wants of the Government and the public appropriations did not call for. The same causes promoted unusual and unexampled sales of the public lands, and thus, from both of the great sources of revenue to the United States, streams were poured into the public Treasury, widened and deepened by their own accumulation and velocity. The banks were safe-keepers of the public funds, the fiscal agents of the Treasury, and they were also the reservoirs from which the importing and other merchants drew their means, and from which the speculating purchasers of our immense domain were supplied with funds for their operations. So far as the Government was concerned, the consequences are obvious. The moment the revenue exceeded the wants of the Treasury, the excesses fed the passion they ought to have controlled. The banks were the receivers and the payers. They received, to keep for the Government, and loaned to the merchants and purchasers of our lands. The system, in fact, and in practice, was one of indefinite credit for both duties and lands. The money paid for both went into the banks for safe-keeping. The Treasury did not want it or call for it for payment of the public dues. The banks loaned it to their customers, who were the payers for duties and lands. Under these circumstances, and this action of the system, excesses were inevitable, and they had visited their consequences sweepingly upon the country and upon the Treasury itself.

Ought not this state of things to be a lesson to the wise not to renew a connection which had been so disastrous to every interest involved? To the Government and the public Treasury, as a creditor of the banks; to the banks, as debtors to the Treasury and creditors to the citizens; and to the people at large, and especially to the commercial community, as debtors to the banks.

But it is said the withdrawal from the State banks of our confidence, countenance, and patronage, in this particular, will prostrate and destroy those institutions; that the attempt to separate the finances of this Government from them, is, in effect, a declaration of war against them, which they cannot survive. Is this, can this, be so? Will any sound and solvent State bank fail, because the United States does not entrust to it the safe-keeping of the moneys of the people? Did the State Legislatures, in chartering these banks, expect or intend that their credit or solvency should be sustained by the legislation of Congress, or the use of the funds of the Federal Government. If so, why have they limited and fixed their respective capitals, and attempted to set bounds to their operations? Why have they assigned different amounts of capital to different banks, dependent upon their location and business associations? Certainly no other answer can be given to these interrogatories, than that they intended that each bank should have a capital equal to the wants of the business community surrounding it, and that all the banks of their creation should have a credit and confidence with the people, and should transact a business proportioned to the capitals granted to them respectively, and not beyond that limit. You, then, by making your deposits with these institutions, destroy the proportions which the State Legislatures have intended to establish and preserve. Your deposits are treated as capital by the banks, and an extension of their loans, and an augmentation of their business, beyond that which their own means would allow, is the necessary consequence of your patronage. Can this disposition of your moneys fail to promote excessive banking? The members of the State Legislatures have a knowledge of the business wants of all the places at which they locate banks, and their object is to measure the banking capital at any given point by the wants of business at that point. When they have done that, you come in with your deposits, distributed, not upon the basis which governs the State Legislatures, but according to your convenience for receipt or disbursement. The consequence is, that you pour your millions into these State institutions, without reference to the legitimate business calls for banking facilities at the points where your deposits are made; and thus derange and destroy the proportions, as to these facilities, which the local Legislatures have determined to be safe and proper. In this way your patronage becomes an evil, and not a benefit. It stimulates the cupidity of the banks, and they, in turn, stimulate the cupidity of the business community around them, until excesses on the part of all produces revulsion, distress, and bankruptcy.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

In every light, then, in which he could view this matter, it was his deliberate opinion that the banks would be benefited, and not injured, by making the existing separation between them and the public Treasury perpetual. The passage of this bill, at this time, might have some tendency to weaken the confidence of the community in the institutions; but, if such a consequence must attend this change of our policy, could there be a better time than the present to make that change? The banks are now—he would not say insolvent, for he did not believe that was the condition of any large portion of them—but unable to pay the demands upon them. That fact was avowed by themselves, and known to all the world. They were in a quasi insolvent state, and all the distrust which could grow out of such a condition they had brought upon themselves by their voluntary suspension of specie payments. It was in vain, then, to talk of the delicacy of their present credits. That delicacy had been destroyed by their own act, and before they could ever again restore themselves to the confidence of the community they must be sound in fact, and able to discharge, to the fullest extent, every obligation which general distrust could bring against them. It was erroneous to suppose that they could ever resume and sustain specie payments until they were thus prepared and thus armed. They must build up for themselves a new character, based upon a perfect fulfilment of all their obligations. If, then, we are to separate from them, and that separation is to have any tendency to affect their credit, this is the very period when it is most desirable to them that the declaration of a perpetual divorcement should be made. Now it can do them no harm. They are already in a condition from which main strength alone can raise them; but at a time when their credit was unsuspected, and their operations unembarrassed and unimpeded, the measure might give them an injurious shock. Let it be done now, therefore, that, when they do rise, it may be distinctly known that they rise upon their own strength, unaided by our patronage, and untrammelled by our movements.

TUESDAY, October 3.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the collection and keeping of the public money, with the amendment offered by Mr. CALHOUN.

[A further debate ensued, in which Messrs. Calhoun, Webster, and Buchanan, were the speakers, chiefly in support of previously expressed opinions, and in reply to objections.]

The question was put on Mr. CALHOUN'S amendment, which was as follows:

Add the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, the resolution of eighteen hundred and sixteen, authorizing the receiving of notes of specie-paying banks in dues to the Government, shall be so modified that only three-fourths of the amount due to the Government for duties, taxes, sales of public lands, or other debts, may be received in the notes of specie-paying banks; and, that from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, one-half may be so received; and from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty, one-fourth; and from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-one, all sums due for duties, sales of public lands, or other debts to the Government, and all payments to the General Post Office, shall be paid in gold and silver coin only, or in such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law; and from and after the said first day of January, in the year eighteen hundred and forty-one, every officer or agent engaged in making disbursements on account of the United States, or of the General Post Office, shall make all payments in gold and silver coin only, or in such notes, bills, or paper, issued as aforesaid, when authorized by law; and any receiving or disbursing officer, or agent, who shall neglect, evade, or violate the provisions of this section, shall be dismissed the service, and shall forfeit all compensation which may then be due him.

And the amendment was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—24.

The amendment offered by Mr. RIVES as a substitute for the whole bill, (authorizing the reception of the bills of all specie-paying banks not issuing notes of less than $20,) was lost by:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—22.

Mr. PRESTON offered a substitute for the bill, making it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make special deposits of the accruing revenues of the United States in banks most conveniently situated, and to make such terms with them as in his judgment would best promote the public interest.

This substitute was lost by :

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—26.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved an amendment :

“That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe regulations to enforce the presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable ; and to prescribe the time—according to the different distances of the depositories—within which they shall be presented for payment.”

Mr. CRITTENDEN deprecated the great and arbitrary power conferred by such a clause upon the Secretary.

Mr. BUCHANAN amended his amendment by adding to it the following :

“And in default of such presentation, to prescribe any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper.”

The amendment, so modified, was agreed to.

A long discussion took place on an amendment offered by Mr. MORRIS, proposing that no notes should be received from any bank which were not payable at the place of issue.

Mr. STRANGE offered, as an amendment to Mr. MORRIS's amendment, to strike out the restriction as to notes under $5 ; which amendment prevailed as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Ala., Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Ala., Knight, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Prentiss, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Spence, Strange, Swift, Wall, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Black, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, King of Georgia, McKean, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Smith of Conn., Smith of Ind., Tipton, Walker, White, Williams—20.

Mr. MORRIS's amendment, as amended, was adopted—ayes 26, noes not counted.

Mr. BENTON offered an amendment authorizing a premium of one per cent. on gold coin paid into the Treasury ; which being objected to, he laid it on the table, with a view to attach it to some other bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading by the following vote :

WEDNESDAY, October 4.

The Sub-Treasury Bill.

The engrossed bill was read the third time.

The CHAIR stated the question to be, “Shall the bill pass?”

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, addressed the Senate : Mr. President, I confess, sir, when this delicate and important subject was first brought forward, I had some hesitation, some doubt, as to its probable tendency ; but the more I have reflected, deliberated, investigated the subject, the better I have become satisfied that its effects will be salutary, in regard to the immediate interests of the Government itself, and that they will not be pernicious ; but, on the contrary, beneficial to the interests of the people—our constituents.

As the measure was at first proposed by the Committee on Finance, I apprehended the disconnection—divorce, if you choose—of the Government from the banks would be too sudden, and would consequently cripple the banks, and occasion a shock in the monetary affairs of the country generally. But, sir, these apprehensions have been obviated and removed by the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), as it is now modified. Under that amendment, the bills of such banks as now pay specie, or as may think proper to resume specie payments, will be receivable in payment, and to the full amount, of all public dues, for customs, lands, &c., till the 1st of January, 1839 ; thereafter, three-fourths of such public dues, till the 1st of January, 1840 ; thereafter one-half till the 1st of January, 1841 ; and, thereafter, one-fourth till the 1st of January, 1842.

Here, then, is inducement, held out to the banks now paying, to continue, and to such as have stopped, to resume, specie payments. We say to them, in effect—“We invite you to resume specie payments ; show that you are solvent, that your notes are convertible into specie when desirable, and we will receive them in payment for public lands, and for all other revenue ;” in the strong language of some of the gentlemen who have addressed us—“do this, and we will endorse your notes.” What stronger motive could be held out to such banking institutions as are solvent, honest, and desirous to effectuate the purposes of their creation ? If the public interest and convenience be the object of bank directors, as legitimately they ought, would they not, by responding to this invitation and offer on our part, give greater value to their paper—give it a wider circulation—and adapt it to the use and interest of the community? And would not such banks as resumed, at once derive all the advantages of superior credit, furnish the circulating medium, and do the business of the country, to the exclusion of such as failed, or refused to comply? The answer is palpable—no man can doubt on these questions.

Again, sir: The change in the mode of collecting the public revenue, in the kind of money receivable for it, will be so gradual as to occasion no shock whatever to the credit of the banks, or to the commercial community. Before we entirely discontinue receiving bank paper, more than four years will have elapsed. All this time will be allowed for the banks and merchants to adapt their business to the new system contemplated, and conform their business to the new state of things. It will give time for the State Legislatures to regulate their banking institutions, so as, in future, to prevent over-issues of paper; to restrain them from generating, or encouraging, a spirit of over-trading and inordinate speculation; to restrain them from making promises they cannot redeem, and thus restore to the country a sound circulating medium, and the just equilibrium of trade, and business of every description.

Moreover, we ourselves shall have time to see how the new system works—to check its velocity, if it be too great—or accelerate it, if it be too slow; and modify it, in all respects, as its results may indicate to be safe and expedient. As already shown, no change in the description of funds, receivable for public dues, will take place for the next fifteen months; for the year 1839, a reduction of one-fourth; for 1840, one-half may be paid in specie-paying bank paper; and so on to the consummation of the plan. If it be discovered that the policy operates injuriously, there will be ample time to amend or modify it.

But, sir, I have no apprehension that any injurious result will follow the adoption of this measure. The chief embarrassments of the community have arisen out of inordinate expansions of the circulating medium, excessive accommodations, begetting extravagance, and reckless speculations; and then sudden contractions, withdrawals of those enormous loans, reductions of the amount of circulation, and thus, almost in a moment, reducing the value of property one-third, sometimes one-half. The Government deposits have, doubtless, heretofore, nurtured and increased this propensity of all banks to excessive issues and accommodations. They have loaned out the public money as if their own, and when called upon to pay it over, they have been necessarily compelled to press and coerce payments from their borrowers, who had, in their turn, treated this borrowed money as their own; and have thus occasioned embarrassment, the sacrifice of property, and in too many instances, the impoverishment and ruin of their customers. To illustrate the correctness of these remarks, I need only refer you to the greater pecuniary distress and embarrassment of communities around any of the banks, which have been large depositories of the public money, compared with those remote from such institutions. If they have no large sums of public money on general deposit, on which to grant accommodations, they will know and understand better the proper limits to prescribe to their liberality; they will have no fluctuations, no augmentations, no diminutions of capital to mislead them; their accommodations will be more uniform, and the amount of their circulation bear some relation to the amount of specie in their vaults. This being brought about, the value of produce, and property of all descriptions, will be more steady and uniform; we shall not have a negro, costing a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars to-day, sold twelve months hence to pay half the amount of consideration—land at one time worth fifty dollars per acre, at another not more than twenty—and our great staple, one while commanding twenty-five dollars, and then not worth eight.

Sir, the Government ought, always, to be able to command its funds, and have them ever ready to meet any exigency. Experience has taught us, that this cannot be expected while we rely on banks. Gentlemen tell us that, although the State banks have failed to meet our expectations, we ought to continue their agency. They ask us, would we discontinue the use of steamboats, because a boiler may sometimes explode, and produce fatal results? By no means, sir, while care and skill may reasonably be expected to ensure safety, and prevent such calamities. But, were we to discover that the machinery is entirely uncontrollable, and the boiler liable to spontaneous combustion—carrying universal misery and death among the passengers and crew, in despite of all the science, vigilance, and fidelity of the engineer—would it be wise or prudent to trust ourselves on board? What would have been the situation of the country in May last, when the banks suspended specie payments, had we been involved in war with some powerful foreign enemy? Whatever might have been the emergency, we should not have been able to have commanded the resources of the nation. We might have been without a dollar for the pay or subsistence of an army to resist the invaders; our energies would have been crippled; and the most disastrous consequences might have followed. When we find that such is the unfortunate tendency of "the experiment," as gentlemen choose to call it, is it time we should abandon it, by whomsoever instituted or approved, heretofore.

But, sir, was not the Bank of the United States an "experiment," and has not that also failed to answer just expectation? No other Government but our own, ever did employ such a fiscal agent, with powers of the same magnitude. It was, indeed, a fearful experiment, and well nigh fatal in its results. Yet, the recharter of the late United States Bank, or the establishment of a new one, is now announced as the only efficient remedy—the sovereign panacea—for existing evils. The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has, to my astonishment, gone so far as to identify the establishment of such an institution with the permanency of the Union! It would seem, the question of a national bank is always portentous—involving consequences of a most alarming character. Shortly after the removal of the deposits from the late Bank of the United States, we were told, by the same distinguished gentleman, that we were then “in the midst of a revolution!” and the sentiment was responded to, by the presses and politicians of the opposition, from one end of the Union to the other. We were told, on the very floors of Congress, that the deposits must be restored, or a revolution was at hand. The same sentiment was announced, when two members of Congress, during the same panic session, addressed an assembled multitude in Baltimore on Sunday. According to the newspapers of the day, it was said, by way of justification, “there were no Sabbaths in revolutionary times!” Sir, the subject of a national or United States bank cannot be touched without an attempt to produce excitement and agitation. It affords one of the most conclusive reasons against the establishment of such an institution, that it has the ability to produce such tremendous effects. The concentration of such an immense moneyed power in the hands of a few individuals, is at war with our peace and quiet; too dangerous to our liberties. It would soon control all our elections, from the highest to the lowest, and direct the operations, nay, usurp the powers, of the Government itself.

When Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, concluded his speech—

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and said that perhaps he ought to feel obliged to the member from Alabama for his quotation and adoption of a report, wholly without foundation, which had been circulated in the newspapers several years ago. That report was, that at a meeting of many citizens on a Sunday in Baltimore, at the time of the excitement in the country, created by the withdrawing of the deposits, he had said that there were no Sabbaths in revolutionary times. That, sir, (said Mr. W.,) was a vile falsehood and slander. I never said any such thing either then or at any other time. Having been home, on indispensable business, I was hastening back to my seat here to vote on very important measures then pending, and in regard to which friends had written to me to lose no time. When I arrived in Baltimore, on a Sunday evening, being in company with the distinguished and honorable gentleman who represented, at that time, the city of Philadelphia in the other House of Congress, we found, on landing from the boat, and repairing to the hotel, a collection of people, assembled without our procurement or knowledge. We each addressed a few observations to them on the absorbing public topics which had drawn them together; and this we felt bound to do out of respect to them, and as the readiest mode of restoring to the day the quiet and repose which are so important to its proper observance. But no such language and no such sentiment as the member has quoted or alluded to to-day escaped from either of us. I should not, of course, have noticed in my place here the original slander if it had not been alluded to by others.

Mr. CLAY rejoined that he believed, whatever might be the character of the report, it had emanated from newspapers which supported the correctness of the gentleman's position; that he spoke from the newspaper account, which he had never before heard controverted.

Mr. WEBSTER said he pronounced the whole story a vile slander, whether reported of himself or his friend. Neither of us, sir, (said Mr. W.,) expressed any such sentiment, nor any thing like it. The whole matter was original and unmixed calumny.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in reply, stated that, if it was a mistake or a calumny, it proceeded entirely from the papers in favor of the political principles advocated by Mr. W., and it had not proceeded from, or been circulated in, papers of the other side. This was the first time he had heard it contradicted; and, hearing it from such a source, he was satisfied he must have been misinformed.

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—20.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

Mr. Madison's Papers.

Mr. WALL, from the Joint Committee on the Library, reported a bill relinquishing to Mrs. Madison the copyright in foreign countries to the late President Madison's Journal of the Debates of the Convention which formed the Constitution; and also the avails of such contracts as had been made by her relative to its publication, prior to the law of the last session, which authorized the purchase of those papers by Government.

Law of Bankruptcy against Bankrupt Banks.

[SENATE.]

This bill was, by unanimous consent, read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, October 12.

Annexation of Texas.

Mr. WEBSTER said he rose to present a great number of memorials and petitions against the annexation of Texas to the United States. These papers, he said, were sent to him, some of them from most of the Northern and Eastern States. They were numerous, and some of them contained several thousand signatures. In some instances he knew the signers, and knew them to be highly respectable persons, and he found among the names persons of all parties in politics, and all sects in religion.

At one time, Mr. W. said, he had thought it might be as well not to present these petitions till the next session. But it being now officially known that the annexation of Texas to the United States had become the subject of communication between the two Governments, the time had come when it was proper that those citizens who wished to protest against any such annexation should make their sentiments known to their own Government.

Mr. SWIFT, Mr. McKEAN, and Mr. WILLIAMS, also presented remonstrances on the same subject, from citizens of their respective States, which were severally laid on the table.

Law of Bankruptcy against Bankrupt Banks.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as related to bankruptcy, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of that subject.

Mr. BENSON said: The recommendation of the President for a bankrupt law, applicable to banks and bankers, has been made the subject of repeated animadversion on this floor, and that while the subject was not before the Senate, but in the hands of a committee. I noticed these animadversions on a former occasion, not for argument, but for the purpose of exhibiting their unparliamentary character; to dissent from their justness; to express my own approbation of the recommendation; and to declare myself ready to support it, whenever it could be done in a parliamentary manner, and without obliquing into a discussion foreign to the subject in hand. The suitable occasion now presents itself; and I embrace it with pleasure, that the great remedial measure proposed by the President, and called for by the rights and interests of the people, and by the character of the country, may not be prejudiced by the unparliamentary and precocious assaults which have been made upon it.

At the head of those who have made the attack on this part of the Message, and whose objections cover all the ground which has since been occupied by others, is the Senator from Massachusetts, who delivered his sentiments on the Treasury note bill, (Mr. WEBSTER.) That Senator spoke briefly, but comprehensively, against this Executive recommendation. He presented all the points which others have since elaborated. In answering him, I answer all.

The objections which the Senator from Massachusetts takes to the Executive recommendation are of a two-fold character: first, to the constitutional power of Congress to pass a bankrupt law, confined to moneyed corporations and to bankers, and with a view to operate upon the paper currency; secondly, to the consistency of the President in having made such a recommendation.

I take up the second of these objections first, because it creates a prejudice against the whole recommendation of the President. The imputation of inconsistency creates a prejudice; and it is necessary to remove that prejudice before the recommendation can be fairly considered. The inconsistency imputed, lies in the supposed disclaimer of the President of all federal authority over the currency, and then, an assumption of power to regulate that currency, and to regulate it by an unauthorized exercise of the power to pass bankrupt laws. This is the point of the imputed inconsistency. It all turns upon this word currency; and now, what currency does the Senator from Massachusetts mean? Certainly not the currency of the constitution; for the President recites the power to coin that currency, and to regulate its value. It must be the paper currency—the local bank notes and the shin-plasters—which are intended; and, if so, I have to remark that the President very explicitly disclaims both the authority, and the expediency, of having recourse to a national bank to regulate that species of currency. He disclaims that instrument of regulation; and in doing so, he stands upon the constitution, which disowns its existence; upon the fact, which shows its impotency; and upon the ground which the authors of the first national bank occupied, and to whom the regulation of currency and of exchanges was wholly unknown as among the reasons for its creation. These reasons are of modern conception and recent date. They are an after-thought of the subsequent supporters of the second national bank. The President disclaims also a power to suppress the local banking institutions by federal legislation; but he nowhere disclaims the authority to prevent their paper issues from superseding and expelling the hard money currency of the constitution. On the contrary, he claims that power, and points to the sources of its rightful exercise in the incidental effects of federal legislation in favor of hard money as necessarily improving the condition of paper currency; and then he points to the bankrupt power as furnishing the direct means of checking the issues of non-specie paying banks, and giving a remedy to the holders of their unpaid notes. This is what the President does; and nothing can be further from his words than a disclaimer of all authority over the regulation of currency. And here let me remark upon a systematic error into which some Senators incessantly fall: they always speak of the federal authority, and the federal duties over "the currency," meaning all the while, not gold and silver, but bank notes and shin-plasters. Now, sir, I repeat, for about the thousandth time, that the word currency is not in the constitution, nor any word whatsoever which can mean what these speakers intend by it. The nearest approach to the term which the constitution contains, is the word current, and that is coupled with the word coin; so that the thing which gentlemen have constantly in their minds, and which they use an equivocal term to express, exists nowhere in the constitution, and is not in any way known to that instrument, either by expression or intendment. I think it right, on this occasion, thus to allude to the equivocal use of this phrase; for upon this equivocation there is built up, in these United States, an immensity of erroneous speaking, erroneous writing, and erroneous legislation. Vast is the number of persons who are mystified by the use of an equivocal term; and in nothing does the rhetorician show the perfection of his art in a higher degree, than in making a debate turn upon one of them.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in taking his objections, declared that he would not do intentional injustice to the Message or to its author; but it is the same thing to the Message, and to the author, if injustice had been done without intention: and this I apprehend to have been the case. The Message says nothing about confining the bankrupt law to corporations and bankers alone; it says nothing about excluding merchants and traders from the operation of the law; and it proposes something else to result from the law, besides an operation upon currency; and that something else is a remedy to the disappointed creditors of the delinquent banks. This is his recommendation:

"In the mean time, it is our duty to provide all the remedies against a depreciated paper currency which the constitution enables us to afford. The Treasury Department, on several former occasions, has suggested the propriety and importance of a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations and other bankers. Through the instrumentality of such a law, a salutary check may doubtless be imposed on the issues of paper money, and an effectual remedy given to the citizens, in a way at once equal in all parts of the Union, and fully authorized by the constitution."

This is the recommendation—the whole of it; and here is no proposition to exclude merchants and traders; and here is an actual proposition to give a remedy to the injured citizens against the delinquent banks; which remedy would naturally be a pro rata distribution of the effects of the bankrupt institutions. Here, then, is injustice to the Message in not stating it as it is, but as it is not; and here, also, is injustice to the author, in representing him as opposed to the extension of the bankrupt law to merchants and traders, when the records of this Senate bear the evidence of the fact that he has been one of the most able and zealous supporters of such a law applicable to the trading part of the community. I speak of the bill of 1827, brought in by General Hayne, of South Carolina, and earnestly supported by the present Chief Magistrate, then a member of this body. It is unjust to suppose that the present Chief Magistrate would object to a bill which should include now those for whom he so strenuously contended when a member of this body. There is nothing in the recommendation to deter the friends of a general bankrupt law from coming forward to include the trading class with the banking class; on the contrary, there may be something to encourage them. A general bill, to include banks as well as traders, might combine more support than the bills for the latter class alone have heretofore received. Besides, if the President had expressly recommended the exclusion of other classes from the bill, it would have been no impediment to the action of Congress. His recommendation would have been no prohibition upon their powers. They might have included what classes they pleased; and if they included those for which he contended in 1827, the bill might have become the more acceptable to him on that account.

The Senator from Massachusetts objects to our constitutional power to pass such a bankrupt law as the President recommends, qualifying that recommendation, as he does, with a limitation of the law to bankers and banking corporations, and with a primary view to the regulation of a paper money currency. I have shown that this qualification is an error and a mistake; and in doing that, I have sufficiently answered the Senator's objection: but I choose to go further, and to show not only the constitutional right, but the clear expediency of passing such an act as the President recommends, whether merchants and traders shall be included in it or not.

The power of Congress to pass bankrupt laws is expressly given in our constitution, and given without limitation or qualification. It is the fourth in the number of the enumerated powers, and runs thus: "Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." This is a full and clear grant of power. Upon its face it admits of no question, and leaves Congress at full liberty to pass any kind of bankrupt laws they please, limited only by the condition, that whatever laws are passed, they are to be uniform in their operation throughout the United States. Upon the face of our own constitution there is no question of our right to pass a bankrupt law, limited to banks and bankers; but the Senator from Massachusetts,

Law of Bankruptcy against Bankrupt Banks.

[SENATE.]

(Mr. WEBSTER,) and others who have spoken on the same side with him, must carry us to England, and conduct us through the labyrinth of English statute law, and through the chaos of English judicial decisions, to learn what this word bankruptcies, in our constitution, is intended to signify. In this he and they are true to the habits of the legal profession—those habits which, both in Great Britain and our America, have become a proverbial disqualification for the proper exercise of legislative duties. I know, Mr. President, that it is the fate of our lawyers and judges to have to run to British law books to find out the meaning of the phrases contained in our constitution; but it is the business of the legislator, and of the statesman, to take a larger view—to consider the difference between the political institutions of the two countries—to ascend to first principles—to know the causes of events—and to judge how far what was suitable and beneficial to one might be prejudicial and inapplicable to the other. We stand here as legislators and statesmen, not as lawyers and judges; we have a grant of power to execute, not a statute to interpret; and our first duty is to look to that grant, and see what it is; and our next duty is to look over our country, and see whether there is any thing in it which requires the exercise of that grant of power. This is what our President has done, and what we ought to do. He has looked into the constitution, and seen there an unlimited grant of power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies; and he has looked over the United States, and seen what he believes to be fit subjects for the exercise of that power, namely, about a thousand banks in a state of bankruptcy, and no State possessed of authority to act beyond its own limits in remedying the evils of a mischief so vast and so frightful. Seeing these two things—a power to act, and a subject matter requiring action—the President has recommended the action which the constitution permits, and which the subject requires; but the Senator from Massachusetts has risen in his place, and called upon us to shift our view; transfer our contemplation from the Constitution of the United States to the British statute book—from actual bankruptcy among ourselves to historical bankruptcy in England; and to confine our legislation to the characteristics of the English model.

As a general proposition, I lay it down that Congress is not confined, like jurists and judges, to the English statutory definitions, or the Nisi Prius or King's Bench construction of the phrases known to English legislation, and used in our constitution. Such a limitation would not only narrow us down to a mere lawyer's view of a subject, but would limit us, in point of time, to English precedents, as they stood at the adoption of our constitution, in the year 1789. I protest against this absurdity, and contend that we are to use our granted powers according to the circumstances of our own country, and according to the genius of our republican institutions, and according to the progress of events and the expansion of light and knowledge among ourselves. If not, and if we are to be confined to the "usual objects," and the "usual subjects," and the "usual purposes," of British legislation at the time of the adoption of our constitution, how could Congress ever make a law in relation to steamboats, or to railroad cars, both of which were unknown to British legislation in 1789; and therefore, according to the idea that would send us to England to find out the meaning of our constitution, would not fall within the limits of our legislative authority. Upon their face, the words of the constitution are sufficient to justify the President's recommendation, even as understood by those who impugn that recommendation. The bankrupt clause is very peculiar in its phraseology, and the more strikingly so from its contrast with the phraseology of the naturalization clause, which is coupled with it. Mark this difference: there is to be a uniform rule of naturalization; there are to be uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. One is in the singular, the other in the plural; one is to be a rule, the other are to be laws; one acts on individuals, the other on the subject; and it is bankruptcies that are, and not bankruptcy that is, to be the objects of these uniform laws.

As a proposition, now limited to this particular case, I lay it down that we are not confined to the modern English acceptance of this term bankrupt, for it is a term, not of English, but of Roman origin. It is a term of the civil law, and borrowed by the English from that code. They borrowed from Italy both the name and the purpose of the law; and also the first objects to which the law was applicable. The English were borrowers of every thing connected with this code; and it is absurd in us to borrow from a borrower—to copy from a copyist—when we have the original lender and the original text before us. Bancus and ruptus signifies a broken bank; and the word broken is not metaphorical but literal, and is descriptive of the ancient method of cashiering an insolvent or fraudulent banker, by turning him out of the exchange or market place, and breaking the table to pieces on which he kept his money and transacted his business. The term bankrupt, then, is the civil law from which the English borrowed it, not only applied to bankers, but was confined to them; and it is preposterous in us to limit ourselves to an English definition of a civil law term.

Upon this exposition of our own constitution, and of the civil law derivation of this term bankrupt, I submit that the Congress of the United States is not limited to the English judicial or statutory acceptance of the term; and so I finish the first point which I took in the argument. The next point is more comprehensive, and makes a direct issue with the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) His proposition is, that we must confine our bankrupt legislation to the usual objects, the usual subjects, and the usual purposes of bankrupt laws in England; and that currency (meaning paper money and shin-plasters of course) and banks and banking, are not within the scope of that legislation. I take issue, sir, upon all these points, and am ready to go with the Senator to England, and to contest them, one by one, on the evidences of English history, of English statute law, and of English judicial decision. I say English; for although the Senator did not mention England, yet he could mean nothing else, in his reference to the usual objects, usual subjects, and usual purposes of bankrupt laws. He could mean nothing else. He must mean the English examples and the English practice, or nothing; and he is not a person to speak, and mean nothing.

Protesting against this voyage across the high seas, I nevertheless will make it, and will ask the Senator on what act out of the scores which Parliament has passed upon this subject, or on what period, out of the five hundred years that she has been legislating upon it, will he fix for his example? Or, whether he will choose to view the whole together; and out of the vast chaotic and heterogeneous mass, extract a general power which Parliament possesses, and which he proposes for our exemplar? For myself, I am agreed to consider the question under the whole or under either of these aspects, and, relying on the goodness of the cause, expect a safe deliverance from the contest, take it in any way.

And first, as to the acts passed upon this subject: great is their number, and most dissimilar their provisions. For the first two hundred years, these acts applied to none but aliens, and a single class of aliens, and only for a single act, that of flying the realm to avoid their creditors. Then they were made to apply to all debtors, whether natives or foreigners, engaged in trade or not, and took effect for three acts: 1st. Flying the realm; 2d. Keeping the house to avoid creditors; 3d. Taking sanctuary in a church to avoid arrest. For upwards of two hundred years—to be precise, for two hundred and twenty years—bankruptcy was only treated criminally, and directed against those who would not face their creditors, or abide the laws of the land; and the remedies against them were not civil, but criminal; it was not a distribution of the effects, but corporal punishment, to wit: imprisonment and out-lawry.* The statute of Elizabeth was the first that confined the law to merchants and traders, took in the unfortunate as well as the criminal, extended the acts of bankruptcy to inability as well as to disinclination to pay, discriminated between innocent and fraudulent bankruptcy, and gave to creditors the remedial right to a distribution of effects. This statute opened the door to judicial construction, and the judges went to work to define by decisions, who were traders, and what acts constituted the fact, or showed an intent to delay or to defraud creditors. In making these decisions, the judges reached high enough to get hold of royal companies, and low enough to get hold of shoemakers; the latter upon the ground that they bought the leather out of which they made the shoes; and they even had a most learned consultation to decide whether a man who was a landlord for dogs, and bought dead horses for his four-legged boarders, and then sold the skins and bones of the horse carcasses he had bought, was not a trader within the meaning of the act, and so subject to the statute of bankrupts. These decisions of the judges set the Parliament to work again to preclude judicial constructions by the precision, negatively and affirmatively, of legislative enactment. But, worse and worse! Out of the frying-pan into the fire. The more legislation the more construction; the more statutes Parliament made, the more numerous and more various the judicial decisions; until, besides merchants and traders, near forty other descriptions of persons were included, and the catalogue of bankruptcy acts, innocent or fraudulent, is swelled to a length which requires whole pages to contain it. Among those who are now included by statutory enactment in England, leaving out the great classes comprehended under the names of merchants and traders, are bankers, brokers, factors, and scriveners; insurers against perils by sea and land; warehousemen, wharfingers, packers, builders, carpenters, shipwrights, and victuallers; keepers of inns, hotels, taverns, and coffee-houses; dyers, printers, bleachers, fullers, calendarers, sellers of cattle or sheep; commission merchants and consignees; and the agents of all these classes. These are the affirmative definitions of the classes liable to bankruptcy in England; then come the negative; and among these are farmers, graziers, and common laborers for hire; the receivers general of the king's taxes, and members or subscribers to any incorporated companies established by charter of act of Parliament. And among these negative and affirmative exclusions and inclusions, there are many classes which have repeatedly changed position, and found themselves successively in and out of the bankrupt code. Now, in all this mass of variant and contradictory legislation, what part of it will the Senator from Massachusetts select for his model? The improved, and approved parts, to be sure! But here a barrier presents itself—an impassable wall interposes—a veto power intervenes. For it so happens that the improvements in the British bankrupt code, those parts of it which are considered best, and most worthy of our imitation, are of modern origin—the creations of the last fifty years—actually made since the date of our constitution; and, therefore, not within the pale of its purview and meaning. Yes, sir, made since the establishment of our constitution, and, therefore, not to be included within its contemplation, unless this doctrine of searching into British statutes for the meaning of our constitution, is to make us search forwards to the end of the British empire, as well as search backwards to its beginning. Fact is, that the actual bankrupt code of Great Britain—the one that preserves all that is valuable, that consolidates all that is preserved, and improves all that is improvable, is an act of most recent date—of the reign of George the Fourth, and not yet a dozen years old. Here, then, in going back to England for a model, we are cut off from her improvements in the bankrupt code, and confined to take it as it stood under the reign of the Plantagenets, the Sturarts, and the earlier reigns of the Brunswick sovereigns. This should be a consideration, and sufficiently weighty to turn the scale in favor of looking to our own constitution alone for the extent and circumscription of our powers.

"Whereas divers and sundry persons craftily obtained into their hands great substance of other men's goods, do suddenly flee to parts unknown, or keep their houses, not minding to pay or restore to any of their creditors, their debts and duties, but at their own wills and own pleasures consume the substance obtained by credit of other men, for their own pleasures and delicate living, against all reason, equity, and good conscience."

But let us continue this discussion upon principles of British example and British legislation. We must go to England for one or two things; either for a case in point, to be found in some statute, or a general authority, to be extracted from a general practice. Take it either way, or both ways, and I am ready and able to vindicate, upon British precedents, our perfect right to enact a bankrupt law, limited in its application to banks and bankers. And first, for a case in point, that is to say, an English statute of bankruptcy, limited to these lords of the purse-strings: we have it at once, in the first act ever passed on the subject—the act of the 30th year of the reign of Edward the Third, against the Lombard Jews. Everybody knows that these Jews were bankers, usually formed into companies, who, issuing from Venice, Milan, and other parts of Italy, spread over the south and west of Europe, during the middle ages, and established themselves in every country and city in which the dawn of reviving civilization, and the germ of returning industry, gave employment to money, and laid the foundation of credit. They came to London as early as the thirteenth century, and gave their name to a street which still retains it, as well as it still retains the particular occupation, and the peculiar reputation, which the Lombard Jews established for it. The first law against bankrupts ever passed in England, was against the banking company composed of these Jews, and confined exclusively to them. It remained in force two hundred years, without any alteration whatever, and was nothing but the application of the law of their own country to these bankers in the country of their sojournment—the Italian law, founded upon the civil law, and called in Italy banco rotto, broken bank. It is in direct reference to these Jews, and this application of the exotic bankrupt law to them, that Sir Edward Coke, in his institutes, takes occasion to say that both the name and the wickedness of bankruptcy were of foreign origin, and had been brought into England from foreign parts. It was enacted under the reign of one of the most glorious of the English princes—a reign as much distinguished for the beneficence of its civil administration as for the splendor of its military achievements. This act of itself is a full answer to the whole objection taken by the Senator from Massachusetts. It shows that, even in England, a bankrupt law has been confined to a single class of persons, and that class a banking company. And here I would be willing to close my speech upon a compromise—a compromise founded in reason and reciprocity, and invested with the equitable mantle of a mutual concession. It is this: if we must follow English precedents, let us follow them chronologically and orderly. Let us begin at the beginning, and take them as they rise. Give me a bankrupt law for two hundred years against banks and bankers; and, after that, make another for merchants and traders.

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has emphatically demanded, how the bankrupt power could be fairly exercised by seizing on corporations and bankers, and excluding all the other usual subjects of bankrupt laws? I answer, by following the example of that England to which he has conducted us; by copying the act of the 30th of Edward the Third; by going back to that reign of heroism, patriotism, and wisdom; that reign in which the monarch acquired as much glory from his domestic policy as from his foreign conquests; that reign in which the acquisition of dyers and weavers from Flanders, the observance of law and justice and the encouragement given to agriculture and manufactures, conferred more benefit upon the kingdom, and more glory upon the king, than the splendid victories of Poitiers, Agincourt, and Cressy.

But the Senator may not be willing to yield to this example, this case in point, drawn from his own fountain, and precisely up to the exigency of the occasion. He may want something more, and he shall have it. I will now take the question upon its broadest bottom and fullest merits. I will go to the question of general power—the point of general authority—exemplified by the general practice of the British Parliament, for five hundred years, over the whole subject of bankruptcy. I will try the question upon this basis; and here I lay down the proposition, that this five hundred years of parliamentary legislation on bankruptcy establishes the point of full authority in the British Parliament to act as it pleased on the entire subject of bankruptcies. This is my proposition; and, when it is proved, I shall claim from those who carry me to England for authority, the same amount of power over the subject which the British Parliament has been in the habit of exercising. Now, what is the extent of that power? Happily for me, I, who have to speak, without any inclination for the task; still more happily for those who have to hear me, peradventure without profit or pleasure; happily for both parties, my proposition is already proved, partly by what I have previously advanced, and fully by what every Senator knows. I have already shown the practice of Parliament upon this subject, that it has altered and changed, contracted and enlarged, put in and left out, abolished and created, precisely as it pleased. I have already shown, in my rapid view of English legislation on this subject, that the Parliament exercised plenary power and unlimited authority over every branch of the bankrupt question; that it confined the action of the bankrupt laws to a single class of persons, or extended it to many classes; that it was sometimes confined to foreigners, then applied to natives, and that now it comprehends natives, aliens, denizens, and women; that at one time all debtors were subject to it; then none but merchants and traders; and now, besides merchants and traders, a long list of persons who have nothing to do with trade; that at one time bankruptcy was treated criminally, and its object punished corporeally, while now it is a remedial measure for the benefit of the creditors, and the relief of unfortunate debtors; and that the acts of the debtor which may constitute him a bankrupt, have been enlarged from three or four glaring misdeeds, to so long a catalogue of actions, divided into the heads of innocent and fraudulent; constructive and positive; intentional and unintentional; voluntary and forced; that none but an attorney, with book in hand, can pretend to enumerate them. All this has been shown; and, from all this, it is incontestable that Parliament can do just what it pleases on the subject; and, therefore, our Congress, if referred to England for its powers, can do just what it pleases also. And thus, whether we go by the words of our own constitution, or by a particular example in England, or deduce a general authority from the general practice of that country, the result is still the same: we have authority to limit, if we please, our bankrupt law to the single class of banks and bankers.

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) demands whether bankrupt laws ordinarily extend to corporations, meaning moneyed corporations. I am free to answer that, in point of fact, they do not. But why? because they ought not? or because these corporations have yet been powerful enough, or fortunate enough, to keep their necks out of that noose? Certainly the latter. It is the power of these moneyed corporations in England, and their good fortune in our America, which, enabling them to grasp all advantages on one hand, and to repulse all penalties on the other, has enabled them to obtain express statutory exemption from bankrupt liabilities in England, and to escape, thus far, from similar liabilities in the United States. This, sir, is history, and not invective; it is fact, and not assertion; and I will speedily refresh the Senator's memory, and bring him to recollect why it is, in point of fact, that bankrupt laws do not usually extend to these corporations. And, first, let us look to England, that great exemplar, whose evil examples we are so prompt, whose good ones we are so slow, to imitate. How stands this question of corporation unliability there? By the judicial construction of the statute of Elizabeth, the partners in all incorporated companies were held subject to the bankrupt law; and, under this construction, a commission of bankrupt was issued against Sir John Wolstenholme, a gentleman of large fortune, who had advanced a sum of money on an adventure in the East India Company's trade. The issue of this commission was affirmed by the Court of King's Bench; but this happened to take place in the reign of Charles the Second—that reign during which so little is found worthy of imitation in the Government of Great Britain—and immediately two acts of Parliament were passed, one to annul the judgment of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Sir John Wolstenholme, and the other to prevent any such judgments from being given in future. Here are copies of the two acts:

First act, to annul the judgment.

"Whereas a verdict and judgment was had in the Easter term of the King's Bench, whereby Sir John Wolstenholme, knight, and adventurer in the East India Company, was found liable to a commission of bankrupt only for, and by reason of, a share which he had in the joint stock of said company: Now, &c., Be it enacted, That the said judgment be reversed, annulled, vacated, and for nought held," &c.

Second act, to prevent such judgments in future.

"That whereas divers noblemen and gentlemen, and persons of quality, no ways bred up to trade, do often put in great stocks of money into the East India and Guinea Company: Be it enacted, That no persons adventurers for putting in money or merchandise into the said companies, or for venturing or managing the fishing trade, called the royal fishing trade, shall be reputed or taken to be a merchant or trader within any statutes for bankrupts."

Thus, and for these reasons, were chartered companies and their members exempted from the bankrupt penalties, under the dissolute reign of Charles the Second. It was not the power of the corporations at that time—for the Bank of England was not then chartered, and the East India Company had not then conquered India—which occasioned this exemption; but it was to favor the dignified characters who engaged in the trade—noblemen, gentlemen, and persons of quality. But, afterwards, when the Bank of England had become almost the Government of England, and when the East India Company had acquired the dominions of the Great Mogul, an act of Parliament expressly declared that no member of any incorporated company, chartered by act of Parliament, should be liable to become bankrupt. This act was passed in the reign of George the Fourth, when the Wellington ministry was in power, and when liberal principles and human rights were at the last gasp. So much for these corporation exemptions in England; and if the Senator from Massachusetts finds any thing in such instances worthy of imitation, let him stand forth and proclaim it.

But, sir, I am not yet done with my answer to this question: do such laws ordinarily extend to corporations at all? I answer, most decidedly, that they do! that they apply in England to all the corporations, except those specially excepted by the act of George the Fourth; and these are few in number, though great in power—powerful, but few—nothing but units to myriads compared to those which are not excepted. The words of that act are: "Member of, or subscriber to, any incorporated commercial or trading companies, established by charter act of Parliament." These words cut off at once the many ten thousand corporations in the British empire existing by prescription, or incorporated by letters patent from the King; and then they cut off all those even chartered by act of Parliament, which are not commercial or trading in their nature. This saves but a few out of the hundreds of thousands of corporations which abound in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. It saves, or rather confirms, the exemption of the Bank of England, which is a trader in money, and it confirms, also, the exemption of the East India Company, which is, in contemplation of law at least, a commercial company; and it saves or exempts a few others deriving charters of incorporation from Parliament; but it leaves subject to the law the whole wilderness of corporations, of which there are thousands in London alone, which derive from prescription or letters patent; and it also leaves subject to the same laws all the corporations created by charter act of Parliament, which are not commercial or trading. The words of the act are very peculiar—"charter act of Parliament;" so that corporations by a general law, without a special charter act, are not included in the exemption. This answer, added to what has been previously said, must be a sufficient reply to the Senator's question, whether bankrupt laws ordinarily extend to corporations? Sir, out of the myriad of corporations in Great Britain, the bankrupt law extends to the whole, except some half dozen or dozen.

So much for the exemption of these corporations in England; now for our America. We never had but one bankrupt law in the United States, and that for the short period of three or four years. It was passed under the administration of the elder Mr. Adams, and repealed under Mr. Jefferson. It copied the English acts including among the subjects of bankruptcy, bankers, brokers, and factors. Corporations were not included; and it is probable that no question was raised about them, as, up to that time, their number was few, and their conduct generally good. But, at a later date, the enactment of a bankrupt law was again attempted in our Congress; and, at that period, the multiplication and the misconduct of banks presented them to the minds of many as proper subjects for the application of the law; I speak of the bill of 1827, brought into the Senate, and lost. That bill, like all previous laws since the time of George II., was made applicable to bankers, brokers, and factors. A Senator from North Carolina (Mr. BRANCH) moved to include banking corporations. The motion was lost, there being but twelve votes for it; but in this twelve there were some whose names must carry weight to any cause to which they are attached. The twelve were, Messrs. Barton, Benton, Branch, Cobb, Dickerson, Hendricks, Macon, Noble, Randolph, Reed, Smith of South Carolina, and White. The whole of the friends of the bill, twenty-one in number, voted against the proposition, (the present Chief Magistrate in the number,) and for the obvious reason, with some, of not encumbering the measure they were so anxious to carry, by putting into it a new and untried provision. And thus stands our own legislation on this subject. In point of fact, then, chartered corporations have thus far escaped bankrupt penalties, both in England and in our America; but ought they to continue to escape? This is the question—the true and important inquiry, which is now to occupy the public mind.

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) says the object of bankrupt laws has no relation to currency; that their object is simply to distribute the effects of insolvent debtors among their creditors. So says the Senator, but what says history? What says the practice of Great Britain? I will show you what it says, and for that purpose will read a passage from McCulloh's notes on Smith's Wealth of Nations. He says:

"In 1814-'15, and '16, no fewer than 240 country banks stopped payment, and ninety-two commissions of bankruptcy were issued against these establishments, being at the rate of one commission against every seven and a half of the total number of country banks existing in 1813."

Two hundred and forty stopped payment at one dash, and ninety-two subjected to commissions of bankruptcy. They were not indeed chartered banks, for there are none such in England, except the Bank of England; but they were legalized establishments, existing under the first joint-stock bank act of 1708, and they were banks of issue. Yet they were subjected to the bankrupt laws, ninety-two of them in a single season of bank catalepsy; their broken "promises to pay" were taken out of circulation; their doors closed; their directors and officers turned out; their whole effects, real and personal, their money, debts, books, paper, and every thing, put into the hands of assignees; and to these assignees, the holders of their notes forwarded their demands, and were paid, every one in equal proportion—as the debts of the bank were collected, and its effects converted into money; and this without expense or trouble to any one of them. Ninety-two banks in England shared this fate in a single season of bank mortality; five hundred more could be enumerated in other seasons, many of them superior in real capital, credit, and circulation, to our famous chartered banks, most of which are banks of moonshine, built upon each other's paper, and the whole ready to fly sky-high the moment any one of the concern becomes sufficiently inflated to burst. The immediate effect of this application of the bankrupt laws to banks in England, is two-fold: first, to save the general currency from depreciation, by stopping the issue and circulation of irredeemable notes; secondly, to do equal justice to all creditors, high and low, rich and poor, present and absent, the widow and the orphan, as well as the cunning and the powerful, by distributing their effects in proportionate amounts to all who hold demands. This is the operation of bankrupt laws upon banks in England, and all over the British empire; and it happens to be the precise check upon the issue of broken bank paper, and the precise remedy for the injured holders of their dishonored paper, which the President recommends. Here is his recommendation, listen to it:

“In the mean time, it is our duty to provide all the remedies against a depreciated paper currency which the constitution enables us to afford. The Treasury Department, on several former occasions, has suggested the propriety and importance of a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations and other bankers. Through the instrumentality of such a law, a salutary check may doubtless be imposed on the issues of paper money, and an effectual remedy given to the citizen, in a way at once equal in all parts of the Union, and fully authorized by the constitution.”

The Senator from Massachusetts says he would not, intentionally, do injustice to the Message or its author; and doubtless he is not conscious of violating that benevolent determination; but here is injustice, both to the Message and to its author; injustice in not quoting the Message as it is, and showing that it proposes a remedy to the citizen, as well as a check upon insolvent issues; injustice to the author in denying that the object of bankrupt laws has any relation to currency, when history shows that these laws are the actual instrument for regulating and purifying the whole local paper currency of the entire British empire, and saving that country from the frauds, losses, impositions, and demoralization of an irredeemable paper money.

The Senator from Massachusetts says the object of bankrupt laws has no relation to currency. If he means hard-money currency, I agree with him; but if he means bank notes, as I am sure he does, then I point him to the British bankrupt code, which applies to every bank of issue in the British empire, except the Bank of England itself, and the few others, four or five in number, which are incorporated by charter acts. All the joint stock banks, all the private banks, all the bankers of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, are subject to the law of bankruptcy. Many of these establishments are of great capital and credit; some having hundreds, or even thousands of partners; and many of them having ten, or twenty, or thirty, and some even forty branches. They are almost the exclusive furnishers of the local and common bank-note currency; the Bank of England notes being chiefly used in the great cities for large mercantile and Government payments. These joint-stock banks, private companies, and individual bankers are, practically, in the British empire what the local banks are in the United States. They perform the same functions, and differ in name only; not in substance nor in conduct. They have no charters, but they have a legalized existence; they are not corporations, but they are allowed by law to act in a body; they furnish the actual paper currency of the great body of the people of the British empire, as much so as our local banks furnish the mass of paper currency to the people of the United States. They have had twenty-four millions sterling (one hundred and twenty millions of dollars) in circulation at one time; a sum nearly equal to the greatest issue ever known in the United States, and more than equal to the whole bank-note circulation of the present day. They are all subject to the law of bankruptcy, and their twenty-four millions sterling of currency along with them; and five hundred of them have been shut up and wound up under commissions of bankruptcy in the last forty years; and yet the Senator from Massachusetts informs us that the object of bankrupt laws has no relation to currency!

But it is not necessary to go all the way to England to find bankrupt laws having relation to currency. The act passed in our own country, about forty years ago, applied to bankers; the bill brought into the House of Representatives, about fifteen years ago, by a gentleman then, and now, a Representative from the city of Philadelphia, (Mr. SERGEANT,) also applied to bankers; and the bill brought into this Senate, ten years ago, by a Senator from South Carolina, not now a member of this body, (General HAYNE,) still applied to bankers. These bankers, of whom there were many in the United States, and of whom Girard, in the East, and Yeatman and Woods, in the West, were the most considerable—these bankers all issued paper money; they all issued currency. The act, then, of 1798, if it had continued in force, or the two bills just referred to, if they had become law, would have operated upon these bankers and their banks—would have stopped their issues, and put their establishments into the hands of assignees, and distributed their effects among their creditors. This, certainly, would have been having some relation to currency: so that, even with our limited essays towards a bankrupt system, we have scaled the outworks of the banking empire; we have laid hold of bankers, but not of banks; we have reached the bank of Girard, but not the Girard bank; we have applied our law to the bank of Yeatman and Woods, but not to the rabble of petty corporations which have not the title of their capital and credit. We have gone as far as bankers, but not as far as banks; and now give me a reason for the difference. Give me a reason why the act of 1798, the bill of Mr. SERGEANT, in 1821, and the bill of General HAYNE, in 1827, should not include banks as well as bankers. They both perform the same function—that of issuing paper currency. They both involve the same mischief when they stop payment—that of afflicting the country with a circulation of irredeemable and depreciated paper money. They are both culpable in the same mode, and in the same degree; for they are both violators of their “promises to pay.” They both exact a general credit from the community, and they both abuse that credit. They both have creditors, and they both have effects; and these creditors have as much right to a pro rata distribution of the effects in one case as in the other. Why, then, a distinction in favor of the bank? Is it because corporate bodies are superior to natural bodies? because artificial beings are superior to natural beings? or, rather, is it not because corporations are assemblages of men, and assemblages are more powerful than single men; and, therefore, these corporations, in addition to all their vast privileges, are also to have the privilege of being bankrupt, and afflicting the country with the evils of bankruptcy, without themselves being subjected to the laws of bankruptcy? Be this as it may—be the cause what it will—the decree has gone forth for the decision of the question—for the trial of the issue—for the verdict and judgment upon the claim of the banks. They have many privileges and exemptions now, and they have the benefit of all laws against the community. They pay no taxes; the property of the stockholders is not liable for their debts; they sue their debtors, sell their property, and put their bodies in jail. They have the privilege of stamping paper money; the privilege of taking interest upon double, treble, and quadruple their actual money. They put up and put down the price of property, labor, and produce, as they please. They have the monopoly of making the actual currency. They are strong enough to suppress the constitutional money, and to force their own paper upon the community, and then to redeem it or not as they please. And is it to be tolerated, that, in addition to all these privileges, and all these powers, they are to be exempted from the law of bankruptcy? the only law of which they are afraid, and the only one which can protect the country against their insolvent issues, and give a fair chance for payment to the numerous holders of their violated “promises to pay!”

I have discussed, Mr. President, the right of Congress to apply a bankrupt law to banking corporations; I have discussed it on the words of our own constitution, on the practice of England, and on the general authority of Parliament; and on each and every ground, as I fully believe, vindicated our right to pass the law. The right is clear; the expediency is manifest and glaring. Of all the objects upon the earth, banks of circulation are the fittest subjects of bankrupt laws. They act in secret, and they exact a general credit. Nobody knows their means, yet everybody must trust them. They send their “promises to pay” far and near. They push them into everybody’s hands; they make them small to go into small hands—into the hands of the laborer, the widow, the helpless, the ignorant. Suddenly the bank stops payment; all these helpless holders of their notes are without pay, and without remedy. A few on the spot get a little; those at a distance get nothing. For each to sue, is a vexatious and a losing business. The only adequate remedy—the only one that promises any justice to the body of the community, and the helpless holders of small notes—is the bankrupt remedy of assignees to distribute the effects. This makes the real effects available. When a bank stops, it has little or no specie, but it has, or ought to have, a good mass of solvent debts. At present, all these debts are unavailable to the community—they go to a few large and favored creditors; and those who are most in need get nothing. But a stronger view remains to be taken of these debts: the mass of them are due from the owners and managers of the banks—from the presidents, directors, cashiers, stockholders, attorneys; and these people do not make themselves pay. They do not sue themselves, nor protest themselves. They sue and protest others, and sell out their property, and put their bodies in jail; but, as for themselves, who are the main debtors, it is another affair! They take their time, and usually wait till the notes are heavily depreciated, and then square off with a few cents in the dollar! A commission of bankruptcy is the remedy for this evil; assignees of the effects of the bank, are the persons to make these owners, and managers, and chief debtors to the institutions, pay up. Under the bankrupt law, every holder of a note, no matter how small in amount, nor how distant the holder may reside, on forwarding the note to assignees, will receive his ratable proportion of the bank’s effects, without expense, and without trouble to himself. It is a most potent, a most proper, and most constitutional remedy against delinquent banks. It is an equitable and a brave remedy. It does honor to the President who recommended it, and is worthy of the successor of Jackson.

Our constitution contains three most vital prohibitions, of which the Federal Government is the guardian and the guaranty, and which are now publicly trodden under foot. No State shall emit bills of credit; no State shall make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. No State shall do these things. So says the constitution under which we live, and which it is the duty of every citizen to protect, preserve, and defend. But a new power has sprung up among us, and has annulled the whole of these prohibitions. That new power is the oligarchy of banks. It has filled the whole land with bills of credit; for it is admitted on all hands that bank notes, not convertible into specie, are bills of credit. It has suppressed the constitutional currency, and made depreciated paper money a forced tender in payment of every debt. It has violated all its own contracts, and compelled all individuals, and the Federal Government and State Governments, to violate theirs, and has obtained from sovereign States an express sanction, or a silent acquiescence, in this double violation of sacred obligations, and in this triple annulment of constitutional prohibitions. It is our duty to bring, or to try to bring, this new power under subordination to the laws and the Government. It is our duty to go to the succor of the constitution—to rescue, if possible, these prohibitions from daily, and public, and permanent infraction. The application of the bankrupt law to this new power, is the way to effect this rescue—the way to cause these vital prohibitions to be respected and observed, and to do it in a way to prevent collisions between the States and the Federal Government. The prohibitions are upon the States; it is they who are not to do these things, and, of course, are not to authorize others to do what they cannot do themselves. The banks are their delegates in this three-fold violation of the constitution; and, in proceeding against these delegates, we avoid collision with the States.

It is said that bankruptcy is a severe remedy to apply to banks. It may be answered that it is not more severe here than in England, where it applies to all banks of issue except the Bank of England, and a few others; and it is not more severe to them than it is to merchants and traders, and to bankers and brokers, and all unincorporated banks. Personally, I was disposed to make large allowances for the conduct of the banks. Our own improvidence tempted them into an expansion of near forty millions, in 1835 and 1836, by giving them the national domain to bank upon; a temptation which they had not fortitude to resist, and which expanded them to near the bursting point. Then they were driven almost to a choice of bankruptcy between themselves and their debtors, by the act which required near forty millions to be distributed in masses, and at brief intervals, among the States. Some failures were inevitable under these circumstances, and I was disposed to make liberal allowances for them; but there are three things for which the banks have no excuse, and which should forever weigh against their claims to favor and confidence. These things are, first, the political aspect which the general suspension of payment was permitted to assume, and which it still wears; secondly, the issue and use of shin-plasters, and refusal to pay silver-change, when there are eighty millions of specie in the country; thirdly, the refusal, by the deposit banks, to pay out the sums which had been severed from the Treasury, and stood in the names of disbursing officers, and was actually due to those who were performing work and labor, and rendering daily services to the Government. For these three things there is no excuse; and, while memory retains their recollection, there can be no confidence in those who have done them.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the consideration of the President's recommendation for a bankrupt law against banking institutions, have deferred their report, and moved to be discharged. I shall make no objection to the discharge, as legislation on this subject can be delayed, without material prejudice to any interest, until the regular session. I shall look for a bill then, either with or without the inclusion of other classes; and shall consider the decision upon that bill as settling the question of the rights of the people, and the supremacy of their Government, on one hand, and of the pretensions of the banks, and their permanent supremacy over laws, Governments, constitutions, and the people, on the other.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied to Mr. BENTON, arguing against the constitutionality and policy of the proposed partial bankrupt law, and commenting on the nature and causes of the present distressed condition of the country.

The motion to discharge the committee lies over one day.

FRIDAY, October 13.

President of the Senate pro tem.

The VICE PRESIDENT having, at the close of yesterday's sitting, stated to the Senate that he should not resume the chair during the present session,

The Senate proceeded to the election, by ballot, of a President pro tem.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, having received nearly all the votes which were given, was declared duly elected President of the Senate pro tem.

Mr. KING, on taking the chair, briefly returned his thanks to the Senate for the distinguished honor conferred upon him. It had often been his fortune to be elected by the voice of the people to distinguished offices, but this election conferred more honor, as coming from so elevated a body. The favor of the people was often obtained without merit, and as often lost without fault. Not so was it with this high evidence of the approbation of the Senate, for which he returned his thanks. It should be his aim and endeavor to discharge the duties imposed upon him in a manner satisfactory to the Senate, and with perfect impartiality to every Senator.

Law of Bankruptcy.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. GRUNDY to discharge the Judiciary Committee from the further consideration of that part of the President's Message relating to a bankrupt law.

Mr. SOUTHARD spoke with much earnestness against the Executive recommendation, and against the constitutionality and expediency of any bankrupt law, except in relation to merchants and traders, and for the exclusive purpose of preventing fraud, and an inequitable distribution of the property of bankrupts; dwelling at times on the present condition of the country, the causes which led to it, and the prospective designs of the administration.

The question on discharging the committee was agreed to.

MONDAY, October 16

Adjournment.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, it was Ordered, That a committee from the Senate be appointed to join a committee from the House to inform the President of the United States that the two Houses had completed the business before them, and were ready to adjourn.

Messrs. GRUNDY, CLAY of Alabama, and NORVELL, were appointed said committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KENT offered a resolution granting to the Chaplain of the Senate the same compensation for this extra session as the House had voted to its Chaplain.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, the Secretary of the Senate was ordered to inform the House that the Senate, having finished the business before it, was now ready to adjourn.

Mr. NORVELL, from the joint committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, informed the Senate that said committee, having waited upon the President, had been informed by him that he had no further communication to make the two Houses, and that the President wished the members, individually and collectively, health and prosperity.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FRANKLIN, their clerk, that the House was ready to adjourn.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. NILES, the Senate adjourned sine die.

TUESDAY, September 5.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, from the Select Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress were organized, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President would transmit a Message to them in writing that day at 12 o'clock.

FRIDAY, September 8.

Death of Mr. Standefor.

Mr. BELL announced to the House the death of his late colleague, the Hon. JAMES STANDEFER, in the following terms:

Mr. Speaker: The melancholy duty has been assigned me, by my colleagues, of announcing to the House the death of one of our members.

JAMES STANDEFER, while on his journey to this place, in order to enter upon his duties as a member of this House, was, on the 20th of last month, suddenly arrested by the hand of the Great Destroyer of human existence. By this unexpected event, the country is deprived, at a period of more than common interest and difficulty, of the services of a most devoted and patriotic public servant, and this House of an honest and worthy member. My late colleague was remarkable for an equanimity of temper, and a kindness of feeling, combined with a justness of perception in all the concerns of life, at least of ordinary occurrence, which, without the advantages of early culture, or of books, at any time, procured for him throughout a life which was not short, the respect and esteem of numerous friends, and raised him to the rank of a useful and meritorious citizen. The same qualities of heart and mind, aided by a reputation for honesty which he nobly earned, and continued to maintain by the most scrupulous regard for truth and justice in all his transactions, public and private, caused him to be repeatedly chosen to the Legislature of his own State; of which body he was a useful and respected member. He was, for many years, a member of this, and I am sure that his quiet and unobtrusive manners—his punctual discharge of all the duties assigned him, in the organization of the House, must have secured the respect of his associates. To these evidences of his worth, I might add, that in the late war with Great Britain, he approved himself an intrepid soldier. He was, above most men I have known, who have risen in any degree into public view, under similar circumstances, free from the pride and vanity of mere station; never anxious to appear what he was not; content to be classed with the useful and faithful, he made no pretensions; had no aspirations beyond his real deserts. If, therefore, my lamented colleague cannot be said to have possessed any of those shining endowments which are required to make a figure in this House, which strike our fancy, or command our admiration, he might still justly lay claim to other and humbler attributes, which, upon the whole, constitute a character of solid merit, and often one of more enduring fame; and that the due and usual tribute of respect be paid to his memory, by this House, I move you, sir, the resolution which I hold in my hand:

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of this House will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. BELL then moved that the House adjourn.

And it adjourned accordingly.

MONDAY, September 11.

Payment of Specie to Members of Congress.

The resolution offered on Thursday last by Mr. BIDDLE, of Pennsylvania, and lying on the Speaker's table, having been again read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House whether a letter, purporting to be addressed by him to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, offering payment in specie to members of Congress, is authentic; if so, to what other claimants on the Treasury a similar offer has been made, and what principle of discrimination, if any, has been adopted in the medium of payment to the public creditors."

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, offered the following resolution; which lies for consideration one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as possible, to communicate to this House the amount of the appropriations of the past and present year remaining unexpended: the amount required to fulfil all existing engagements contracted prior to the 1st day of June last, and all existing engagements contracted since that time. Also, the amount of moneys drawn from the Treasury and placed in the hands of disbursing officers or agents on the 1st day of May last, and at the present time. And that he also report what objects of public expenditure can, with the least injury to the public service, be either wholly dispensed with during the present year, or have any material reduction.

Reference of the Message and Report.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the Message of the President to Congress was then taken up, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the House went thereon into committee, Mr. J. Q. ADAMS in the chair.

Mr. CAMBRELENG introduced two resolutions, as follows:

1. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the finances of the country, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

2. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to a bankrupt law, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolutions were severally agreed to; the committee rose and reported them to the House, and they were concurred in.

Mr. CAMBRELENG submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, as relates to the finances of the country, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and that so much of said report as relates to a bankrupt law be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Business for the Session.

Mr. F. O. J. SMITH, of Maine, said that he wished to ascertain the sense of the House as to what was to be the business of the session before it; and asked leave to introduce a resolution. Leave was given, and the following resolution was introduced:

"Resolved, That the action of the several standing committees of this House, on all matters not embraced by the Message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress, communicated on the second day of the current session, be suspended until the commencement of the annual session of Congress in December next, and that the consideration of all petitions on such suspended matters be also postponed to the period above specified."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the resolution until Wednesday.

The motion to postpone was rejected.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, moved to rescind the resolution, by inserting "with the exception of private business." There was no reason, he said, why the private bills which had been hanging here for years, should not be acted on, in the intervals of time, when the House was not otherwise employed. The amendment was lost.

The original resolution was agreed to.

TUESDAY, September 12.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, on leave, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill:

A bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the transfer of the fourth instalment of the deposits directed to be made with the States under the thirteenth section of the act of June 23, 1836, be, and the same is hereby, postponed until further provision by law.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would merely mention for the information of the House, that that was the only bill the committee could agree upon at this morning's session. There would, probably, be two other bills requiring the most urgent action of the House to-morrow morning.

The above bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Election of Chaplain.

The House then, on motion of Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, went into the election of a Chaplain.

On the second ballot, Rev. Mr. Tuston received 135 votes, which being a majority of the whole, he was declared duly elected Chaplain to the House.

WEDNESDAY, September 13.

Order of Business.

The SPEAKER stated that, having considered the extent of the resolution adopted by the House on Monday, touching the course of its business, and compared it with the 16th rule of order, which requires the calling for petitions, he had been constrained to come to the conclusion that it was his duty, under that rule, to call the House, by States, for petitions; but that, if any should be presented which had no immediate relation to the special subjects recommended in the President's Message to the attention of Congress, at its present session, the House could enter into no action concerning them, but that they must, as of course, lie on the table until the period of the regular session on the first Monday of December next.

Under this decision, the States were thereupon called on for petitions, and a very few were presented, which had no reference to the currency; while a number were offered which did relate to that subject, and the prayer of which was either in favor of, or adverse to, the establishment of a national bank; and which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; several of them were ordered to be printed.

Proposed Issue of Treasury Notes.

MR. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The United States, Mexico, and Texas.

The following resolution, moved yesterday by Mr. ADAMS, was read, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, so far as may be consistent with the public interest, all the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Mexico, concerning the boundary between them, and particularly concerning any proposition for a cession of territory belonging to the Mexican confederation to the United States; and also all correspondence relating thereto between the Department of State and the diplomatic representatives of the United States in Mexico, and of the said Department with those of the Mexican Republic, accredited to the Government of the United States.

MR. ADAMS observed that, as this was merely a call for information, if no opposition should be made to its adoption, he should content himself with simply asking a vote of the House upon it, without accompanying it with any remarks.

MR. HOWARD (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations) said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts wished for this correspondence merely that it might be printed and thrown before the House and the country, he should make no opposition to the call; but if it was his intention to move for its reference to a committee, in violation of the plan which had been chalked out by the House for the course of its business at the present session, he should certainly oppose the adoption of the resolution. In the meanwhile, he hoped to be permitted to add a word or two in reference to the first of the resolutions. He would suggest whether the House, by merely passing a silent vote adopting the resolution, might not find itself to have established a precedent which might hereafter prove very inconvenient. He did not exactly comprehend what the object of the honorable gentleman could be in going back to the old question of our Mexican boundary, now that an intermediate province had been interposed between us and Mexico. No doubt the gentleman had good reasons, which would appear in due time.

MR. ADAMS said it was not his intention to bring the subject of our relations with Mexico into discussion at this time; but merely to obtain the information called for in the resolution, and have it printed for the use of the House and of the nation.

The resolution was, without debate, agreed to.

The following resolution, also moved yesterday by Mr. ADAMS, was read, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whether any proposition has been made on the part of the Republic of Texas to the Government of the United States for the annexation of the said Republic of Texas to this Union, and if such proposition has been made, what answer has been returned, and all correspondence which has taken place relating thereto.

MR. WISE said he should vote against the resolution; his reason was that he was in possession of information from a high source, and on which he could explicitly, positively rely, that the correspondence referred to was not in a condition to be made public, and that it might be injurious to the public interest should it now be disclosed.

MR. HAYNES suggested to the mover to modify his resolution by the annexation of the ordinary qualifying clause, "if the communication of the same shall, in his opinion, be consistent with the public interest."

Mr. HAYNES' amendment prevailed, and the resolution thus amended, was adopted.

THURSDAY, September 14.

Extension of Merchants' Bonds.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing a further postponement of the payment of duty bonds and for other purposes.

Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

FRIDAY, September 15.

Mr. LINCOLN said that he had been charged with the care and presentation of numerous memorials, subscribed by more than three thousand of his immediate constituents, remonstrating in the most earnest manner against the annexation of Texas to the United States, and more especially against the admission of that country into the Federal Union. After the resolution adopted by the House, which restricted the action of the session to the subjects embraced in the President's Message, he had intended to have retained these memorials in his possession, until the occasion offered for the consideration of the subject to which they relate. But the extraordinary debate to which the proposition of his honorable colleague (the resolution of Mr. ADAMS, asking information from the President) had subsequently given rise, made it his duty, as he deemed, to present, without further delay, these expressions of the sentiments of his constituents. In moving, as he should be constrained to do, under the resolution of the House, that the memorials be laid upon the table, he begged leave to give notice that he should call them up for consideration whenever any proposition for the annexation of Texas to the United States should engage the attention of the House.

Mr. LINCOLN then presented sundry other petitions, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the United States, which were laid on the table.

The same course was taken with a large number more, of a similar tenor, presented by Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. EVERETT, and other gentlemen from the Western as well as the Eastern States.

Mr. ADAMS presented a memorial praying for retrenchment and reform, (a laugh.) He said he had been aware that these words would occasion only a universal shout of laughter in the House, but he had held it to be his duty to present the memorial, because it contained one suggestion, that the House should reduce the pay of its members from $8 to $4 per diem. He could not reconcile it to his conscience to withhold such a petition from the House a single day longer. (A laugh.)

Regulation of Government Receivers.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill imposing additional duties as depositories, in certain cases, on public officers.

The bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the same committee, reported further a bill "adjusting the remaining claims on the late deposit banks," which received the same reference and order.

Public Expenditures.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 11th instant, calling upon him to report the amount of appropriations of the past and present years remaining unexpended; the amount required to fulfil existing engagements, contracted prior to the first day of June last; the existing engagements since that time; the amount of money drawn from the Treasury, and placed in the hands of disbursing officers since the first day of May last; and what objects of public expenditure can, with the least injury to the public service, be dispensed with.

The communication was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

September 14, 1837.

SIR: This report is submitted in compliance with the following resolution, passed on the 11th instant:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as possible, to communicate to this House the amount of the appropriations of the past and present years remaining unexpended; the amount required to fulfil all existing engagements contracted prior to the first day of June last, and all existing engagements contracted since that time; also the amount of money drawn from the Treasury and placed in the hands of disbursing officers or agents on the first day of May last and at the present time; and that he also report what objects of public expenditure can, with the least injury to the public service, be either wholly dispensed with during the present year, or bear any material reduction."

The tabular statement annexed shows, as desired, "the amount of the appropriations of the past and present years remaining unexpended" to be $24,075,239 37. (A.)

In reply to the inquiry as to "the amount of money drawn from the Treasury, and placed in the hands of disbursing officers or agents on the first day of May last, and at the present time," I would state that at the former period it appears to have been $5,264,052 95, and at the latter $5,049,540 76. It may be useful to add that both sums are much larger than they would otherwise be, in consequence of the unusual amount of deposits by officers of the mint.

In relation to "what objects of public expenditure can, with the least injury to the public service, be either wholly dispensed with during the present year, or bear any material reduction," I would observe that a minute and critical examination on this point was instituted in May last by this Department. The result of it was, that enough of it could and would be postponed till next year, to amount to about $15,000,000.

Consequently, the expenditures during the present year were estimated in my recent report upon that basis, after every delay of them which the public interest may permit. It is therefore expected that, of the outstanding appropriations now exceeding $24,000,000, not much over $9,000,000 will necessarily be required to be expended during the residue of the year.

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

The Florida War.

Since the resolution passed, further inquiries on this point were instituted in connection with the other departments of the Government; but the result has not been essentially varied from that to which the Department arrived last spring. The particular heads of appropriations, that it is supposed need not, and will not, be expended in full during the year, and the amounts under each, are very numerous and difficult to be prepared, but if desired will be submitted hereafter with as little delay as practicable.

The only remaining inquiry is "the amount required to fulfil all existing engagements contracted prior to the first day of June last, and all existing engagements contracted since that time."

Each Department has been requested to furnish a statement of this subject as early as it can be completed. But some delay being unavoidable, it has, in the mean time, been deemed advisable to submit immediately the answer to the other portions of the resolution.

Those statements will be made as comprehensive as possible, but can, of course, relate to only a small part of the whole appropriations of Congress, which it has been, and will be, necessary to expend during the year. All salaries of Judicial, Executive, or other officers; the expenses of foreign intercourse; the pay and subsistence in both the army and navy; all pensions; all Indian annuities; all private bills which have passed; many miscellaneous appropriations, with several other items, stand independent of any special engagements or contracts made by any public officer, and cannot, therefore, enter into this computation. Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. K. POLK, Speaker H. R.

TUESDAY, September 19.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was yesterday ruled out of order by the Chair:

Resolved, That the power of annexing the people of any independent foreign State to this Union, is a power not delegated by the Constitution of the United States to their Congress, or to any Department of their Government, but reserved to the people.

Mr. HAMER objecting,

Mr. ADAMS moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of enabling him to introduce the resolution; but the motion was negative.

The States being then again called in order for the offering of resolutions, and Massachusetts having been called, Mr. ADAMS again offered the same resolution, and moved that it lie on the table; which motion was agreed to.

The Florida War.

Mr. WISE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, by ballot, to inquire into the causes of the extraordinary delays and failures, and the enormous expenditures, which have attended the prosecution of the war against the Indians in Florida; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that it have power to sit in the recess, and that it make report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired why it was proposed that the committee should sit during the recess?

Mr. WISE said that the reason must be obvious. The committee could not even commence its labors before then; and there was little use in raising the committee, if its labors were to be confined to the adjournment of the present session of Congress. It was most extraordinary that two major-generals employed in this war had been successively arraigned and tried by courts-martial, while the only successful commander, General Clinch, when called as a witness in the trial, should have testified that no commanding general or subordinate officer was blame-worthy for the failure of the campaigns, but that the blame lay at the door of the War Department. In reply, the world had seen a labored defence from the late Secretary of War, General Cass; it saw the war still raging; and it was but yesterday that, in the midst of the general distress of the country, with a bankrupt Treasury, (bankrupt with a surplus of means!) the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had called for more than a million and a half of dollars to prosecute this ill-starred contest. Sitting in that House, as a representative of the people, while he never would hesitate in voting any necessary appropriation which was asked for, and would not stop to inquire how former appropriations had been expended, or how the sum asked for was to be applied, he felt it his duty, particularly at such a time as this, to inquire how the millions already given, and given on the mere request of the chairman of a committee, without even a statement of the Department to back it, without an estimate, and without a report, had been spent, or rather wasted.

It was now universally admitted, he believed, that in this branch of the public concerns there had been mal-administration: that great errors had been committed. Was it not worth inquiry how the public money, so lavishly and hastily appropriated, had been expended? and was it not time that some steps should be taken to put an end to a war so disgraceful to the country? The universal opinion now was, that the course of the major-general now in command was quite as objectionable as that of either of his predecessors. One of these had been publicly tried; and, though the court-martial who sat upon his conduct had honorably acquitted him, its verdict had been by the order of the late Executive expunged. Shall we submit any longer to such a state of things? He said he had proposed that the committee of inquiry should be appointed by ballot: for this was no party movement. The administration was as much interested in the inquiry as the opposition, and so was the country at large. As the divisions of party stood now nearly upon a balance, all would have an opportunity of fearlessly placing such individuals upon the proposed committee as they thought would best discharge the duty to be accomplished.

Mr. EVERETT said that it had been his intention, when the bill making appropriations for the Florida war should come up for discussion, to offer some remarks on the general subject of that war, and the manner in which it had been conducted. At present he should regret extremely that any remarks should be indulged in, which went injuriously to affect the reputation of the late Secretary of War. Mr. E. had grounds to know in what manner that officer had acted in the discharge of his public duty, and he was satisfied that, whatever might have been the disasters of this war, no part of the responsibility rested justly on him. This had been his conviction then; it was his conviction now. Where the blame did rest he should not say. It was true, General Clinch had made use of strong expressions in his testimony before the court-martial; but he was persuaded they arose from a misapprehension of the real facts of the case. That brave man had not been fully aware of the position in which Gen. Cass stood.

Mr. GLASCOCK said: As to the question of who was in fault, he should express no opinion; but he must be permitted to say, in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) in respect to the late Secretary of War, that whenever a thorough investigation should take place, the War Department would have no cause for fear. It had been Mr. G.'s wish that such a resolution should be moved; because he had the firmest conviction that the character of General Cass would remain, as it had hitherto ever done, pure and spotless. From the expressions which had been employed, by some officers engaged in the Florida campaigns, as well as from the remarks which had now dropped from the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. G. was anxious that an investigation should be gone into: he hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. CUSHING tendered his acknowledgments to his friend from Virginia for bringing forward this resolution. If there was any thing, in the whole course of the administration, which demanded investigation—any thing to which the people looked, as to a rotten point; a blot, a shame on the national reputation, it was the conduct of that Florida war. He trusted the gentleman would press this measure to an issue, and would not cease until the whole management of that contest should be fully unfolded. Year after year, army after army had been marched into the morasses of that peninsula; and general after general had been dismissed, he would not say in disgrace, but to the tender mercies of a court-martial; the blood of our people had been wasted, had been squandered, in those arid sands; and all for what? To force a few Indians from a desert tract of country, utterly useless to any but themselves, and in violation of all that was dear to them, and to the perpetual disgrace of our arms and of the national character. More: we had enlisted Indians themselves to destroy each other; we had done that which, in the era of our national revolution, had been branded by the indignant voice of Chatham as the disgrace of the British arms. As if the poor wretches did not perish fast enough by the usual progress of our oppressive encroachments, we had enlisted them as merciless allies in the destruction and extermination of other tribes.

Mr. WISE said he would modify his resolution in consequence of what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, so as to include as the objects of investigation not only the failures in the Florida war, but the causes of the war itself. Mr. W. added, that he had been informed by a gentleman who had been in the employ of Government in Florida, that the celebrated chief Opothleohola, a well-known friend to the white man, and a chief of great influence among the Creeks, had been employed by General Jesup as an ally of the United States, and to aid in the suppression of the Creek war, on the express condition that if he succeeded he should be permitted to reside on his lands until he could settle the title and remove conveniently. Yet, the moment, through his exertions, the Creek war had been brought to an end, this very Opothleohola saw himself surrounded by the bayonets of General Jesup, and ordered off the soil. The indignant chief had produced the written agreement of the American general, and pointing to the signature, had demanded of the officer who was removing him, "Is not that signature genuine?" Thus was one of our own allies, in direct violation of the plighted faith of our commanding general, and of the nation, driven from his land. He wished all these things fully looked into.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired whether this stipulation of General Jesup had ever received the sanction of his superior, or had ever been submitted for such sanction?

Mr. WISE said he was unable to tell. He made the statement as it had been represented to him.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HAYNES in the chair,) and took up the Senate's bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said: It cannot be disguised, that the bills already reported in this House, and which received the sanction of the Senate, whatever gentlemen might profess, and whatever some of them might perhaps very honestly think, were so many features of a project which found extensive countenance, and the object of which was to establish, in fact, a national bank—a Treasury bank of deposit and issue. Disguise it as they may, such a plan has been conceived, and not only conceived, but actually embodied to a considerable extent in the bills which have been reported from a committee of this House. The plan is to establish a Government bank under the proper disguises for the present, and through its agency to substitute a circulating medium composed of Federal Government paper instead of the notes of State banks. We have the germ of this bank now before us; its parts are already sufficiently developed to indicate its true character. At another session, or in another Congress, by one or another addition, by way of amendment, we shall eventually behold the monster developed in all its frightful proportions. Such a subject is surely of consequence enough by itself to occupy the attention of the House, without connecting it with the less important subject under consideration.

But the questions presented by this bill are of great interest to the country. It is true the object to be accomplished by it has less connection with the great results to which I have alluded than any one of the other measures proposed for our adoption; and I believe it will be found upon examination to have originated more from the settled hostility of the administration to the policy of the deposit law of 1836, than from any actual necessity of the Government, or its tendency to promote the favorite fiscal policy of the Executive; but still it is of a piece with the general conduct and policy of those in power. One question which will be found to arise under the present bill involves the public faith. The question is presented, whether Congress or the Federal Government is not bound to keep its promise, or comply with its engagements with the States of the Union, by obligations as strong as any that can exist between it and its creditors, of any other nature or description. It is a question whether, if the States agreed to accept the deposit of the surplus in the Treasury, according to the terms of the act of 1836, by which it was tendered to them, there was not from that moment a contract between them as obligatory as any other compact between the Government and the States can be. Can the General Government, without consulting the other parties to this arrangement, dissolve it without a breach of faith?

But, sir, there is another and a much more impressive and important inquiry which presents itself in considering the effect of this bill: I mean the great question whether the expenditures of this Government are to be reduced now or ever? This is now the issue, and it is to be determined almost exclusively by this House. We already know the determination of the Executive branch of the Government, and all the influence attached to it; and we know, too, the decision of the other branch of the National Legislature. It devolves upon this House, I repeat, to settle the issue, whether the expenditures of this Government, after having been increased nearly threefold within the last few years, are to be reduced now or ever? These are questions truly which may command our exclusive attention for a season. With these convictions, and a corresponding determination,

I shall proceed to make as succinct a statement of what I believe to be the existing condition of the Treasury as I can, that it may be seen whether the repeal of the act of 1836, proposed by the bill under consideration, is demanded by the state of the Treasury, or by the public interest; for, if it be so, I shall be prepared to give it my support.

Much confusion was produced yesterday by the mere statement of the condition of the Treasury, which was presented to the House by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. CAMBRELENG.) I do not mean to say that the statement of that gentleman varies materially from that of the Secretary of the Treasury, but certainly it was well calculated to add to the difficulties which all must have felt in coming to any satisfactory conclusion as to what is the real state of the National Treasury.

I propose to present a statement based upon the facts and estimates contained in the several reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury at the present session, which I believe may be relied upon. At all events, I shall be obliged to any gentleman who shall detect any error in my statement to point it out to me as I proceed.

[Mr. Bell then entered into an elaborate examination of the state of the Treasury, to show that there would be a surplus of twenty millions; and then proceeded:]

I have now, sir, shown that, taking the statements of the several reports of the Secretary of the Treasury as correct, if the funds lying dead in the hands of disbursing officers be brought forth and applied in aid of the expenditures of the last quarter of the year, as they should be, the fourth instalment due the States can be paid, with all other actual demands against the Treasury during the year, and not scarcely more than a nominal deficit; but if, as has always been the case heretofore, a portion of the actual demands upon the Treasury shall not be presented for payment at the depositories of the public money within the year, there will be a surplus, in fact, still left in the Treasury at the end of the year.

The question now is, whether the States have not acquired rights under the act of 1836, which it is not competent for Congress to annul or defeat without their consent. It is a question of power and of right in the General Government whether, after the States have accepted the terms of the deposit act; after many of them have anticipated the funds which they expected to receive in payment of the fourth instalment, and made other important arrangements connected with their financial interest and condition, they will not have just cause to complain of a breach of faith, if this Government shall now proceed to abrogate the compact by legislative action merely, and without any communication with the States. I call upon those gentlemen especially, who hold to what is called the State rights party, to say upon what grounds they can support the bill under consideration? Will it not be a usurpation, a clear assumption of power on our part, and an insulting disregard of the State sovereignties, if, after deluding them with promises of these funds upon certain conditions, which have been acceded to by the States, we should claim the power to postpone the execution of the compact, or to annul the whole proceeding unconditionally, without reference to their wishes or interests, and even without consulting them?

But, sir, we have the same grand object, inviting us to reject this bill, which operated with many gentlemen in giving their support to the deposit act of 1836. The question is now, as then, whether we shall set about curtailing the extravagance and profligacy of the Government in its expenditures. We have tried every other plan—every other occasion, in vain. If we would prove ourselves what we profess to be—if we be ourselves in earnest—if we are seriously the advocates of retrenchment and reform, we can never hope, in our time, a more propitious season to make one more bold and determined effort. “Now’s the day, and now’s the hour.” If we suffer ourselves to be deluded by the arguments and the devices of the advocates of power, and shall let this opportunity pass, we need never hope again. There is only one expedient left, and that is, to withhold the supplies; stop the money; keep the Treasury drained and low; cut off the means; and I engage that the expenditures, for once, shall be reduced to the actual wants of the Government. I call upon the experienced of the House—the observation of them, and there are some who have had seats here for more than twenty years—to say, if any time could be so fit, or promise equal success, in effecting this great object, as the present. I repeat, if the means are not supplied, the expenditures must cease.

Mr. McKAY, of North Carolina, contended, in reply to Mr. BELL, that there had been no change in the ordinary expenditures of the Government during the last year, but it was the extraordinary expenditures of the year which made the great difference. He agreed that in these there had been much extravagance, and he had voted against them all. Of many of those appropriations he would remark not one dollar had yet been expended. He then entered into some estimates, and read voluminous data, furnished him, he said, by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, in his own handwriting, to show the truth of his assertion as to the expenditures of the year. Among the extraordinary appropriations for the year, he named the amount of $5,000,000 to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty.

Mr. BELL remarked that that did not enter into this estimate, as it was an appropriation of 1836, and just about so much as this error in his calculations made would reduce his (Mr.

McKAY's) estimate to his own, (Mr. BELL's.) There had been no extraordinary expenses or subjects of expenditure in 1837.

Mr. McKAY reasserted that his minutes were from the Secretary's own hand.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that there were other items of a similar character omitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, which would make up the sum he had named.

Mr. McKAY remarked that the gentleman would have an opportunity at the next session of Congress to bring forward his plans of reform, as the Secretary had already postponed the expenditure of $15,000,000 appropriated by the last Congress till after the first of January next. He then took similar ground to that maintained by Mr. PICKENS, as to the creation of a debt, as the necessary consequence of permitting the deposit act of 1836 to go into further operation.

WEDNESDAY, September 20.

Bankrupt Laws.

Mr. BIDDLE inquired of the chairman of the Committee of the Judiciary, or any other gentleman on that committee who could give him the information, whether it was the intention of that committee to report on the subject of bankruptcy, which had been referred to them in the Message of the President of the United States. As it was a subject of very deep interest to the whole community, he would further ask whether it was the intention of that committee to report any bill which might come in conflict with the constitutional opinions of the President, as expressed in the Senate of the United States some years since. It will be recollected that the present President expressed it as his opinion, in his place in the Senate, on a former occasion, that a bankrupt law, extending to others than merchants and bankers, would be an unconstitutional act; and he wished to know whether it was the intention of the committee to introduce a proposition of this kind.

Mr. THOMAS (chairman of the Judiciary Committee) said he felt that the response which he should make to the gentleman would be unsatisfactory. The Committee on the Judiciary had held two meetings on the subject, which had been generally referred to them. At the first meeting, it appeared to meet the approbation of all the members of the committee that the final decision as to the propriety of reporting a bankrupt law should be postponed until it was distinctly ascertained whether the measures which were expected to come from the Committee of Ways and Means would so long occupy the attention of Congress as to extend the present session to the meeting of the regular session of Congress. In this state of the case, power was given to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to reassemble the committee as soon as the proper information could be obtained.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

[H. OF R.]

A few days since, when he (Mr. THOMAS) was absent, a gentleman from Virginia propounded an inquiry to the committee somewhat similar to the one now propounded; and in consequence of this a member thereof reassembled the committee, for the purpose of considering whether they should report now, or wait until the regular session of Congress. This meeting was held without coming to any conclusion, and an adjourned meeting of the committee was to be held to-morrow morning. The gentleman would therefore perceive that he could not pretend to say what would be the course of the committee on this subject. The House had referred to them the Message of the President and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, and he was not prepared to say what would be the decision of the committee; whether they would be disposed to pass a general bankrupt law to affect that class of citizens alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) or not. On to-morrow morning, however, the subject would be taken up, and he presumed he would be instructed by the committee to make a report to the House in some shape or other.

Fourth Instalment Postponement Bill.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would detain the committee only to make a short reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL.) The gentleman had referred to the project of establishing a Treasury bank of deposit and issue. On that question he would not now detain the committee further than to say that the Treasury bank was already established, not only of deposit, but of circulation. We have always had one to some extent, and have generally had two millions of warrants in circulation. He had also referred to the expenditures of Government—they had increased two or three-fold; but that increase had been made almost exclusively for extraordinary purposes. We appropriated, in 1836, thirty-eight millions; of which, as may be seen by a report of the Committee of Ways and Means, seventeen millions and a half were appropriated to ordinary purposes, and twenty millions and a half to extraordinary objects. Of the latter, thirteen millions and a half were required for Indian treaties and Indian wars in the neighborhood of the gentleman from Tennessee. The appropriations for the present year amount to thirty-two millions, of which fourteen were for extraordinary purposes. He concurred with the gentleman as to the necessity of reducing the public expenditures. It is obvious they will, as they have done uniformly, increase with an increasing revenue, and be suddenly curtailed when the revenue falls short. Such would be the case now, and our expenditures must be reduced to seventeen or eighteen millions.

The gentleman from Tennessee appeared to complain that the Executive had not, when the crisis came upon the country, in May last, directed the different departments to stop the expenditures. This was singular doctrine, after all we had heard for some years past on the subject of Executive usurpation, to expect the Executive to direct the execution of the laws to be suspended, while there were means in the Treasury. But, sir, the views of the President and of the departments were, from necessity, similar to those stated by the gentleman. It was evident that the revenue would fail, and that some of the expenditures could not be met—a minute inquiry was instituted in every branch of public expenditure, to ascertain what could be conveniently postponed till next year. It was ascertained that some fifteen or sixteen millions might be suspended till the next year, to wait the future action of Congress.

It would, however, be wholly impracticable to curtail the expenditures in the last quarter of the present year. The very branches of expenditure referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee are not now within our reach. One-half of the amount is already expended, and most of the remainder is under contract. Whatever we may do in curtailing the expenditures for the next year, any attempt to interfere with the expenditures of the last quarter would be wholly unavailable; and, if attempted, must be attended with much loss and embarrassment to the Government.

Gentlemen might take what view they pleased of the state of our finances, but it is impossible to make any estimate which will not exhibit a deficiency in our means to meet the current expenses of Government. This deposit cannot be made unless we create a public debt for the sole purpose of placing a surplus in the Treasury, to be transferred and deposited in the Treasuries of the several States. Such a measure, he felt persuaded, would never be sanctioned by Congress.

Mr. BELL made a few remarks in rejoinder to Mr. CAMBRELENG, and insisted that the statement of the gentleman did not controvert Mr. B.'s of yesterday, that there was a dead fund of five millions of dollars on hand; and that, assuming that fact, which he said was incontrovertible, according to the gentleman's own estimate, there would be a deficit of only one million some odd hundred thousand, but, according to Mr. B.'s estimate, an excess of rising three millions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD next addressed the committee. Mr. Chairman, (said he,) I have listened to the debate with surprise. It seems that the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to make a plain statement, unfolding the present condition of the national finances, or that we are incapable of understanding it. In either case, there is cause for regret. It is a national calamity that a man should be placed at the head of the Treasury, whose confused and involved statements leave doubts in regard to the correctness of his reports. On the other hand, if the fault is ours, if the Secretary has been clear, discriminating, and definite, and we cannot comprehend the facts, it is a serious misfortune that the people are so poorly represented.

Mr. Chairman, when the States acceded to the terms prescribed in the deposit act of 1836, a clear contract was formed between them and the General Government—just such a contract as would entitle an individual to damages in similar circumstances, if the contract was not performed. Suppose you had a surplus quantity of work-horses, and you were to propose to me to keep them for you, that I might have the use of them as long as I retained them; that I should insure their lives, and return them in good order when called for; and that you would deliver to me a certain number at four several times, a week or a month apart; provided, however, that you should not reclaim more than one horse in any one month, without thirty days' previous notice. Suppose I assent to all this, and go on and erect stables, purchase provender, and employ hands to take care of the horses, and to work them so as to remunerate me for all my trouble and expense. Suppose you deliver me the first three portions at the times stipulated; but a few days before the last are to be delivered, you say to me that I shall not have them—that you find you have use for them yourself. May I not answer, "I want them likewise; I have made my arrangements, looking to the fulfilment of your promises. I have agreed that my neighbor's children shall go to school over the mud upon the backs of a part of the horses, and I need the rest to help me about improvements in progress on my farm. I have been at expense and trouble in preparing to take care of them. I have assumed risk by insuring their lives; and now, sir, if you don't comply on your part, I will sue you for damages." There never was a plainer case of contract between individuals than the one supposed; and yet, sir, it is precisely the case between this Government and the States. So far as legal and moral principles are concerned, there is no distinction between the cases. There is but one difference; individuals could appeal to the judiciary for redress; this Government is amenable to no such tribunal. But, sir, the perpetrator of wrong, who violates principle because he knows that he can do it with impunity, more deserves the scorn of mankind than if the dungeon or the gibbet were the penalty. I beg the members of this House not to flatter themselves that they are irresponsible for voting to violate the faith and contract of the nation. There is a political tribunal before which they must account. They may hear the verdict of an incensed people proclaimed in a voice of thunder, "Depart from our service, ye workers of iniquity." You had better not be the first to violate the contract, lest the States imitate your example, to punish you.

In contemplating the evils of a depreciated currency, I was anxious for the adoption of some effectual and immediate remedy, and desirous that the President would propose some scheme of relief in which I could concur. But he has proposed nothing for the relief of the people. On the contrary, he has told us that "all communities are apt to look to Government for too much," and referred to the "uncommon fruitfulness" of the country, and the "proceeds of our great staples," to liquidate debts at home and abroad, and to revive commerce and credit. This waiting upon the seasons and the crops is rather cold comfort to those who must perish before these remedies can operate, unless they can procure other aids. It is like telling the poor wretch who is shivering at the door, "you will get over it when warm weather comes," instead of helping him with a blanket. However much the Message has failed to propose or recommend any thing in aid of the people, it has substituted a scheme in aid of the office-holders, and still further to enlarge Executive power, the deleterious consequences of which I shall briefly expose.

The plan is to establish sub-treasuries, and to make this a "hard money Government." The jingling sounds of "hard money," when we are overwhelmed with shin-plasters, may, and probably will, tickle the ears of many people, and some, as in former days, will be deluded into the belief that the "hard money" age is just before them, and that nothing more is necessary to bring on this political millennium than to worship at the shrine of President Van Buren with increased devotion. There is no more hope of a political zealot than there is of a religious bigot. Each is without the pale of reason. I do not expect to influence partisans; but those who are not blind past all cure, may be preserved from falling into this new pit.

The plan of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury is to establish sub-treasuries at such places as may be deemed proper, and to appoint suitable officers, at which, and by whom, the public money shall be kept and disbursed; and to receive nothing in payment of public dues but specie. This plan is to bring about the hard money age!

One of my principal objections to the sub-Treasury is, the increase of Executive power and patronage which would necessarily result from it. The Secretary of the Treasury says, "The whole addition of principal officers need not exceed ten." He estimates the increased annual expense at fifty or sixty thousand dollars only. Ten principal officers! What salaries would you give to each? Not less, I suppose, than you give an Auditor—$3,000 a year; especially as they would be located in the large cities. What a scrambling among office-seekers this new batch of offices would produce! How many interviews and intrigues at the White House would grow out of it, I leave to those who are fond of such speculations. Thirty thousand dollars a year I set down as the least for ten "principal officers," under this scheme! How many minor officers—clerks and agents—will be required, we are not informed; nor are we told what necessity there will be for additional buildings; nor are we told where they are to be located. I will venture to predict that, instead of $60,000 a year, this sub-Treasury scheme will cost the nation double or treble as much, should it ever go into operation; and just in proportion as the people lose money, to sustain the establishment, so will the President gain power to reward his partisans.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

[H. OF R.]

But, sir, I look upon this new scheme as an entering wedge merely; the beginning of a new system, which will ultimately place all the money of the nation under Executive control. The Secretary already hints that he could furnish an excellent general paper currency, in small bills, based upon an equal amount of specie deposited in his sub-treasuries. I admit it could be done, and that it might be convenient to the people. But the transition is so easy from a sub-Treasury bank of deposit to a sub-Treasury bank of discount, that I apprehend great danger in the progress of events, that the President will deem it proper to call on Congress for power, through his Secretary, to lend money at least to the extent of the surplus revenue; and that Congress, in obedience to Executive recommendations, will sanction the project. The Secretary now says, in substance, in the 9th page of his late report, that "it is impossible to conduct our fiscal operations any length of time with ease, vigor, and uniformity, without some such regulator as a power to issue and redeem Treasury notes, or to invest and sell the investment of surpluses." I am apprehensive that a power to lend the surplus would, in the Secretary's estimation, be found a better "regulator," and that the whole scheme of sub-treasuries will eventuate in a Government bank, where the money of the nation will be loaned out at the will and pleasure of the President. Should such a state of things ever arrive, and if there is no curtailment of Executive power, as claimed and exercised by the late President, I am ready to declare that American liberty exists no longer. The people will become the mere slaves of power, and nothing short of revolution will burst their chains.

Mr. PICKENS said he would submit a proposition which he thought would meet the views of a large majority of both sides of the House, and that was to postpone the payment of the instalment to the "1st day of January, 1839," by which time it would be seen if the postponement should be made indefinite or not. Mr. P. then moved to strike out the words "till further provision by law," and insert "the 1st day of January, 1839."

Mr. DUNCAN said he was anxious for the passage of the bill. There was more than one consideration that operated on his mind and induced him to support it. The object of the deposit act was to relieve the Treasury of the surplus revenue—a surplus which, as he would attempt to show, grew out of a policy the most dangerous and disastrous in its character, and which, if it had been persisted in, would have, in all probability, severed this Union—he meant the unequal and inequitable policy misnamed "the American system," which had for its object the official elevation of its projectors and zealous supporters, and which, in its operation, was at the same time beneficial to one portion of the Union and destructive to another. The surplus was now disposed of, and the object for which the deposit law was made is accomplished, and it was of no further use. He hoped it would take its place among the things that had been and are not, and that the policy which gave rise to its necessity would share the same fate.

The question involved in the bill was simply whether the Government shall deposit $9,000,000 with the States, in proportion to their representation in Congress, when, to enable her to do it, she must borrow a sum equal in amount, to supply her own wants during the current year.

The first fact upon which the question depends is, does the Government want the money? And, if it does, is it not better that she should keep her own and use it, than to deposit it with the States and run in debt for an equal amount to supply her own wants? To convince the committee that the amount of the fourth instalment of the deposits would be wanted by the Government for her own use, he had prepared a statement, which was the result of a calculation from the facts stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he believed it would be found correct, and conclusively show that Government would want the full amount of the fourth instalment. In submitting the statement, he would acknowledge his obligation to the worthy and distinguished gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. McKim,) for the assistance he had received from him in preparing the statement.

If, said Mr. D., the report of the Secretary of the Treasury is a correct and true exposition of the state of the Treasury and the finances of the nation, then his statement proved, beyond all doubt, that the money proposed to be deposited as a fourth instalment was required for the use of the Government, and it disposed of the main question.

But to return to the subject of this bill. Is it good policy for the Government to deposit her money with the States, for their use, when she wants to use it herself? The decision of this question seemed to him a small business. Present the naked question, and there was no schoolboy in the district he had the honor to represent who did not carry the answer on the end of his tongue. What was there about the question that prevented it from being a plain, easy question to answer? We are told that there exists a contract between the Government and the States that is binding in law, in equity, and in conscience; that Congress, by a solemn act, had agreed to deposit the surplus revenue with the States for safe-keeping, provided the States would agree to receive it, and that the States had agreed to the only condition necessary to complete the contract, viz: to receive them. Therefore, the States were entitled to the full benefit of the contract, and in good faith the money ought to be paid over. What miserable sophistry! What pitiful subterfuge to cover nakedness and deformity, and how far from every true principle connected with the question! What is the title of the deposit act? "An act to provide for the deposit of the surplus revenue, and safe keeping of the same." Is there any thing in the title of this act that authorizes the belief that Congress intended that the States should have any other benefit from the public moneys than a depositor should have from any general deposit? Is there any expression in the body of the act that conveys any other meaning? On the contrary, is it not full of provisions by which such inferences are studiously foreclosed and avoided? Does not the act provide the manner in which the Secretary of the Treasury shall recall them whenever the circumstances of the Government may require? Did the supporters of that law attempt to convey the idea, or advance the argument, when it was under consideration, that the surplus revenue, in the form of a deposit, was really to be a gift to the States? No, sir. At the time the bill was under consideration, there was no idea held out or advanced other than that the money was to be placed with the States for safe-keeping. But gentlemen who rejoice at the embarrassed state of the Treasury, and who are shouting that their former predictions of misrule and ruin are verified, are willing, in violation of the meaning, spirit, and express words of the deposit law, to withhold from Government the necessary funds of conducting its only legitimate operations, and that, too, for party effect; so that possibly what they heretofore predicted, and now declare has happened, may yet, peradventure, prove true. But in what section, sentence, word, or syllable of that act is the provision to warrant the statement that the Government is pledged to deposit with the States the means of her own, which are necessary to conduct her own concerns? Sir, such a construction of the act, and such a policy, is revolting to every economist and correct judge of ordinary dealings and business habits.

THURSDAY, September 21.

Bankrupt Law.

Mr. THOMAS, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, rose and stated that he had been instructed by that committee to state to the House that the committee had this day adopted a resolution that it is inexpedient to report a bankrupt law at this special session of Congress.

The Fourth Instalment Bill.

The question pending was on the amendment of Mr. PICKENS to strike from the bill the indefinite clause "till further provision by law," and insert "the first day of January, 1839."

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, said: It has been contended, that an expectation has been raised on the part of the States, that the transfer would be made; that, upon the faith of that expectation, the States had actually gone on to appropriate the amount; and that such expectation should not now be disappointed. This, sir, may be true, and I doubt not is true, as to many of the States; it may be that the course of legislation on the part of the States may subject them to very serious inconvenience, and possibly to loss. But the inquiry immediately recurs: Whose act was it that produced the difficulties with the States? It was the action of the States themselves through their Legislatures; action, too, taken by them, with full knowledge that the money so applied was neither given nor loaned, but merely deposited; liable to be called for at any moment when the wants of the Government should render necessary its return. And the argument from inconvenience, if it be worth any thing, is just as conclusive to prove that the amount, when deposited, could at no future day be called for; for I presume it will never be entirely convenient to pay back the amount. It proves that what was intended and declared to be a mere deposit for safe-keeping, was, in truth and in fact, a gift, absolute and unconditional; that such was never the intention of Congress is rendered too plain by the terms of the law itself to admit even of doubt.

But suppose it shall now be determined to pay over the fourth instalment to the States; how is the amount to be raised? It is not in the Treasury; for to all practical purposes we have very nearly an empty Treasury: by this I mean that the available means, at the disposal of the Secretary, are not sufficient to meet the demands upon it. How, then, is the money to be raised? I presume by a loan of some kind, with the faith of the Government pledged for its redemption; but ultimately to be discharged, and paid off, through the ordinary channels of taxation upon the people. It follows, then, that the people are to be taxed to raise money to distribute among the people. You most graciously give them with one hand, and take back with the other a like amount; increased, however, by the costs, and charges of collection; and, also, by the amount of interest that may have accrued on the loan. The conclusion seems to me inevitable, that the passage of the bill now under consideration will give to the fourth instalment its proper direction, by placing it in a condition to be applied to the legitimate purposes of the Government, for which it was originally intended.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. ATHERTON said: In whatever light it may be viewed, the question seems to be, whether we shall borrow money for the sake of depositing it with the States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who addressed the committee some days since, was understood to admit there would be a deficiency in the Treasury, but to contend that the Secretary was bound to make this deposit, if there were no action of Congress on the subject; and that the question was whether we would stop this appropriation. Now he (Mr. A.) thought it incumbent on gentlemen to say how the Secretary could, by any possibility, do this, unless there be some action of Congress on the subject. He thought it incumbent also on those who contended there is such a vast amount of money in the Treasury, to inform the Secretary where it may be found. Nor could he conceive it to be other than a misapplication of terms to call this an appropriation.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BELL) has said that he views the question of making the deposit of the last instalment with the States as a question of faith, like that of making payment to any other creditor. To him (Mr. A.) the position that this was a contract, seemed utterly untenable. Are the States our creditors to the amount of the last instalment? What consideration have we received for it? Has the money already deposited, gone to pay our debts to the States? The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LOOMIS) contends that the States furnish a consideration, because they are obliged to agree to accept the money, and to pledge the faith of the States for its repayment. Now, this fact, to Mr. A.'s mind, showed it to be a deposit, else why so much caution as to securing the repayment of the money when needed? All the guards and securities to this end, prove that it was the money of the United States, and not that of the States. The deposit law of 1836, both in its letter and in its spirit, is a law for the safe-keeping of the money of the United States. We have power to withdraw the money after its deposit, if we need it, and, of course, to withhold it. The law was based on the supposition of a surplus in the Treasury, and an available surplus.

The gentleman from Tennessee has said that he considered this a question whether our expenditures were to be reduced now or never, and contends that the expenditures under existing appropriations can be so reduced as to supersede any necessity of postponing the last instalment. It seemed to him (Mr. A.) that this is shown to be utterly impracticable. All expenditures have already been postponed in the Secretary's estimates, which, after a most careful investigation, it was found could properly be dispensed with for the present. It must be apparent that the greatest reduction which could, by any possibility, be made in the expenditures of the last three months of this year, would not affect the balance in the Treasury to an amount sufficient to make any difference in the aspect of the question under consideration. As to the reference made by that gentleman to the sum in the hands of disbursing officers, it seemed only necessary to recollect that this sum is not in the Treasury, and can in no manner be made applicable by the Secretary in the manner contended for. Money in the hands of disbursing officers is charged, at once, to appropriations which are, by that, so much reduced; and of the amount returned by the last reports as in the hands of those officers, half of it is actually expended, and all the remainder contracted for. Should works under contract be stopped, every one must perceive it would be a source of great expense and loss. We should be beset with application after application for damages on account of breaches of those contracts; and it requires but very little acquaintance with such subjects to convince us at once that the responsibilities and the expense thus incurred would, by far, counterbalance any advantage that could accrue to the Treasury. He (Mr. A.) believed that a large majority of the friends of the administration would be found as ready as the gentleman from Tennessee to do all in their power to prevent extravagant appropriations. That gentleman has said that the professions of economy of this administration, like those of the last, were hollow. In regard to the professions of the last administration, perhaps he (Mr. A.) ought to defer to the greater experience of the gentleman from Tennessee, and his superior opportunities of judging. He had, however, been inclined to believe them sincere, and before he admitted the justice of the gentleman's imputation, he would like to inquire whether the friends of the gentleman, the National Republicans of the North, who have been characterized by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PICKENS) as having reform on their lips and extravagance in their hearts, had nothing to do with these extravagant appropriations. But it did seem to him (Mr. A.) that of all the extravagance ever heard of, of all the extravagance which it ever entered into the heart of man to conceive, the greatest is that proposed by the opponents of this bill. It is to borrow money for the purpose of giving it away—according to the views of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD,) who contends that the States have a right to retain this money after they once get it—or borrow money and pay interest for it, that it may be kept safely for us by the States, who pay no interest! In either view of the subject, he called on gentlemen to show that this is not the worst of extravagance.

Mr. FOSTER said he would ask the friends of the administration on that floor, and those who voted for the bill originally, and who intended to carry it out into complete effect, to meet on some common ground, and fulfil, as nearly as the exigency will permit, the original intention of that bill. He would recommend for that purpose the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS,) which proposes a postponement of the fourth instalment. For, sir, asked Mr. F., does any one pretend that the Government shall never pay over this last instalment? That could not be pretended, under the plain and obvious intention of the act of 1836. Why not, then, accept the amendment suggested? Mr. F. believed something, if not this, must be done for the relief of the Treasury. The available funds at the command of the Government would go but a short way towards the liquidation of this fourth instalment. It was not to be paid over, according to the terms of the act, without resorting to some kind of debt, either by borrowing, or by an increase of the amount of Treasury notes. Under this aspect of affairs, he would be compelled to go for the bill, if no substitute or amendment were provided. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PICKENS) proposed to postpone the payment of the last sum due the States until January 1st, 1839. In the mean time we can look around us, retrench our expenditures, benefit by experience, and ascertain if, without detriment, we can deposit with the States what we must all certainly admit is honestly due them. Can there be any objection to this course—to the assumption of this common ground?

Mr. BRIGGS said: Can this Government now withhold the fourth instalment without the consent of the States, and not violate the plain provisions of their own law?

The money was to be passed over to the States in four equal instalments, at fixed periods. It was to be repaid by them when wanted by the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet appropriations made by law, in ratable proportions, and in sums not exceeding a certain amount by any one State. No provision in law authorizes the Secretary to withhold, in any state of the case, any portion of the money. Nor does Congress reserve to itself the right or power to do any such thing.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JONES) asks if Congress meant that this money should be deposited with the States, if the Government should want it for its own purposes? I answer, that Congress intended that all the money which should be in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1837, after deducting five millions of dollars, should be deposited with the States. To prove this intention, I refer to the explicit, unambiguous, and unqualified language of their own law, made to accomplish this identical purpose.

The gentleman from Virginia says, the fact that this thirty-seven millions were to be paid to the States by instalments does not change the character of the transaction between the General Government and the States. I concur with him fully. The instalments were arranged for the accommodation of the banks, who held that money on deposit. As between the Government and the States, the case is the same as though the whole amount had been paid out at once. If it had been so paid, neither the Secretary, under the law, nor Congress, by new legislation, would have had the right to recall the money in any different manner than is provided by the terms of the law as proposed to, and accepted by, the States. This fourth instalment constitutes a much larger amount than could be demanded from the States, and cannot therefore, in good faith to them, be withheld without their consent. What Congress would have done if they had anticipated a different state of the Treasury is one thing; what they actually did, and what are the rights of the States resulting from their action, is entirely another thing.

FRIDAY, September 22.

The Fourth Instalment Bill.

Mr. SIBLEY, of New York, said that the first and great question for the House to decide, as a co-ordinate branch of the Federal Government, was this: What are the obligations resting upon Congress, in the relation which it holds to the several States, for the payment of the fourth instalment under the deposit act of 1836? Has our past action raised just and reasonable expectations on the part of the States that this money would be paid; and have those expectations led to important arrangements by the States, deeply and seriously affecting the interests of the people? If so, then have obligations and duties been imposed upon us which could not be disregarded without violating the faith of the Federal Government, and fixing a stain upon the national honor. That our position in this matter might be clearly seen, it would only be necessary to recur to the law of Congress for regulating the deposits of the public money, passed on the 23d of June, 1836, and to the action of the several States consequent upon that law.

Under this law it became the duty of the Secretary to ascertain the amount of money in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, 1837, and to communicate that amount, together with the law which appropriated and fixed the destination of the money, to the several States, as an entire proposition for their acceptance or rejection. This duty was performed by that officer, as appears by a communication made by him to Congress in January, 1837, in which he says:

"I seize the earliest occasion to inform Congress of the measures adopted by this Department since the 1st instant, in compliance with the 13th section of the act regulating the deposits of the public money."

"The balance in the Treasury on that day, which was subject to be apportioned among the several States, has, on the principles of the act, as construed by the Attorney-General, and explained in my last annual report, been ascertained to be $37,468,859 97.

"The division of this money in detail among the several States may be seen in the document annexed, (marked A.)" distributive portion accruing to my own State (New York) to be $5,352,694 28.

It had been said, by the friends of this bill, that the law of June, 1836, did not propose to deposit a sum certain. The maxim that that is certain which may be rendered certain, is a sufficient answer to such an objection. Besides, the sum designated by the law was actually rendered certain in the manner contemplated by the act, as appears by the statement of the officer charged with that duty.

The proposition, then, made by the Federal Government on the one part, to the Government of the State of New York (equally independent, and as competent to contract) of the other part, was, in substance, this: We agree to deposit with you, for your use, the sum of $5,352,694 28, in quarter-yearly instalments, if you will agree to receive that sum and safely to keep and repay it, when duly demanded, by instalments not exceeding thirty thousand dollars each, upon thirty days' previous notice of each instalment.

What was the response of New York to this proposition? Did she say that she would receive, safely keep, and return any fractional part of the stipulated sum—as one-half, or three-fourths? No, sir! (said Mr. S.) She accepted your proposition, and your whole proposition, in all its parts and proportions. You tended her an entire contract, the essence of which were, the amount to be deposited, the times of deposit, and the terms and conditions of repayment. She closed with you upon that contract, in all its length and breadth, and has never assented to change or modification. In January, '37, the Senate and Assembly of that State, representing its sovereignty, "struck hands" with this the Federal Government, and plighted, in solemn form, its faith, and the honor of its people, for the performance of those terms, which, being accepted, drew after them reciprocal obligations of faith and duty on your part. Did New York place reliance upon that faith? Judge of her confidence by her conduct. Mindful of your interests, and her own obligations, she made prompt provision by law for the safe investment of every dollar of the money you had so proffered for her acceptance.

In full reliance on your fidelity to engagements, she apportioned the entire sum among her people, and sent out her loan officers into the several counties to pay over the amount actually received, and to issue authorized and official certificates for the payment of the balance. These officers have performed their duty. They have lent the whole five millions, and for the security of its repayment have taken bonds and mortgages. And while we are here debating whether this last instalment (amounting to nearly a million and a half of dollars, appropriated to the State of New York by the act of 1836, and actually in the Treasury of the United States last January) be now anywhere in existence, the mortgages of the landholders of that great State are duly executed and recorded, for securing the "safe-keeping and employment" of that identical money, according to the terms and conditions of your contract.

There exists, then, (continued Mr. S.,) a contract, compact, or agreement—call it what you will—deliberately formed between independent sovereignties, under all the sanctions and solemnities used and approved by the high contracting parties, each of which has entered upon the execution of the contract, and assumed all the liabilities contemplated by it. It is now proposed by one party to this agreement, without the consent of the other, to set at naught some of its essential provisions. This, it is urged, may be lawfully done, because our engagements are not upheld by a valid consideration; and the genius of the old common law is invoked and thrust between this Government and its just accountabilities. Sir, it will be time enough for the Federal Government to seek refuge behind the narrow and technical rules of the common law when she acknowledges its jurisdiction over her, and consents to become a party litigant before our judicial tribunals, and yields obedience to their mandates. But while she stands aloof from all these, a law unto herself, and a fountain of law unto others, it does not become her to intrench herself behind the defences of a system to which she does not acknowledge subjection.

Mr. CUSHMAN said: I contend that the deposit act is not such a contract as has been pretended. It is a mere gratuity, which cannot form the basis of a legal contract. Neither does it lay the United States under any moral obligation to deposit money with the several States which she does not now possess. Suppose, sir, that one individual should say to another that he would make him a present of a certain article, at a certain time and place; and suppose, further, that article should be accidentally destroyed; would that individual be under any legal, or even moral obligation to perfect that benevolent design? No, sir, there is not a gentleman on this floor who will contend for the fulfilment of such a promise, upon the ground that it lays the foundation of a legal contract, which can be enforced by suit at law.

Again, sir; suppose one individual should say to another that he had in the hands of his agent the sum of fifty thousand dollars, for which he had no present use. This sum you may have, with all the benefits you can derive from it, until he should be under the necessity of calling for it; when he should return it to the owner. And it is further agreed, that the same shall be delivered over in four equal instalments, in one, two, three, and four months. Now, suppose, sir, three of the above instalments to have been delivered over agreeably to the above-mentioned promise, but before the time arrives for delivering the fourth instalment, the gentleman who made the proposition is visited by some unexpected calamity; his property engulfed in the ocean, or fire may have consumed to ashes his dwellings, by which calamity he is wholly unable to complete his original design. Is here such a contract as could be legally enforced in a court of justice? Would there be even the slightest moral obligation resting upon that individual, after having been providentially deprived of the means of fulfilling his design, to hand over the fourth instalment as above mentioned? No, sir, every gentleman must be compelled, if he intends to abide the truth, to answer this question in the negative. The person to whom such an overtute was made would not have the hardihood to assert any such claim. He could not look his friend in the face, and tell him that he was guilty of a breach of faith. No, he would blush to make a charge of that sort.

Mr. Chairman, in the case as above supposed, I have given you, as I think, a very fair exposition of the deposit law of June, 1836. That law was to regulate the deposits of the surplus revenue of the General Government. Three instalments of that surplus have been delivered over to the several States, agreeably to the requisitions of that act; but before the time had arrived for transmitting to the States the fourth instalment, she finds her financial affairs in such a situation as to leave her without any surplus to deposit. How can there be any legal or moral obligation on the part of the United States to deposit a surplus revenue which she does not possess? It is folly as well as madness to make any such pretensions.

Mr. HOLSEY said: Sir, we have strong appeals to the faith of this Government to fulfil the expectations of the States, founded upon the deposit act of 1836. I deny the obligation. I can safely appeal to the virtue and intelligence of the people, and ask whether they desire for State purposes the money collected by this Government, when it is necessary for Federal purposes? Is the fund necessary to meet the wants of the Government? This is the question. Let us refer to the report of the Secretary. This report has been condemned by the opponents of the bill as mysterious and incomprehensible. Be this as it may as to the details, the aggregate of means and liabilities is set down so plainly that "he who runs may read."

The amount of means in the Treasury for the current year, in round numbers, is twenty-six millions of dollars, exclusive of the nine millions due under the fourth instalment, and which is not a part of the income of the present year. The amount of expenditure, by virtue of appropriations, is thirty-two millions, leaving a balance of six millions against the Treasury, or a deficit to that amount. This debt of six millions cannot be paid except by a resort to the fourth instalment, or to those transfers which have already been made with the States. Shall we give them the fourth instalment in the left hand, and draw from them with the right, under the provisions of the deposit act? It is more easy to deposit money with the States than to collect it from them. Sir, the process of collection will be fraught with delays, dangers, collisions, between the two Governments, which will leave your Treasury totally unable to pay the appropriations. It is already announced in this hall that the deposits with the States are a gift to them. Many of the States have made permanent investments of this fund. Some have deposited it with banks, to be loaned to the people. All will feel reluctant to return it. If we might judge from the tone of debate, some of the States would, as their representatives have done, attempt to "argue the seal from the bond," and prove the loan to be a gift. The difficulty is inherent in the nature of demands upon political bodies; the same which existed under the Confederation. Some will refuse to pay under colorable pretexts, and none will pay without all will pay! We must, therefore, discard the idea of drawing upon the States for the funds already on deposit with them. The only expedient left is to arrest the nine millions due under the last instalment. This amount in the deposit banks will not, in all probability, cancel the debt of six millions. Indeed, the general and signal failure of those institutions to comply with their engagements renders it doubtful whether any considerable portion of it can be collected. But as far as this fund can go to defray the expenses of the Government, it should go. It is not legitimate to divert it to any other object. But six millions of excess of expenditure is a minimum point; one to which all will, and, I believe, have agreed.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said: I need not say that being opposed to the original act in its inception, and in all its subsequent stages and processes, I am of course in favor of the bill now proposing the postponement of the payment of the fourth instalment. But it is said by several gentlemen that we cannot lawfully withhold this instalment. That the States have acquired a vested right in it, by virtue of a contract. Sir, I had thought that the doctrine of vested rights had become sufficiently odious through the indiscreet use of it by its friends, without attempting to apply it to this case. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BRIGGS) has labored to show that there is a contract between the States and the Government of the United States, and upon the establishment of that point seemed to consider the right of the States to the instalment as clearly made out. Now, sir, does one follow the other? It appears to me not. If it be a contract, the next inquiry is, what are its terms, and is it a binding and valid one? And for the purposes of this argument, it may be admitted to be a contract. All bailments are contracts. This is one kind of bailment, and, therefore, a contract. It falls within that class of bailments, technically denominated in law "deposit," which is the bailment of a thing by one to another, to be returned when the bailor calls for it. By this, the bailee acquires no right or title to the thing bailed, or to its use, but is bound to restore it when called for.

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

Fourth Instalment Bill.

[H. OF R.]

On the part of the United States this bailment of money to the States was merely gratuitous; and there was no such consideration in the case as to render the contract a legal and valid one. But it is said there was a promise on the part of the States to pay back the money, and this constituted a good consideration. Sir, as well might I set up a legal claim to my neighbor's horse—ay, to a vested right in him, because my neighbor, in the exercise of a spirit of courtesy and kindness, said I might have the use of his horse at any time, on my promise to return him. But the gentleman from New York (Mr. SIBLEY) has undertaken to show that there was a good consideration upon strict common law principles, and has quoted from the old books the definition of a good consideration to be “a charge or trouble to one party, or a benefit to the other;” both of which, he says, exist in this case. The States, it is said, incurred charges and trouble in receiving and keeping this money, and the General Government derived a benefit in having it kept for them. Sir, I must confess I was not prepared to hear such a position as this taken. Can it, in any sense, be said to be a charge or trouble to a State to receive a large sum of money, and use it for an indefinite period without paying interest for it? If so, I know of a great many people who would like to be troubled in the same way; and I cannot say that I should have any very serious objections to it myself. Again: how can it be said, in any proper sense of the term, that the United States Government derive a benefit from the transaction? Just look at the facts. The Government have a large surplus, which they do not want to use, lying in the deposit banks, and for which the Government is drawing interest. This surplus the Government withdraws from the banks, and deposits with the States, to be kept by them without the payment of interest. And this the gentleman from New York calls a benefit to the United States Government! Sir, I cannot conceive of a more palpable perversion of our mother tongue.

SATURDAY, September 23.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States.

Mr. F. O. J. SMITH said: It has been contended that the faith of the Government is plighted, because an expectation of the money has been created among the States, under the law of Congress; and that to withhold it would be a breach of that faith. Now, I will ask gentlemen who use this argument, how it is reconcilable with the proposition made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) or acquiesced in by him, if coming from another quarter, to repeal and withhold from five to fifteen millions of dollars, appropriated by law, to build harbors, light-houses, breakwaters, and roads? Would not such a repeal of appropriations be equally a breach of the plighted faith of the nation, that such moneys were to be expended for such works? Sir, I see no distinction in the principle of the two measures, and in neither do I see any thing that resembles a violation of the public faith.

Sir, those who oppose this postponement or repeal of the fourth instalment, regardless of the necessitous condition of the Treasury, and on the principle of distribution, pervert the purpose of the deposit act; and I confess I was not a little surprised when I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) and afterwards the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. LOOMIS,) oppose it on the ground that it would deprive their respective States of a certain amount of dollars and cents! Pennsylvania, says the former gentleman, will be compelled to abandon a million of dollars if this bill should pass. Ohio, says the latter gentleman, will lose seven hundred thousand dollars, if this bill becomes a law. Why, sir, to me it appears wholly unworthy of the people of these two great States, to allow the mere consideration of benefit or loss in dollars and cents to enter into either their support or opposition of this bill. I have heard it remarked upon this floor, in other days, that no people like those of the Northern and Eastern States were governed by entirely sordid considerations in matters of legislation; that “no people can see a dollar so far as they can.” But, sir, when it is gravely announced upon this floor, that the constituents of the honorable gentleman to whom I have alluded, are disposed to graduate their opposition to this bill by the number of dollars and cents it may withhold from them, I think the time has arrived when the imputation of sordidness, so often cast upon the people of the Northern States, should be withdrawn, and applied to other quarters of the Union.

[Mr. LOOMIS, of Ohio, asked leave to explain. He said the gentleman from Maine misunderstood him in supposing that he (Mr. LOOMIS) made the loss of the fourth instalment to Ohio, proposed by the bill, his only reason or ground of opposition to the bill; that was only one ground of opposition to it.]

Mr. SMITH proceeded. I understand the position of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, and mean not to misrepresent him. I have not indicated that this argument of the honorable gentleman was his only ground of opposition. But, sir, it is one of his positions, urged by him upon the consideration of the committee, and consequently one which he must have regarded as worthy of the approbation of his constituents. I maintain, in reply, that it is a consideration wholly unworthy the approbation of the people of his great State, and one that is unworthy of influencing the legislation of this House upon this subject.

MR. THOMPSON said: Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague, as it makes the bill more acceptable; but I shall vote against the bill, even if thus amended. Time and reflection have only served to confirm my first impressions of the wisdom and policy of the law depositing with the States the surplus in the Treasury. The chief recommendation of that law, to me, was not the money which it gave to the States—that was a small matter; but it was that a fund was provided to meet the future exigencies of the Government—a fund which was to be raised by each particular State in its own way, with a just regard to the different interests of each State which could best bear taxation, and not by the majority interests of the General Government, alike ignorant and reckless, as past experience has proven it to be, of the interest and circumstances of the respective States. If there were now a deficiency of resources, I should feel constrained, by the principles upon which I supported that bill, by plighted faith, and the peculiar interests of those I represent, not only to give back this fourth instalment, but all that we have received. No such case exists. I have examined the statement of the resources of the Government presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, (MR. BELL,) and have made the calculation in various forms; and, sir, I am satisfied that he has demonstrated (for it is a matter of figures) that there is no deficiency of funds. Charging the Government with all the demands upon it, including the fund of $37,000,000 set apart to be distributed among the States, the unexpended appropriations of last year, and the appropriations of this year, and you have an aggregate of $85,000,000. Of this sum the Secretary informs you that $15,000,000 cannot be expended during the year, reducing the amount to $70,000,000. The payments made, and the admitted resources of the Treasury, amount to $64,000,000; to which add $5,000,000 in the hands of disbursing officers, and you have $69,000,000. In this estimate, the accruing revenue of the last half of the present year is taken, on the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, at $7,000,000; whereas it has been proven to my entire satisfaction that it will exceed $9,000,000. So that, instead of a deficiency, there will be a surplus, even if you do not withhold from the States this fourth instalment. I am unable to perceive why money in the hands of disbursing officers of the Government is not as much the money of the Government as if it were in the Treasury. It is only one step nearer being paid out—that is all. The Government can order these officers to pay it back into the Treasury, only to be paid again to the disbursing officers. If, then, sir, you withhold this fourth instalment, you leave in the hands of the Government $9,000,000; to which add the $12,000,000 of Treasury notes, and you have a surplus of $21,000,000—not to meet the wants of the Government, but to be deposited in your sub-treasuries. I have another and an insuperable objection to this bill. The States will receive the fund in the bills of the State banks. The General Government will not, and cannot, receive it but in specie. The officers of the Government will be constrained by law to demand it in specie. They will be constrained by that which, with them, is stronger than laws or constitutions—by party obligations and an irresistible necessity to play out the desperate game they have commenced. I will not arm them with this terrible power over the deposit banks in their mad and ferocious experiment of a metallic currency. I would sooner see the whole amount of the fund sunk in the ocean, than the wide-wasting ruin which a demand on these banks for $12,000,000 in specie would produce. At the very moment that you are asked to adopt a measure which must lead to this pressure on the deposit banks and their debtors, it is recommended further to indulge the merchants on their bonds. Why this discrimination? If you press the deposit banks, is not a corresponding pressure upon their debtors inevitable? Why, I ask, are they to be pressed, when the merchants are to be indulged on their bonds? I would at this time press neither. These considerations bring up at once the sub-Treasury scheme and the metallic currency. They are all cognate branches of the same system of measures, and one of them cannot be properly considered disconnected with the others.

[Mr. Thompson then proceeded at much length to speak against the sub-Treasury scheme and the metallic currency.]

MONDAY, September 25.

Mississippi Election.

MR. BUCHANAN, from the Committee of Elections, made a detailed report on the subject of the Mississippi elections, accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That Samuel J. Gholson and John F. H. Claiborne are duly elected members of the 25th Congress, and as such are entitled to take their seats.

MR. MERCER considered this question one of very great importance, and one which should not be decided without being fully discussed. He therefore moved that the report be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. MAURY (a member of the Committee of Elections) stated that the committee were divided on the subject; but they deemed it unnecessary to present a minority report. They had determined to permit the majority to bring forward their report, and when the subject came under the House, to move to amend it in accordance with their views.

MR. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, would inquire whether there had ever been a report of a committee on the subject of a contested election decided without going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, hoped, as this was as important a question as any which might be brought before the present Congress, that it would take the usual course. It was a question which required very grave deliberation, and free and full discussion, and he therefore trusted it would be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The question involved a grave constitutional question, and he wished to see it settled, and settled after full, free, and deliberate discussion, which he considered it would not receive out of the Committee of the Whole.

The question was put on a motion to postpone till Wednesday, and print, and agreed to without a division.

National Bank.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient to establish a national bank."

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the question on this resolution would be taken without debate, and on the question of agreeing to this resolution he called the yeas and nays. He wished to show the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CHAMBERS,) who had alluded, during some remarks which fell from him this morning, to the dark cloud hanging over the prospects of the administration in the West, that a still darker cloud was hanging over the prospects of the friends of a national bank in this House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EVERETT said that his sentiments on the subject of a national bank were well known, and when the proper occasion was offered, he should maintain these sentiments. But that issue was not now to be made up, and it should not be forced upon him at this time. The veto upon such an institution had been promulgated in advance by the President of the United States, and he presumed that no friend of a national bank would bring such a proposition forward, until it was ascertained that two-thirds of that body were in favor of it. That majority in opposition was necessary, he verily believed, now, before any relief could be expected for the country; and he further believed that, were the incubus of the late Message of the President taken from that body, there would be the necessary relief. But are those of the party, in majority here, expected to vote for this measure even though they preferred it, when they know that its passage would be followed by the veto? He conceived not. And while such obstacles in the way of success did exist, he hoped that such a step would not be taken. Had Mr. Van Buren left the question to the action and decision of the House, without giving his own opinion, or declaring his own intentions in the matter, the action of that House might be different from what it could now be expected to be. Then there might be some relief for the people anticipated as the result of this special session. As it was, the relief of the Executive is all that is asked at the hands of Congress. Mr. EVERETT concluded by moving to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BOON called for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to postpone the payment of the fourth instalment of the deposits to the States.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. PROKENS to strike from the bill the indefinite clause "till further provision by law," and insert "the first day of January, 1839."

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said: Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to discuss the merits of the principal remedy proposed by the President for the relief of the Government and the country, I ask the indulgence of the House in making reference to the circumstances which place me, in reference to that remedy, in a peculiar attitude—for no other consideration could induce me to obtrude upon the House any remark affecting me individually. The journal of the House, for the 23d Congress, exhibits the fact that my immediate predecessor, General Gordon, of Virginia, (a gentleman of whom I take pleasure in saying that he is honest, talented, honorable, magnanimous, and liberal in an eminent degree, who stood so strong in the confidence and affections of the people of his district that nothing but substantial differences of political opinion could have brought me hither in his place,) offered a scheme embracing the very principles of the recommendations of the Message. The principles of this bill, proposed by my predecessor in February, 1835, were opposed and denounced by the late administration, and all its prominent friends in both Houses of Congress, in no unmeasured terms. In this denunciation and opposition I united, and defended General Jackson's administration for its opposition to this scheme before the people of the Congressional district which I now feel honored in representing. Now, Mr. Chairman, in less than three years, I find myself compelled to defend the opinions I then entertained and defended, not against my political opponents, but against the attacks of the present administration and its friends, so completely have they changed their position. Finding for a few months past that my opinions upon this subject were in collision with those of the administration and most of its prominent friends, I carefully and deliberately reviewed my former opinions, with a view to detect any fallacy, error, or delusion under which I labored, if there was any which had contributed to form those opinions. The result of this review has been to rivet my conviction of the truth of those opinions, and an increased and more inflexible determination to adhere to them. Being satisfied that my opinions are correct, I dare not—I cannot—I will not vote for this recommendation of the Message.

The question to be decided is, whether the continuance of the present State bank system of fiscal agency, with the improvements and restrictions which experience has pointed out to us as necessary and proper, or the "untried experiment" of excluding the State banks as depositories of the public money, and restricting the receipts of the public revenue to gold and silver only, shall be adopted. This is the true issue, to the decision of which, as affects the future happiness and prosperity of the nation, the most serious and deliberate attention of the House should be directed. I need not here repeat what I have before stated, that, whenever the question of a national bank is presented, if I shall have the honor of a seat upon this floor, I shall oppose it, both upon the grounds of the want of constitutional power, and its inexpediency. The opinions I imbibed in my earliest youth, I learned from the State papers of Jefferson, Madison, and their republican contemporaries, and shall never surrender them until I become a tenant of the tomb.

The system of deposits adopted from the foundation of the Government, and which has prevailed to the present hour, wherever it was practicable, is the bank system. This fact, accompanied with the expressed opinions of every incumbent of the Treasury Department until the present time, proves conclusively to every reflecting mind that it was regarded as the safest, most economical, and most convenient system; without this means of keeping the public money, it must have been kept and distributed by individuals, and subject to all the extravagance, insecurity, and liability to defalcation which has ever attended individual receipts and disbursements. All preceding Secretaries, and many of our most distinguished men of the old republican school, declared their opinions in favor of the plan now proposed. It is remarkable, that a system so republican, so safe, and so innocent, as that now proposed, should never have been proposed for the adoption of Congress, by any preceding administration, or any preceding Treasury Department. If it had been viewed in its present favorable and superior light, it certainly would have been recommended; but, as it was not, I regard the omission to do it as conclusive evidence that it was not approved. The only difficulty which has ever prevailed has been between the selection of a national and State banks, some preferring the former, some the latter. There being now no national bank, the question of preference is directly presented between the State bank system and the sub-Treasury system recommended by the Executive.

[Mr. Garland then argued at great length to show that the State bank system was entitled to the preference.]

Mr. RARIDEN said: I cannot view this bill as simply intending to withhold from the States the fourth instalment of the surplus revenue. This is a false and mistaken view of it. This will not be its practical effect, for it must be kept in mind that this surplus, the payment of which to the States is to be indefinitely postponed by this bill, is already with the States in the deposit banks, and is the basis of a portion of the circulating medium of the States; and to postpone its payment to the States by the national Treasury, means nothing more or less than to withdraw from the States this basis of their circulating medium, by withdrawing from the deposit banks, in hard money, a sum equal to the amount to which each State is yet entitled under the provisions of the deposit law; and whilst this ruinous measure, which will be most sensibly felt by the western and south-western States, is pressed forward, we find another measure, claiming the same fraternity, (referring to the bill to postpone the collection of merchants' bonds,) the effects of which will be to leave with certain States several millions of money, of which the Treasury is at this time in want, and to which, under existing laws, it is now entitled.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The few remarks which I design to make are with a view to illustrate the positions just assumed.

This question has been discussed by some gentlemen, as though there was an angry and rival interest involved in the action of this House between the General and State Governments, and some seem to feel that they have specially in charge the interest of the former. For my part, I do not view it in that light, nor do I feel myself more the friend and agent of the State which sent me here than the friend and agent of the General Government. I feel that in this matter I am the common friend of both, and that the action of this House is paternal; that in a controversy like this, for the possession of a fund which each claims as trustee, the adjustment of the difference is referred to us and the co-ordinate branches for an adjustment upon principles of political equity, looking to the convenience and well-being of both claimants.

I cannot comprehend how the General Government has any adverse or paramount rights in this fund to the people of the States. It was they who infused into it all its life and vigor, and bestowed upon it all its capacities, among which was the power to levy and collect a revenue of themselves, to such amount as was necessary to carry on and carry out the functions they had bestowed upon it, and predestined it to fulfil for their own good.

Now, sir, if from accidental causes, in the due execution of the established revenue laws, more has been collected than was necessary for purposes of government, to whom does it belong—the agent who collected it, or the principal of whom it was collected? I, sir, consider it a common right of the people in a common surplus in the safe-keeping of the United States, the accumulation and inactivity of which, at the time Congress acted upon it, was paralyzing the enterprise and industry of the country. Money, we know, sir, is the generator of enterprise, and had this fund been permitted to have remained an inactive accumulating mass in the national Treasury, it would, in all probability, have checked the industry and enterprise of the country, as injuriously as its subsequent removal to the State banks stimulated them, and thereby greatly diminished the natural resources of the Treasury.

Add to this, sir, that it was a source of jealous watching with our intelligent countrymen, lest its influence might have been diverted to party purposes, instead of national. Indeed, sir, I have heard whispers that the party who once had the entire control of it, were less successful in elections since it has been wrested from their control, but whether there be any foundation for the uncharitable surmises that this fund had any agency in the success, I know not, and therefore cannot say.

Nor can I pretend to say positively that had this surplus remained in the Bank of the United States, the result would have been different from that which followed its deposit in the State banks—if the Bank of the United States was managed by fallible human agents, and it is probable, at least possible, that they were liable to the influence of the same passions and frailties which characterized the agents of the State banks.

This is all possible, but not necessary to determine now. The surplus was removed to the State banks, which cannot now be undone or recalled.

Congress, in the passage of the deposit law, seemed to have in view to ward off from the country the injurious effects of that disposition of them.

But some gentlemen tell us now that there is no surplus, that the act is spent, and nothing remains for it to operate upon. Why so? Where has it gone to? Was not the action of Congress based upon a visible and tangible fund, to be in the Treasury on a certain day? And was it not there on that day? So says the Secretary's report. And disposed of by the act? If so, then it is a Congressional disposition of the public money; like all other dispositions, a fair and permanent charge upon the Treasury, and if misdirected by the agents of the Government, or absorbed by other appropriations, it is a fair demand of the States upon the Treasury, and so far remains to be executed.

Sir, it is important to my State that it should be executed. Much of her legislation is based upon its reception; her institutions of learning look to it; her system of internal improvements looks to it; and her citizens look to it as a fund to resuscitate, in some degree, the fountain of their currency in these dark days.

Mr. CUSHING said: Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to vote for this bill. Various reasons for opposing it have been adduced by different gentlemen, in many of whose arguments I concur. I have another reason, particular to myself.

The clauses of the deposit act, which appertain to the present question, seem to me to possess all the features of a contract. It provides that the whole surplus revenue of the United States, beyond a certain sum, which may be in the Treasury on a certain day, shall be deposited with the several States; which deposit the States are to keep safely, and to pay back to the United States, whenever the same shall be called for by the Secretary of the Treasury in a prescribed time and mode, and on the happening of a given contingency. Here, it seems to me, is a contract in honor; and, so far as there can be a contract between the United States and the several States, a contract in law; there being reciprocal engagements, for a valuable consideration, on both sides. It is, at any rate, a quasi-contract. They who impugn this view of the question argue on the supposition that the act, performed or to be performed by the United States, is an inchoate gift of money to the States. Not so. It is a contract of deposit; and that contract is consummated, and made perfect, on the formal reception of any instalment of the deposit by the States.

Now, entertaining this view of the transaction, I am asked by the administration to come forward and break this contract. True, a contract made by the Government of the United States cannot be enforced in law. Does that make it either honest or honorable for the United States to take advantage of its power and violate its pledged faith? I refuse to participate in any such breach of faith.

But further. The administration solicits Congress to step in between the United States and the States as a volunteer, and to violate a contract, as the means of helping the administration out of difficulties, into which its own madness and folly have wilfully sunk it, and which press equally upon the Government and the people. The object of the measure is to relieve the Secretary of the Treasury from the responsibility of acting in this matter as he has the power to do. Let him act. I will not go out of my way to interpose in this between the Executive and the several States, until the administration appeals to me in the right spirit. This it has not done. The Executive comes to us with a new doctrine, which is echoed by his friends in this House, namely, that the American Government is not to exert itself for the relief of the American people. Very well. If this be your policy, I, as representing the people, will not exert myself for the relief of your administration.

Let me restate the question. The doctrine of the Executive is, in short, that, in their mutual relations towards each other, all the Government has to do is to be supported by the people, and all the people have to do is to support the Government. Now I say that, under such circumstances, for an administration professing such tenets, I will do just that which my public duty to the country requires, and no more. I will vote for its Treasury note bill; that is, grant it a loan, not for the sake of the administration, but for the sake of the public creditors to whom the money is, or will be due, and of the Government as such, which must not be allowed to suffer, whatever may be the faults of the administration. But I will not, as a member of Congress, volunteer to take on my own shoulders the responsibility of revoking or withholding the surplus revenue from the States, in order to lighten the burden of responsibility, which the existing law imposes on the Secretary of the Treasury. Let him untangle his own snarl. I will not raise a finger to do it. The administration has got itself and the people into these desperate straits. It now proposes to cut loose from the people, and abandon them to their fate; but asks of us, the House of the people, to take upon us the propitiation for its sins; and to do this by the violation of a contract between the Federal Government and the States. I will not do it.

Sir, I submit these brief remarks, on this particular bill, by way of preface to the more extended line of argument, which I am about to pursue.

[Mr. Cushing then proceeded to reply to the Message, and the doctrines which it contained, in a speech divided into thirty heads, each introduced with a caption, as follows: "Convocation of Congress."—"Public Distress."—"Causes of Public Distress."—"Condition of the Country."—"Objects for Congress."—"National Bank and Popular Will."—"Utility of a National Bank."—"Exchanges."—"The Bank Government."—"The President's Pledges."—"The Pet Banks."—"Divorce of Bank and State."—"Practice of other Nations."—"Use of Government Deposits."—"Utility of Credit."—"Sub-Treasuries."—"Comparative Safety."—"Defaulters."—"Financial Operations."—"The Post Office."—"Patronage."—"Treasury Bank."—"Funds receivable by Government."—"Government Paper."—"Currency and Bank Question."—"Objects of Legislation."—"Ceded Powers."—"Equality."—"Non-interference of Government."—"The true issue."—The scope and design of this abridgment excludes the whole of this most elaborate essay, except what relates to the questions before the House: and these parts are given under their respective captions.]

DIVORCE OF BANK AND STATE.

The repudiation of banks as fiscal agents of the United States—this is the new scheme, the "untried expedient," the fresh humbug, to be imposed upon the people, under cover of the cry, Divorce of bank and State. This phrase is somewhat ambiguous. It may have different meanings. In the true and legitimate sense of the words, I am for a divorce of bank and State; and I should rejoice to be able to believe that the administration was sincerely for it. I abhor that close association, that marriage, of bank and State which characterized the system of the late deposit banks, those pets of the Government; banks, some of them confessedly the mere tools of the administration; banks, earning the use of the deposits, like the Seventh Ward Bank in New York, by walking on their knees to a despotic Executive. To prevent this marriage, has ever been a favorite object of the whig party throughout the country, North, South, and West. To effect this, always has been, and I solemnly believe is at this hour, if not the favorite purpose of the administration, at any rate the sure tendency of its measures.

Sir, this is no new question. Do we forget that the late President deliberately proposed to Congress the establishment of a national bank founded on the funds of the Treasury, and conducted by the Government? Do we forget that the unpardonable sin of the late United States Bank was its independence of the Government—the refusal of that bank to be married to the administration? This, from beginning to end, was the point of that controversy. Do we forget that afterwards, at a later period, when the regulation of the public deposits was under discussion at the second session of the twenty-third Congress, the friends of the administration, to a man, voted and spoke against this very proposition of a divorce of bank and State, then made by Mr. Gordon, of Virginia? Nay, that they refused even to consider the subject, when Mr. Robertson moved a reference for inquiry concerning it? And now this, the desperate heresy of 1835, is the orthodox doctrine of 1837. I repeat, I am opposed to the union of bank and State; I am in favor of the separation of bank and State, if these words have any meaning which I can comprehend. I would have the Government deal with citizens doing business under the style and firm of a bank, as with other citizens; employ them, on proper terms, so long as they are honest and true; otherwise, not. I would have the Government do with its deposits just as I do with mine—selecting a suitable depository, and each contracting fairly with the other for their mutual advantage.

SUB-TREASURIES.

Admitting, upon such facts, which the President perforce does, the utility of the credit system, what then is the application he makes of it? Is it not singular, that he steps at once from a statement of the value of the credit system, to the development of a new policy of administration directly adverse to the premises?

Heretofore, the public treasure has not been in the very hands of the Treasurer of the United States, or of any deputy of his. It has been deposited in bank, to be drawn out only by warrants, countersigned, registered, and recorded, and so guarded as to render the actual money wholly inaccessible to the immediate agents of the Treasury. To avoid the evils of bank connections, the President recommends that this public money, instead of being kept on deposit in bank, shall, for greater safety, be kept in the pockets, chests, or vaults, of collectors, receivers-general, sub-treasurers, or some other denomination of agents of the Treasury. Such, in plain terms, is the scheme.

COMPARATIVE SAFETY.

If the clerks of a great merchant, or other person using a great deal of money, were to make a similar proposal to their employer, that is, a proposal that large sums of cash of his on hand should be kept in their pockets, or chests, instead of being deposited in bank, he would have good reason to suspect their honesty; but if the employer himself were to propose the plan to his clerks, and propose it as a plan of peculiar safety, they would be sure he had lost his senses.

But, demands the President, are bank vaults any stronger than Treasury vaults—are bank agents any honester than Treasury agents?

In reply, 1st. Individuals may abscond with the public money in their pockets; but a bank corporation cannot. Non est inventus is a pretty frequent entry on the books of the Treasury Department against the names of individuals intrusted with public money; but I never heard of such an entry against the name of a deposit bank.

2d. There is great difference between the case of money passing at once through the hands of a man, and that of money kept for an indefinite period in his actual custody; especially when there is a stream of it continually coming in, and he can pay over out of the new receipts, so as to conceal for a long time a past defalcation.

3d. A depositor is not dependent on the strength of a bank vault, or the honesty of bank officers. He has the bank, that is, the stockholders, for security. If the bank vault is robbed, or the bank officers commit a fraud, the depositor does not bear the loss; the bank bears it. But if the Government vaults be robbed, or its agents embezzle the money intrusted to them, the deposit is gone, it is absolutely lost to the Government. When the Government deposits in bank, it has all the security of moral honesty, strong vaults, and penal bonds or laws, (for bank officers are usually under bond and are indictable for malfeasance,) which it possibly can have, with sub-treasuries; and it has the additional, and much greater security, of the stock and stockholders of the deposit bank.

4th. There is greater supervision in banks, with directors and stockholders always on the spot, vigilant over their personal interest, and having careful arrangements of inspection; none of which things could by any possibility be, to the same degree, attainable in the sub-Treasury scheme.

THE TRUE ISSUE.

And the question for the people now to decide is, whether their Government is to be active in the perpetration of mischief only? Potent as it is for evil, shall it be suffered to make itself utterly impotent for good? Shall it, in the hour of public distress and peril, coward-like, slink into a corner, in wilful neglect and abandonment of its public duty? Shall it stand upon its safe elevation, and halloo on to mischief all the furies of rapine and disorder, which the evil times have drawn forth from their lurking-places, refusing meanwhile to stir a step itself for the welfare and happiness of the country, amid the disasters which its own misrule has brought upon us?

Doubtless it is true, as the President suggests, that the country will, in time, recover itself. It has elastic and recuperative energies within it, which no power on earth can subdue. Our forests and our fields,—our oceans, lakes, and rivers,—our enterprise, industry, and intelligence,—our free institutions,—the favor of Providence which has never forsaken us,—these are elements of greatness and prosperity, which baffle and defy all the errors and faults of misgovernment. But is it any apology for your striking off my arm, that its bones and muscles are endowed with a natural power to knit together again, and regain their pristine health and strength? Doubtless, the country will recover itself; but, if the recommendations of the Message are to be enforced, it has got to recover, not only without aid from the Federal Government, but in spite of the Government.

Will the people sanction such a doctrine? In the concluding paragraph of the Message, the President reminds us that we are fresh from the people, that we know their embarrassments, and the relief they need. We do so. We have submitted this question to the arbitrament of the people. We cheerfully abide their decision. We tell you, that North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Rhode Island, Maine, have pronounced judgment on the administration. I congratulate Maine, especially, on her emancipation from the thralldom of degrading assentation to every caprice of the Executive, to which her own peculiar interests have so long been sacrificed. We hail the auspicious omen of the bright star in the East. Maine has rung the knell of radicalism. Well may she hold up to the eye of her sister States the DIRIGO in her escutcheon. The people have spoken out, and in a voice of thunder, which should be re-echoed by their Representatives in this Hall, until it penetrate into the innermost recesses of the White House. And if the assembled Representatives of the nation do nothing else for the public good in this emergency,—if all the power and influence of the Executive are to be exerted as a drag on the wheels of legislation, to preclude the adoption of any measure of general relief,—this at least we may and we will do; we may and we will enter up an APPEAL to the people, against the conduct now pursued, and the purposes professed, by this administration.

TUESDAY, September 26.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The question on the following amendment, moved by Mr. PICKENS, was then taken:

Strike out the words "till further provision by law," and insert "the first day of January, 1839."

Rejected—yeas 65, nays not counted.

The committee rose, and reported the bill, without amendment, to the House.

WEDNESDAY, September 27.

Mississippi Election.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections, which was accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Samuel J. Gholson and John F. H. Claiborne are duly elected members of the 25th Congress, and as such are entitled to take their seats."

The question was on concurring with the committee in the above resolution.

Mr. MAURY contended that, by the Constitution of the United States, it was made the duty of the Legislature of Mississippi to prescribe the time, places, and manner of holding their elections. The Constitution of the United States had made it their specific duty to do so, and if they refused or neglected to exercise the power conferred upon them, it was for Congress to exercise it. It was not in the power of the Governor, he argued, to determine upon the time, places, and manner of holding elections; and even if the Legislature of Mississippi had conferred this power upon the Governor, he could not have exercised it legally, because it would have been in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. [He then went into a critical examination of that clause in the Constitution of the United States which says: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies," and of the definition of the word "happen," to show that the vacancy which had occurred by the expiration of the term of the two representatives from Mississippi on the third of March last, was not such a vacancy as that contemplated by the framers of the constitution when they inserted the above clause.] The above clause, in his opinion, only referred to the contingency of a vacancy happening by the death, resignation, or other inability, of a member from a State, and did not refer to the case of the expiration of the term of service of representatives.

He contended, also, that argument as to time would not lie, because the Governor of Mississippi could not have assembled the Legislature and had an election held in time enough in the legal and proper mode. He next referred to cases that he considered cases in point, which had occurred in the Senate of the United States, where seats became vacant by the expiration of the term of Senators, and where the Governor had filled such vacancies; and showed that two decisions had been had by the Senate, where it refused to permit such Senators so appointed to qualify and take their seats, because they declared that the Governor of the State had no power to make a temporary appointment, where the regular term of the member had expired.

Mr. M. concluded by moving to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting

SEPTEMBER, 1837.]

Mississippi Election.

[H. OF R.]

"That Samuel J. Gholson and John F. H. Claiborne, not being duly elected members of the House of Representatives, are not entitled to seats on this floor as such."

Mr. PENNYBACKER said: I, like the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MAURY,) am a member of the Committee of Elections. The relation which I bear to the report of the majority has caused me to rise. It is due to myself, due to the majority, and perhaps due to the House, to explain the reasons which induced the committee to come to their conclusion. In doing so, sir, I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible.

The facts of the case are simply these: Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne were members of the 24th Congress; their term of office expired with that Congress: this came to pass on the 3d of March last. By the law of Mississippi, her general elections are directed to be held in the month of November, biennially. The coming November will be the time at which her general elections would have taken place, under ordinary circumstances. But, the President of the United States having issued his proclamation convening Congress on the first of this month, it was seen by the executive of the State of Mississippi, that, unless the elections were sooner brought on, the State of Mississippi would be unrepresented in the extra session. To prevent this, he issued his writs, commanding the sheriffs to hold an election, in July last, for two representatives, to serve, however, until the first Monday in November next, when, it was supposed, their successors could be regularly chosen. The writs were executed, and Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne were returned as elected.

Upon this state of facts a question has arisen: are these gentlemen entitled to their seats? and if so, for what period of time?

First. Are the gentlemen entitled to their seats?

This brings us immediately to the consideration of the clause in the constitution read by the gentleman, (Mr. MAURY,) and which is in these words: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." From this clause the executive of Mississippi claimed his authority to issue his writs: under this clause the members elect insist upon their seats. We are bound, therefore, to ascertain its meaning.

Its language is: "When vacancies happen," &c. Here at the threshold, the inquiry arises, had vacancies happened when the writs were issued? That vacancies existed cannot be denied. The thing of itself was nearly self-evident. Mr. P. did not know that he could make it any plainer; nevertheless, he would attempt to do so. By the Constitution of the United States various offices are created. Those of President, Vice President, Judge of the Supreme Court, Senator in Congress, and Representative in Congress are among the number. By the same instrument, also, the tenures of those offices are fixed and established. Those of President and Vice President, being four years; that of Judge, during good behavior; that of Senator, subject to classification, six years; and that of Representative two years. Though the terms of the offices may expire, the offices themselves remain with the constitution. Now the terms of office for Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne, as members of the 24th Congress, expired with that Congress: this came to pass on the 3d of March last. On the 4th of March, then, their offices were vacant. So they continued until after the writs were issued.

Having established this position, Mr. P. would proceed.

It was said by the gentleman, (Mr. MAURY,) though vacancies existed, they had not happened; that he had examined the dictionary for the meaning of the term, and found its meaning not to apply; that it was only applied to cases of casualty; that it would be absurd to say the sun happened to rise, the tides happened to flow, &c.; that there was nothing fortuitous in these events, they were foreseen, foreknown, and must occur: so with a vacancy by efflux of time; and that the obvious meaning of the constitution was, vacancies occurring by death, &c. To this Mr. P. could not subscribe. It appeared to him that the term chance more exactly represented the gentleman's meaning. The constitution did not read "when vacancies chance to happen," but its terms were "when vacancies happen," &c. He, like the gentleman, had looked into authority. He had found one exactly in point. From it he learned (to use a figure) that to happen was a genus, whilst to chance was a species; that the one included the other, but not vice versa. Mr. P. then read from Crabb's Synonymes (a book from the library) the following: "To happen (that is, to fall out by a hap) is to chance as the genus to the species, whatever chances happens, but not vice versa. Happen respects all events, without including any collateral idea; chance comprehends, likewise, the idea of the cause and order of the events. Whatever comes to pass happens, whether regularly in the course of events, or particularly, and out of order; whatever chances happens altogether without concert, intention, and often without relation to any other thing. The newspapers contain an account of all that happens in the course of the week." Now, (said Mr. P.) whilst I do not aspire to the character of a critic, and will not arrogate to myself any great degree of learning, I will say, upon the authority I have just read, that the rising of the sun may be well said to happen; the going down of the same may be said to happen; the flowing of the tides may be said to happen; eclipses happen; and that vacancies, occurring by the efflux of time, may be said to happen. And why, sir? Because they all come to pass.

Then, from the language of the clause, the executive of Mississippi had authority for his writs.

Mr. MAURY made a few additional remarks in explanation of the position he had taken.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The House proceeded to consider the "bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States," reported last night, without amendment, from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JENIFER said: The bill immediately under consideration is to withhold from the States upwards of $9,000,000, which was directed to be paid to them on the 1st October approaching, and this, too, without any notice to the States. The deposit bill of June, 1836, distributing $37,000,000 amongst the several States, provides that in the event that any portion of said deposits should be required for the Treasury, the Secretary is authorized to withdraw it "in sums not exceeding $10,000, from any one State, in any one month, without previous notice of thirty days for every additional sum of $20,000 which may at any time be required;" thus protecting the States against a too sudden or heavy draft, by which they might be inconvenienced. This bill proposes, without such notice, to withhold from them from $300,000 to one and a half millions, according to the amount to which each might be entitled. From Maryland, for instance, upwards of $300,000; from Pennsylvania near $1,000,000; South Carolina near $400,000; New York near one million and a half, and the other States in proportion. Are there no other means by which the Treasury may be replenished than resorting to the sum pledged to be paid to the States on the 1st October, and which has in many instances been anticipated in advance? This deposit with the States has been variously appropriated. By some of them loaned out at interest; by others applied to works of internal improvement; and by some to the purposes of education; the withholding of which, as proposed, must necessarily affect, more or less, those several interests.

Should the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PROCKENS) be adopted, it will render much less objectionable the bill, because that fixes the period when the nine millions shall be paid to the States, and takes from the Executive the power of withdrawing it at his will. The amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) would make the bill still more acceptable, because in it the means are provided by which the payment is guaranteed to the States. But, sir, pass the bill, and you still have to raise, by loan, Treasury notes or other means to an additional amount. The estimate by the friends of the administration makes a deficiency in the Treasury of from 12 to 16 millions to be supplied. The nine millions withheld from the States will not answer your demands; and if you have to resort to the expediency of raising money as you propose by your Treasury note bill, why not issue notes to the full amount?

By this means you supply the demand upon the Treasury, without sacrifice to the States; and the principle is the same, whether you raise ten or twenty millions.

Mr. J. said he had seen a statement prepared by his friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. PHILLIPS,) and which, it was to be regretted, had not been presented to the consideration of the House, which points out the means by which the demand upon the Treasury may be met without the withdrawal of the nine millions from the States, and without an additional tax upon the people. He hoped, before the question was taken, the House might have the benefit of his suggestions.

But, Mr. Speaker, why is the Government thus situated? Why is there a deficiency in the Treasury? Why is it that Congress is called to remedy the embarrassments under which the country is suffering?

I know that the response to these inquiries by the friends of the administration is, that it is attributable to the Bank of the United States—to the State banks—to overtrading by merchants—to extravagant speculations. If such be the facts, who is responsible for all these causes?

In 1828 the country was prosperous, the currency sound, bank issues within proper limits, and confidence between man and man. From that period to the present time, the country has been under the dominion of Andrew Jackson. Congress has been under his control, and his will the law of the land. Which of his friends here present, in either House, have ever dared to raise their voice against his will? He undertook to re-organize the Government—to put down the Bank of the United States—to give to the country a sound and uniform currency—to establish a metallic circulating medium, and to make the people prosperous and happy. And now, after eight years of uninterrupted experiments, with all the departments of the Government under his control, with the exercise of a power which was never wielded in any country except a despotic one, his successor, in almost the first act of his administration, is compelled to convoke Congress to remedy the evils which he has inflicted upon the country.

But, sir, Congress cannot, by their acts alone, place the country where it was ten years since. They may, by persevering in the late experiments, divide the responsibility of those ruinous measures with the Executive, but they cannot remedy them without retracing their steps. Go back to 1834; replace the public money where the law directed it should be kept; restore the constitution to its original purity by obeying its injunctions; repeal your Treasury circular, which was issued contrary to the almost unanimous consent of the Representatives of the people; listen to the voice which has spoken, in no doubtful language, from Indiana to Maine; attempt no more experiments upon the currency: do this, and confidence may be restored; but do not aggravate the sufferings of the people by contrasting their miserable currency with the golden bribe tendered to their representatives.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

Sir, is it not extraordinary that while, on the 1st January, 1837, by a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there was in the Treasury of the United States $37,468,859 97 surplus over all the demands of the Government, and which was by law directed to be distributed amongst the different States, now we are told there will be a deficiency of from twelve to sixteen millions of dollars? And whilst the people are parentally advised to deny themselves many of their accustomed comforts, and to economize their own expenditures, not one effort is made to curtail the expenses of the Government, which have risen up in eight years from thirteen to thirty-two millions of dollars.

The proposition has been made to separate the interests of the Government from that of the people—to establish for the one a sound, uniform metallic currency, and for the other such paper as is denounced to be perfectly valueless. This new experiment has already commenced, and a discrimination is to be made between different classes of Government creditors. I cannot more clearly show the rank injustice, and, I might add, cruelty, practised by the Government in relation to this discrimination, than by stating a fact which has come to my knowledge since the adjournment of the House on Saturday. An old soldier of the Revolution, worn down by years and arduous duties in the service of his country, and who is entitled to a pension in consequence of those services from his Government, presented, as usual, his claim at the proper department. A check or certificate was given for the amount, and, although he entreated to have a few dollars for the payment of his post office account, he could not obtain a single dollar. To what reflections are we brought by such a state of things as this? The Representatives in Congress, heads of Departments, and various other officers of the Government, receive and send their papers, packages, and letters to and from all parts of the United States free of postage. Their frank saves them from oppression here. Amongst them, with few exceptions, gold and silver can be dispensed with except at the post office; and they being thus protected, still are tendered gold and silver, before it is asked for. And yet a poor old soldier, who is as much a creditor of the Government for his pension, as a member of Congress is for his mileage or per diem, cannot obtain as much of the precious metal as will enable him to buy from the post office his long-expected letter, perhaps from his children or grand-children, whom he may never see again. Sir, the old soldier, with a check for sixty dollars in his pocket, paid for his services, cannot obtain from his Government money enough to pay for his letter, or credit at the post office to enable him to obtain it. And yet members of Congress and office-holders daily receive their golden reward for adhering to these experiments.

Mr. MENESEE, of Kentucky, said: Among the numerous objections to this bill, it may, not without reason, be urged, as it has been, that the act of Congress of the 23d of June, 1836, directing certain money, belonging to the United States, to be transferred to the several States, on their complying with the prescribed terms, bears the character of a legislative contract, from the obligations of which this Government cannot rightfully discharge itself, by such an interference with its provisions as the bill under consideration proposes. The act carried with it certain propositions to the States, which they accepted, respecting the public money. Its mere custody, if nothing more was intended, undoubtedly involved both expense and responsibility, independently of the express and formal stipulations to restore it when demanded according to the terms of the act. It is not pretended that the States have failed, in the smallest particular, to observe the requisitions of the act, as far as transfers have already been made; nor is their readiness or ability to comply, with respect to the instalment yet due, at all questioned.

It is perfectly competent to a Government to create, in the form of laws, contracts binding upon it. The practice often occurs. All our acts of incorporation are instances of this kind of legislation.

If, then, the act of 1836 be, as it is represented and insisted on, a contract—and it is difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish it from a contract—the objection to the bill, for that cause alone, is altogether sufficient. If a contract, it must be fulfilled. This Government cannot escape from the obligations it imposes, except by the consent of the other contracting party—the States. The violation, by Congress, of such a contract, could not, I know, be redressed by a resort to the judicial tribunals. Yet the imputation of tyranny and perfidy would justly await such a violation. A position which no one supposes an American Congress capable of occupying.

But, sir, I do not rest my opposition to this bill exclusively, or even mainly, on the ground of a supposed violation of contract involved in it. This I deem a narrow view of the matter. I place it on higher and more commanding reasons—on the true nature and spirit of the act; not as evinced by its language or its form, but by the principles in which it was conceived, the ends it aimed at, and the whole context of circumstances which attended its enactment.

What, sir, I ask, are the nature and spirit of that act? It is attempted to be maintained that it was merely intended as a measure of finance; that the public money was to be transferred, for the advantage of the Treasury of the United States, to the State Treasuries, there to be held on deposit strictly—not contemplating the use of it, by the States, for their own benefit, even temporarily. In other words, that the States were, as such, substantially converted, by that act, into so many agents and instruments of the Federal Treasury. Under this pretension, the use of the money, by the States, even for the shortest periods, or to the least extent, was wholly forbidden; for, if Congress could authorize the use of it, by the States, without interest or equivalent, for an indefinite time, they might, upon the same principle, and with equal propriety, wholly relinquish it to the States; the constitutional power to do which, the advocates of this construction deny.

No, sir, (said he,) the act of the 23d of June was no financial expedient. It is more imposing. It is the offspring of considerations tenderly affecting the federal constitution, and the purity of its administration.

By a course of federal legislation, whether constitutional or unconstitutional, wise or unwise, is of no moment here, a large revenue had accumulated beyond the wants of the Treasury. Large, however, as this surplus was, it cannot be pretended that its mere custody by the Government was impracticable, or even difficult. Its full competency to this end was never questioned. Yet, from the earliest period of this accumulation, it was universally regarded with an eye, not only of distrust and apprehension, but of absolute abhorrence. It was viewed as the dread fountain from which were destined to flow extravagance in the federal expenditures, augmentation of Executive power, and all else that was hostile to the constitution and dangerous to public liberty. Nor, sir, was it viewed in any false light. No fear was entertained that was not just; no abhorrence felt that the frightful visage of the evil did not fully warrant. The worst predictions of its pernicious influences fast ripened into fulfilment. Government extravagance, impelled by this surplus, progressed without check, and with the utmost rapidity, to the point not only of profusion, but of profligacy verging on actual corruption. Executive power, already expanded to its fullest constitutional dimensions, seated on this same surplus, and wielded by a popular hand, wrenched from its co-ordinate departments every check, and demolished every balance designed for its restraint. Under an abused, if not unconstitutional, power of removal from office, the independence of public officers, so necessary to a pure administration, broken down to the basest servility, and the whole corps transformed from servants of the people and officers of the law into an army of mercenaries, obedient to Executive command, no matter what commanding. The Senate—prostrated, utterly. The Judiciary—contemned, defied, and principles advanced openly by the Executive abolishing every vestige of restraint through that department. Congress—a seducing patronage perpetually playing upon it; the veto lightly and capriciously hurled at it; the practice of withholding bills, insulting and defrauding it; the purse violently wrested from it; the regulation of the currency usurped; its spirit broken; and at last, subjugated and outstretched at the feet of the Executive. The people—deceived, despised, most grievously distressed. Their most highly favored measures—the bank bill, the land bill, the currency bill, successively perishing under the veto, or that other more terrible power. Their currency—in rags, torn asunder by the hand that had snatched it from Congress.

The principle of preserving the surplus for the States, first acquired form and consistency in the land bill of Mr. Clay. That measure from its first conception was dear to the people and dear to their representatives. It received majorities in Congress seldom, if ever, commanded by so grave a measure; and it might have been reasonably supposed that such majorities, backed by the almost undivided voice of the nation, would have insured its success. Yet, sir, it perished—under the frown of one man. Not by the veto, but that more detestable engine of withholding bills. Its fate was calamitous to the country, and the calamity was aggravated by the general conviction that it was induced by no constitutional objection really existing in the breast of the Executive, but by the relentless hatred he bore the author of the measure, and an insuperable repugnance to do or permit any thing tending to advance his fame.

The determination of the country to relieve the Government of this malady did not, however, perish with that bill. It survived and flourished. It presented itself next in the form of the deposit bill of the Senate, in the spring of 1836, proposing to transfer the surplus to the States, upon the execution to the General Government of certificates of deposit bearing an interest, and negotiable by the Secretary of the Treasury. That bill found its way to this House, and finally grew into the act of the 23d of June, 1836.

This, sir, is a concise view of the history of that act, and of the principles which lie at its foundation. That history and those principles, I think, prove—the debates upon it, the general understanding of the country, every thing that attended its passage, all that could characterize such a proceeding, its contemporaneous exposition drawn from every source—manifestly prove, that this transfer of money to the States was but colorably a deposit, having been meant, in fact, as distribution. Upon its constitutionality, as an act of distribution, some, I know, expressed doubts; and, for that reason, opposed it. We have, therefore, their authority for asserting, that it involved distribution. The various hues it assumed between its first germination in the land bill, and its maturity, arose from a desire on the part of its friends to mould it to the views and constitutional opinions of those who favored the principle of distribution, but hesitated upon the mode of effecting it. Sir, that great act experienced much tribulation in struggling into life. The organs of the Executive, in both Houses of Congress, denounced it—reviled it—warred against it in every shape, by all means, and without quarter. Their published speeches, now before me, breathe the utmost violence towards it. It is notorious that it experienced the frowns of the Executive; for even in the third generation, it labored, in his eye, under the curse which he had pronounced on its forefather, the land bill. And when at last, after passing by most striking majorities, it was presented to the Executive, a reluctant signature was wrung from him. He did not, in the language of the constitution, approve the bill. He barely tolerated its passage, the first and last instance, during his administration, of his yielding, even in his caprices, to the will of Congress or of the people! He repented signing the bill the moment after he had done it. His spirit of unbridled rule construed it into an act of Executive humiliation; to soothe which, he followed the act of signing the bill with an extraordinary annunciation, through the official paper, of his determination to publish to the world the secret necessity which had forced it upon him. His growling and ill-suppressed wrath pursued the measure ever after.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

[H. OF R.]

What action, by the States, ensued the passage of this law? In their reception of their respective proportions of the surplus, none of them either viewed or treated it as a deposit merely; though, for the sake of the appearances which the act had been compelled to assume, they, too, observed the forms prescribed by it. The general policy adopted by them, respecting the application of the surplus, was the same. In the West, in particular, as in all new countries, a great demand existed for capital, the want of which repressed their enterprise, and stifled the development of the boundless resources profusely scattered around them. This act was hailed as measurably supplying that capital. Their Legislatures, previously limited to the means afforded by direct taxation, felt freed from their former restraints, and at once launched into a bold and incautious policy. Popular instruction and internal improvement were the predominating objects of their regard. The whole energy of their legislation was bent towards laying, deep and broad, the foundations of that policy; and the systems devised for the purpose became intimately connected with every ramification of business. They, in many instances, were connected with the local banks by an investment of the surplus in capital; through the banks, with the trading and mercantile interests; and ultimately with all classes.

Taking into view this application of the surplus by the States, and supposing it liable, as contended for, to be recalled at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, is it not plain that the act, instead of abridging Executive power, as was intended, must greatly augment it? It confers upon the Executive the most dangerous power over the States—no less a power than that of direct taxation; for to that a recall of the surplus must lead; the States having no other expedient to sustain the interests shown thus to rest upon it.

Even admitting, then, that Congress may have the right to extort from the States the surplus already paid, and to withhold that now due, the exercise of the right would not be warranted, except on the most urgent and irresistible necessity.

What, sir, is that necessity, as alleged by the President, and assumed by this bill? It is, that the Treasury of the United States is unable to sustain itself in its embarrassments, without resorting to the fourth instalment intended for the States, amounting to $9,367,214.98; the proportion of which transferable to Kentucky being nearly half a million. I have looked, in the spirit of sincere inquiry, into evidences upon which this alleged financial necessity rests; and have looked in vain. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted to Congress at the opening of the session, though obviously meant to magnify, as far as possible, our financial difficulties, has, I think, utterly failed to establish it. Information, derived officially from that department since, under resolutions of this House, still further weakens the attempt.

Without entering minutely into the condition of the Treasury, it is, in my opinion, plainly demonstrable, that, by converting into cash (which can readily be done) the bonds held by the Government on the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, amounting to $7,946,356 16, besides interest, means may be commanded fully adequate to the wants of the Treasury, without violating the act of 1836.

The proposition to withhold this surplus would be more tolerable, if it were intended to prevent the creation of a new national debt; my aversion to which, if any thing could, might induce me to support it. But it intends no such thing. The President boldly announces to the people of the United States the starting purpose of fixing upon them a new public debt—not in a direct form, but under the insidious disguise of Treasury notes. The employment of these notes is, in the end, more pernicious than any other expedient of finance that could be adopted. Under its cover a public debt steals upon the nation by degrees, imperceptible to the people; and the first signal of approaching danger is, depreciated Government paper, and public credit prostrated, with impending burdens and taxation in the rear.

MR. PORTER said: If I comprehend the fiscal situation of the Treasury, from the report of the Secretary, there would not, on the 1st of October, be sufficient available funds in the Department to pay the amount transferable to the States, by the deposit act, by one third.

Congress must, in that event, provide the funds, to enable the Treasury to make the deposit with the States; and, when that sum is provided, at the close of the year, unless further provision is made, the Treasury would be empty, and the operations of Government suspended. Not a dollar would be left to supply the mint, to meet contingencies, or the current expenses. Under this state of the Treasury, the question is presented, Is the nation bound by contract, express or implied, to deposit these nine millions with the States? If she is, a high sense of duty imperatively commands a fulfilment of the bargain. Nay, if the faith of the nation is pledged, so that it would be dishonorable to make a temporary postponement of the deposit, the pledge must be redeemed. That the deposit act created no obligatory compact with the States seems clear. The act of 1836 had two objects in view: 1st, to secure a safe depository for keeping the public money, under specific regulations by law. 2d. A large surplus had accumulated in the Treasury, not immediately wanted for the exigencies of the nation. It was to be so deposited, as, in the interim, to be used for the benefit of the people. The 18th section, after a reservation of five millions from the surplus, directed the remainder to be deposited with the States. What were the States to receive? The surplus remaining in the Treasury. If none remained, the proposed deposit never could be made. The measure would, in that result, have had no operation. This act did not, nor could it, prevent Congress, after its passage, and before the 1st of January, from appropriating part, or the whole amount in the Treasury for the support of the Government, the defence of the country, or its security and prosperity. A new era existed in the financial situation of the country. The national debt was extinguished—the Treasury overflowing. A rapid reduction of the revenue would have prostrated great and important interests, built upon the faith of previous legislation. What was to be done with the money? Objections of a serious nature arose to almost every plan proposed for its disposition. At last, the mode of making the States the depository was agreed upon. They were “to keep it safely, and repay it whenever required for the purpose of defraying the wants of the Treasury.” Do these terms partake of the character of a contract? Are they not the mere expression of a deposit for safe-keeping? No mutual equivalent exists; no quid pro quo, which constitutes the essence of a contract; no consideration on which an obligation can be founded. At what time was the contract consummated? At the passage of the act, at the period of legislative action by the several States, or on the report of the Secretary ascertaining the amount for distribution? The act was passed on the supposition that a surplus would, on a given day, be found in the Treasury. If the Secretary had ascertained that no surplus was there, at the period fixed, what claim would the States have had on the nation to raise a surplus, and what amount of surplus would have been necessary to satisfy that claim? What an extraordinary and dangerous state of affairs is presented, if the time of deposit is not postponed—the United States laying, and collecting taxes, or borrowing money, to deposit, when collected, with the States! In my judgment, no power is granted by the constitution to Congress to draw money from the people for any such purpose. To deposit money for safe-keeping, is not to pay a debt, nor is it necessary for “the common defence.” If constitutional, its fatal and blighting operation upon our institutions might well be feared. To teach the State sovereignties to look up to the National Government as the great reservoir to supply them means of support, instead of a reliance upon the people, would inevitably destroy their independence, and introduce a system of extravagance and corruption which would speedily produce the ruin of the republic. The deposit act was a temporary expedient to meet an extraordinary crisis in the fiscal concerns of the country. The causes which gave it birth no longer exist. Postpone its operation until a similar occasion arises; then, according to the provisions of the act, let the surplus be deposited with the States. This will be doing justice to them, and redeeming honorably and fairly the hopes excited by the passage of the law.

Mr. Wise said he was in no sense prepared to discuss this bill; and were it not that he alone of the opposition voted, the vote was proverbially 43 democrats and Wise! against the distribution bill—distribution bill it was; and was there not a seeming inconsistency between the vote he then gave and the one he now should give against this measure, he would remain silent. But (said Mr. W.) I am peculiarly situated, and must explain my position. I shall vote against this bill to postpone the fourth instalment under the law of 1836; and, inasmuch as I voted against the law to create that instalment, I must explain.

What a change has “come over the spirit of our dream!” Sir, this all does seem like a dream to me. But yesterday—as it were, last week—we were debating and deliberating upon the great and solemn question, What shall be done with our immense surplus revenue? We were told by the President, by the party, by the press, that the nation was in a state of the most exuberant prosperity; that the Treasury was overflowing with millions, and countless streams of revenue were still pouring in from customs and from lands. We saw one of the strongest friends of the administration in the Senate (Mr. BENTON) proposing bills of appropriation for the most extended works of extravagant expenditure, and providing for the most magnificent outlay of a splendid Government. In two sessions of Congress we saw more than eighty millions appropriated by law, and we saw an opposition, jealous of Executive power, striving to curtail Executive patronage by putting a nominal surplus of more than thirty-seven millions out of the Executive hand? All this was but a year past—in June, 1836; and a year in the existence of a Government is but a day. What hear we, what see we now? What do we hear and see in September, 1837? Sir, we are now called together, at an unusual time, under the most extraordinary emergencies, by an official proclamation of distress—distress among the people, and distress in the affairs of Government! What are the recommendations of the President? What are the propositions of the Committee of Ways and Means? Yesterday, sir, yesterday there were sixteen millions of unexpended balances of appropriations for 1836, thirty-seven millions and a half of surplus, five millions reserve for contingencies, sixty millions or more in the Treasury; and now, sir, though the States have been paid but three instalments, though appropriations to the amount of fifteen millions have been suspended, we are told that the Treasury is bankrupt! Sir, look at the bills on your table. After all this prosperity, so soon after all this richness and superfluity of means, of a sudden we see a bill to postpone the fourth instalment to be paid the States; a bill to issue ten millions of inconvertible Treasury notes; a bill of bankruptcy proposed; a series of acts, like fishing nets, put out to draw in your small remnants of resources to replenish our exhausted coffers; a series of measures to rake together the small change of Government, which lies scattered in the places where the bulk of our treasures were supposed to be! How came this change? What means this immense and sudden vicissitude? What has produced this scene of loss and ruin and confusion? Sir, it may surprise some, it does not surprise me. It is exactly as I always thought it would be—it was all humbug. You never had the money; it was a delusion; the people were deceived and imposed upon. One reason why the Government opposed the deposit act was because it was sure, in the end, to expose the fact that we had all along been toppling on the giddy height of a delusive and false prosperity, ever verging upon an overwhelming catastrophe!

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The catastrophe has come and overwhelmed us; we are now bankrupt, and we are asked to take back this gift we made to the States in the moment of our delusion and folly; to postpone the fourth instalment until further provision by law. I will not vote to do it. I will vote against this bill for the same reason, the very same reason I voted against the deposit act itself.

This bill is, as was that, in fraud of legislation. I will say it boldly, that every word said by the young gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MENESEE) is true. That act was a distribution bill, not a deposit act, and so understood by most who voted for it. It was openly advocated as a distribution bill, and opposed by me on this floor as a distribution bill. By the leaders, at least, of parties, it was never intended as any thing else than as a distribution bill, and they never expected that a dollar deposited with the States would ever be returned to the General Government. It was a disguised measure, and therefore I opposed it. It said one thing, and meant another; it was a deposit bill on its face, and a distribution bill in the intention of its legislators.

It is true the great question was, What shall be done with the surplus revenue? It was a great source of corruption; most of the opposition feared that so great a money power left with a corrupt Executive would enslave us; the plans to dispose of it were numerous, almost infinite; there was a great and irreconcilable diversity of opinion among most of us; the land bill had failed. It was at such a moment when I, as well as many others, began to be willing to dispose of it in almost any way, to take it from the hands of power and its parasites—hands which seemed to grasp it with an iron hold—it was then, I say, I saw that truly gallant and great man, who is always wide awake, and always knows when to strike for his policy, who has always been consistent and constant in one line of policy, HENRY CLAY, who, if he be the father of the American system, has ever supported it with a master hand. I saw him convert the word distribution into deposit, and the public money into the public lands. I saw him bring forth that deposit act, and though oft baffled, though comparatively weak in the numbers of his party, clearly in a minority, yet it seems impossible to resist him; he will be felt, will be heard. I saw him carry his measure, in spite of all, successfully, triumphantly! He carried the substitute for his land bill in a way most surprising to me. I saw the State rights men, of the strongest calibre, carried along with him, and aiding in the support and success of the distribution bill.

Sir, I regarded that bill as the very acme of the American system. I was astonished to see how the strait-jacket politicians were caught by it. Every effort was made to obtain my vote for it; some of my State rights friends endeavored most strenuously to prevail on me not to vote against it. No, I told them they were exceeding the most ultra-latitudinarians; I could not vote for it; it was unconstitutional.

What have been the consequences of passing that bill? The States of the Union have taken the money as their own. They have taken it just as the Secretary of the Treasury told the deposit banks to take what was deposited with them as their own—for loan, for use, for trade, for commerce. They have appropriated, used, and expended what has been given them, and have entirely anticipated the amount of the fourth instalment, yet to be paid them.

The proposition for this measure came from no State in the Union. You gratuitously passed a law giving them this money; and you have, by your own action here, unsought and uncalled for, induced them to incur large expenditures and heavy contracts. If you have not made strictly a contract with them, you have, wisely or unwisely, caused them to make contracts with others. Your gratuitous promises have caused them to enter into solemn obligations, which they must keep in good faith, though you fail to keep your faith and to enable them to comply with their obligations. The case is submitted to me as a chancellor. A father promises to advance his son; the son, on the faith of the promise, makes a purchase. Shall the father not comply? Yes, sir, so saith equity; and so I say. I will not put the States, by my vote, to the least inconvenience, even on account of promises gratuitously made by the General Government, and on the faith of which the States have proceeded to act or contract. Although I do not consider this a contract between the General Government and States, yet, sir, I am for decreeing, under the circumstances, for the States to take the money.

I have said I shall vote against this bill to postpone, because it is just like the bill it means in part to repeal. It provides that the fourth instalment shall be postponed until further provision by law. Now, sir, does any gentleman who will vote for this bill intend that the States shall ever receive or be paid this fourth instalment? No, he does not. By the word "postpone," you mean the word "repeal." You either mean to repeal, or you do not. If you do, why not say so? Why say one thing and mean another? If the bill means to repeal, it means to do so fraudulently, and therefore I cannot vote for it. If it means what it says, to postpone until further provision by law, it means still further to pledge the faith of this Government to distribute this portion of the fourth instalment—a measure to which I was always opposed, and therefore I cannot vote for it in either aspect. If you have never before committed yourselves to pay this money, you will have done so by this bill. Do you not plight the faith of the nation hereafter to distribute this amount? Postpone is not the right word for a measure of repeal; and to postpone until further provision by law, is to say you will at some time do what I was never willing should be done at any time.

But I have other objections. This bill is in aid of the sub-Treasury scheme, and it tends to put the State banks, which hold the balance of surplus revenue, into the power of an administration whose policy is to discredit and to destroy them.

Sir, let me ask those who call themselves Conservatives, especially, how they can vote for a bill which everybody understands as a part of an entire system of warfare against the local institutions of the country? Every bill on your table tends to this one great point; to make all banks odious and insolvent; to put the screws upon them, and to check them up with the reins and stiff-bits of Government. These bills are all mere precursors of a Treasury bank, which can only be made tolerable in the public mind by making every other sort of bank intolerable. Credit must be destroyed to destroy the credit system. Is not this plain? Is it not obvious that this locofoco administration is courting the people and taunting the opposition to force upon it either a national bank or a Treasury bank? What is a Treasury bank, but a national, a United States bank, in its really odious form? Have we not the clearest evidence that an unrelenting war is commenced against the State banks—Jackson duces? Has not the "Greatest and Best" denounced them even with more venom than he ever denounced the great monster and Old Nick himself? Has he not denounced the local bank system of deposit as the most base and perfidious? And, sir, if any link in the chain is stronger than another to bind the local banks to the car of the Federal Executive, it is this bill. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CHAMBERS) has, by a very able speech, relieved me from the trouble of demonstrating this. But he will not publish his speeches, though he delivers among the ablest we hear in Congress. I require of him to publish that speech, and I here rebuke him for not publishing others. He has demonstrated, sir, that this bill will call on the banks, and the banks will call on the people, for more than seventeen millions of specie. The banks are to be made to groan and call out in their distress upon the Executive for relief. Sir, I should think we would all remember other evidences of enmity from a certain quarter to the local banks: the evidence has not all been published. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) we are told by the newspapers, wrote to a friend in Albany that they then had the banks "on the hip." Now, sir, that is an old Virginian phrase in wrestling, and I tell the Conservatives that if they do not "mind their eyes," the deposit and local banks will all be "cross-hopped" and laid flat on their backs!

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here interposed, and made some remarks to the effect that he was glad his letter had been alluded to, and that he was thus afforded an opportunity to publish it. He said a copy was at the service of the gentleman from Virginia, and he would be happy if the gentleman would publish it.]

Mr. WISE continued. Sir, I do not pretend to be certain of the contents of that letter. I will not say it will be found to contain the expression "we have 'em on the hip," but I will risk its publication. Where there was so much smoke, there must have been some fire. It made, as it was said, Governor Marcy mad, and, at all events, will be found, I expect, to exult highly in the probable triumph of locofoco principles and events over sound credit and currency.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG. If he had thought there was any thing worthy of publication in the letter, he would have published it. Governor Marcy condemned the suspension of specie payments. But I never went so far as the gentleman from Massachusetts; why don't you wage war on him?]

Mr. WISE. Sir, I mean the Flagg letter. Let there be no tricks—give me the real letter. I'll publish it, and risk the advantage the gentleman has of furnishing me with whatever letter he pleases.* If it be not found to contain the old Virginia wrestling phrase, I think it will be found to declare war, relentless and savage, against the local banks. Now, be it distinctly understood that I am no advocate of the deposit banks, or the State banks generally. I opposed the deposit pet bank system as inefficient and corrupt. I have been engaged the last two years in exposing its vices. I cannot bring my mind to choose between the pet bank system and the sub-Treasury. I am a friend to neither, and I shall oppose both; but I cannot consent to aid the Executive of the Federal Government in waging an exterminating war against the institutions of the States of the Union. I deprecate an alliance of State banks with this central power, no more than I do an executive war upon them. The rights of the States and the interests of the people of the States are too intimately blended with these institutions for me to consent, either that they shall be corrupted and used for political purposes, or be prostrated and crushed by the General Government. They now have ceased to be "pets." Some gentlemen seem goaded by that appellation of them now, and I am not willing that they shall become victims, like almost all our institutions, to be sacrificed at the shrine of an overweening federal power, which now, more than ever, darkens the land. The funds now in the deposit banks are not to be transferred to the States. The banks are not to be left to the mercy of their creators, but they are to be ground down by the tender mercies of this administration, which brought them to the very condition which is now calculated to render them odious, and to furnish the pretext for oppressing them and their debtors. Whose interest is it now to show that they have been "base and perfidious?" Sir, I wish that my honorable colleague (Mr. GARLAND) was here. I would remonstrate with him, as a true conservative, against his remarks in favor of this bill. This is not a conservative, but a locofoco—a destructive measure. Sir, we are told that the funds in the deposit banks are not available. If they are not available to the General Government, they may be available to the States. And, if not available, why should they be withheld from the States when they cannot avail the wants of the Treasury? The local banks can pay the States, whilst they cannot pay the General Government. The States, wherein they are located, will take their notes. With their local currency they can pay the laborers on the works for which they have contracted on the faith of this deposit.

Truly, truly, it may be said, sir, that the evil which General Jackson did lives after him. He was the most fortunate man that God ever permitted to riot in success, and to triumph over much that was good! He warred without ceasing against the Bank of the United States; he rendered it an odious monster, and killed it in the confidence of men; yet all the time that he was in power, and wielding that power against that institution, it was fructifying the nation, sustaining exchange, maintaining credit, a sound currency, regulating, in a measure, excessive bank issues, meting out to labor its reward, insuring confidence in trade, keeping prices steady and advancing, and in every way warding off the evil day until after General Jackson's term of office expired. His monster lived to keep him and his power and popularity alive, until it was too late to rebuke him for the mischiefs we now endure. It gave us a seeming prosperity which was all ascribed to General Jackson, and verily his enemy was made to praise him. Sir, it was the most signal instance of good fortune in his whole life, that the bank continued in existence until within one year of the expiration of his reign, and that the effects of its death could not be felt until one year after the expiration of its charter, and one day after his political career ceased! It was wonderful the coincidence of events. No one thought that disorder would so soon arrive; it waited not a moment after Jackson ceased to be President. You may look through his whole life, I say—to the cock-pit, the horse-race scenes, to his hair-breadth 'scapes in war, and to his glorious victories—and not find a parallel instance of good luck with this. We were told that the bank would fall like the oak in the forest, crushing every tender shrub in reach of its giant trunk and branches. Not so; it died, like a good man, quietly, and almost in silent prayer. The earth shook not at its fall; and yet in one year from that event the credit of the Government and the trade of the people are crushed. Sir, when it died, the arterial blood dried up; its bills of exchange, which it kept at the lowest rate in market, were that blood; it circulated in the great arteries between the exporting and importing points, between north-east and south-west, New York and New Orleans. The bank was your importing and exporting agent; the artery of internal ex-

"NEW YORK, May 10, 1837.

"MY DEAR SIR: I have just learned that some of our friends (I heard the Bank Commissioners named) were to go to Albany this afternoon, to get the Legislature to suspend or repeal that part of our bank law relating to the suspension of specie payments. Such a measure, it seems to me, would be bad in every point of view. The bank party have inflicted upon themselves as a party a fatal blow, and have established a commercial precedent, which, if sanctioned in any manner by the Legislature, will lead to a suspension of specie payments at the commencement of every pressure, which would be very different in its effects from that which has now occurred, after credit, prices, banking, and every kind of trade are reduced so low that our city bank paper and specie are nearly on a par for all the purposes of trade.

"Very truly yours,

change was cut, and the nation now lies bleeding to death! None of this happened, because it could not, until after Jackson ceased to reign. Now, oh! ye, the people, contrast the "last annual Message of the chief, and his farewell address," with the first extraordinary Message of his successor! Sir, the administration either knew of all these results which we have witnessed, so ruinous and disastrous, or they did not. They may take which horn of the dilemma they choose. If they did not see the operation of causes and the coming of events almost touching their noses—events which were predicted for years; events which have followed so suddenly upon their boasts of prosperity; upon times when the administration party was for voting away millions for every species of extravagance; upon times when, instead of withholding appropriations, they were making the most numerous and extensive Government contracts, contracting away millions in a month;—I will not be harsh; I will not say if they did not know and did not consider, they must have been fools; or, if they saw and knew what was coming, and they did not warn the people, they must be knaves. A friend, the other day, said he would put both horns upon them, and make the beast complete! I will not say they must be both knaves and fools; but I do say there has been most shameful, wilful, blind, and gross mismanagement, and mal-administration; and if there be no hope of reform, all hope of preserving the Government and its freedom and purity must cease! Their great panacea, their deposit bank system, has signally, wofully failed. It was recommended and defended but yesterday as the best substitute for the Bank of the United States; it was to supply exchange, and perform every financial and commercial function; and we have seen, in a day, in what it has resulted. They now recommend another sovereign remedy, another king-cure-all, a sub-Treasury system. Are they to be confided in? Are they and their plan not to be distrusted? Are the people not sick of experiments? But, sir, this part of the discussion I must reserve for the time when the sub-Treasury system comes up; though I do not believe it will ever be presented, in good faith, to the decision and action of this House.

THURSDAY, September 28.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The House resumed the consideration of the "bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposits with the States."

Mr. CUSHMAN remarked that this question had long been very considerably and very fully discussed, and, he believed, to the satisfaction of every gentleman of the House. He believed that any further discussion of it would be entirely useless, and the House was worn down with the debate. Still, he confessed, he should be very happy if the House would then pass upon the several amendments submitted in Committee of the Whole, if it could be done without further delay. He rose for the purpose of asking whether it was not the sense of the House that the discussion had been carried as far as it ought to be? whether the subject had not been fully and fairly debated—sufficiently debated? In the full belief that it had, it was his intention to call for the previous question; but although he had risen for that purpose, he would make this proposition. If it meets the general approbation of the House to close the debate, I should be willing to have the vote taken upon every amendment, and give the movers of them an opportunity of calling for the yeas and nays on each. For the purpose, however, of testing the sense of the House to bring this discussion to a close, I move the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded—yeas 107, nays 78.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered, and were—yeas 123, nays 102.

So the House determined that the main question be now put.

The main question, being on ordering the bill to a third reading, recurring—

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered, and were—

FRIDAY, September 29.

Fourth Instalment Bill.

The House took up the "bill to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States." The question pending was the motion of Mr. PICKENS to reconsider the vote by which it had been ordered to a third reading last night.

Mr. PICKENS said it was not his desire to occupy the attention of the House for any length of time, for he was perfectly certain that its patience must be exhausted by the discussion that had already taken place. I desire (said he) to reconsider the vote, because every gentleman must be aware that, under the peculiar and technical operations of the previous question, a majority of this House had not been brought to vote upon the amendment proposed. Sir, I consider the amendment which I had the honor to propose, as important, both in principle and in policy. I desire the House to be brought to a distinct vote upon that amendment, and it is with that view I moved to reconsider the vote ordering this bill to a third reading; and, in presenting that, I beg gentlemen to reflect upon the course which they are disposed to pursue.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of that act—the deposit act of 1836, I mean, are peculiar. They give, in certain contingencies, power to the Secretary of the Treasury to call back the three instalments already distributed, under certain limitations. Sir, it is a power which you yourself, by the very act which you desire to enforce, by refusing to pass this bill, place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. What will be the result, then, of defeating this bill? Why, that you leave it a claim upon the Treasury, and that, by solemn discussion and solemn vote rejecting this bill, you make it the imperative duty of the Secretary to execute the deposit act to its very letter.

Now, sir, look at the proposition. It says the Treasury is embarrassed; that it is reduced, and that it will want funds: then how will the deposit act be executed? Why, the Secretary must, of necessity, call upon the States for the three instalments already made. But suppose, as gentlemen say, that the Treasury is full, and that there are ample funds in its hands. If this be true, what a spectacle will be presented to the American people? That your Secretary of the Treasury, your authorized officer, has presented a set of statements to this House and to the country which are utterly false! Can any administration stand under the scorn and indignation this would produce amongst an outraged people, when Congress meets in December, and finds his statements a thorough delusion! But I doubt it, sir. It is my sincere impression that the Treasury is embarrassed, and that if you reject the bill on your table, you place not only the States and the Treasuries of the States, but the State banks also, which gentlemen wish to protect, at the mercy and under the control of the Secretary. Now, sir, I put this to gentlemen: are they prepared to see this deposit act executed to its letter, and especially under the existing pressure? Are they prepared to pay back the three instalments? Under this specific provision of that act, I know the course the Treasury will pursue—or, at least, what I believe it will pursue. It is this: That it will, if the fourth instalment be paid over at all, throw the expenses of this Government upon the States, by drawing upon them for the three other instalments; and the inevitable result will be, that you compel the Treasury to rely upon the States to support and sustain the General Government. This will produce more pressure than will be produced by the suspension of the act of 1836, or than could possibly be by withholding the fourth instalment. Let gentlemen from the West look at this. The deposit banks of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio have, at this time, nearly seven millions of dollars on deposit out of the nine and a half required to pay the fourth instalment. What will be the result? You will compel the Secretary of the Treasury to call upon those banks to pay up, so as to enable him to execute that payment. Look at Ohio, having more now than she is entitled to under the fourth payment. Do you suppose the paper of the Ohio banks, though perfectly good and current in that State between man and man, will be received at par in Pennsylvania, which is to draw a million? Or do you suppose the funds of Alabama banks will be taken by Georgia for her instalment, when perhaps they are from ten to fifteen per cent. below par there, and then pledge its faith to refund—in what? in specie, or in available funds equivalent to specie, to this Government? Would this be a sound financial operation on the part of Georgia, or would her Government assent to it?

Again, sir, suppose this bill be not passed, what will be another result? That you call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to enforce the law, or distribute the fourth instalment, and where are the means you put in his control? Do you not see that, under such an operation, you inevitably compel him to execute the law to the letter, and that, to do so, he must draw contributions from the States to distribute back to them? Is this sound policy?

Now, sir, look at the Treasury note bill. Will it relieve the Treasury from embarrassments? If that bill should pass the House in its present form, as passed by the Senate, paying interest on its notes, what will be the result? Why, the moment you throw them out, they will be taken up by capitalists, as the very best investment, as stock, under existing circumstances. There are, at this time, millions of capital lying idle in the vaults of banks, watching the operations of this Government, and ready to take stock in a bank of the United States, if such an institution should be created. Yes, sir; these very capitalists, the moment you throw out your ten millions of Treasury notes bearing interest, will seize upon them, and, instead of serving for a circulation, they will be invested as stock. It will only then afford temporary relief, and the final effect will be, to all intents and purposes, to create a debt. How are the notes, with interest, to be redeemed? By taxation, sir. And are we prepared to incur that debt? Now, if you throw into circulation ten millions of certificates, receivable only for public dues not bearing interest—(but I much question whether you will ever get a majority in this House to pass such a bill as that, for the simple fact that, the moment the Government throws into circulation such bills as that, the notes of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania will be excluded to that extent from circulation in the South-west, where they have been at five and ten per cent.)—I say, if you throw into circulation such certificates, their circulation would spread through the country, and might relieve the present embarrassment, and could be redeemed in future dues. But there is an interest struggling against this—the banking interest of the country.

Now, sir, some gentlemen suppose the notes I have referred to will fall below par. How can that be? If they be receivable for the revenues of the Government, and no more be issued than enough to pay those revenues, they will be above par, or, at least, equal to gold and silver. Nothing can depreciate them but an issue beyond the amount of the revenue of the country, and it is even questionable if that would. But, sir, can we pass such a bill as that, viz: without interest, and throw no more into circulation than the amount necessary for the public dues? It is very doubtful whether this House would.

But throw out $10,000,000 of notes, bearing interest, and at the end of the year the Government will be called on to redeem them, or they will run on at interest, thus creating a debt in its most odious and objectionable form. Capitalists in stock are deeply interested in such an issue. Whatever this Government makes receivable in dues, is, to all intents and purposes, money, and such a circulation, limited to the amount of expenditures, would be equivalent to gold and silver, and relieve the commercial community in collections of customs. It would, in fact, be a currency resting upon the credit of Government. And this is all the Government could do, even though a bank endorse the notes or loan its credit.

Now, sir, I repeat, we are not prepared for the state of things that will ensue upon the rejection of this bill. You will press upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and compel him to execute that fourth instalment, and the result will inevitably be that you compel this Government to create a debt, which debt you are bound to pay in the revenues of the country; and how these revenues are collected we all too well know.

Who receives the distribution? Do you distribute it according to the payment of taxes? Many suppose that we consume according to population, and pay taxes according to consumption. If this be true, we do not receive our proper distribution, for two-fifths of a certain class of our population, under our representation, will be excluded. Are gentlemen prepared to carry out this system permanently, or create a debt by distributing this instalment?

Mr. Speaker, the view I had in introducing the amendment was, that if there be any surplus remaining in 1839, then let it be deposited; and I thought at the time, and still think, it would meet the assent of a majority of the House. The tendency of this would be to produce economy in the appropriations for next year, under the hope of receiving the deposit then. Upon all the other questions presented by gentlemen in this debate, discursory as they were in their character, "de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis," I desire to reserve myself for the great bill—for I call that the great measure of the session—the divorce bill I mean. That bill I hold myself prepared to defend, and I fear no consequences.

[A further debate now took place in which Messrs. Cambreleng, Waddy Thompson, Gray of New York, Loomis, Toucey, and Lyon, were the speakers; when,]

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded.

The previous question was then put and carried; and the main question being on reconsideration—

The yeas and nays were taken—yeas 149, nays 81.

So the House resolved to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been ordered to a third reading.

Mr. PICKENS moved his amendment to limit the postponement to the 1st of January, 1839.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and stood—yeas 101, nays 132. Negatived.

The question being on Mr. HAYNES' amendment to the amendment of Mr. PICKENS,

Mr. BELL, after an animated speech, submitted a motion, to recommit the bill and amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to report the following as a substitute for the bill:

"That the payment of the fourth instalment required to be deposited with the States, by the act of the 23d of June, 1836, be postponed until the 1st day of October, 1840; and that moneys to that amount, now in deposit to the credit of the Treasurer, and other public officers, in any of the deposit banks, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the payment of the same.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as may be after the 1st day of October next, to proceed to tender and transfer to the several States his drafts or orders to pay their respective portions of said moneys; and that it shall be lawful for any State, which may be willing to accept such drafts or transfers in payment of its proportion of said instalment, according to the terms of said act of the 23d of June, 1836, to receive the same; provided, nevertheless, that any bank or banks upon which such transfers or drafts shall issue, upon the condition of paying to the States holding the same interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum quarterly, shall be required to pay the principal only in the following instalments, to wit: one-third on the 1st of October, 1838; one-third on the 1st of October, 1839; and the remainder on the 1st day of October, 1840."

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the House would reject the motion, and pass the bill this night.

The question was then taken on the motion to commit, and decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 149.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. PICKENS, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 99.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays on the main question, (which was on ordering the bill to a third reading,) which were ordered, and were:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading at this time.

Mr. RICE GARLAND moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next.

Mr. McKIM then moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question having been ordered, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

SATURDAY, September 30.

Treasury Note Bill.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONNOR in the chair,) and took up the bill from the Senate authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. BELL said he had been waiting for some who, he understood, were prepared to contest the constitutional right of the Senate to send to the House a bill of this description. It was a money bill: and, by the constitution, all such bills must originate in the House. The proper course would be, first to take a vote on that question. If his friend from Massachusetts was desirous of addressing the House on that question, Mr. B. would not now proceed with any remarks on the bill.

Mr. ADAMS said that in his own opinion the matter admitted of no question at all. If ever there was a money bill, this was one. But he should make no motion, because he knew perfectly well if he did, the previous question would be called, and the motion voted down. If, however, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BELL) was disposed to go into the discussion, he should have Mr. A.'s most cordial support. This House had too long suffered the other branch of the Legislature to dictate to it every measure relating to revenue. For the last five years not one of all the measures of that character had originated in that House.

Mr. HAYNES said it was now too late to raise an objection of this kind: the House had received the bill, and referred it; and it had been reported on. If such an objection did exist, this was not the place to make it.

Mr. WISE was astonished to hear such language from the gentleman from Georgia. Did not that gentleman know that at every step, in any, even the last stage of a bill, when it had received its third reading, if the House discovered a constitutional objection to lie against its passage, it was never too late to bring it forward? It never could be too late for the House to receive an objection to doing that which it had no power to do. It never could waive a constitutional objection on the ground of laches. He moved that the committee rise, and report that a bill like this could not constitutionally originate in the Senate. Thus, in the House, that report might be adopted, and the bill sent back to the Senate, with a message declaring that the House could not act upon the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the committee would not rise. This bill did not propose the levying of a tax; it was a mere anticipation of the receipt of revenue. The compromise act of 1833 had been sent from the Senate (when that body was differently constituted in a political point of view) to the House, although it proposed an increase of taxes, in some cases amounting to 45 per cent. The present bill created no public debt; it merely anticipated means which were ample. Congress had been convened to meet an emergency; and it had so happened that the Senate's Committee on Finance had been constituted four days sooner than that of the House, and hence the Senate's bill had come earlier than that of the House. No constitutional objection had been urged in the Senate; but here, at this late hour, a constitutional question was to be raised and discussed, when the House had arrived at the 1st day of October, and the Treasury was in such a condition that the specie could not be obtained for a little draft of $811. He hoped the House would proceed with the bill.

Mr. MERCER was astonished at the position taken by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It was not a fact that the compromise bill had originated in the Senate; it had originated in this House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, to avoid all difficulty, he would move to pass by the Senate's bill and take up that of the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON contended that the House could not thus pass over the greatest breach of its privileges which had ever been perpetrated. He could not understand how the gentleman could be so insensible to the indignity thus cast on the House. Should they continue to take bills raising millions on millions, at the dictation of the Senate or the President, when the constitution plainly forbade it?

A dispute on order arose, attended for a time with some confusion; but it issued in taking up the House bill, as moved by Mr. CAMBRELENG.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then submitted a statement of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMBRELENG alluded to the fact, that there were seven or eight millions of outstanding appropriations at the end of every year, which might be considered permanently outstanding. It would thus appear that our money and resources probably amount to twenty-four millions and a half. We were not called upon to authorize a loan or to create a public debt. There was no occasion for a stock, however desirable it might be for investment or for remittance to Europe. All that was now proposed, was to anticipate our actual resources by an issue of Treasury notes. The material question was, whether the notes should bear interest or not. In the present extraordinary condition of the country, he should think notes without interest an important auxiliary to aid in the collection of the revenue, and in relieving our internal circulation. He believed it quite as important to adjust the balance between the south-western and north-western portions of the country, as it was to pay off our foreign debt. If there was a current revenue coming into the Treasury, such an issue might be safely made and sustained in circulation, and would not, like the small notes issued in 1815, interfere with the currency. Gentlemen denounced notes of this description as paper money: they perform the office of exchange, and not of currency, and at the same time were convenient for making payments into the Treasury, and for our public expenditures. The currency of France, with her four hundred and fifty millions of gold and silver, had not been disturbed by the issues by the Bank of France of notes of about a similar denomination. The demands of commerce alone will not, however, sustain Treasury notes, without interest, in circulation. We must also be in receipt of a current revenue. Since the extension of time to the merchants and the banks, all the payments into the Treasury were thrown into the next year, and for some months very little would be coming into the Treasury. Under such circumstances, there was reason to fear that the notes would be depreciated. He had, therefore, adopted the principle of the Senate's bill, allowing an interest. He was not in favor of issuing Treasury notes now, or at any time, whether with or without interest; but, although our resources are ample, we are compelled to anticipate them, in order to give indulgence to the debtors of Government. In relieving them, and giving means to the Treasury, it is fortunate that we can afford to the south-west a medium of remittance, and, at the same time, aid the merchants on the Atlantic to pay off their foreign debt. It was the prospect of this issue of ten millions of Treasury notes which had already considerably reduced the price of specie. Mr. C. then moved an amendment to the bill, by proposing substantially the provisions of the Senate's bill, authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent.

Mr. RHETT addressed the Chair as follows:

OCTOBER, 1837.]

Mississippi Election.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. Chairman: I shall follow the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and consider all the bills upon your table as constituting one system, although contained in different bills. To the bill authorizing the Treasurer to issue Treasury notes, I shall propose, as amendments, that these notes shall bear no interest; and that the Secretary be authorized to issue another kind of paper—bills receivable in payment of the public dues. When the bill regulating the depositories of the public money shall come up for consideration, I shall also move the amendment I send to the Chair, providing for a gradual dissolution of all connection between the Government and the banks; dispensing entirely, in the course of three years, with the use or reception of their paper; and using them only for the safe-keeping of the public money by special deposits. By these amendments, the Government will have the option of issuing either Treasury notes bearing no interest, or bills receivable in payment of the public dues—the Government will be separated from the banks—the public moneys be kept in the banks on special deposit—and the revenue be collected either in Government paper or specie. There is but one other alternative before the committee to this system in this shape, or by other modifications, and that is the project of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GARLAND,) to reunite the Government to the State banks—receive their paper in payment of the public dues—and make them, as heretofore, the general depositories of the money of the country. These are the two projects for consideration.

If, sir, we are to have Treasury notes, I prefer that they should not bear interest. In issuing these notes, it is not our object simply to raise money, or to pay debts; but, in the paralytic state of the country, we want a medium in which the revenues of the country can be easily collected, and domestic exchanges be carried on without embarrassment to the banks. If these notes bear interest, their circulation will be impeded, if not stopped entirely; they will be retained on hand as investments. Nor, sir, do I think the objection that if they do not bear interest they will fall below par, is well founded. Although they cannot be employed like specie in paying debts abroad, they will answer a function which specie cannot perform in carrying on the exchanges of the country. This peculiarity of usefulness, in the present situation of the country, will more than counterbalance any other advantages which either bank notes or specie may possess over them, as a medium of circulation.

But, sir, I prefer, to Treasury notes in any shape, the medium I propose—bills receivable in payment of the public dues. A Treasury note is a promise to pay, for the redemption of which specie must be collected and reserved. A bill receivable in payment of the public dues, is merely a promise to receive, and has its promise fulfilled when received; the one requires the abstraction of a large amount of specie from circulation—the other not only abstracts no specie from circulation, but will actually be equivalent to an additional supply of specie to the amount of the issue. The one may bring the Government in collision with the banks in the delicate position in which they will be placed when they resume specie payments—the other will give the Government the means of collecting its revenue without intrenching in the least upon the resources of the banks. The one is intended as a temporary expedient: it is a debt, and the debt must soon be paid; the other is merely an instrument of collection, and can be kept out forever, and be expanded or contracted as the wants of the country for the purposes of exchange and collection may require. For these reasons, I prefer, to Treasury notes, bills receivable in payment of the public dues.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not hold himself responsible for the very extraordinary delay in the passage of the bill to postpone the fourth instalment which passed last night. But gentlemen would not drive him from the course he had taken in bringing these bills before the House. The first object of the Committee of Ways and Means was to bring the bill to postpone the fourth instalment before the House, and have it acted upon. Their next object was to supply the deficiency in the Treasury to enable it to go on with its disbursements; and with great deference to the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) who had become very lately the advocate of the merchants, he must say, that he must provide for the wants of the Government before he did any thing else. We have been told but yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) and it was repeated again to-day, that he could not obtain, for a friend of his, the payment of a draft for $811. He would not budge from the position he had taken, and he felt very confident that this committee would not do so. Gentlemen understood this question perfectly. It was simply whether Congress would authorize the issue of Treasury notes with or without interest. The bill was printed in various forms, both in this House and the Senate; and gentlemen would make up their minds on the subject as well now as a month hence.

Mr. BELL made a few remarks in explanation, contending that the course he had suggested before was the proper course now to be pursued.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, the amendments to the bill were ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, October 3.

Mississippi Election.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. ADAMS said: Mr. Speaker, differing essentially in opinion as I do from that of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr.

LOOMIS,) and from the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections, with regard to the limitation in the writ of election, I am constrained again, though very unwillingly, to address the House on this question. Not on the question whether a vacancy had happened in the representation of the people of Mississippi in this House, because upon that point you have understood, from the observations which I submitted to the House this morning, my opinions concur with those contained in the report of the committee. But the question affecting the right of the members from Mississippi to seats on this floor, is not whether a vacancy in the representation of the State had happened, but what the vacancy was, and how that vacancy was to be filled.

Now the vacancy was of two seats in this House of members from the State of Mississippi for the twenty-fifth Congress of the United States, which twenty-fifth Congress commenced on the 4th of March last, and is to continue till the 4th of March, 1839. That is the 25th Congress of the United States, and that was the vacancy in the representation of the people of the State of Mississippi; and so it is understood by the majority of the Committee of Elections, who have reported the resolution, that MESSRS. CLAIBORNE and GHOLSON have been duly elected members of the 25th Congress.

But have they been so elected? The Constitution of the United States provides that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." The term for which they are chosen is two years.

The constitution further provides, that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

And the constitution further provides, that when vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

The Legislature of the State of Mississippi had, by an act of the 2d of March, 1833, (so much of which as relates to the subject before the House is inserted in the report of the Committee of Elections,) prescribed that the elections for members of Congress, as well as of the Governor, members of the Legislature, and others, should be held biennially, and particularly that the Representatives to Congress from that State should be elected once in every two years, to be computed from the first Monday in November, in the year 1833. Such is the standing law of the State, and in enacting it, the Legislature appear not to have been aware that it left the State wholly without representation in this Hall, from the commencement of every Congress on the 4th of March, till late in November of every first Congressional year; and the consequence is, and must be, that whenever Congress shall meet, whether by virtue of a law of the United States, or by special call from the President of the United States, in the interval between the 4th of March, the day when the Congress commences, and the first Monday in December thereafter, the State of Mississippi cannot lawfully be represented in the House of Representatives of the United States.

The vacancy is created, not as the writ of election issued by Governor Lynch avers, by the expiration of the term of service of the members of a former Congress, but by the law of the State deferring the elections of members to a Congress commencing on the 4th of March till the subsequent November.

The vacancy thus created by the law of the State is a vacancy which the Executive of a State cannot supply. It is not within the purview of the authority given him to supply vacancies, for the following reasons: First, because it is inconsistent with the law of the State itself, which prescribes that the election shall be held once in every two years, in November, and consequently prohibiting its being held more than once in that term. Secondly, because it is inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution of the United States that the members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen by the people every second year. And, thirdly, because it would change the tenure of the term of office, prescribed by the constitution to be for two years, into a tenure of two sets of members from the same State; one for a single session or part of a session, and the other for the remainder of the term of two years.

But if the Governor of the State cannot supply the vacancy thus created by the law of the State, for the interval of time between the 4th of March and the first Monday in November, still less can he, directly in the face of the law of the State, supply a vacancy for a whole term of two years. The gentleman from New York thinks he could, and that his writ of election, instead of authorizing it to be held for a choice of members to sit until superseded by members to be chosen at the regular election in November, should have directed it to be held for members of the twenty-fifth Congress. The report of the Committee of Elections avows the opinion that the Governor, by introducing into his writ of election the restriction upon the terms of service of the members to be chosen, transcended his powers. The report says that the opinion of the committee was almost unanimous that the writ was perfect in itself without the restricting clause; that its being there does not invalidate the election held under it, but that it may fairly be rejected as surplusage. They, accordingly, reject it as surplusage, and present to the House a resolution that MESSRS. CLAIBORNE and GHOLSON have been duly elected members of the twenty-fifth Congress.

Mississippi Election.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. Speaker, I have never been a tenacious adherent to the disorganizing doctrine of State rights. But conversant as I have been with the Constitution of the United States from its origin; familiar as I have been with all the controversies which attended its progress from the 17th of September, 1787, when it was presented by the convention at Philadelphia to the people of the Union, till its final adoption by the people of the whole thirteen primitive States of the Confederacy—equally familiar with all the subsequent controversies and collisions of power between the General and State Governments, as well as between the several departments of this Government—sworn as I have repeatedly been to support both the Constitution of the United States and that of my native Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and profoundly responsible as I hold, and ever have held, myself to a tribunal far beyond this visible diurnal sphere, for the faithful observance of those oaths, I have invariably considered the government of this our common country as consisting of two distinct, separate, independent, but interwoven authorities, both limited—each sovereign within its appropriate sphere—each lawfully powerless to encroach upon the appropriate functions of the other; and of all the errors which half a century of national existence has brought forth to kindle the torch of discord in our country, the doctrine of nullification is, in my judgment, the greatest and the most pernicious. And next to that is the doctrine of nullification, by the Executive, of the acts of the legislative power—I do not mean by the veto, before a legislative act becomes a law—I do not mean by the constitutional control given to Congress over certain acts of State legislation—but I mean the annulment, by a State law, of an act of Congress, or the annulment of a State law by an Executive proclamation, or by any department of the General Government, except as authorized by the constitution.

Now, sir, it appears to me that both these errors are involved in the opinion expressed by the gentleman near me from New York, (Mr. Loomis,) in the report of the Committee of Elections, and in the resolution with which it closes, that Messrs. CLAIBORNE and GNOLSON have been duly elected members of the 25th Congress. The gentleman from New York thinks the Governor of the State of Mississippi reprehensible for limiting in his writ the election of the members to a term to be superseded by members to be chosen at the general election in November, prescribed by the law of the State. The report of the Committee of Elections considers the Governor as having, by inserting the restriction, transcended his powers. They reject the restriction as surplusage!

Sir, it was the standing law of the State. The law of the State surplusage! The Governor of the State, by conforming his writ to the law of the State, transcended his powers! Why, what would he have done if he had omitted the restriction from his writ? He would have annulled the law of the State by proclamation. That would have been a transcending of his powers with a vengeance! Sir, there has been a time, in the land of our fathers, when the pretension of power in a kingly crowned head to annul the laws of the land by proclamation, conducted the royal nullifier to the block. As a democrat, as a republican, I should hardly expect that the gentleman from New York would be ready to invest the Governor of a State with a dispensing power to annul the laws of the State by proclamation. As devoted and ardent supporters of State rights, I should hardly have expected from the majority of the Committee of Elections, a charge against the Governor of the State of Mississippi, of transcending his powers by strict conformity to the law of the State; and still less can I think that this House will adopt a resolution equivalent to the appointment by this House of members to represent the people of the State of Mississippi from the close of the present session to the end of the 25th Congress. For this, and nothing less than this, will be the effect of adopting the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections.

Upon the face of the credentials of these gentlemen, as stated by themselves, they were elected to represent the people of the State of Mississippi in this House, until superseded by members to be chosen at the regular State election in November. Yet the resolution reported by the committee, declares that they shall represent the people of that State during the whole of the 25th Congress. The people of the State elected them to serve for one session. The resolution of the House is to constitute them Representatives of the people of Mississippi from the close of this session till the 4th of March, 1839.

Sir, it is my very deliberate opinion that the election of the two members from the State of Mississippi, for a term, to be superseded by others to be elected next November, was unconstitutional; that no such election could be held, because it is in direct collision with that provision of the Constitution of the United States, which prescribes that the members of this House shall be chosen every other year. But the time, place, and manner of holding the election, being entrusted by the constitution to the State Legislature, and the Legislature having provided only for an election to be held once in two years, and that in the month of November, after the commencement of the term of the Congress for which they are elected, there was no authority in the State competent to ordain an election for a single session of Congress, or for a term short of two years, from the 4th of March, 1837. The election was, therefore, null and void. It was not an election for a single session, or until November, because the Constitution of the United States admits of no such election. It was not an election for the whole Congress, because the law of the State required that another election for that purpose should be held in November, and the writ of election issued by the Governor, in exact conformity to the law of the State, expressly restricted the term of service to the interval till the regular election in November. If he had no power to insert the restriction in the writ, he had none to issue the writ itself. If the election was to be held for the whole Congress, the law of the State had prescribed that it should be held in November, and it could be held at no other time.

The error of all this was in the law of the State, fixing the time for the election of the State's members in this House nine months after the commencement of the Congress itself. The power of the Governor was not competent either to repeal this law or to supply its defects. He assumed authority to supply its defects; and the report of the Committee of Elections, while charging him with transcending his powers in this assumption, concedes to him the power which he did not assume, of annulling the law of the State, assumes that he has annulled it, and stretches the election, avowedly authorized by him for a term of three months, into an election for the whole Congress.

If the House should adopt the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, we are yet to see how it will be taken by the people of the State of Mississippi. Their law requires that the election of members to represent them in this House for the present Congress, should be held next November. That law this House cannot set aside. This election must and will be held, and it is to be presumed that the same members will be again returned. Although I hold that the election by which they now occupy their seats was irregular, null, and void, I have been content that they should hold the seats, and wish they may continue to hold them till the close of the session; because, however irregular the election may have been, they were actually chosen by large majorities of the people, and there is no comparison in point of magnitude between the mere inconvenience of an informal election, and the great evil of depriving the people of a whole State of their representation in this House, when they have actually signified their pleasure by whom they choose to be represented. I would, therefore, postpone to the last hour of the session the decision of the question; but I should then vote for the resolution as proposed from the gentleman from Tennessee. The regular election would then be held according to the law of the State of Mississippi; and as there is no reason for expecting that the people of the State of Mississippi have, since last August, transferred their preferences to other persons, there can be no doubt that the same members will be chosen again. But it is devoutly to be wished that the Legislature of the State of Mississippi will, by a suitable modification of their election law, provide against the recurrence of this defect in their representation in this House, which must otherwise return whenever a session intervenes between the fourth of March, and the first Monday in December of every alternate year. Other States are in the same situation. Eight or ten have been obliged to hold their elections since the special call for the present session by the President of the United States. The constitution no doubt authorizes Congress by law to alter the time of holding the election, as regulated by the law of the State; but there never yet has arisen a necessity for exercising this power by Congress; nor should it, without necessity, be exercised. It is a still more exceptionable remedy for the evil which is now proposed; an assumption of illegal power by the Governor of a State, and the nullification of a State law by a resolution of this House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked that there might be a call of the House. This was agreed to, and the roll was called; when 105 members answered to their names.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, said that, as there was a doubt as to whether the gentlemen from Mississippi had been elected for the present session only, or the whole Congress, he thought it would be the better plan to lay the whole subject on the table, and thus afford time for them to return and be re-elected. With that view, he moved that the report of the Committee of Elections, with the amendment thereto, be laid on the table, and, on that question, he asked for the yeas and nays.

Negatives—yeas 70, nays 145.

Mr. HAYNES moved the previous question, which was seconded—yeas 105, nays 81; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. BRIGES called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which was the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were entitled to their seats; which was ordered, and were:

WEDNESDAY, October 4.

Treasury Notes.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONNOR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill "to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

The question was on the substitute of Mr. RHETT.

Mr. BIDDLE said, in entering on his duties as a member of this House, he had done so with a fixed determination to be drawn into no merely factious opposition to those who administered the Government. But it was undeniable, in the high state of credit which this country enjoyed, at home and abroad, that any method of pledging that credit in constitutional form, will effect the desired object with equal certainty and promptitude. If, then, the administration has resorted to a method which is most liable to exception; which, in its example, is most dangerous; which would, in all probability, be the least productive and the most burdensome; which would tend to disguise from the people their real condition and liabilities, then he felt not merely at liberty, but bound to resist it, and to turn the Government round to a method direct, advantageous, and unexceptionable.

He would make a preliminary remark. The late President, General Jackson, had proclaimed to the whole world that the bill before us is unconstitutional, and, if passed, will not bind the faith of the nation. In his letter to the editor of the Globe, dated Hermitage, 23d of July, 1837, he says: .

"I hope no Treasury notes will be issued. The Treasury drafts upon actual deposits are constitutional, and do not partake of paper credits as Treasury notes, which are subject to depreciation, by the merchants, and banks, and shavers, and brokers; and will be, if issued; and the Government cannot avoid it. Different must it be with Treasury drafts drawn upon actual deposits; and, from the conduct of the banks and the merchants, they deserve no favors from the Government, which they have attempted to disgrace, and to destroy its credit both at home and abroad."

Now, sir, does this bill profess to authorize drafts on actual deposits in the Treasury, or notes to be discounted by merchants, banks, shavers, and brokers? The title is "A bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," and the President and Secretary are empowered to make the best bargain they can with these merchants, banks, shavers, and brokers, provided not more than six per cent. be allowed. Does any one pretend to deny that they encounter the full denunciation of General Jackson as unconstitutional? He holds, distinctly, that the power to borrow money does not embrace the issue of this kind of paper.

Mr. Chairman, you will readily believe that I am not one of those who push to an extreme my faith in the accuracy of General Jackson's opinions on constitutional points. That is not the question. Is it not undeniable that such opinions are held by many, and will exercise a wide influence? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us that these notes are to find their resting-place in London; in other words, this is a new form of loan to the United States from the detested Barings. They ought, then, to have a clear and indisputable credit among those who have been soured and alarmed at being so long held up as persons whom it is meritorious to cheat, because they happen to live on the other side of the Atlantic. Let it be remembered, too, that, in discussing the probabilities of the Supreme Court declaring a certain charter unconstitutional, great reliance was placed on the fact that a large majority of the present judges had been appointed by General Jackson. If those judges should adopt his opinions in the present case, what a fraud is to be practised on the purchasers of this paper! These are matters which cannot remain unknown in that great mart of the world, where rival stocks are perpetually struggling for precedence. Nay, sir, is it not possible that the agent for the Smithsonian bequest, in one of those fluctuations of mood to which he seems subject, may republish, with a preface, the letter of General Jackson to Mr. Blair, as he did a certain other letter, with a view to shake public confidence in an American stock?

Mr. Chairman, I have other objections to this bill.

No one can shut his eyes to the fact, that this is the commencement of a new national debt. But it wears a mask to conceal its hideous countenance. With what rapturous joy did the people hail their escape from the former load! Abundant gratitude was claimed, on that occasion, for General Jackson; though it was the result of measures matured long before, and retarded, rather than advanced, by the increased expenditures of his administration. There is plainly now a trembling timidity—a morbid fear—after so much false boasting, to lay bare the fact that the first step of the present administration is to create a national debt. Is it right, sir, that the representatives of the people should co-operate in an effort to mislead the people? How many of our constituents are aware of the true character and operation of this bill? Is it not proper that they should be instantly aroused, so that, at the polls, they may begin at once to exercise their right of claiming from candidates a pledge of rigid economy? How is this debt to be paid off? Does anybody suppose that the present emission of paper will render more available the notes of broken banks which constitute our present resources? On the contrary, it will only cause their still further depreciation. You will not be able to force them even upon the revolutionary pensioners and the laborers in your service. They will prove a total loss to the holders, as was the case when the paper tickets of irresponsible individuals were superseded by the paper tickets of corporations. Sir, this thing must end in direct taxes. The necessity may be shuffled off by new emissions, but will come at last with all its accumulation. Disguise the matter as you may, these ten millions will have eventually to be paid out of the soil. Unless the people are aroused, and take the matter into their own hands, the time will speedily come when every farmer, in preparing for his crop, must run one furrow for himself and the next for the tax-gatherer. Viewing the matter even on party grounds, how is it that an administration, pledged to follow in the footsteps of General Jackson, begins its career by creating a debt of ten millions, in a mode which General Jackson has denounced as dangerous and unconstitutional?

Mr. Chairman, it has ever been a subject of regret and astonishment that our mode of raising money is one that invites prodigality and extravagance, and tends, most speedily, to exhaust our credit. Our wisest statesmen have warned us, over and over again, of the fatal impolicy of ever incurring a debt, without, at the same time, providing a specific fund for its redemption. Even during the late war, when there was a disposition to put every thing at risk, in sustaining the country, without looking to consequences, you will find that the voice of sagacious men was raised in protest against this improvidence. Thus, in the debate of the 9th of April, 1814, on the subject of Treasury notes, a patriotic member of the House of Representatives, Mr. McKim, used this language:

“Mr. McKim said he should be sorry to deny to the gentleman the courtesy of having his resolution referred, were it not for one consideration. If the gentleman would add to his motion a proposition for such further tax as should be necessary to redeem the notes when they became due, he should concur in his motion. But he asked of the House to take a deliberate view of this subject before they referred the resolution. If there was any one point on which Government should be cautious, it should be its credit; and a regard for the credit of the Government would not justify the issuing of these notes without providing for their redemption.”

Nay, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury himself, in his recent report, admits the importance of such a provision:

“In connection with the issue of any Treasury notes, it is believed to be wise to make ample provision for their early and final redemption.”

Why has this been neglected? Why is it that Congress shall grant money with reckless precipitation, omitting the precautions against abuse which even an executive officer has pointed out?

Mr. B. said he could not forbear to press upon the House the warning of the first Secretary of the Treasury, as to the emission of paper money by this Government:

“The emitting of paper money by the authority of the Government is wisely prohibited to the individual States by the national constitution, and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the Government of the United States. Though paper emissions, under a general authority, might have some advantages not applicable, and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable, to the like emission by the States separately, yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse, and, it may even be affirmed, so certain of being abused, that the wisdom of Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an expedient.” “The stamping of paper is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, that a Government in the practice of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any such emergency, to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource, to avoid as much as possible one less auspicious to present popularity.”

Here, sir, you find plainly disclosed to us the real motive for a resort to Government paper. It is less auspicious to present popularity to adopt a course which would compel the people to pause and to reflect upon the folly and imposture that have brought us to our present condition.”

Are we, sir, prepared to run over again a career of improvidence, without the shadow of a pretext, and against all the lessons of wisdom and experience? Sir, the present times afford little scope for ambition, or reward for the toils of office. But this administration has put aside, from narrow, temporary, and selfish considerations, an opportunity of earning the lasting gratitude of posterity, and achieving a great civil triumph, by placing this matter on its true basis.

What, I repeat, is now the fund mainly looked to, for the redemption of these Treasury notes? Why, sir, the claims which we hold on broken banks, and the vague hope that they will grow better during the next year, in which we are going to wage a war of extermination against those institutions. No, sir! There is not the least hope or expectation of aid from that quarter. It is perfectly well known that the only claim to credit which these notes possess, is the fact, that they constitute a lien on every inch of real estate in the country, and must be discharged out of the hard labor of the country. But the administration dares not acknowledge this to the people. It does not feel strong enough to do so. Concealment is necessary. For this very reason, sir, I resist the project. I say to the administration, come out fairly and openly, so that the people may see what is before them; do this, and I will cheerfully co-operate with you.

Mr. Chairman, there is a paragraph in the President's Message, to which I could not listen without pain at the light in which it must place the Chief Magistrate of the country before all those who have watched the course of events. I allude to the passage in which he adverts to a prophecy that, under a State charter, the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States would prove stronger than ever. Sir, I think that such anticipations were justifiable. It might well be supposed that, on escaping from the constitutional scruples which clogged her former existence, and from the party contests which perpetually sought to involve her in their vortex, there would be no longer a motive for persecution. It was, doubtless, believed that many even of the politicians who had joined in a cry against the bank, in order to keep abreast of a supposed popular current, would gladly atone to their own consciences by, at least, an amnesty. Was it not rational to presume that the States would cordially welcome the advantages to be derived from its career of quiet usefulness? And, when the State of Pennsylvania had thrown round it her ægis, was it to be apprehended that those, at least, who had been so long indulging in sentimental regrets over "the lost rights of the States," would be the first to trample upon such as are unquestionable? And yet, sir, how was it? You well know the subsequent history. The topic was too precious for demagogues to be abandoned. Party fires had begun to wane and languish for want of the accustomed blast and aliment. The war assumed a character of unprecedented fierceness. Before the wax of the charter was cold, you saw the great State of Ohio, under the influence of party excitement, passing a law to inflict the heaviest penalties upon any one of her citizens or corporations who should dare to act as the agent of that bank. We of Pittsburg well know that the result of this single blow was to paralyze, in a great measure, the western business of the bank. There was denied even a right of way, and it became almost perilous to open in Ohio a letter connected with her affairs. You saw, also, under the same impulses, the branch expelled, on a few days' notice, from Missouri. And in other quarters, so far from being permitted to take the position of a regulator, she has been compelled to pass an obscure and uneasy existence, constantly assailed by party clamor, and with the Government and its minions ready and eager, at any moment, to second a blow at her interests.

And who, sir, took the lead in that crusade? The writer of this very Message. You saw him, with astonishment, arraiging the sovereign State of Pennsylvania for a high misdemeanor, before a Cincinnati dinner-table. You saw him addressing to that dinner-party an inflammatory letter, urging them, amidst their orgies, to lift high the wine-cup in pledge of eternal hostility to our Pennsylvania institution. And yet, sir, he who has successfully employed the influence of his high station as Vice President in efforts to cripple that institution—to baffle all her exertions to be diffusively useful—now sneers in this high state paper at the sanguine hopes with which she entered on her new career!

It has been a subject of complaint here that, amidst the falling to pieces of the system of over-banking, to which your policy gave unrestricted scope, the Pennsylvania institution did not continue to pay specie. From whom is this heard? From those who had destroyed her national character, and with it all accountability to the nation; from those who had broken down the only barrier against over-issues of paper, which then, "like to an entered tide," had rushed by and flooded the country; from those who had compelled her to wind up, and to dispose of her resources at a long credit; from those who, in 1833, declared that she was "a reptile beneath the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury," and that she had been "brought to her knees at the first blow of the State banks!" Surely, it is of the essence of modesty and consistency that such complaints should proceed from such a quarter. But, forsooth, she might, as she asserts, have continued specie payments. Be it so. The fact cannot well be questioned by those who ring in our ears her tremendous power and resources. But would such a course, if practicable, have relieved the country? Every candid man must admit that exactly the reverse would have been the case. If she continued to pay out specie, she must resort to measures to compel a similar course on the part of others. And who does not see the widespread ruin that must have ensued? Look at the bill upon your table for the adjustment of claims upon the deposit banks. Before a resort to suit, you provide for the offer to receive payment in protracted instalments. This is already pronounced, by gentlemen from the quarters in which they are located, to be oppressive and ruinous. Yet you reproach the Pennsylvania bank for not having taken the position which would have compelled a far sharper and more peremptory action on her part. It seems to be the misfortune of gentlemen, otherwise amiable and just, to catch the spirit which prevails here, and to suppose that a capacity for mischief necessarily implies the exercise of it. No, sir! If the whole force of the Government could not sustain a league of banks, the Pennsylvania institution might well decline to become an instrument for gratifying the blind and ungovernable rage with which the Executive was disposed to turn upon those who had been so long the objects of eulogy and favoritism. She did wisely, I think, not to exhaust herself in an effort to destroy them, but to reserve whatever strength she possessed to co-operate with them in an effort to relieve the country from the evils into which misgovernment had plunged it.

Sir, after destroying the best currency with which any country was ever blest, the friends of the administration tell us that they have constitutional scruples about meddling further with the subject; it is no concern of theirs; they doubt their right to cure the mischief they have inflicted. Suppose, sir, one of your naval commanders should insist on taking under convoy a fleet of American merchantmen. He declares that he has the only accurate charts; that he is familiar with every shoal of the channel, and every indentation of the coast. But, in the midst of difficulty and danger—with breakers around, and signals of distress everywhere flying, he is seen refusing the aid of a single boat or anchor, and abandoning to their fate the victims of his ignorance and presumption. Would it be sufficient for such an officer to say, as has been argued here, "mine was a national ship intended to meet the public enemy; had I rendered assistance on that occasion, the next request would be to throw overboard my guns for the more convenient transportation of merchandise?" If such arguments would be met by universal scorn and execration, must not the country regard with similar feelings the course of the dominant party?

But, sir, (said Mr. B.) it is contended that the nation will cheerfully sacrifice itself for a metaphor. The word divorce is to reconcile us to every evil. This seemed to him a singular notion, with regard to a people supposed to cherish, in an especial manner, all the endearing ties and sympathies of domestic life. The word has been supposed to bring up the most melancholy images; it speaks of violated faith—of ungovernable passions—of a desolated fireside. The most remarkable case on record is that of Henry VIII.; on which rests the yet unmitigated execration of mankind. There, too, the talk was of State policy; and even religion was pressed into service as the handmaid of lust. The purest statesman of the age was led to the block for his opinions about the divorce. Sir, what has been the past career, and what is the present state, of the party in this matter? You have long since madly broken away from a legal connection, sanctified by a happy and serene cohabitation of forty years. In your downward course from respectability, you next took to your pets, to the infinite shame and mortification of all decent persons who looked on. And now you are wearied of them, and wish to go upon the town at large! This craving for novelty—this change of doxies—you dignify with the name of a divorce, which shall console us in the midst of our calamities. The man whom you have deprived of the chance of earning a dinner for his wife, is to go home and comfort her with talk about the divorce!

Mr. ROBERTSON said he was opposed to the bill, whether designed to raise revenue or to create a circulating medium. As a revenue measure he believed it unnecessary, and, under that impression, he was unwilling, at this time of general pressure, to incur a new debt or levy upon the people additional burdens. The Secretary of the Treasury anticipates a deficit of five or six millions of dollars only. He proposes to withhold the fourth instalment set apart for the States, or to resort to some other resource for a sum equal to ten millions of dollars; which he gives us to understand will meet all necessary expenses, and leave a surplus of one million for the mint, and three or four millions for sudden and contingent calls. The same view is presented still more distinctly by the President in his Message. He tells us:

"The sum necessary for the service of the year, beyond the probable receipts and the amount it was intended should be left in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, will be about six millions."

He makes this estimate on the supposition that indulgence will be extended on the merchants' bonds. Adverting to the means of supply, he says:

"It is not proposed to procure the amount required by loans or increased taxation. There are now in the Treasury, $9,367,214, directed by the act of 23d June, 1836, to be deposited with the States in October next."

He then recommends the use of this sum, as the whole or the greater part will be wanted to defray existing appropriations. Well, sir, we have granted the sum required, in the very mode recommended by the Executive, by violating our engagement solemnly made with the States; and now, before we have determined whether any or what indulgence shall be extended to the merchants or the banks, we are called upon to authorize an issue of ten millions in Treasury notes, making (exclusive of the sum withheld from the States) about forty-six millions for the current year. It is true the President proposes this issue, not in addition to the funds withheld from the States, but temporarily, and only until the amount can be collected from the banks. But there is no pretence that the banks are insolvent; nor is there any proof that the whole or some part at least of what they owe may not speedily be collected or made available. We well know that hitherto drafts upon them, whether paid or not, have served the purposes of the Government; indeed that, even when protested these drafts have readily sold in the market at a premium of six or seven per cent. If six millions only of the sum wrested from the States can be commanded, they will suffice, as the President himself informs us, for the service of the present year. Yet we are to issue ten millions in Treasury notes, redeemable at the expiration of twelve months; six millions to supply what, there is every reason to believe, we may obtain from the banks indebted to us, or make available by drafts upon them; and the residue, avowedly, to provide or keep up a surplus for the mint, and for unforeseen contingencies. I question much, sir, the propriety of this annual appropriation for the mint. There is reason to fear that we are making money there at a heavy expense, and, if so, the sooner we get rid of a losing concern the better. As for the surplus for sudden emergencies, the very contingency has occurred for using whatever portion of it may remain; and I would sooner expend every dollar of it than issue a Treasury note, or impose a burden of any kind upon the country. This is not the time to create or retain an idle surplus of three or four millions in the Treasury.

But funds, it is said, are wanting to carry on what is called the Florida war. If that be so, profoundly ignorant as we are still kept of the true cause of that war, discreditable as its conduct has been to the administration, I am ready to vote adequate supplies for the protection and security of our frontier settlements. But has the Executive called for a further appropriation for that object? If there be in the Message the most distant allusion to such an appropriation, it has escaped my notice. The President sums up in a single paragraph the objects to which he invites our immediate attention:

"To regulate, by law, the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys; to designate the funds to be received and paid by the Government; to enable the Treasury to meet promptly every demand upon it; to prescribe the terms of indulgence and the mode of settlement to be adopted as well in collecting from individuals the revenue that has accrued, as in withdrawing it from former depositories; and to devise and adopt such further measures, within the constitutional competency of Congress, as will be best calculated to revive the enterprise and to promote the prosperity of the country."

These are the reasons assigned for the present inconvenient and unseasonable convocation of Congress. Yet my colleague (Mr. WISE) may have been right in suggesting that the true motive is to be found in the necessity of providing further means to carry on the war in Florida. For, of the various objects supposed to require immediate legislation, there is not one which the Executive, in the plenitude of its authority, has not already provided for, or which might not have been deferred without much detriment to the public interests, till the regular period of our annual session.

THURSDAY, October 5.

National Bank.

The House passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, declaring it to be inexpedient to charter a national bank; and the question being on Mr. SERGEANT's motion to refer the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. CUSHMAN said that, believing every gentleman to have made up his mind on the question in relation to the expediency of chartering a national bank, and that the state of the public business would not permit of its further discussion, he moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 83, noes 80.

The main question was then reported as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to charter a national bank.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered, and were:

So the House resolved that it is inexpedient to charter a national bank.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act imposing additional duties in certain cases on public officers," was taken up on its reference.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that, as this bill corresponded in almost all its provisions with the House bill under the same title, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, he had been instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move that this bill be at once committed to the same Committee of the Whole as the other.

The motion was assented to.

Treasury Note Bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the "bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

The bill had been amended entirely in Committee of the Whole, and a substitute submitted by Mr. CAMBRELENG adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, said: The bill before us is indirect and deceptive; calculated to conceal the real nature and object of the measure which is proposed. It is entitled a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. Why not call it a bill to authorize the employment of additional clerks? Or, a bill to punish forgery in certain cases? Both of which are just as much provided for in the bill as is the issue of Treasury notes; and either of which would just as well express the real object of the bill as the title which it bears.

The bill bears a false title; it carries upon its front a false name; it imports what it is not; or rather it does not import what in fact it is; it is deceptive. Wherever else designing artifice may prevail, let it not corrupt our legislation. Let us deal frankly and openly with the people. When we take their money, let us tell them so; let it be taken openly and avowedly, not covertly and indirectly. Take their money and tell them so; but do not pick their pockets!

When the people are to be subjected to a liability of ten millions, they should be informed of the fact clearly and distinctly; there should be no concealment in word or thought. The bill before us is, in truth, a bill to authorize a loan of ten millions. What we want is a loan, and we ought in fairness and truth to say so. To call the bill by a name that does not fairly import its character; thus to treat it as something different from what it really is, does not comport with what ought to be the character of the Government.

We have already, sir, passed a bill entitled an act to postpone the fourth instalment of deposit with the States. I fear, sir, that bill raises expectations only to disappoint them. That payment, if it were really intended, might as well be made now as ever. I fear, sir, the States will expect it in vain. Postponement, in all probability, will turn out to mean repeal.

The expectation of payment at a future time will prove, I apprehend, a delusive expectation. Sir, I protest against duplicity in any form, on the part of the Government. The relation which we sustain towards the people demands from us the strictest truth and sincerity. They have placed confidence in us; they have entrusted to us their rights and interests; and they have an undeniable claim to be informed fully and clearly, without disguise, as to every thing we do, and every thing we intend. The title and the form of this bill are calculated, in my opinion, to disguise from the people that we are borrowing money upon their credit; and, in that point of view, the bill is obnoxious to serious objections.

There is another objection, which must press with great weight upon those gentlemen who hold to a strict construction of the constitution, who hold that Congress has no powers except those expressly granted to it. Those gentlemen, who cannot find in the constitution any power to charter a national bank, where do they find the power to issue Treasury notes, or bills of credit; for Treasury notes, designed to circulate as currency, are neither more nor less than bills of credit? No such power is anywhere expressly granted.

The framers of the constitution had seen and felt the evils of Government paper money. The power to issue bills of credit was expressly withheld from the States; it was not expressly given to the General Government. How, then, does the General Government obtain it? It will be said that it is included under the power to borrow money. Let us see how that interpretation will answer.

No one will deny to the several States the power to borrow money—a power which they exercise every day without objection. But it is certain that the States cannot issue bills of credit. The power to borrow money, then, does not necessarily include the power to issue bills of credit; and, although the Government has undoubtedly the power to borrow money, that power to borrow money does not, by any means, necessarily imply a power to issue bills of credit. I found this argument upon the views of those gentlemen who hold to a strict construction of the constitution, without intending to express any opinion of my own upon this constitutional point. The only exercise of this power by the General Government occurred during the late war with Great Britain. The Government, in the first place, endeavored to obtain a loan in the usual way. The attempt failed; the loan could not be obtained; and, as a matter of necessity, the Government resorted to a forced loan, by the issue of Treasury notes. An example at such a time, and under such circumstances, is rather to be avoided than to be followed.

There is still a further objection to this measure. The bill provides that the notes to be issued shall bear such interest as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine. This omission to fix the amount of interest leaves the character of the notes wholly indeterminate and uncertain. The interest which they may bear will determine the character and office of the notes. They may be of a character to be taken up as an investment by capitalists; they may be of a character to circulate as currency; and which of these characters they will assume, depends upon the interest they may bear. Before I can vote for the bill, this point must be determined. Before I can vote for the notes, I must know what the notes are to be. I cannot agree to the passage of any bill the nature of which is not fixed and established by the bill itself. It would be to act blindly and inconsiderately, to vote for a measure in ignorance of what that measure is to be. Should the bill pass in the present form, and should I be inquired of what its effects upon the community was anticipated to be, I could give no answer. I could express no opinion on that point, because, in the present shape of this bill, it is impossible to form any opinion what character the notes will assume. I could only say, what I should be ashamed to say, that the Executive had been authorized to issue notes to suit the purposes of the Government, without any regard having been paid to the concern which the community at large might have in this matter. If we are to act with the slightest regard to the interest and convenience of the public, we should fix the interest which the notes are to bear. Why refer this to the Executive? Is not the House competent to form and exercise a judgment on this question? Is not the House as fit as the Executive to determine what rate of interest, what character to the notes, will best subserve the public interest? If it be best for the Executive to legislate upon this point, why not upon all others? Though the Executive, in fact, exercised such a power, it would hardly be necessary to make a public proclamation of it.

Treasury Notes.

[H. OF R.]

The earnestness with which the friends of the administration press this measure of issuing Treasury notes, in preference to the usual mode of supplying the wants of the Treasury by a simple loan, is well calculated to excite suspicions. I have no desire to throw any undeserved odium upon the administration. I wish them to merit, and, by meriting, to possess the confidence of the entire community. But this measure is little calculated to produce that effect. It is an unusual measure; it will be attended with extraordinary expense; it will add to the number of those in the employ of Government; it will increase Executive patronage; it opens a new door to Executive favoritism. In raising money upon these notes, the Executive may give a preference, and may consult the interests of favored individuals; whereas a loan would be open equally to all.

Besides, sir, there are those who see in this measure the commencement of a permanent and a most perilous system. It is more than surmised that the Government would be willing to have the whole currency of the country flow exclusively from itself; and is desirous to furnish not only the gold and silver coin, but the whole paper currency also, from its own exclusive mint; and that the measure now proposed is the first step in the march towards that object. The taking measures to render safe and convenient such currency as the people may elect to use, is the business and all the business of the Government in relation to this subject. It should be kept strictly within the limits of that duty, and should faithfully perform what belongs to it within those limits. They ought to follow public sentiment in this matter, not attempt to lead it.

But strange and dangerous doctrines have been put forth in relation to the currency of the country; and there is cause enough for alarm to render it the part of prudence to watch with care every measure bearing upon this subject. The issue of paper money is at all times a dangerous business for a Government to engage in, and a business peculiarly dangerous at the present crisis. Our time is now too short, our action too hurried, to justify us in adventuring upon a scheme of a novel character. At such a time, and under present circumstances, the only safe way is the old way—the common way. If the Government must have money, let it borrow the money in the usual mode. So doing, we shall know what we do. To the adoption of this course, I have heard no substantial objection, I can see no substantial objection; and, until I can obtain some new light, it is the only course to which I can give my assent.

A great change has come over our national affairs. At the commencement of this present year, there was in the hands of the Government a surplus of nearly twelve millions of dollars, exclusive of the whole amount to be deposited with the States. The fourth installment of the deposit money (between nine and ten millions) has been withheld from the States; there is due to the Government from the late United States Bank six millions, exclusive of interest; and now ten additional millions are demanded, to meet the expenses of the current year; and this, too, besides all the ordinary revenues of the country—a country, whose whole annual expenses during the administration next preceding that of General Jackson, were hardly twelve millions of dollars!

Mr. PARMENTER said: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the observations of my honorable colleague who has just taken his seat, (Mr. FLETCHER,) as I always have elsewhere, when I have had an opportunity, from my great respect for his high moral worth and distinguished talents; but, entertaining somewhat different views from those presented by him and other gentlemen on the same side of the question, I will, with your leave, state the grounds upon which I dissent.

My colleague objects to the bill, because no rate of interest is specified; and he cannot give it his vote until he knows precisely what the obligations of the Government are to be. It appears to me that this is one of the most valuable provisions of the bill, because the rate of interest can be so fixed all the way from a very low rate to the maximum of six per cent., that the Secretary of the Treasury will put it at the most advantageous rate for the Government and for the community. And it appears to me the rule would be a very plain one, to place the rate so that they would not be hoarded by the capitalists, or fall below par in the market, however small the demand for Government dues. And although, as has been strongly urged, there is very small probability that, under almost any circumstances, they would be below par, yet it is better, in my judgment, to leave the whole matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who will understand best what the wants of the case may require.

It is objected, that the issue of Treasury notes is unconstitutional; that they are bills of credit, and prohibited by the Constitution of the United States; that they were never issued in but one instance, and that during the war with Great Britain, when it was difficult or almost impossible to obtain a loan. If it were unconstitutional to issue Treasury notes, the fact that we were at war, and it was difficult to obtain a loan in any other manner, would not have made it constitutional. I come to the conclusion myself, that Treasury notes were issued at that time for the same reason as now, because they are the most convenient to the Government and the people.

I have not entertained the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the present embarrassments of this nation have arisen from what may be properly called general distress. I believe, and think I shall be sustained in the opinion by the sentiments of many men of business in the commercial cities, that the stoppage of specie payments was owing to the alarm excited in the community, which caused a rush upon the banks for the precious metals, and thereby materially lessened their means, and by the imprudence and extended speculation into which the debtors of these institutions plunged. Had it not been for these circumstances, the suspension would not have taken place; and, but for them, before this time specie payments would have been resumed. It is true that the consternation was universal; the panic was overwhelming; but that the evil was not deep-rooted, and that there was not, in reality, a scarcity of the precious metals in the commercial world, is shown by various facts. Contrary to the expectation of most persons in this country, the Bank of England continued, and still continues, specie payments, and money is abundant, and there is no want of coin and bullion for all purposes. The speculations and investments in lands, amounting to many millions of dollars; engagements in novel manufacturing concerns; building of railroads in all parts of the country; and establishments of every variety which ingenuity could invent—a few of them useful and profitable, but many, very many, most sorrowfully ruinous in their results—all tended to produce the mischief. The ordinary means of the banks were probably equal to their liabilities; but the inability of their debtors, in consequence of their imprudent and indiscreet course, crippled these institutions, and brought on the calamity of a suspension of specie payments—an evil which, while it continues, will blight every effort of enterprise and industry.

The amount of specie within the control of the banks of the country was equal to their wants, greater than it has been in many instances and at many times; but unsafe and improvident men obtained access to their resources; not that I mean to censure the managers of the moneyed institutions more than I would individuals, and copartnerships, and corporations, for everybody was infected with the mania of speculation; the whole atmosphere of the business world was filled with it. It drove people to the pine forests of Maine; to the town sites on the Gulf of Mexico; to every stream and river through the whole republic; to the new cities of the West; and to the engagements in manufactures, mechanic arts, and discoveries of all kinds, in most instances lamentably unsuccessful.

My colleague objects that the bill is deceptive; that, under the guise of authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, it affects a loan. It undoubtedly is a use of the credit of the country, to obtain means of extinguishing some of its liabilities, and in that sense is a loan. But there is no deception about it. Notes payable are never issued in money transactions, excepting for the purpose of substituting credit for money, or promising it, and therefore always, directly or indirectly, operate as a negotiation for a loan. What difference does it make as to the matter of borrowing, whether the money be obtained by one person of a third, and paid to a second one, or the note be given directly to the second person? In both cases it is obtaining means on loan; in one instance directly, in the other indirectly. Banks borrow continually, by their bills or notes, money of the community. Now, sir, as Treasury notes can be issued for no other purpose than to procure money or means on the credit of the United States, the bill cannot be deceptive, because, as it can have no other object, everybody understands it.

I am in favor of the bill as it now stands, without any of the proposed amendments, particularly those which propose the sale of the United State Bank of Pennsylvania, and to the striking out the provision authorizing the Secretary to pay interest when, in his opinion, the good of the country may require it. It certainly appears to me that there can be no possible objection to that provision. It will guard against the possibility, although

Treasury Notes.

[H. OF R.]

I admit it is not a strong probability, that they will be at any considerable discount, under ordinary circumstances. But we all know the nice calculations of dealers in money; and I should be exceedingly sorry to hear the cry, which has so frequently sounded in our ears, of depreciated currency applied to any of the issues of the Government.

Mr. CROCKETT addressed the Chair as follows:

Sir, it has been urged by honorable gentlemen that this is a measure of relief to the country; that it will supply the country with a circulation and a medium of exchange; and I grant that it might offer some temporary relief; but, sir, I believe it would tend, ultimately, to aggravate the disease. So far from being a measure of permanent relief to the people, I believe it is the entering wedge to an institution almost as odious as the Spanish Inquisition. I mean, sir, a Treasury bank. In fact, if the amendment of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RHETT) be adopted, a Treasury bank of issue and deposit is at once established.

Sir, instead of showing any disposition to grant relief to the people, we are called upon to increase their burdens. We are about to heap upon them another national debt, (for, disguise it as you will, it is nothing less, and has been so admitted on all sides,) to the amount of ten millions of dollars, to relieve the Government; while the people are told, substantially, that they need not expect any relief; that it is the business of the Government to take care of itself; and that it has no power to intermeddle with the concerns of individuals! The Government, after having tampered with the currency until it is ruined and annihilated—after having prostrated every branch of industry and enterprise, the commerce and credit of the nation, by practising wild and visionary experiments—cuts loose from the people, and tells them it has no power to grant them relief, or interfere with their concerns! They are to be dismissed with a lecture on economy. Yes, sir; they are contemptuously told that they are to look to their own industry and frugality for relief, without the aid of the Government! Sir, this reminds me of the language of Job's comforters. We read in Holy Writ that on a certain occasion Satan was permitted by the Almighty to try an "experiment" upon the firmness and integrity of "Job, a perfect and an upright man, one that feared God and eschewed evil;" that when, by the power of this arch enemy of the peace and happiness of man, Job's fortunes, and his children, and every thing calculated to render him happy, had been driven to the four winds, and he was reduced to beggary and ruin; when, in addition to this, "he was smitten with sore boils from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot," and was groaning under the bitterest agonies of human affliction; when, in short, by one calamity upon the heels of another, he had been reduced from the highest state of prosperity and happiness, to the lowest depths of degradation and misery, and was wont to roll himself in the ashes upon his hearth, there was but one resource left upon earth to which he could look for consolation and solace—and that was his wife. And when he cried out to her in the bitterness of his soul, what was her reply? She told him he had better "curse God and die!" And, sir, pretty much in keeping with this is the President's consolation to the people in their afflictions.

Sir, do you imagine the people expected to hear such language as this from those to whose interests they have shown so much devotion? Did they expect their rulers to mock at their calamities, which they themselves had been instrumental in bringing upon them? No, sir; they looked to those whom they had placed in power to devise some means to relieve them from their calamities. The proclamation of the President was hailed with joy by thousands as a favorable omen. They hugged to their bosoms the delusive hope that their rulers had seen the folly of their course, and were about to retrace their steps. Sir, although the President was pledged to "tread generally in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor," yet, I imagine no one believed he designed to tread specially in his footsteps. And it was hoped that if he did tread in his footsteps at all, he would take his "back track," (if I may be allowed to use a hunter's phrase,) at least in relation to the currency and the revenue. But in all this how sadly are we disappointed! So far from this, we find him disposed to plunge still deeper into new and untried experiments! Sir, what do we behold? The whole country involved in one wide-spread ruin, and the Government itself bankrupt; and we are yet to have another "experiment!" Yes, sir, the State bank experiment has failed, and the golden bubble has exploded, and left a wreck of ruin in their train; and now, sir, in obedience to the mandate from the Hermitage, we are to have the Government divorced from all existing banks, and wedded to a new and untried system of sub-Treasuries, or, in plain language, a Treasury bank. Sir, we find that the ex-President is not content with having dictated to the people whom they should choose to be his successor, but seems now determined to dictate to that successor. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that, as the President had attained the summit of his wishes, he would kick from under him the ladder by which he had ascended, and take the dictates of his own judgment as the man of his counsel; but, sir, mortifying as it may be, we find the Message the exact fac simile of certain letters not long since addressed to the editor of the Globe, and published in that print.

Mr. Speaker, in order to remedy the evils which now afflict this country, I am for commencing the work where they originated. Let us, sir, in all due charity, instead of charging the whole of these misfortunes to the account of the people, at least charge one-half of them to the mal-administration of the Government; and, although it is not recommended by the President, let us commence economizing a little on the part of the Government, and set a praiseworthy example before the people. I have always heard it remarked that example was much more forcible than precept. Let us, sir, instead of creating a national debt, in order to keep up an extravagant and prodigal system of expenditures which has crept into the Government, commence the business of retrenchment and reform which was promised us a few years since, and adopt some measure of general and permanent relief to the community as well as to the Government; and then, sir, and not until then, may we hope to see better times, and cease to hear the complaints that are now continually saluting our ears from the tens of thousands of honest, industrious citizens who have been thrown out of employment and reduced to beggary and ruin during this age of experiments.

Sir, I deem it unnecessary to detain the House with any calculations to show the state of the Treasury, in order to prove that the passage of this bill is not required to supply a deficit in the Treasury, as contended for by the friends of the measure. It has already been shown to this House conclusively, to my mind at least, that, by withholding the fourth instalment of the surplus revenue from the States, and suspending certain appropriations for useless—nay, worse than useless—public works, exploring expeditions, &c., and thereby reducing the expenditures for the present year some fifteen millions of dollars, there would be ample means in the Treasury to meet all demands against it, without resorting to the expedient of issuing Treasury notes on the credit of the nation. And, sir, if this be true, would it not be an unpardonable outrage to heap upon the people another national debt, right upon the heels of the one just discharged? Sir, we have had theoretical reform long enough; I think it is time we should begin to carry it into practice. But, on the other hand, it is urged that, after withholding the fourth instalment of the deposits from the States, and suspending the fifteen millions of appropriations, there will still be, in any event, a deficit in the Treasury, which renders it indispensable that this bill should pass. And, sir, we are told that the Treasury is in actual want of those funds at this moment, and cannot perform its engagements for ten days without them. I cannot perceive, sir, how this can be; but if it be true, I, for one, say, so let it be. If the Government has actually brought itself to insolvency, and it be really necessary to borrow money to pay its expenses, let the truth come out, and let things be called by their right names. Sir, this bill is designed to practise a fraud upon the people, by borrowing money in such a form that they will not understand it, and thereby shield the Government from the odium of bringing itself from a surplus of forty-five millions to bankruptcy in less than one year. If I were satisfied that there would really be a deficit in the Treasury, which would make it necessary to borrow money to enable the Government to perform its functions, I should certainly grant it; but, sir, I would prefer that it should be asked for in plain English in that form. I am opposed to laying burdens upon the people in disguise. If they are to be taxed, let them understand it, and have an opportunity to provide for it.

Mr. PHILLIPS endeavored to prove that the most injurious effects had resulted from the late measure of the Secretary of the Treasury, in allowing a large amount of deposits to remain in several isolated banks, while he withdrew nearly the whole sums deposited with the banks on the seaboard. It was his opinion that much of the distress now existing in the commercial cities was to be attributed to that measure. He referred to the prospects of the country for the ensuing year, and contended, that from the report of the Secretary, and the statements given in the House, if a balance were drawn, the amount of difference between the expenditure and receipts would not exceed two or three hundred thousand dollars. He would tell them frankly, that when he came here his impression was, that the only practicable relief was the creation of a Government loan, by which our account with Europe could be speedily closed, or to issue such kinds of Treasury notes as would be useful to the people; and he thought that the payment of the fourth instalment of the deposits would be the means of distributing these notes to the country. But that measure had failed, and with it a great portion of the ground for issuing these notes.

It was his opinion that specie payments would not be resumed for the present, if the measures now before the House were adopted; and he also wished it to be known that, in his opinion, the period of distress had not passed over. It still existed, and, under the present state of things, must increase. Some gentlemen had attributed the distress to over-trading; but, although he would admit that might have had some influence, yet the great evil which they were called on to remedy was that of obstruction to our credit, both at home and abroad, and to restore the currency to its former state, and the banks to that confidence they enjoyed before the suspension of specie payments. It was desirable that they should make the notes of the banks receivable for public dues; and, when they had done that, they would have done all that was expected from Government; for, when such notes were so receivable, confidence would be restored, and nothing more would be wanting. He could not vote for the bill to its present amount; and, if Treasury notes were issued at all, he would suggest the expediency of issuing them without, rather than with interest.

Mr. TOWN sententia contended that the bill under consideration was well adapted to the wants of the country, and well calculated to afford relief to the Government and the people; and that, if we attempted to draw the money from the deposit banks while they owe the Government, it will force them to press their creditors, and add to the distress of the community. The country stood in the relation of creditor to the banks and the merchants, and it was its duty to deal with them in such a manner as to afford the greatest relief to them. In relation to sending bonds abroad, he must say that he felt a great repugnance to sending them into a foreign market, to raise money upon them to carry on the operations of the Government; besides, if they were sent abroad, it would have the effect of increasing our foreign debt, which now presses so heavily upon us. He supported the bill at some length, and answered the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts in relation to the constitutionality of the measure.

MR. BOULDIN said: I agree perfectly with the President of the United States, in believing we have nothing to do in providing a currency, further or other than as the constitution literally mentions. That instrument fixes a standard to be used when debtor and creditor come to points, and cannot agree as to what the debt shall be paid in. The debtor can get clear by offering, and the creditor can require, if he pleases to do so, the specie which is the standard. Congress cannot add to nor take from this privilege, in regard to either. Every law about money, without saying more, refers to specie only. Every judgment; every execution for money, without any thing more said in relation as to that point, is for specie of course. The Treasurer and Secretary of the Treasury have by the constitution the control of the money belonging to the United States to a great extent. You may shelter them by authorizing them to place the money in this or in that bank. But you cannot make them more responsible.

FRIDAY, October 6.

Treasury Note Bill.

The House then resumed the consideration of the "bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," as reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. HOPKINS said: Mr. Speaker, I am in principle a hard-money man, and I have the satisfaction to believe that the patriotic people whom I have the distinguished honor to represent upon this floor, prefer the constitutional currency of our fathers to any paper money, your Treasury notes included. But, whilst I say this, I desire that it shall be distinctly understood, that I am not to be enlisted in the contemplated crusade against the existing institutions of Virginia and her sister States, to accomplish the narrow object of supplying the Government alone with the constitutional currency; and I now admonish gentlemen that, until they propose a measure broad and comprehensive enough to separate the great body of the people from the banks, I will not co-operate with them in giving effect to a partial restricted measure, which furnishes a hard-money currency only to them, who, in the better days of our republic, were regarded as the mere servants of the people, and considered amenable to them. Now, sir, I am not the man to advocate here, in my representative capacity, any measure which will provide gold and silver for myself, and other functionaries of the Government, whilst the people are left to endure all the evils of a depreciated paper money.

But I have another objection to the details of this measure, growing out of the palpable injustice which must result, from the denominations of these Treasury notes, to the poorer classes of the community. If, sir, as is now too obvious for the most incredulous to doubt, these notes are to circulate and perform all the functions of a paper currency, they cannot reach the pocket of the poor man, but must serve alone the purpose of the wealthy, who alone can command the benefit of a currency in denominations of one hundred dollars. Another effect of this measure, I fear, will be to cripple still more the State banks, now rapidly recovering from the shock by which the whole monetary system of the community has been so recently convulsed to its centre; and, whilst it may relieve the Government, may at the same time embarrass still more the great body of the people.

I am not, I hope, sir, mistaken or misunderstood upon this subject. I am willing to extend to the Treasury immediate and ample relief, by any means compatible with the constitution and my convictions of public duty; nor will I be drawn from this determination by any doubt which may be entertained as to the real amount necessary, nor by the asperities of party intolerance, the prominent bane of our deliberations and councils here. Yes, sir, I am willing, and stand ready, to vote any sum, in the bounds of reason, which the Secretary of the Treasury may consider necessary to meet the most liberal wants of the Government; and if he asks more than is necessary, I leave him to his just responsibility to the country.

Sir, I am opposed to this measure, not as one of financial relief, but one for the emission of ten millions of paper currency, obnoxious as I conceive it to be, to all the objections of an executive bank, based not upon the means of immediate convertibility, but upon the plighted faith of the nation, which I maintain can be pledged only for a loan. In my humble judgment, sir, this project is fraught with mischief; and I look to it with the deepest distrust and alarm. Admonished as I am, by a short experience in the practical administration of this Government, that its tendency is to enlarge its powers by gradual and imperceptible innovations upon the rights of the States and of the people, I look to the future with all the forebodings of one fully impressed with the solemn conviction that, if not resisted, and successfully resisted at the threshold, it will end in consolidation, and consolidation in the overthrow of our institutions and the downfall of our liberties.

Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House longer by the expression of any apprehensions of my own, as to the objects of this measure, or the danger of its ripening into a permanent system. I feel as sensibly as any man can do, the magnitude of the consequences which such a system cannot fail to produce. I hope, sir, most devoutly, that my fears may never be realized; but I should be unfaithful to my constituents and my country, if I did not declare, fearlessly, that I look to the present measure as laying the foundation of a system which, if ever established, must end in revolution or despotism.

Mr. WISE eulogized his colleague on the course he had just taken. He was glad to find displayed so honorable and independent an opposition to the bill. Mr. W. then read several extracts from President Jackson's Messages of 1834 and 1835, to show that the sales of Government stock in the United States Bank had been recommended by the President at those periods.

Mr. ROBERTSON said, if the administration had no other object in view than to raise a sufficiency of money to meet the real wants of the Treasury, he was at a loss to comprehend the cause of these persevering efforts to raise it by the issue of Treasury notes. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD,) as modified, proposed to give the right to dispose of the debt of about six millions due from the Bank of the United States; and that of his colleague, (Mr. PATTON,) if he understood it, to superadd the power of drawing upon the State banks, which held ten or twelve millions of public money. If these resources should prove insufficient, authority might be conferred to borrow whatever sum might be necessary to make up the deficiency. But none of these obvious and ordinary methods of replenishing the Treasury will now answer the purpose. Nothing will do but to resort to the extraordinary and dangerous resource of an issue of Treasury notes. In times of great difficulty, when engaged in war with one of the most powerful nations of Europe, we were compelled, from sheer necessity, to adopt that method of raising supplies. During the Revolutionary war we had issued upwards of three hundred millions in bills of credit, and at its close these bills were so depreciated that they were funded at 100 for 1. Such were the evils attending the system, that the framers of the constitution, to guard against their recurrence, thought it necessary to interdict the States in express terms from emitting bills of credit. I will not, sir, (said Mr. R.,) at this time enter into the question whether the power thus prohibited to the States rightfully belongs to this Government. There is much force, all must admit, in the reference made by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) to the journal of the convention, showing that a proposition to clothe this Government with the power was expressly overruled. With those who rely on the same ground, not verified by the journal, but depending on the memory of members of the convention, as an argument against the power to establish a national bank, this reference ought to be conclusive. Certain it is, that the power was not expressly granted, as were those to lay taxes and borrow money; and the rule of interpretation, as given by the constitution itself, is, that the powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people. It is obvious that its exercise by the General Government is equally dangerous; indeed, liable to much greater abuse. The States can effect none, to any considerable extent, except those within their respective limits; but we may inundate the Union with a spurious currency; and when the system shall be once commenced, no one can undertake to say where it is to stop.

In every aspect, Mr. Speaker, this scheme appears to me substantially the establishment of a Government bank. If the paper be designed as a circulating medium, the Treasury becomes a bank of issue and circulation merely. But the scheme goes further. It authorizes not only the payment of these notes to public creditors, but the borrowing of money upon their credit. What is this in effect but a banking operation? You apply to the Secretary, who is thus authorized to borrow, and propose to lend him half a million or a million of dollars. He is not in immediate want of the money. You offer, for a given sum in Treasury notes, to supply him with one or two hundred thousand dollars monthly, in munitions of war, in rations, or in money, until an amount equal to the value of the notes in the market shall be furnished. There is nothing in the law to prevent such a negotiation.

Mr. LEGARE said: As to the constitutional power of Congress, then, to issue these notes, under existing circumstances, I entertain no doubt at all, at least with reference to the objections mainly relied on in this discussion, and especially by the gentlemen over the way, (Messrs. FLETCHER, PHILLIPS, and CUSHING, of Massachusetts.) But to the issuing them without interest, or with a very small interest, for which I repeat my decided preference, another difficulty has been presented by my friend from Virginia near me, (Mr. ROBERTSON.) He maintained that as the constitution forbids any thing but gold and silver to be made a legal tender by the States, it implicitly requires that we should pay the debts of this Government only in specie or in what is equivalent to it. And yet, in almost the same breath, the gentleman proceeded to denounce the Executive for not being satisfied with the bank notes of the States, which he maintained are really not all depreciated. Sir, on this last head I agree with him entirely, at least so far as regards the state of our paper currency in the Southern States. I maintained when I first came here, what has been since demonstrated in a masterly argument in another part of this building,* and is strikingly corroborated by the recent fall in exchanges, that the price of bullion had been raised by an extraordinary foreign demand, and was no proof whatever of the redundancy of the circulation, which has been very much reduced within the last ten months, and is probably even inadequate to the necessary exchanges of the country, in the usual course of business. But if this is true, as I have no doubt it is, then the right of a creditor under the constitution to demand specie for his debt, becomes that summum jus which, all the world over, is summa injuria. And if this is the case as between individuals, why should a rule so very different be applied to the transactions of Government? Nay, the news brought us from New York this morning is that, while gold is only at 5 per cent. premium, Treasury drafts are at 4: for you must remark, sir, that the letter of Prime, Ward & Co., received just now, is dated at least a fortnight ago, and since that time a most decided change has taken place in the specie market as well as in foreign bills. I think, then, I am perfectly safe in affirming that there is no danger whatever of the contemplated Treasury notes falling below what, by the confession of the gentleman himself, ought to satisfy any man not bent upon enforcing a contract according to the utmost rigor of the law, in a manner inconsistent with equity and good conscience. We shall pay our creditors in what is 4 per cent. above those bank notes which are there acknowledged to be at their full value in reference to all other commodities but gold and silver.

Treasury Notes.

[Here Mr. ROBERTSON said nothing was at par, which was not equivalent to gold and silver, or something to that effect.]

Mr. LEGARE. Then why find so much fault with the Government for demanding gold and silver of its debtors? The gentleman is plainly in a dilemma, from which it is not easy for him to extricate himself.

[Mr. ROBERTSON said, with the permission of the gentleman from South Carolina, he would make a brief explanation. He had not at all discussed the question of depreciation. He could not admit, however, that paper money was not depreciated. On the contrary, he insisted that it must always be regarded, in a legal sense, as depreciated when below the legal standard—gold and silver, without regard to the causes, whether it be a foreign demand or any other, which may have occasioned the difference. Still he denied the policy or justice of exacting gold and silver at this time in payment of the public dues; when it could not be procured but at a high premium, and when, indeed, there was scarcely any currency at the command of the people than depreciated paper. He thought it was oppressive in this Government to exact this sacrifice—to reject that which the State Governments were content to receive; and what, in the ordinary transactions between man and man, it would be deemed immoral and dishonorable to refuse.]

Sir, I am charmed to hear the gentleman say so. Then why should the public creditor call upon the Government to do, for his benefit, an immoral and dishonorable thing; and why should he think himself wronged if we offer him what is at this moment four per cent. better than the paper which, according to the gentleman's own showing, ought to satisfy every equitable and conscientious man? But the truth is, I apprehend no difficulty at all from those to whom we shall have payments to make, and through whose hands these notes will, almost without exception, make their way into circulation. They will receive them cheerfully, and without hesitation; and although I perfectly appreciate the delicate and honorable scruples which some gentlemen seem to feel about offering, in satisfaction of the public dues, a paper ever so little inferior to the only legal tender recognized in the constitution, yet I cannot myself, in a matter left, after all, entirely to the free will of the party, consent to sacrifice substantial justice and the public good to what I must consider as a superstitious adherence to the mere letter of the law. Nobody, at all versed in these subjects, now regards the precious metals as any thing but an approximation, and often a very imperfect approximation, to a correct measure of value. They have been adopted from the necessity of the thing, as the two great "commodities of commerce" furnishing a ready medium of exchange for all others, and, on the whole, the best practical means of comparing them; but they are still, like the rest, mere commodities, subject to a very great fluctuation in value, according to the common principles which govern prices. The present state of things furnishes, in my opinion, a striking example of this important truth; and now, I ask, whether any really just man ought to complain of us if we offer him these notes, with the most perfect liberty to refuse them at his own discretion, and treat us as debtors on his unsettled account; if, in making that offer, we hold to him the frank, manly, and reasonable language dictated to us by the truth of the case, and the actual situation of the country—if we say to him "gold and silver, which is in strict law, though not in good conscience, your due, we have none? By an unforeseen and terrible revulsion, by contingencies beyond any human control, our debtors have been, and are still, unable to meet their engagements with us in the usual way. The country is in deep embarrassment and distress, and we cannot, even were we disposed to do so, press them to a literal compliance with their contracts, without involving our whole people, more or less, in the fearful consequences of the bankruptcy that would probably ensue. We give you, however, an acknowledgment of your claims against us, which will be everywhere nearly as good, in some parts of the country probably better, than the precious metals—which, at all events, is at a premium in reference to what you would not hesitate to receive from a private debtor; and we put it to your patriotism and your sense of justice, to decide whether we have not, to all substantial purposes, complied with our engagements." Sir, depend upon it, such an appeal to the good sense and the generosity of our fellow-citizens will not be made in vain.

The right of the Government, therefore, in every aspect of the case, being, as I conceive, fully established, the only remaining question is, in what form will these notes be most beneficial to the public? Whether it is better to issue them bearing an interest of not more than 6 per cent., or bearing either no interest at all, or a very small one, to be ascertained by the House? And this brings me to the differences between me and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or, to express it more accurately, perhaps, between the Senate and the committee of this House. Sir, I admit that these notes, at a higher rate of interest than I approve, would serve an excellent purpose as remittances to Europe; but exchanges, as we have seen, are already fallen nearly 50 per cent. within a very few days, and there is every reason to believe that as soon as the coming crop shall be brought to market, they will be down at par. But the prospect of an improvement in our domestic exchanges is unfortunately not so good. An immense debt is due from the West and the South-west to the great commercial capitals on the Atlantic, to the payment of which, notes bearing a high rate of interest will contribute no aid whatever. They will, you may rely upon it, sir, be instantly bought up by capitalists for investment. They will disappear entirely, as gold and silver have disappeared. In consequence of the shock given to all credit by the late revulsion, there are immense deposits in all your banks waiting for some safe opportunity to lay them out on any reasonable terms. The answers made to the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury have no weight at all with me, not only because, as I said just now, a very material change has occurred in the price of bullion since that date, but for several other reasons which need not be dwelt upon here. These notes are not intended to go into the market at all. My idea of the proper use to be made of them is, that they shall be passed away, as I have said, to the functionaries and creditors of the Government. I repeat, that I have no doubt that they will be readily accepted by them, and that the extravagant rates of exchange between the different parts of the country, will keep them up at a considerable premium in respect of the best bank paper, and nearly, if not quite, at a par with gold and silver.

Mr. CUSHING followed, in reply to Mr. LE GARE. He quoted Judges Story, Marshall, and other authorities, to show that Treasury notes were bills of credit.

Mr. FOSTER replied, arguing that Treasury notes, to become bills of credit, must be issued as a circulating medium. He denied that a high or low rate of interest altered the case.

Mr. CAMBRELENG pressed for action on the bill, and referred to pledges given by gentlemen of the opposition that a vote should be had this night.

Mr. WISE replied, admitting that he had given such a pledge, but for himself only.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON obtained the floor, and addressed the House in a speech of great animation till late in the evening.

Mr. PHILLIPS read to the House, from a document recently received, and not yet generally distributed, in reply to a call for the correspondence of the Treasury with various individuals, touching the terms of their reception of Treasury notes for specie; and in which many commercial capitalists declined altogether having any thing to do with such a transaction.

Mr. RHETT moved an amendment, the effect of which would be, if agreed to, to make the bills payable "upon presentation," after the expiration of one year from date, and to divest them of the character of interest-bearing notes.

SATURDAY, October 7.

Treasury Note Bill.

The House resumed the consideration of the "bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

The question being on an amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. RHETT—

Mr. RHETT modified his amendment so as to declare that the faith of the United States was pledged for the payment of the notes, on presentation, at six months after their dates, respectively.

Mr. BELL said: I concur most heartily with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS,) the other day, in speaking of the new Treasury schemes which have been recommended for our consideration. I do heartily and truly believe that the destiny of this country, for good or for evil, will depend greatly upon the decision of the questions which they present. The mind fails in an effort to grasp the whole of this important subject; no powers are adequate to do full justice to the great issues which are involved. The argument embraces in its range the fate of the federal constitution, of free Government itself! Of all the causes which in modern times have deeply excited, agitated, and convulsed a people, but few had a more certain, rapid, and fearful tendency to engender a spirit of opposition to the laws and to revolution, than a debased and disordered currency. I need not refer to the examples which past history affords of this nature. I will not even revert to the deep feeling, the intense excitement, which manifested themselves in our large cities, at a recent date, in connection with this subject; but I will say, that such instances of popular excitement, upon such occasions, ought never to be lost sight of by the statesmen of this country, nor will they be either tauntingly referred to, or slightly regarded by any man who has any just claim to the rank and character of one. What I fear upon this subject is, that we have only arrived at the first stage of this disorder—that greater embarrassments, and yet wider spread mischiefs, await us in the progress of it; that the state of the currency is yet to become a subject of deeper and more permanent discontent; that the blindness of party prejudice, the obstinacy of party interest, and the infatuation of power, will defeat every prudent remedy, and bring on a crisis of open resistance to the laws, and leave the institutions of the country, both local and general, a prey to anarchy. This, sir, is my fear; and I regard this bill as one of the forerunners of a train of measures, on the part of the Government, which are well calculated to lead to this last and most fatal calamity which can befall a country. Mr. Speaker, I warn gentlemen that, if this administration shall be so infatuated as to persevere for any length of time in the policy of requiring the public revenue to be collected in gold and silver, and disbursed among the officeholders, contractors, and others, dependent upon the Government, while the only money in use among the people is bank paper, or any other paper of less value than gold and silver—if the distinction shall be attempted to be kept up much longer between the Government and the people—gold and silver for the Government and its trains of officials, and a depreciated paper for the people, resistance must and will come. It is not in the blood of the race of freemen which inhabit this free country to submit long and tamely to so unjust, exacting, and oppressive a course of policy. And let it be borne in mind by every member in this House, who shall record his vote in favor of this bill, that he thereby sanctions this arbitrary and unjust policy of the administration, and draws the line between the Government and the people! Pass this bill, and the Government is put above and made independent of the people; those in power will have the means of carrying out their policy in defiance of the popular will, at least until the people shall again have the privilege of interposing through the elective right. I have seen it stated, that this objection, that any distinction is made by the present course of things between the Government and the people, has been refuted, if not in this House, in another place; but, sir, I have not seen or heard the argument by which it was done, nor do I believe it to be in the power of argument to do any such thing. Again, sir, whoever gives his support to this bill, endorses and becomes responsible for the present course and future policy of this administration, in relation to the currency, and every other interest connected with it. And let no one delude himself with the idea that there is nothing to be apprehended from the men in power, however mischievous or wicked their designs. Let us not underrate the genius and ability of those who possess the guiding influence over our public affairs at the present juncture. They are profoundly versed in the knowledge of men and of the motives to human action. They are also distinguished for great caution, secrecy, and skill in effecting their purposes. They possess another great advantage over most men who have attained their influence and station in Government and society. They are for the most part entirely reckless of all consequences, except such as relate to themselves, and affect their interests. Such persons—such advantages, are not to be slightly regarded by those who desire to restore the country to quiet and prosperity. Can we who sit here any longer doubt the skill of the administration in carrying their measures? Have the opposition yet succeeded—is there any probability that they will succeed, in effecting a single modification of any one measure of all those which were no doubt prepared before we sat out from our homes, which have been submitted to us merely, as it would seem, that we might confirm by our votes what long since had been resolved upon and fixed by the Executive Department of the Government? No facts, however stubborn or important—no reasoning, however conclusive and unanswerable—have the least effect; the measures must, and, it seems, will be carried. Although, sir, I am not in the habit of relying upon rumors which I hear out of doors, yet I have heard it stated from such respectable sources this morning, that the Secretary of the Treasury has had such entire confidence in the success of every measure proposed at the opening of the session, and, among others, the bill now under discussion, that the plates for printing the notes have already been engraved, and perhaps the notes actually struck off. If I do any injustice to the Secretary, I will openly acknowledge it the moment the statement shall be denied upon his authority. But, sir, if this be the fact, how idle, how absurd, are all our discussions here? Every thing is fixed and settled by an influence and power beyond our control. My honorable friend from Kentucky (Mr. UNDERWOOD) was not aware of the ground upon which he was treading last evening, in proposing his amendment, and in what a dilemma he would have placed the Secretary of the Treasury if he had carried it.

But, whatever may be the destiny of this bill, I will not forbear to show that it is founded upon a pretext which is utterly unfounded. Sir, there is no deficit in the Treasury which it has not been the policy of the administration to produce—which they have not designedly created, and which they cannot amply supply without the aid of this bill. I say, sir, that there is no evidence before us, or before the public, that there is, or is likely to be, any deficiency of means in the Treasury to meet all the demands upon it during the remaining quarter of the year, except this bill; by which it seems that ten millions of dollars are required by the administration for the public service. Every other circumstance in the conduct of the administration indicates an overflowing Treasury. At the very moment, and during the entire period, within which it might be supposed this alleged deficiency of means in the Treasury would be felt or apprehended, what has been the uniform course of the administration? One of uniform extravagance and profusion, as far as the expenditures of the public moneys are concerned. Need I refer to the evidence furnished by the report of the Chief of the Engineer Department, which has been laid upon our table, that special instructions had been issued last spring that the moneys appropriated should be expended as speedily as possible? Need I recapitulate the facts, that four millions of dollars asked at the last session for the support of the Florida war, are stated to have been already exhausted, and one million and a half more are demanded, and yet the campaign has not opened; that, judging from the accounts which we see in the public papers, and from rumors, seven or eight thousand troops are about being collected to oppose some fifteen hundred hostile Indians and negroes? Does this look like an exhausted Treasury? But we need not go so far for proofs of the true condition of the Treasury. Look around you, sir, and reflect upon the scenes that are passing before our eyes almost every day. How many delegations from far distant tribes of Indians have we seen during this short session, decked out in all the extravagant and fantastic trappings of savage pomp and vanity, come, sir, for the purpose, and according to a now well-established system of policy, of supplying the deficits which have lately been felt in the coffers of some favorite officeholders, jobbers, or agents of some kind, which swarm upon your north-western frontier? We know, sir, that this has been regarded as a great abuse for the last ten years, yet we see it daily increasing. So imposing and pompous an exhibition of bands of savages from our Western frontier, I believe has never before been witnessed in this city, as during the present short session. We have regular and formal bulletins announcing their movements in all the daily papers of the city; and thousands of the resident and visiting population are frequently entertained by public councils held with them by the Secretary of War, in some of the public buildings in the Court end of the city. It is even left doubtful, whether the interest got up by these exhibitions has not surpassed, for the time, that inspired by the proceedings of Congress, weighty and important as the matters are which brought us together.

But, sir, there is a much better way yet of supplying any possible deficiency of means in the Treasury, and at the same time of relieving the people as well as the Government. I have said there is no deficit in the Treasury but such a one as the administration, in the exercise of their discretion, and to further their schemes of future policy, had created. I have already shown that, by continuing the practice of drawing upon the deposit banks, as heretofore, the deficit vanishes; but, say the friends of the administration, we want to supply a medium of exchange; we wish to put into circulation a species of paper in the shape of Treasury notes, which will be a relief to the country just at this time. My remedy for any real or pretended deficit in the Treasury, and the one which is certainly called for by the suffering condition of the country, is to compel the Government to recognize and accredit the only circulating medium which has any existence in the country, by receiving and disbursing the public revenue in it. And the most surprising feature in the history of the times, is that a whole people would so long submit without tumult and open violation of the order of the Executive requiring all dues to the Government to be collected in gold and silver. Gold and silver no longer circulate—they are only to be acquired by purchase and by paying a price regulated like any other article of property, by the proportion between the supply and the demand. They are articles bought and sold just like any other commodity of trade, and have, moreover, been rendered scarce and high by the great demand which has existed to pay foreign debts, and by being hoarded in banks and by individuals. An example of equal daring, on the part of the administration of a Government, does not exist on record. The most arbitrary and despotic monarch that ever sat upon a throne, would not have dared to issue such an edict as went forth from the Executive of this Government after the deposit banks suspended specie payment; nor would the power of any such tyrant have been safe under such an experiment. It is only in a Government at least nominally free, and claiming to act in the name of the people, that such a measure could be sustained at all; and, but for the interests of party, which have for some years been paramount to every other in this country, even in this free government the administration would have been compelled to have convoked Congress, or to have permitted the public taxes to be paid in the circulating medium of the country within one month from the commencement of a different experiment. The present bill proposes to sustain this gross outrage upon the people; the attempt to collect a revenue of twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars, not in the circulating medium of the country, which the Government rejects and spurns, but in an article of traffic, in a species of property which must be bought at any sacrifice, and when it is collected is to be poured into the lap of a favorite and preferred class. No other Government could stand under such an experiment sixty days. I call upon the House, by rejecting this bill, to compel the administration to abandon this unjust, and before unheard-of policy.

Mr. BRONSON said: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debates on this bill, and given them all due attention; and the various objections which have been raised in the progress of this discussion against an issue of Treasury notes, have received from me attentive consideration.

I was in favor of the project from the first, if the state of the Treasury was such as to warrant it, and I have heard nothing yet which to my mind is a sufficient objection against it. Let us look for a moment to the ground which we occupy in relation to this matter, and the point at which we have arrived in this discussion.

Is it not, sir, a conceded point that the Treasury is nearly or quite exhausted—that in a short time it will be necessary to raise money, either by loan or otherwise, unless the unavailable funds now in hand can be realized? I shall not here go into a review of the financial condition of the country, or the state of the Treasury, as exhibited by the Secretary's report, or the various explanations of that report, which have been made on this floor. I assume the position that there is no money in the Treasury, or that such will be the case very shortly—and that money is needed to carry on the operations of the Government. We are told so by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The whole of this debate has proceeded upon that supposition; and with the exception of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) and perhaps one or two others, such has been allowed to be the true state of the Treasury by all who have addressed the House on this subject. There can be no question that such is the fact, and the point that is now presented is simply, in what manner shall we replenish the Treasury; I say merely the Treasury, and not an exhausted or bankrupt Treasury; for, sir, we have ample resources, as soon as they can be realized, without resorting to taxes or duties. It is only necessary to resort to some temporary expedient to enable the Government to go on and to furnish the Treasury with the necessary means, until the debts due to the Government, and the ample but at present unavailable means which we have, can be realized without unnecessary distress or pressure upon the people.

You have now, sir, upon your table, a bill postponing the payment of duty bonds nine months, and another, allowing time to the deposit banks to pay the balances due from them, neither of which are yet acted upon in this House, but both of which, so far as any opinion has been elicited, meet with universal favor. In fact, sir, I doubt whether there is a member on this floor who is not prepared to support both of those measures; and gentlemen opposed to the administration and to this bill, are supposed to be particularly favorable to those. Can gentlemen of the opposition, then, fail to see the effect that the defeat of this bill must have upon those measures? Are they sincere in desiring a delay upon the duty bonds, and the allowance of further time to the deposit banks, and yet oppose this measure, which if defeated must necessarily result in the defeat of both those bills? Are they willing to assume the responsibility of denying any extension to the banks, or on the duty bonds, which must be the inevitable consequence of refusing to pass this bill? I apprehend, sir, that gentlemen have not duly weighed these considerations, and yet it would seem impossible that they can have overlooked the fact that, by exacting immediate payment of the duty bonds and bank balances, not only the security or safety of the debts might be endangered, but that increased pressure and distress must be felt through all the ramifications of society; and yet, sir, how can that result be avoided if this bill is defeated?

But, sir, another and more weighty objection is now urged to this bill. After it had been debated nearly two days, it was suddenly discovered to be an enemy in disguise; a scheme fraught with all sorts of mischief to the country and danger to our institutions; in short, an incipient step towards a Treasury bank, as an entering wedge towards a permanent national paper currency. The changes have been rung upon these words in all forms and shapes, until the ear is weary of the repetition; and like the old United States Bank, which the gentleman from Massachusetts insisted had become a kind of "stalking horse" in this House, sir, this idea of a "Treasury Bank" "a Government paper currency" has become a kind of "stalking horse" to this bill, which is led in upon this floor by every speaker of the opposition, to frighten members out of their votes in favor of this measure. Now, sir, I am as much opposed to a Treasury bank as any of the gentlemen who oppose this bill; and I would go as far in opposing any measure which would be an incipient step towards such an institution, or towards the establishment of an irredeemable Government paper currency, as the most patriotic of them; but, after a very candid examination of the subject in all its bearings, and after a careful perusal of the bill, I cannot discover the lurking dangers with which other gentlemen seem to think it is fraught. I am not able to perceive any foundation for a Treasury bank or for a permanent Government paper currency lurking about the bill, or incident to it. It is, sir, a very plain, intelligible bill, just what it purports to be on the face of it, and meaning nothing more than is expressed; a mere temporary expedient, to enable the Treasury, by an issue of Treasury notes to a limited amount, to fulfil its obligations; thus anticipating the moneys due to the Government, and at the same time to do it without laying any taxes or new duties. The issue of Treasury notes is confined to ten millions, beyond which amount no issue can be made; and, to make assurance doubly sure, I will myself propose the amendment offered in Committee of the Whole, by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. JOHNSON,) limiting the time within which these notes shall be issued to the first of June, 1839, or some other shorter time, so as to throw around the bill all those safeguards necessary to render it, as it is intended to be, and as it purports to be on the face of it, a measure merely temporary. By the passage of this bill, we shall, sir, be able to extend all reasonable indulgence to the Government debtors, at a time when it is not only the interest but the duty of the Government to do so; we shall furnish a temporary circulation which may and will be used, not only as a remittance to Europe, but between the different parts of the Union; which will have a tendency to equalize exchanges, retain our specie from foreign exportation, restore commercial confidence, and in every way relieve the country, without injury to the Government or danger to our institutions. I say without danger to our institutions; for, really, sir, I cannot see the least shadow of foundation for the apprehensions of gentlemen on that point. This is a measure which has before been adopted by this Government, and without any objection as to its constitutionality. It is no new experiment, sir; no trifling with the supposed powers given us by the constitution; but the judicious exercise of those powers clearly granted, and an exercise sanctioned as well by authority of a former Congress, as by sound discretion and a just regard for a suffering country.

Mr. HALSTED entered into an argument to prove that Treasury notes were bills of credit, and therefore not warranted by the constitution. He quoted the Message of General Jackson in 1836, Judge Marshall, and various decisions of the Supreme Court, in support of his position. He was, therefore, unwilling to give to the administration the power of issuing Treasury notes, as they evidently had no right so to do.

He contended that the language of the Secretary, and the bill itself, indicated that the notes were intended to form a constituent part of the currency, which of itself was a sufficient objection. He also opposed the bill on the ground that it provided no fund for the redemption of such notes, and quoted authorities to show that Government debts should never be incurred without some specific means being appropriated for their liquidation. It was likewise his opinion that the issue of Treasury notes would prevent the banks resuming specie payment. He could not vote for the bill, because it would lay the foundation of a Treasury bank, and add to the Executive power, so as to enable him to buy up the liberties of the people.

[A great number of amendments were then offered to the bill, and successively rejected; when—]

TUESDAY, October 10.

The Sub-Treasury Bill.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH, of Maine, in the chair.)

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, the Senate bill, for imposing additional duties as depositaries, in certain cases, on public officers, was taken up.

Mr. PICKENS said: Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to trespass upon the attention of this committee, by discussing minutely those abstruse questions connected with currency and trade. I too well understand the sagacity of this committee, and its profound common sense, to detain them long upon those subjects. I know well, sir, that for a man to discourse here upon currency, trade, and commerce, at least if he expects to command the attention of this body, he must have a high character for experience, and be blessed also with a good old age. Yes, if he expects to entertain this House upon those abstruse questions, he must first put on the "powdered wig" and "fair top-boots," and place himself on the "tripod," and talk about trade and commerce beyond the waters, and in another hemisphere, thirty or forty years ago. Such a man would be listened to as a sage, particularly if he stepped forth as the advocate of some peculiar theory, or if he ascribed the prevailing embarrassments to some foreign or remote cause, or declared them to be owing to causes beyond our control; to something that operated deeply upon the community, which they could neither foresee nor avert! If one were to proclaim the doctrine that our suffering and ruin have sprung from over-speculation, over-trading, or extravagance, or a combination of them all; or if he were to say that many a man had been brought to bankruptcy and poverty by dashing forth in a coach and four, with splendid damask curtains, Brussels carpets, and broad mirrors, upon a capital in reality of but three hundred dollars, with a credit of thirty thousand dollars, he would advance such sentiments but to call down upon his head the denunciations of the wise in this enlightened age for his folly and his madness! But while I am not disposed minutely to touch these intricate points, I cannot altogether overlook them without a passing notice.

The immediate causes, sir, of our distress arise from that peculiar system of credit and currency which has, for the last five years, been enlarged so extensively both in England and in this country. In England, during the year 1836 alone, no less than two hundred joint-stock banks were created; the influence of which was deeply felt, first in that country, and then in this. Vast facilities were extended to our capitalists, while, also, they received an extension of the credit system here, connected with a peculiar juncture in our affairs during the same period. The Bank of the United States was about to wind up, or was supposed to be about to wind up, its concerns. For twenty years had that institution held a control over the currency and exchanges of the country, and hundreds, I might almost say thousands, of other institutions were created in order to supply the demand in the circulating medium which, it was supposed, would ensue upon the decease of that bank. We all know too, (I refer to these things as matters of history,) that a war at that time was carried on against that institution; and that, for the purpose of creating counter interests in society, the deposits of this Government were placed in local institutions; and that these latter, after being made the fiscal agents of this Government, with an immense surplus, were expressly encouraged, nay more, enjoined, to enlarge their circulation. This, connected with the extended credit system in Great Britain, and the long peace which had engendered confidence, producing large investments of foreign capital in our stocks, had the effect of expanding our local currency and credits, and produced a gigantic system of speculation and enterprise never witnessed in any age or country before. I do not allude to the increased amount of mere issues alone; but the bills, checks, and other substitutes for money which these banks brought into circulation. This produced a bloated system of credit, which, with the apparent prosperity of the times, seemed to expand and place unbounded means within the grasp of almost every individual member of society. He seemed to breathe a new atmosphere, and gaze alone upon the splendid fortune that glittered before his excited imagination.

This system has one remarkably peculiar feature. It grows up, is fostered and nourished under free institutions. But there is another remarkable principle in it, that, after it has spread itself into all the ramifications of society, then, sir, those who depend upon it, and are deeply identified with it, (although at first springing up under free institutions,) soon become disposed to lean, for aid and support, upon any Government, no matter how despotic, rather than run the risk of a shock by reform or revolution.

The slightest irregular movement of the Government must necessarily produce an electric shock in this delicate and vital credit system, which would be felt, and extend from the centre to the circumference of all society. It can only live under a free Government, as far removed from it as possible; and, if it be once brought into contact with a lawless Government, it must either fall all together, or lean upon that Government for protection and support, and become intimately identified with it. Now I am about to refer to something which belongs to the history of this question, and which has happened within the last four or five years. To my mind, it is an example not to be disregarded, but presents a lesson of profound wisdom, which no one can reflect upon without profit. The war made upon the Bank of the United States, and the seizure of the public deposits—a seizure without law—caused local institutions to spring up like mushrooms, under the fostering care of an all-powerful hand here, dispensing distinction and patronage and wealth, until all society became, as it were, dependent upon his will and movements. Let no man be induced to create the same state of things again, when a bold and daring genius may be tempted to run the same career, and bring the property and honest industry of the country under the will and mercy of him who may give life and soul to this Federal Government.

This conflict produced a tremendous shock, and even the banking system itself, the local institutions, created for the express purpose of sustaining the warfare against that overshadowing central institution, have been paralyzed, for a time at least, under its desolating effects. And here I will say, that though I ever believed in the unconstitutionality of that institution, yet those who made war upon it never could have succeeded without raising up powerful local antagonist interests. The effect of that war was felt from one end of the country to the other, and the consequence was, that sagacious capitalists in stocks, ready for any result, began to look elsewhere for safe investments; and hence it was that we find such extensive investments in real estate, to the amount of forty millions of dollars, in two years alone, in the public lands, besides upwards of one hundred millions in other real estate speculations, such as town and village property, &c. This conflict against credit, deeply affecting currency, was anticipated by capitalists, who preferred risking the loss of something in the high prices of real estate, to a probable loss of all. It was at least investing in something beyond total destruction from an arbitrary Government.

Sir, when this change began, and the capitalists began to contract their credit, the banking institutions of the country also felt it incumbent upon them to contract too. And what was the result? Why, the result was exactly what we now experience.

Approaching this juncture, viz. in 1836, the deposit act was passed, to be carried into effect in 1837. I was a supporter of that law, sir, but I understood it at that time, as I now understand it to be, in the nature of a bill for general account and settlement with those institutions which had, up to that time, leaned upon, and been sustained by, the credit and fiscal action of this Government. They were therefore compelled by that distribution or deposit act, and particularly in the peculiar manner in which it was executed, to come to a general account. Their paper was necessarily compelled to be "convertible" paper, or they themselves compelled to suspend specie payments. This circumstance, connected with our immense foreign debt, and the demand thereby produced for specie, or its representative, abroad, brought about this result; that is, brought us to the present condition of the country, under a general suspension of specie payments by the banks.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will say here that the great and radical difficulty, and, in fact, the primary cause, that produced the present state of things, arises from the peculiar currency, which, in modern times, has so much extended itself in Great Britain and in this country, and its peculiar capacity for expansion and contraction, in the hands and under the control of banks and bankers; and particularly from the fact, that there, as here, the system has depended upon and been so deeply identified with Government, and its financial action, for support and extensive credit. This is the real and radical cause which has produced this great shock in our modern banking and credit system.

Sir, under this suspension of specie payments the Government is found in a peculiar situation. Under the law of 1816 it can receive, in payment of its dues, nothing but gold and silver, or convertible paper, or notes of the then Bank of the United States; the latter clause became, however, practically repealed when these institutions suspended specie payments, thereby making their paper inconvertible. Then there was, in fact, under the provisions of the law, an immediate separation of the Government from the banking institutions of the country. Under the law, the Government could not take inconvertible paper, and convertible paper did not exist from one end of the country to the other, with the honorable exception, perhaps, of one or two banks in the State of Georgia, and a single small institution in the State of Ohio. And now, sir, the great question presented to this committee is, not whether you will separate the banks from the Government, because that is already done, but the great question is, whether and how we shall reunite the Government and the banks. Under this view of the case, we have three alternatives presented to us:

The first is, to reunite ourselves, or rather the Government, with the State institutions, in the manner in which they have been connected for the last three or four years.

The second is, the proposition creating a Bank of the United States, a national institution to conduct the fiscal operations of this Government, and regulate the exchanges and currency of the country.

The third is, the proposition on your table, sir, to separate the Government and its agents from all banks whatever.

Now, sir, as to the first proposition: if we do not separate the Government from the banks in this peculiar juncture of our affairs, we never can separate them. The system will be fixed upon us forever, and we compelled to run the same round we have done for the last three or four years in periodical terms, and then be in the same, or worse condition—distracted and embarrassed from one end of the country to the other.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard a great deal as to the comparison between the State bank system, as it is called, and the peculiar policy of separating the Government and its agents from all banks whatever. I have heard too much declamation and no little denunciation of that system, that it is the most outrageous proposition ever presented to the American people; that it is, in fact, a Treasury bank. Yes, sir, I have heard much declamation upon that subject, both here and elsewhere, (better suited to newspaper politics than grave legislation,) but I confess to you that that declamation only reminds me very strongly of the description of a certain grandiloquent class of poets which a profound and polished ancient critic describes as swelling—

*"Inceptis gravibus plerumque et magna professis, Purpureus, late qui splendeat, unus et alter
Assutur pannus."*

It is not pretended that this system is perfect, because you cannot present any system to the people that is so. All questions upon which a practical legislator is called to act, involve more or less a comparison of evils, and we must not adopt any measure as perfect, but as embracing the lesser evil. We must go on to perfect details after the establishment of great and vital principles. It is neither pretended, sir, that this bill involves no patronage: it certainly does to a degree. But the question is, whether this system, or that of employing the local banks as fiscal agents of the Government, contains or involves the most patronage? Now, upon that point, permit me here to say that I feel myself committed, from a deep and an anxious reflection upon the question heretofore. The question is between the power and influence of an individual, and the power and influence of an incorporated bank. To tell me that a bank which chooses to go into the politics of the country, with its power to extend discounts and accommodations to its friends, and refuse them to its enemies, has no more influence than an individual, is to tell me what is contradicted by the daily experience of every man; even if that individual have millions of the public money in his possession for safe-keeping. Sir, the one system winds and spreads itself into all the secret and business recesses of society. Hundreds and thousands of honorable and high-minded men have been brought to degradation and sycophancy by this tremendous and almost invisible power. I have seen them around their domestic firesides, with every thing apparently to bless and gladden the heart of man, full of sadness and gloom; while even those who were the confiding and devoted partners of their joys and their sorrows, were in doubt and ignorance as to the causes of melancholy and dejection.

Sir, this system is as hidden as the air we breathe, and penetrates unseen, but, alas! not unfelt, into the most retired scenes of society. No man can tell upon what power he is depending when he looks for support, aid, and assistance from this system. No man can tell what the situation of his neighbor may be—what his obligations—his alliances and contracts, that swerve him from the path of independence and rectitude. Then how can you say that such a system as this, allied to, and dependent upon Government, has less patronage than that which makes an individual responsible for whatever public funds he may have in his custody, without the power of loaning, without the power of discounting, without the power of accommodating a friend, or refusing an enemy, unless he chooses openly to incur the odium and penalty of crime and misdemeanor? It does seem to me that the question admits of no argument so far as the question of patronage is concerned.

But I have said, sir, that I felt myself somewhat committed on this subject. In 1835, a friend of mine from Virginia, (Mr. Gordon,) now not a member of this House, (and I will here take occasion to say of him, that he is a gentleman who would have done honor to Virginia in her proudest days of glory and fame,) presented the very identical proposition to this House which is embraced in the bill on your table. For that proposition, sir, I then voted. I acted from reflection, and from a conscientious conviction of the effects of that measure to bring about honesty in the Government, and secure the independence of the people. True, I was then but a very young man, and had but for a few weeks taken my seat in this House; yet, sir, I had made up my opinion from observation and reflection. And although young, yet, to use the language applied to another, I was old enough—

"Acta parentum jam legere, et quæ sit poterit cognoscere virtus."

Sir, I had formed my judgment then, and have not yielded it since. On the contrary, the experience between then and now has only tended to confirm my conviction.

I desire the Clerk to read the proposition and the vote upon it.

"The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. Gordon, to amend the said bill, to strike out all thereof after the enacting words, and insert:

"That, from and after the — day of —, in the year —, the collectors of the public revenue, at places where the sums collected shall not exceed the sum of — dollars per annum, shall be the agents of the Treasurer to keep and disburse the same, and be subject to such rules and regulations, and give such bond and security as he shall prescribe for the faithful execution of their office; and shall receive, in addition to the compensation now allowed by law, — per centum on the sums disbursed; so that it does not exceed the sum of — dollars per annum.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, at all places where the amount of public revenue collected shall exceed the sum of — dollars per annum, there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, receivers of the public revenue, to be agents of the Treasurer, who shall give such bond and security to keep and disburse the public revenue, and be subject to such rules and regulations as the Treasurer shall prescribe, and shall receive for their services — per centum per annum on the sum disbursed: provided it does not exceed the sum of — dollars per annum.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the — day of —, the whole revenue of the United States, derived from customs of lands or other sources, shall be paid in the current coins of the United States."

This received 33 votes.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my desire, nor have I caused the vote upon that proposition to be read, to show the consistency or inconsistency of any honorable member of this body. My sole and entire object was to prove that the present bill was no new proposition, and that, as far as I am concerned, it is the very identical proposition upon which I then voted coolly and deliberately. I have no desire, sir, to show that there has been any contradiction on the part of any gentleman on this floor, or that there has been any change in their opinions. It is with neither of those views that I had the proposition read. I will now quote a paragraph from the speech of the mover of the proposition, made at the time, as illustrating the views under which we acted, and which too truly portrays what has really happened since, and what, I fear, we will again see, if the system be continued. Mr. Gordon said:

"There is another consideration which has induced me to offer this amendment. We may all very plainly see that the contest for the Executive office is the rock on which the permanency of this republic is likely to be wrecked. And the vehemence of this contest will ever be in proportion to the Executive patronage. But for this, the office would have no allurements but for virtuous ambition; but with this concomitant, it exerts an influence which may one day prove fatal to the federal part of our system. If we do not separate the influence of the Executive from the interest of banking corporations, we shall have another controversy on the subject of banks. The political will be united with the money power; the contest must come; it will come. You will witness a struggle in this Capitol between State banks and federal banks; and the combatants for the President's chair will be found contending in different ranks of interest and influence, whilst they mar the peace of the country, and shake the pillars of the constitution. Separate them, I beseech you, representatives of the American people, if you wish to put down this fearful contest for the Presidential chair—I had almost said Presidential throne—separate, I beseech you, banking and politics. Let the banks facilitate the exchanges of commerce, and further the interest of trade; but let them, I pray you, have nothing to do with the Government."

The predictions of my friend have been fulfilled to the letter. What have we seen? You brought into existence a system of State banks, connected from one end of this Confederacy to another, receiving, disbursing, and acting upon those deposits, organized and controlled by, and responsible to one man, and then brought into overwhelming conflict, as I believe, with the freedom of elections. Sir, I speak plainly. I believed then, and I now believe, that this was the true source of power for the last three years. Gentlemen may speak as they please; they may deny, and say they have never seen or felt it; but who is it that knows any thing of the operations of banks—who is it, at all acquainted with their peculiar influence, who is not irresistibly impressed with their tremendous power? Sir, I believe they did more than any thing else to elect the present President of the United States; and am I now to be called upon, and urged to re-organize such a system, and abandon the position I then assumed? The experience of the last three years strengthens my position. It may be denied, but I conscientiously believe that these institutions have controlled, more or less, not only the destinies of this Government, but the destinies of the people of this country during that period. Yes, we all know that at the last session of Congress enough was developed upon this floor to demonstrate that there was an organized system, acting through one man, giving energy to the whole, and for one and the same purpose. Yes, sir, we have seen this cordon of leagued banks, with their various interests, raising their banner from one end of the Union to the other, upon which was inscribed the infamous motto, "To the victors belong the spoils;" and calling upon their mercenary bands to gather in to the plunder of sacked cities and subjugated provinces.

WEDNESDAY, October 11.

Florida War.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WISE on the 19th of September:

"Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed by ballot to inquire into the course of the Florida war, and into the causes of the delays and failures, and the expenditures which have attended the prosecution of that war, and into the manner of its conduct, and the facts of its history generally; that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that it have power to sit in the recess, and that it make report to the next session of Congress."

Mr. GLASCOCK had moved to amend the resolution, by striking all out after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the cause of the Florida war, and the causes of the extraordinary delays and failure, and the expenditures which have attended the prosecution of the same, and all the facts connected with its history generally; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

The question immediately pending was the motion of Mr. HOWARD to strike out the words "that a Select Committee be appointed," and insert "that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed."

Mr. McKAY opposed the raising of this Select Committee, because the same subject was now under investigation in various ways. It had been referred to the President of the United States, who had caused an inquiry to be instituted, and had made a report in part, and he understood would probably report in full at the next session of Congress. Besides this, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs (Mr. BELL) had moved to have this subject referred to that committee, and after a lengthy, and no doubt arduous investigation, the papers had been reported back to the House without coming to any conclusion thereon. He presumed, however, that, at the commencement of the regular session, the chairman of that committee would move to have the subject again referred to that committee, and proceed with the investigation. He could not, therefore, see the necessity of raising this Select Committee, because it was before the President of the United States, who had appointed commissioners to investigate the matter, and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) had admitted that they had performed their duty faithfully, so far as they went, and laid before the House information which, to use his own expression, had made the blood tingle in his veins. They will doubtless lay the whole proceedings before the House at the next session of Congress. In relation to the causes of delays and failures of the campaigns, it will be recollected that an inquiry was instituted by the President at Frederick, at which all the officers engaged in the first campaign (Scott, Gaines, and Clinch) were fully examined, and the court came to the conclusion that the failures and delays of the campaigns were in consequence of the insalubrity of the climate, the impregnability of the swamps, and the absence of all knowledge of the topography of the country by the commanding generals, and the difficulty in transporting supplies for the army from one point to another. Here, then, at this tribunal, all the causes of the failures of the campaigns conducted by Generals Gaines and Scott were examined into; and it certainly could not be designed by the House to institute an inquiry in relation to the conduct of the present commander in Florida, (General Jesup,) at a time when he was just preparing and organizing his forces for another campaign. It would certainly be improper for the House to interfere with this campaign before there was an opportunity of doing any thing with it. It would be interfering with the legitimate duties of the Executive to send an investigating committee, with power to send for persons and papers, into Florida; and, by so doing, the whole of the benefits to be derived from the approaching campaign might be set aside. Mr. McK. next referred to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) who had stated that the probable causes of failures of the campaigns in Florida had arisen from the deficiency in the number of officers connected with the army in Florida. He admitted that there might be some justice in this remark, but said the subject had already attracted the attention of the President of the United States, and referred to an order issued as early as October last, directing all officers of the army on detached service to join their regiments and companies, in which order the President had said that this state of things must no longer exist. If any notice was to be taken of this matter, however, by this House, it was the legitimate business of the Committee on Military Affairs to take charge of it, and he hoped they would take the matter under consideration. In relation to the subject of expenditures, he admitted that they had been very large, amounting, he believed, to about seven millions: but he could see no necessity of appointing a select committee to take charge of this subject, when we have committees appointed under the rules whose special business it was to take charge of these subjects. He alluded to the Committees on the Expenditures of the Executive Departments, all of which committees he believed were composed of majorities opposed to the administration. The Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department should take this subject into consideration, and report upon it. Mr. McK. concluded by moving to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed the motion. If there was to be any investigation at all, it was as necessary and as practicable now as it could be ever. He hoped the committee would be at once appointed, and pursue the inquiries during the recess, so as to report, in whole, or in part, at the next session. He was opposed to the reference of investigations of alleged extraordinary abuses to standing committees, and replied to the remarks of Mr. HOWARD, of Maryland, who had made the pending motion to refer the subject under consideration to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS. The question is an entire new question. It is not now a question as to what committee it shall be referred to, but whether it shall now have the go-by altogether. The whole of the argument of the gentleman went to the point that it is unnecessary for this House to trouble itself at all about the matter, and would be just as strong an argument against the investigation in December as now. Mr. A. alluded again to the investigation made under the direction of Congress by the late Executive, and said that the horrible disclosures of that report convinced him still more strongly than ever of the necessity of the proposed inquiry. He replied to the suggestions of Mr. McKAY, with regard to the propositions of various committees, as the proper referees of the subject before the House. Among the rest, the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department had been recommended by that gentleman. Mr. A. reminded the House that the committees on expenditures were sinecures, without pay, and without duty also. A chairman of one of them (Mr. HAWES) had told the House that he had never called the committee together, and did not even know his colleagues! Mr. A. had intended to offer a resolution to rescind the rule requiring that those committees should be appointed.

Mr. A. replied, further, to the argument of Mr. McKAY, that the constitution of the Committee on Military Affairs was the same in previous administrations as now. That was no good reason why it should still continue to be so, Mr. A. contended.

In allusion to there being on this committee eight members from the South, and only one from the Northern section of the country, Mr. A. said that the reason must be that the people of the North had no interest in the subjects referable to it. As to the interest of all the New England States, as well as those of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, in the benefit that would result to them from the enormous expenditures of public money in the prosecution of the Florida campaigns, Mr. A. admitted it was very little indeed. But they had a very deep interest in the amount of those expenditures, at all events. Were the army disbanded to-morrow, it would be money in their pockets; and he looked upon this fact as another exemplification of that profound philosophical theory of his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON,) who had said that the money of this Government flowed naturally towards the North. Since he had made these remarks, that gentleman had published his speech, and he had now turned the globe half round. The stream now flowed to the East, and not the North. Well, sir, be it then "the East!"

Sub-Treasury Bill.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH, of Maine, being in the chair.)

Mr. PICKENS said that he considered himself bound, by the deep interest he felt in the sub-Treasury bill, to move that it be taken up at that time. The motion prevailed—yeas 105, nays 35.

Mr. HOFFMAN was opposed to the sub-Treasury bill, because it violated the constitution of the country—if not its plain and palpable literal language, its spirit, which is its life-blood, and which alone recommends it to the people of the nation. That spirit is the principle that the people shall govern themselves. The mode of choosing public officers, the appointment of those officers, duties, &c., are but the trappings of the constitution. But this principle, which is its spirit, enters into the labors of the artisan, and the researches of the scholar. It should be the atmosphere by which we should be sustained and strengthened, and from which we should receive buoyancy and vigor to perform the duties of good citizens and patriots.

The connection between the Government and the people of this Union, Mr. H. looked upon as a great partnership. There should be a common credit or discredit, a common honor or dishonor, a common interest in all things between them. The distress, if there be any, of the Government should be reflected upon the people. The arm of power should not be wielded over the governed, to be looked up to as paramount. The people should not, while struggling amidst discontent, embarrassment, and perplexity, be insulted by the spectacle of their Government walking free, unfettered, unembarrassed, and in prosperity.

Mr. H. remarked that it had been said that this was no new proposition; that England and France had furnished examples of similar schemes; and not long since (though perhaps not parliamentary to allude particularly to it on that floor) the great Mormon of this golden bible, (Mr. BENTON, of the Senate,) had instanced Rome also as furnishing a similar example. In reply to these allusions, Mr. H. adverted to the difference between the institutions of England and France and those of our own country, and asked, why not model our whole Government upon those examples? Why not establish the "divine right of kings" principle throughout; create a standing army, authorize a system of passports, and all the rest? And Rome, too; Rome had her questors, or public treasurers! Yes, (said Mr. H.,) she had; and they "grew by what they fed on." They followed the Roman eagles to conquest, and, in every situation, were ever the links between the worn-down people and the overbearing Government.

Mr. H. alluded to the provisions of the bill before the committee. The public money is to be given by the Executive to the different disbursing officers. Defalcation would ensue defalcation, as the consequence of this provision. Besides the direct pilfering and frauds of the officers who will have the charge of the public revenues, there would be the brawling sycophant, and the unscrupulous partisan, whose very bread would depend upon his subserviency to Executive dictation. He did not allude more to one administration than to another. This would ever be the case, were this bill to become a law. In case of an election depending in any State, or district, or town, there would be a call on the partisan officeholder's exertions. On one side would be his honesty, and on the other his office; and he would console himself, while making the sacrifice of the former to the latter, that the bread of his wife and children depended upon it. And who will call the defaulter in such a case to account? The Executive? This would never be; and, as to the Congress? That, too, was powerless. The proceedings of the last Congress, under similar circumstances to those described, afforded a sufficient proof that this was so.

Here Mr. H. alluded to the novel and monstrous doctrine which had been broached under the late administration, that every officer of the Government was accountable to the Executive alone; and he only to the impeaching power of Congress; and insisted that no people were ever strong enough to resist the union of the purse and sword of Government.

If the bill passes, he contended the money of the people would not be safe; it would be less safe than in banks, where the stockholders' interests require the selection of careful directors and officers, and where there were many hands, and not a single hand, to guard those interests. And to this point Mr. H. read from the Congressional Debates of 1835, an opinion of one who he wished could take a part in that debate, and sustain the views he had once expressed, and which he would now quote—views which he was confident the high regard for his opinions, entertained by the members of that House, would lead them to regard with great respect; he alluded to Mr. Speaker POLK, who, in the course of a debate in 1835, had said that “corporations were safer than any individual could be, as the depository of public moneys,” because corporations were bound together by the strongest ties of interest, with an immense aggregate of wealth, which furnished a safe security, &c.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, said: Mr. Speaker, I arise under the painful sense that I am asking almost too much of this committee, when I throw myself upon its indulgence whilst I express my views in relation to the subject before us. But our present position is highly responsible; the consequences of our action in the existing crisis may be lasting to the country, and I wish to be heard in vindication of the principles which will govern my course. We stand, sir, in the midst of a great commercial revolution; we have just witnessed an explosion in the credit system, through which the stream of capital circulates and dispenses its mighty agency to the country. Old channels have been abandoned, new ones are being formed; and now, sir, when every institution of the land is trembling under the shock, and our most important interests are sympathizing with the distress in the circulating system of the body politic, the eyes of the people are turned in anxious solicitude upon our course.

They have suffered with exemplary patience under calamities which would have goaded almost any other people to tumult and bloodshed; and they have even foreborne to speak forth their grievances, as if fearful that the clamor might disturb the presence of mind of those whose peculiar task it was to work the ship of state off the lee shore upon which it was driving—“Nec tumultus, nec quies,” but there is that state of deep and silent suspense which more forcibly than by words seems to say that, upon this occasion, “our country expects every man to do his duty.” I feel, sir, a most painful sense of the responsibility of my position. On the one hand, I know that he cannot be justified on the plea of ignorance, who lightly tampers with the important interests now concerned in our action; and, on the other, if personal or party considerations were to deter me from doing whatever may be done for the relief of the country, I feel that my name would deserve to be pursued through all posterity with execrations. I might, perhaps, escape responsibility by declaring that, as I had nothing to do in producing the present distress, so I was bound to do nothing towards restoring things to a sounder condition. Sir, I scorn the excuse. I think I see something which may be done for the good of the country, and I am willing to share the responsibility with those who will attempt it. In taking my course, I form no new connections, I make no alliances; I act as I was sent here to act. I legislate not for party, but for the good of our common country. I tread all personal and party considerations into the dust, when they present themselves in competition with the most important interests of the people.

Mr. Chairman, if I can free this Government from a corrupting connection, if I can aid in so moulding its action as to remove the causes by which it has disturbed the natural level of our circulating capital, and advance one more step towards that perfect freedom which American trade ought to enjoy, I shall be content, be my own fate what it may; but if I should unfortunately work harm where I mean good, I shall only regret that others will suffer under the consequences of my mistake. But, sir, I turn from these considerations to the great question before us. How can we exercise the powers given us by the constitution, and remould the fiscal action of the Government, so as to relieve the country of its sufferings, and prevent their recurrence again? It has been well said that debt is the evil under which we are suffering. The real balance of trade has been against us; the foreign creditor demanded the adjustment of this balance in specie; and the currency system of the country, having been inflated beyond its just dimensions, was unable to meet the demand for a conversion so sudden. What, then, can be done, sir, to relieve the people from this pressure? There are but two modes of relief from debt; the one consists in its payment, and the other palliates the evil by obtaining time, so as to divide between several years the burden which is too heavy for one. It is obvious that, as a Government, we have neither the right nor the means of paying the debt. Governments may spend money, but they never make it; and their attempts at political alchemy have always resulted, like the vain search after the philosopher's stone, in more expense than profit.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, by McCulloch, one of the ablest political economists of the present day, that our system of banking is the worst in the world. I will not stop now to institute that comparison, or to examine his conclusion; but I shall demonstrate that its natural tendencies are to produce a state of things like the present, if I succeed in showing, first, that it causes a false distribution of capital, and, secondly, that it creates a diseased action in the credit and currency systems by forming an improper connection between them.

According to our banking policy these institutions have the exclusive right of making a paper currency; and their paper is only received in payment of public dues. To these exclusive privileges they unite the power of drawing interest from an amount greatly exceeding their capitals. Take, in connection with this, the usury laws, which exist, I believe, in all of the States of the Union, and you have the result that capital, loaned through bank agency, will draw an interest greatly exceeding that which any other capitalist can derive from money lent. The loanable capital of the country will of course seek that investment, and fill those channels of circulation before it reaches any other; the consequences of the artificial direction thus given to capital, is its false distribution between the different sections of that country, and the different classes of society in that country, in which banks have those exclusive privileges. The loanable capital will seek the places in which these institutions exist, until it has exhausted the demand for it there, before it reaches those portions of the same country in which banks do not exist. It will do so, because, through bank agency, it can derive more than the legal interest within the sphere of its operations, whilst beyond that sphere its profits are confined to that interest. The system establishes, in effect, a bounty upon capital lent to the mercantile, and those classes whose labor brings a speedy return, at the expense of the agriculturists, whose returns are slow. Loans for thirty or sixty days are obviously more profitable than those for longer periods. It is the difference between simple and compound interest. The merchant, therefore, whose outlay is speedily returned to him, can thus afford to deal in these short credits, whilst the agriculturist, whose returns are generally annual, finds himself forced to pay compound, for what the merchant returns only simple interest. The effect of this is so much felt, although its causes are perhaps not generally understood, that in my State it is received almost as an adage, that no farmer can afford to go into bank. There is yet another mode, sir, in which the system produces a false distribution of capital. The available profits of these institutions, within the limits presented to them, are so great that they may become credit insurance offices. The directors, under these extraordinary advantages, may run the risk of insuring a favorite's credit when it is doubtful, when he may have no real resources, and thus the fair trader will be injured by the reckless and often ruinous competition of these men, who have nothing in fact to lose. This, sir, will always happen when a bank has supplied the demands of good customers without reaching the limits of circulation prescribed to them. The temptation to run this risk is so strong that they too often yield to it.

I come now, then, to the false and artificial laws of expansion and contraction, which are introduced into our currency and credit (as I maintain) by the banking system as it exists here. Instead of leaving currency and credit to the regulation of the great laws ordained by nature for that purpose, instead of leaving them to that self-regulating power which would adapt them to the changing condition of society, and harmonize them with each other, our Governments vainly practise their political alchemy, to the injury, and sometimes to the destruction of both. At their very creation, we arm these corporations with incompatible functions. We unite in them the money-making and the money-lending powers; and what, sir, are the inevitable consequences? Why, they make as much money as possible, that they may have the more to lend. They have a direct interest in issuing as much as possible, and they always do it. When their capitals are loaned out, they cannot add a dollar to the credit of the country, without making a like addition to the currency. The latter, under this system, is swelled to an undue proportion, and when once it is beyond its level, its overflow is inevitable. Debase it in the least degree, and its downward tendency is ever increasing. The moment you increase, in this way, the nominal or money price of commodities, the catastrophe is unavoidable. The merchant who deals annually in $10,000 of bank credit, when wheat was $1 per bushel, will require $20,000 of the like credit to deal in the same quantity of grain. The banks which supplied the demand for credit, when wheat was at one dollar, are unable to meet that demand, when it is at double its former price. The cry is, therefore, "more banks," and more paper money is the consequence, until the proportion between the currency and the material wealth of that country is greater than in other parts of the world. If the real balance of trade then turns for a moment against us, a great commercial catastrophe occurs. And even if this should not be the case, the trade in our currency becomes more profitable than that in our commodities. This currency promises to be convertible into specie, which is of uniform value everywhere. The constitution of this country requires that it should be so convertible, and when the paper currency is purchased with commodities, the holder seeks a redemption of the pledge to pay in specie.

If the State Governments will have a paper currency, this is undoubtedly the safest mode in which they can put it forth. But a paper currency put forth by Government on any other principle, will always have the unfortunate effect of continually changing the measure of value by which contracts are to be adjusted. Different Governments adopt different rules of issue. The proportion of paper currency to material wealth is different in each. A man contracts, expecting to deliver by one standard, and owing to its change is forced to deliver by another. He receives, perhaps, in ounces, and is forced to return in pounds. This injurious change in the relations between debtor and creditor, leads to disasters and sufferings so often witnessed that I need not depict them. Other Governments have means of palliating the evils of this sudden change in the measure of value, not within our reach. When a demand is made for a sudden adjustment in specie, of contracts formed under the expectation that they are to be redeemed in paper, these Governments can, and always do, interfere to prevent this change in the relations between debtor and creditor. They make the paper a legal tender between man and man. Indeed, the English Government seems to be well aware of the necessity of making paper currency a tender, after it is once issued; it sees so clearly that contracts will always be made under the expectation of redeeming them in this paper, and that it would be impossible to force their adjustment in specie, that it has made the paper of the Bank of England a legal tender by a standing law of the land. Here we can resort to no such expedient. Nothing but gold and silver can be made a legal tender; a point of difference which no American statesman should lose sight of. What folly is it, then, to introduce by legislation a standard of measure in the formation of contracts, which can always be altered by the creditor at his pleasure, in despite of our laws! How vast and complex is the fraud which we thus practise upon our citizens, when we indirectly force them to contract by one standard, whilst the constitution requires them to pay by another! If a law were passed requiring every man who had contracted to deliver a bushel of corn to deliver two, the injustice would not be greater, nor the mischief more, than our paper currency has often produced.

But, Mr. Chairman, much as I object to the connection between this Government and the banks, on account of the disturbing causes which I think it introduces into the action of the currency and credit systems of the country, I have another objection still more powerful. I never wish to see the banks converted into political engines again. Of all the enormous additions which have been made to Executive patronage, in late years, I regarded its connection with the State banks as the most fearful. The army of office-holders, though you should count them as 100,000 strong, would confer not half the power upon the Executive which the possession of the State banks would give to him. Convert them into political engines to be worked by his hands; give him the control over the exchanges and currency of the country; give him the dispensation of bank favors, and if he were disposed to use them for personal advancement, he would scorn your title of king, and your gewgaw of a crown, as if the offer intimated a doubt of his absolute authority without them. If the choice of means were given to a wise king, who wished to maintain his power, he would not choose a nobility, said to be the natural support of the crown, but he would ask for some hundreds of corporations, wielding the money power of the whole country. He would ask for those whose deliberations might be secret, whose agents might be invisible, and whose march upon their purpose could only be diverted by that impulse of interest which he alone could regulate. Give him these, sir, and he would despise your standing armies and your orders of nobility as cumbrous devices, unworthy of the refinement of the spirit of modern despotism. Mr. Chairman, I have always regarded the connection between bank and State in this country as a conjuncture most ominous to our liberties. Use the public money to buy up the State banks for the use of this Government, or of its Executive branch, and you at once convert them into political engines, you deprive the States of the control of their own institutions, and you place the people under the dominion of a league of corporate influences. Endow a moneyed corporation with the functions of Government, and you behold at once the most ruthless of all despotisms; and the history of human suffering and of East Indian oppression is not silent upon this subject. You may place the worst of men in authority, and he will have some touch of human feeling. Not so with a moneyed corporation. It deliberates in secret; it moves by the power of a majority, with no sense of personal and individual responsibility at the bar of public opinion; and it is governed by the single impulse of interest. You cannot move it to pity for the present, or to remorse for the past; for its action is mechanical, and not under the influence of feeling or of soul. I protest, then, sir, against any attempt to bind the moneyed corporations to one government, and by one common political purpose. I have given my reasons for objecting to any connection between bank and State, and, perhaps it may be reasonably required of me to suggest some better plan for the custody of the public treasure. If the selection were left to me, sir, I should adopt the plan of special deposits. The General Government should be independent of the banks as to the medium in which its revenues are collected, and banks would be independent of the Government when they were no longer exposed to the power of its rewards through the privilege of trading upon the public deposits. If such an arrangement could be effected by giving the banks a fair compensation for keeping the public money, at the same time that they were effectually restrained from using it, I should much prefer it to the scheme proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. The pecuniary responsibility would be greater than that of individual collectors, and its custody of the public revenue would, perhaps, be safer. But the chief recommendation would be in the means which this plan would afford the representatives of the people to ascertain the state of the public money, if at any time there was cause to suspect either the ability or the honesty of the Secretary of the Treasury. I shall not fatigue the committee, however, with the details of a scheme which I shall not propose by way of amendment, as there would be no reasonable prospect of its adoption at present. I should greatly prefer a bill carefully framed upon this basis to the one now before us; but I give to that the decided preference over the other alternatives, of a United States Bank, or the connection between the Government and the State banks. Doubtless, there will be difficulties attendant upon any scheme for regulating the custody of the public revenue. The money power, in all its combinations, presents the most difficult problem to be solved in the science of Government. But we must choose the best plan within our reach. It is idle to expect perfection in a system of finance. I go, sir, for the great principle of divorce, without committing myself to the specific details of this bill further than by the expression of a preference for them over the connection between bank and State. In that comparison, I have satisfied myself that it does not increase Executive patronage, as its opponents maintain; nor do I believe that its tendency will be to retard the resumption of specie payments. It, in fact, diminishes the Executive patronage by a larger amount than any other reform ever proposed under this Government. It subtracts the entire amount of bank patronage from the Executive, and, in comparison with this, the few additional officers to be created are as nothing. How is this bill, sir, to retard the resumption of specie payments by the banks? They will be afraid, it is said, of runs upon them for specie to be paid for public dues. This objection, sir, is more specious than valid. The quarterly receipts of this Government will range from six to eight millions. The greatest possible amount of the addition to be made to the legal currency, under this bill, would be six or eight millions, and, in point of fact, I am informed that a far less sum would suffice, as the public money is paid out nearly as fast as it comes in. Is it to be supposed, sir, that the eight hundred banks of this country could not meet such a requisition, if they were ready in other respects for the resumption of specie payments? But, sir, in point of fact, the requisition for specie upon the banks, or upon the country, under this bill, cannot amount to a dollar if these Treasury drafts be issued for circulation, as I presume will be the case. They furnish more than enough of medium for the collection of our revenues. The banks, Mr. Chairman, cannot resume specie payments generally until the foreign debt is nearly or wholly liquidated. When that is done, if they will elevate the value of their currency to the par of specie, partly by curtailing their circulation gradually, and within the limit of the present discount upon their paper, and partly by a judicious command of exchanges for converting their own obligations, they may then safely resume specie payments. Whenever their paper will command its par in specie in the market, they may safely undertake to give specie for it themselves. This I believe to be the only true mode of effecting the resumption, and this operation is entirely independent of the fiscal action of the Government. Rely upon it, sir, that a speedy resumption of specie payments by any other means would be impracticable, without producing more distress than we have yet seen in the community. To take their depreciated paper in payment of the public dues, would rob them of all inducement to resume, as the Government credit would thus be worth more to them than it would be if their paper was convertible.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said: My great objections to the measures proposed in this bill are, that they are not at all commensurate with the exigencies of the times; they do not meet the real difficulty. The bill simply ordains that the Government, after a limited time, will receive nothing but gold and silver in payment of public dues, and will intrust its keeping to its own officers alone. Now, if there were a creative power in our law; if, by this simple enactment, the bank paper could be driven out of circulation, back whence it came, and the precious metals substituted in sufficient quantities to meet the wants of society, as well as the demands of the revenue, the chief ground of my opposition would be at once removed. I can well see, from the experience we have had of the evil tendencies of the banks to excessive issues, (and such, at present, are my decided impressions,) that, whenever the currency is placed in a condition to bear the tribute, the true policy of Government may be found to be to exact its dues altogether in coin, and to withhold its revenue, while resting between its collection and its disbursement, from the use of banks, as a fund to increase their discounts. My reasons for this I will give hereafter, when treating of the proper positions which the Government may ultimately assume toward the State banks.

The bill is to operate upon the currency as it now is; for we have not only no guarantee that it will be found in an improved condition at the end of twelve months, (the limited time,) but it is susceptible almost of demonstration that one necessary consequence from the proposed law will be to continue the currency in its present debased condition.

The precious metals, all will agree, are now banished from circulation. They are in the country, I grant you, and in sufficient quantities, perhaps, to answer their accustomed duty of circulating in those channels below the reach of bank paper; but they no longer pass from hand to hand as a medium of exchange. Their former exchangeable value has been converted, by the course of trade to which I have alluded, to a value exclusively marketable; and thus they have fallen back, and are entirely merged in the common and general mass of merchandise. Specie, whether in coin or in bullion, is now merchandise, and not money; and those who require it for any purpose must go into the market and buy it at market rates, as they would any kind of merchandise whatever. How long, then, is this state of things to continue? How long will this marketable value attach, which detains the coin from its most appropriate function as current money? And by what process can it be restored to circulation?

The answer to the two first inquiries is very simple. Specie will continue to be merchandise, so long as there exists any demand for it greater than that which would invite or retain it in circulation. It was driven out of circulation by the demand for exportation, after the business of the country had realized the fact that our exports were insufficient to pay for our imports. The balance must be met, and the precious metals were called out of circulation to answer this new demand. It is a necessary and fundamental law of currency, that where you have two media, of which either answers all the purposes of exchange, and one of them, besides those purposes, will answer another purpose as a subject of trade, the latter will fly at once to meet the new demand, and leave the duties of currency exclusively to its fellow.

OCTOBER, 1837.]

Sub-Treasury Bill.

[H. OF R.]

So it was between the paper and the specie, when, by the exigencies of trade, the latter was suddenly called off to meet the new demand created by the necessity in commerce, of extinguishing the balances against our importers. There is no mystery in all this. Imports are to be paid for from those two sources alone: by the produce and labor of the importing nation, or by gold and silver; and whenever the former is found inadequate, the precious metals must make up the deficiency.

Thus stood the country when the banks suspended the payment of specie. They had an agency, and a large agency, I grant you, in bringing that necessity about; pampering, as they did, the pride of commerce. They met all its demands, honored all its drafts, as well in the rage for importation, as in those extravagant speculations to which the apparent prosperity of the age gave birth. But the banks are not alone to blame in this. It is due to the occasion, and will aid us in searching out the true remedy against a recurrence, to admit, candidly and fairly, that the Government itself saw as little the mischiefs that would follow from the extension of their credit, as the banks did themselves. It is a part of the history of the times, and should be recorded on the same page, that when the deposits were given to the State banks, they were expressly instructed to make them the basis of new incentives to commercial enterprise.

I do not speak this at all, sir, in the spirit of rebuke; far, very far from it. I adduce it only to show that the Government itself, against whom, as some have said, the banks have committed the unpardonable sin, was itself actively instigating them to that very extension, now so zealously condemned. How far the banks might have gone in extending their discounts, upon the immense deposit thus cast upon them, without this authoritative hint, none can easily tell. But it is fair and reasonable to infer, that this license in advance did not pass unimproved.

Having stated thus the actual condition of the currency, and briefly traced the causes which have led to it, let us inquire next what will be the probable operation of a law that takes no account of its enfeebled state; but pre-emptorily demands, after a given day, that the entire revenue, amounting to some twenty millions of dollars per annum, shall be paid up in gold and silver. One necessary consequence, in my apprehension, would be, effectually to place it out of the power of the banks to resume the payment of specie within any reasonable time. How can it be otherwise? They suspended payment, because of the new demand for coin created by the exigencies of trade. They have not yet resumed, because, although that demand has entirely diminished, as shown by the rate of foreign exchange, yet there is still demand enough to warn them of the consequences of an attempted resumption, before the trade of the country is in a fit condition to bear it. Sir, the country is recovering fast from the violent and sudden convulsion into which it has been lately thrown. It cannot otherwise be, when we consider the immense resources of this vast continent, wielded, as they are, by a people whose industry and enterprise acknowledge no other limit than the very bounds of the earth. But the Government must keep its hands off; time must be allowed for the system to react, before any new or additional pressure can be borne.

If the necessities of circulation are not strong enough now to bring specie into general use, as part of the currency, because of the existing collateral demand in trade, does it not necessarily follow, that any new demand will have an additional effect in retarding that operation?

You create this new demand by the bill under consideration; pass it, and you at once increase the premium that specie already bears over the ordinary currency; you give it increased value in the market to the extent of such new demand; and to that same extent you postpone the day when it can return into use as a part of the circulating medium. Until that day comes, it is impossible for the banks to pay out specie upon their notes; they never can do so, until the demand upon them is reduced to a naked demand for circulation. If I am correct in this reasoning, the best that could be hoped for under the proposed law would be, that it should remain a dead letter upon the statute book.

I think I have shown that we could have no return to a circulation of specie under its auspices; and, if this be so, do you believe, does any man believe, that the law could be carried into effect?

What, sir, that the Government alone should be paid in silver and gold, while those who have the payments to make receive nothing but irredeemable paper! How vain and idle it is to expect any such thing. If, by any chance, or lucky accident, overruling those stern necessities to which all human affairs are subject, the exigency of the times should have passed by, before your policy begins, then it might, thus chance-favored, be that the scheme could be carried out. But it becomes us not to legislate upon such improbable contingencies. I want no better evidence of what the Government would be twelve months hence, under the operation of this law, than what is now daily passing before our eyes. There are, it is said, (and I presume with an approximation at least to the truth,) now in this country eighty millions of dollars in coined metal. By the existing law, (as there is no bank paper convertible into specie,) Government can now receive nothing but coin in payment of any part of its revenue. I ask, confidently, is any part of that revenue so paid? With all this abundance of the precious metals, fully three times as much as we have had at any former period, do we not all know, that none whatever is paid into the Treasury from any source of revenue. I mean none, when compared even with the lowest necessity of the public service. The mint, it is true, does furnish a small supply, barely sufficient, if at all, to meet those demands which coin alone will satisfy. But this does not come in any shape of revenue—far from it. It is purchased by Government, at market rates, and a premium paid upon every dollar that is brought in. Such is the present state of things, under the operation of a hard-money law, while the only money of the country is in irredeemable paper; and such must ever continue to be your condition, under the operation of any laws that you may pass, so long as the money which you require is banished, by whatever cause, from the channels of circulation.

I lay down, then, this position, and defy any refutation: that the Government must, as a permanent necessity, deal in that currency in which the people deal; it is the law of its creation, and inseparable from its condition. It must receive what the people receive, and pay what they pay—a necessity from which Government cannot escape if it would, and ought not if it could.

I speak of this as a permanent necessity, distinguished from the necessities of immediate want. It is struggling now against this very want, and precisely as any large capitalist might equally do, by using the resources of its credit to supply the temporary absence of revenue. Have we not just passed a law, authorizing an issue of ten millions of Treasury paper, for this very purpose? I mean for the single purpose of reserving the Government from the necessity of coming down at once to the irredeemable paper of the banks. And this only to answer the present emergency; for it will certainly follow, unless that medium can be restored, in which alone the Government is allowed to deal, that we must issue at least ten millions more, before we return home from the ensuing session. Sir, I went cordially with you in this use of Government credit; and I will do so again should the emergency continue. But I tell you fairly and candidly, and I tell the people, too, that this Treasury issue is all that saves the Government now from coming down at once to bank paper. I say this, sir, because your revenue laws exacting gold and silver, are not and cannot be enforced. If you collect any revenue, it can only be in that very paper, because there is nothing else to pay with.

Suppose, then, your law passed, and the currency remain, as under such policy it inevitably must in the condition that it now is; what are you to do? If you could enforce the law then, I ask why do you not do so now?

Why do you not now compel your debtors to go into market and buy specie, in order to replenish the Treasury? So far from this, we have now a bill before us, and which it is admitted on all hands must pass, to save the Secretary from the necessity of so idle an attempt. With more than four millions of dollars now due in New York alone, so far from exacting payment, we are about to give further time on all bonds due and to become due between this time and the next session of Congress.

I say, then, confidently, pass what law you may, you cannot have your revenues paid in specie, so long as it remains at a premium; and that the very first effect of this law, by creating a new demand, would be to increase the premium, and thus render permanent the very exigencies to which your legislation is now actually yielding.

But take another view of the subject. Suppose the law carried out, what then would follow? The importer, besides all other charges for freight, insurance, duties, &c., is required to pay five or ten per centum for specie to pay the duties. Certainly this latter would be added to the price of the commodity; and thus the whole effect of your policy would be to tax the people to this extent, in order that Government might deal in gold, while they were left to struggle on, unaided, against all the ills of worthless paper money.

My view of the subject, then, is that, by passing this law now, you postpone to an indefinite period the resumption of specie payments by the State banks; that until they do resume, the law must be inoperative, and the Treasury supplied by loans; or, if enforced, besides creating a new and heavy tax upon all foreign merchandise, the sole effect will be to enrich the office-holders, and all who feed upon the public crib, at the expense of the rest of the community. I know, sir, that this last objection has been scouted as mere slang, as part of a mere "rabble," and unworthy of notice. But I tell you that it has never been met, and that it cannot be overthrown. I do not believe (and that disbelief is founded on the experience of the present day) that such a law could be carried out; but if it were, the host of Government dependents would grow rich under it. They would have money worth five or ten dollars more in the hundred than the money used by the people; and the people would be taxed to the extent, of this five or ten dollars in the hundred, to furnish the former with the better currency.

Remuneration for Losses in the Florida Campaign.

[H. OF R.]

The great forcing process now in contemplation, will work the very reverse of what was then so strenuously urged. It will put all our golden dreams to flight, of the halcyon days of hard money, and the States will be compelled, from sheer necessity, to license once more the very lowest issue of bank paper. Seeing these things, as I clearly do in prospect, under the operation of the proposed law, I can have no choice but to raise my voice against it.

As to so much of the bill as constitutes the collectors of the revenue, with the mint and its branches, depositories of the public money, I have but little to say. It is certainly subject to very strong objections, not the least of which is, the very great increase of patronage to which it must give rise; and a patronage of the most dangerous influence, as being so immediately connected with the public money. Neither is this objection at all answered, when it is said that the patronage will be less than that exercised in the intercourse between the Government and the deposit banks; because, by the simple substitute of a special for a general deposit, all patronage will be at once taken away; and on the score of safety, the difference is incalculable.

Whether I regard, then, the pernicious influence which this bill must exercise upon the currency, if now enacted into law, or the inadequacy of its provisions for the safe-keeping of the money, I am equally constrained to withhold my assent. In the first aspect, it has never been submitted to the country, and has had very little consideration here. The innovation is too great, the transition too violent, from all previous usage, to be thus suddenly met.

FRIDAY, October 13.

Remuneration for Losses in the Florida Campaigns.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, chairman of the Committee of Claims, the House took up the bill reported by that committee, to amend the bill making provision for the remuneration of volunteers and others, for horses, &c., lost in the military service of the United States.

[The Committee of Claims accompanied this bill with a report, stating "That several claims are presented to the committee, arising from the horses and saddles, and other equipage of disbanded mounted volunteers, having been turned over to the United States, by the order of General Jesup, as it is alleged, when said volunteers were dismissed from the service.

"It is represented to the committee by Colonel King, acting adjutant to Colonel Caulfield's regiment of Alabama mounted volunteers in Florida, that most of the claimants with whom he is acquainted are young men who obtained their horses and equipage on credit, and that they are obliged to look to the United States for the value of the property to enable them to make payment to the persons of whom they purchased. Most, if not all, of the claimants were sick at the time they were dismissed, or left the service on furlough; and it was thought best by General Jesup that they should return home by water, rather than encounter the fatigue, hardships, and danger of returning home by land. The committee, at the last session of Congress, reported a bill for the relief of James L. Kenner, whose horse was turned over to the United States by the order of the commanding officer, on the discharge of said Kenner by reason of sickness.

"The committee refer to that report in the first volume of Reports, No. 3. The number of claims that will be embraced under a general law, Colonel King thinks may be one hundred. It appears to the committee it is expedient to provide for this class of cases by a general law."]

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on this bill, (Mr. BRIGGS in the chair,)

Mr. CARTER said he was not opposed to the bill now under consideration, except that its provisions were not sufficiently extensive. It did not embrace a class of cases of real hardship that he believed existed. He said he would take this occasion to bring to the notice of the committee, and at the same time suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Claims, that there were among the volunteers some cases of real and peculiar hardships, that were not yet provided for by law, although great exertions were made at the last Congress in their behalf; and he would now tender to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Claims his acknowledgments of gratitude for his assiduity and exertions favorable to the relief of those patriotic young men he had the honor to represent, and who had sustained losses in the service of their country.

Sir, I will take occasion to say here that, in my opinion, (if the reports be true that have reached my ears,) the Government has not dealt as kindly and as liberally as she should have done towards the volunteers of Tennessee. We provided by law at the last Congress, that the soldiers or volunteers who had rendezvoused, were mustered, and immediately discharged, should be paid one month's full pay; and, by the estimates furnished the Committee of Claims by the War Department, one month's full pay was made to amount to between $65 and $70, I think, perhaps, $68 and some cents; and, by the decision of the Attorney-General under the old law, another class of those volunteers, that were indefinitely furloughed, and required to return to service if they should be ordered to do so, were to be considered in service until absolutely discharged, and consequently were entitled to their full pay. I have heard some hints, sir, that the War Department has not carried into effect this law, and this decision, as was contemplated by Congress and those representatives who were looked to to guard and sustain the rights of those particular individuals. I do not know, sir, how far the War Department has failed in a compliance with the law; nor have I any idea as to what extent those volunteers have been injured by the defalcations of the Government. But I hope, and I have no doubt, I will be able to obtain the information; and, if my fears are realized, and they have been defrauded out of any portion of the amount that Congress intended they should have, and I cannot obtain redress by an application to the Secretary of War, I will feel myself bound to bring the subject again to the consideration of this House, believing that the representatives of the people are ready upon all occasions to do justice to the people. And I am glad now to have the assurance of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Claims, that he will afford all the aid in his power to render to the volunteers of my State ample compensation for their service and their losses, at the next meeting of Congress. I have also a right to complain, on behalf of these men, in another point of view. I am informed our volunteers were paid off in the depreciated bank paper that was perhaps ten or fifteen per cent. below par. If this be true, and my former suggestions be true, that they have not been paid as much as Congress intended them to have, why, sir, your volunteer soldiery of Tennessee have been cheated and defrauded out of half, or at least a large portion of their just dues. And if so, we must ask Congress hereafter, whenever the true state of facts can be ascertained, to grant such relief as the merits of those claimants may justly and honestly demand. And I have no doubt, from the disposition heretofore manifested by this House, and by the Committee of Claims, in relation to this deserving and meritorious class of claimants, that ample relief will be awarded them.

The bill, then, having been ordered to be engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

The Sub-Treasury Bill.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Senate bill imposing additional duties on certain officers.

Mr. LEGARE, of South Carolina, after an extended elementary view of currency, went on to say: Sir, I have been driven to this elementary way of considering the subject, by the course which the argument has taken here and elsewhere, and because, in solemnly reviewing, as we are now compelled to do, the whole monetary system of the country, it is of the very last importance that the subject, in all its aspects, should be fairly presented to the people. I shall, therefore, proceed briefly to consider the question, how far it is practicable or desirable to substitute a metallic currency for bank paper, or even very materially to widen the metallic basis of our present circulation.

I presume it will hardly be disputed that, by a general return to the precious metals, as the only medium of exchange for the whole commercial world, the operations of trade would be everywhere embarrassed and impeded, and the value of money enhanced; or, which is the same thing, the prices of commodities reduced in an incalculable degree. How far a similar effect has already been produced, by the diminution of the supply from the Mexican and South American mines, within the last twenty years, is one of the most difficult and controverted questions of the day. This is not a fit occasion for stating the arguments advanced by the advocates of different views of that subject, but I will mention to the committee, that in a very able work, to which I have already referred as having been recently sent to me, the author, who examines this point with perfect candor, advances the opinion, that thousands have, within the period alluded to, been precipitated into embarrassments from that cause alone.* If it be true, as is alleged by Jacobs, that the whole stock of coin in circulation in 1829, was less, by upwards of £60,000,000, than that which circulated in 1809; and if any thing like the supposed diminution of the actual quantity by abrasion, by loss, by consumption in manufactures takes place, (one per cent.* a year,) it becomes a matter of serious speculation, what means shall be adopted to obviate so great an inconvenience as a continually decreasing metallic basis, at a period when commerce and its productive powers are so immensely on the increase. Sir, that question is infinitely more interesting in a highly progressive country than in any other. In such a country, the currency must be regularly enlarged, with the growth of its population and of its productive power, or it is subjected to the most terrible of all evils, falling prices. Everybody that has ever treated of such subjects, has dwelt upon the effects of an increasing currency, as wonderfully favorable to industry. No more striking example of this truth can be desired than what was witnessed in the 16th century, after the importation of gold and silver from America began to produce a decided effect upon the distribution of wealth. It is admitted on all hands, to have been the period of the greatest improvement in society that has occurred in its history; and of all countries, be it remembered, England benefited most by the general rise of prices, because so large a portion of her farmers held leases for long terms of years, and paid money rents; the increase of the circulation operating to reduce the real value of the returns made to the landlord in favor of his tenant. The great benefit of a full, and especially an increasing circulation, thus consists not only in quickening and facilitating exchanges, (itself an immense stimulus to industry,) but in securing to the industrious classes rather a larger proportion of the income of society than they would otherwise enjoy. Every thing which they buy to sell again advances in price while it is in their hands, and this unquestionable truth is of itself a total refutation of all that is said concerning the oppressive operation of bank paper upon the productive classes, by the very persons who, in the same breath, speak of its excess and depreciation.

* Money and its Vicissitudes in Value.

With a population, then, increasing at the rate of four or five per cent. a year, and with an accumulation of capital and productive power proportionably greater, I hold it to be utterly absurd to talk of any thing like a metallic currency in the United States. There is no possible means of procuring it; and if by any means it could be procured, I venture to affirm that our people would get rid of it in the course of a few years, though all the penal laws of Spain against the exportation of gold and silver should be re-enacted here—laws which were passed with no other effect, even in that country, but to show the utter futility of such legislation. I say, sir, that, with their present habits of active enterprise and strict economy, the American people would export the precious metals as fast as they were imported, beyond any amount of them which might be absolutely necessary for the domestic exchanges of the country, and they would do so, because gold and silver would be of more use abroad in purchasing commodities, and would be wholly superfluous at home, where paper would do as well. If you put down "the banks," it would have no effect but to set up something worse in their place, in the shape of private paper. There are some things over which the most despotic lawgivers are unable to exercise any control; and one of them, as all experience shows, is this commerce in bullion.

Sir, it has been said that the only advantage of a paper currency over the precious metals, consists in its cheapness. I am by no means, as you may gather from what I have said, ready to admit this; but supposing it to be true, is that saving really an unimportant matter? Mr. Gallatin, in a pamphlet of signal ability,* has, as I conceive, fallen into a grave error on this subject, which it is so much the more important to rectify, as I perceive that he has misled others more disposed than himself to turn a speculative error into a practical mischief. He states the whole benefit derived from the use of paper, instead of the precious metals, in the United States in 1830, including, under the name of circulation, private deposits in the banks, as they ought undoubtedly to be, at about five millions of dollars a year. It is true that, according to principles admitted by Mr. Gallatin, the progress of the country, both in wealth and population, in the last seven years, would require a very considerable addition to be made to this estimate, in order to a correct application of it to our actual condition. But, sir, it appears to me that the estimate was made on data altogether erroneous. In the first place, the quantity of currency, if it were metallic, necessary to the circulation of this country, was prodigiously underrated. For reasons that need not be stated here, it is found that a given amount of metallic currency does not circulate as rapidly as an equal amount of paper, and, therefore, that more of it is, ceteris paribus, required to do the same business. But, without going into such minute inquiry here, why should the United States, with sixteen millions of inhabitants, and relatively the most active trade, both foreign and domestic, in the world, and with extraordinary productive power of all sorts, not need, at the very least, half the circulation in France, with only double their population, and not half their industry? The stress that ought to be laid on this latter circumstance may be illustrated by comparing Asia with Europe in this particular: double the population in the former, possessing, according to the most accurate researches, only one-fifth the quantity of gold and silver, which, in addition to paper of all sorts, is required in the latter. Now, the circulation of France was, before the first Revolution, set down by Neckar at £88,000,000;† and Thiers, in his history of that event, makes a similar estimate.‡ Its present amount ought, in reference to the increase of her capital and population, to be at least 600,000,000 dollars; and accordingly, as was observed by one of my colleagues, (Mr. THOMPSON,) it is stated at that on good authority.§ Mr. Rothschild, in his examination before the committee of the House of Commons, in 1832, mentions the paper circulation of the Bank of France as amounting to 750,000,000 francs. According to this, then, we should require, on the footing of population alone, at least 300,000,000 dollars. So much for the amount; now for the loss upon it.

Mr. Gallatin considers it only as so much interest on dead capital, and even the interest he puts at an exceedingly low rate. But I apprehend the difference to the country between having a vast inert mass of gold and silver as currency, and turning it into productive capital must be determined not in relation to interest merely, but to the profit of stock laid out in active industry, which is nowhere in this country less than ten per cent., and in the great majority of cases, the new States and all included, nearer double that amount on an average. You see, then, sir, what an enormous loss a metallic currency would be to the nation, without taking into account its wear and tear. Look back at the half century that has passed away, and say what that loss would have been, on principles of compound interest, from the beginning up to the present day. Why, sir, it exceeds all powers of calculation, nay, of imagination. Do not suppose for a moment that so important, so palpable a truth, although never stated in abstract terms, or as a general proposition, has not occurred to the people of the United States. They have felt it, without perceiving it; they have acted upon it, without reasoning about it; they have perfectly well comprehended the uses of money, without studying the principles of currency; and they have preferred paper as a circulating medium to gold and silver, on the simplest maxims of prudence and economy. You may depend upon it, this conclusion is as deeply rooted as it is just. You will never be able to shake it. All your policy will be of no avail, as all legislation will be forever vain which comes into conflict with the genius of a people, especially in matters so deeply and visibly affecting their private interest. The barbarian who, in his impotent rage, threw fetters into the Hellespont, and scourged its foaming billows, did not wage a more insane war against the nature of things.

But we are told that if it is an experiment that has been proposed to us, we need not be alarmed at it, because we are accustomed to experiments, and successful ones; that our constitution itself is a mere experiment. Sir, I deny it utterly, and he that says so shows me that he has either not studied at all, or studied to very little purpose, the history and genius of our institutions. The great cause of their prosperous results—a cause which every one of the many attempts since vainly made to imitate them on this continent or in Europe only demonstrates the more clearly—is precisely the contrary. It is because our fathers made no experiments, and had no experiment to make, that their work has stood. They were forced, by a violation of their historical hereditary rights under the old common law of their race, to dissolve their connection with the mother country. Their external, their federal relations were of course changed, and in that respect, and in that respect only, they were compelled to do their best in the novel situation in which they stood. What relates, therefore, merely to the union of the States is all that gives the least countenance to this superficial idea of an “experiment” which has done so much to misguide the speculations of some visionary minds upon these important matters. Even in this respect, however, an attentive study of our history will show that strong federal tendencies existed, and had, frequently, on former occasions, manifested themselves.* But the whole constitution of society in the States, the great body and bulk of their public law, with all its maxims and principles, all that is republican, in short, in our institutions, remained after the Revolution, and remains now, with some very subordinate modifications, what it was from the beginning. Our written constitutions do nothing but consecrate and fortify the “plain rules of ancient liberty,” handed down with Magna Charta from the earliest history of our race. It is not a piece of paper, sir, it is not a few abstractions engrossed on parchment, that make free Governments. No, sir, the law of liberty must be inscribed on the heart of the citizen; the word, if I may use the expression without irreverence, must become flesh; you must have a whole people trained, disciplined, bred, yea, and born, as our fathers were, to institutions like ours. Before the colonies existed, the petition of right, that Magna Charta of a more enlightened age, had been presented in 1628 by Lord Coke and his immortal compeers. Our founders brought it with them, and we have not gone one step beyond them. They brought these maxims of civil liberty, not in their libraries but in their souls; not as philosophical prattle—not as barren generalities, but as rules of conduct; as a symbol of public duty and private right, to be adhered to with religious fidelity; and the very first pilgrim that set his foot upon the rock of Plymouth, stepped forth a living constitution! armed at all points to defend and to perpetuate the liberty to which he had devoted his whole being.

It only remains for me to advert briefly to one or two additional topics, and I have done. It has been argued as if the currency given to bank paper in this country were due almost exclusively to the countenance which Government affords it, by receiving it in payment of public dues. Certainly, sir, the patronage of Government is an important concurring cause of this credit, but it is not true that it is essential to it. What does the house of Rothschild owe to the Governments of Europe—that house to which all the Governments on the continent are obliged to have recourse in their financial exigencies? And here let me call the attention of those who declaim so vehemently against the agency of banking corporations, to the fact, that this mighty house, with its scarcely less than royal influence and splendor, like most of the other establishments of the same kind in Europe, is no corporation at all, but a mere private partnership; and to the additional fact, that this colossal fortune has been amassed in little more than a single generation, by an obscure person, born in a corner of the Juden Strasse of Frankfort on the Main, and his four sons. Do you not see, then, sir, that the odious common-places, about “the money power,” and the “political powers,” either have no meaning, or apply with all their force to every accumulation of capital, and all the great results of modern commerce? The “money power,” I presume, signifies “the power of money,” which is widely diffused in this country, thanks to the protection of equal laws, and which will exist and continue to have its influence so long as those laws shall protect it from confiscation, whether it shall borrow the credit of the Government, or the Government shall borrow its credit. It is scarcely necessary to notice an idea, analogous to the last, which has been very much insisted on, and that is, that the commerce of New York has been built up by Government credits. Why, sir, this does appear to me too extravagant to need exposure. New York has been built up by her unquestionable natural advantages, and there is no measure of this Government—there is only one event that can possibly deprive her of her immense commercial ascendancy, the dissolution of the Union—that, and nothing but that, can do it. Commerce, as I have already remarked, leads everywhere to centralization: look at Liverpool—look at Havre, the last is a hard money country. But on this head there is a very important consideration, which has been urged with all his admirable eloquence by one of my colleagues in the Senate, (Mr. PRESTON.) If this concentration of commercial business in that city be injurious to the others now, what will it become if, by collecting the revenue in gold and silver, and thus making gold and silver mere merchandise, you add to the disadvantages of centralization all the difficulties of procuring coin; make New York the great specie market; and render the whole country tributary to the money changers of Wall street?

The Sub-Treasury Bill.

Sir, a word more to the South, and for the South! When your system of protection was still in all its vigor, we (I mean the people of South Carolina) sent you a protest against its principles and tendency, which contained, among other objections to it, one that deserves to be repeated here. We told you that we depended absolutely upon commerce—commerce on the largest scale—commerce carried on as it has been for the last half century, with an ever-increasing production, provoking and creating an ever-increasing consumption, and permitting us to send a million (now a million and a half) of bales of cotton into the market, without any danger of a glut. We told you the staple commodities, especially the principal one which we produced, were among the very few in the production of which slave labor can enter into competition with free. We reminded you that great revolutions in trade sometimes arose from apparently slight causes, and that, however far it might be from your purpose, or even your apprehensions, it was possible that your legislation might occasion us the loss of our foreign market, our only resource; that the result of that loss to us would be poverty and utter desolation; that our people, in despair, would emigrate to more fortunate regions, and the whole frame and constitution of our society would be seriously impaired and endangered, if not dissolved entirely. And we adjured you not to persist in a course of legislation of which the benefits to yourselves, even were they unquestionable, were nothing in comparison of the danger to which they exposed us—a danger which, however contingent or remote, involved our whole existence, and could not be contemplated without well-founded alarm. Sir, I repeat to you now—I repeat to the representatives of the whole South on this floor—the words then addressed to the House on a different subject. Let well alone. Resist this uncalled-for innovation, of which no one can foresee the whole extent nor the ultimate results. Mark what your Secretary of the Treasury has told you in the very paper in which he reveals the project on the table—you produce too much cotton. Go home, gentlemen of the South, and tell your people that their successful industry is a vice; that the fertility of their soil is a curse; that their excessive production occasions disorders in the State; and that the remedy for our troubles is, that they should live on short commons. Let them co-operate with our political economy, by depriving themselves of the little mercantile capital they have; let them abolish those corporations to which people, who cannot themselves do business with the widow and the orphan, have contributed their means for the accommodation of commerce; let them but do this, and their docility will be admirable, and shall have our approbation.

Sir, before I take my seat, there is one other topic that I feel it my duty to advert to—I mean to the supposed injurious effects of banking institutions upon the laboring classes of society. Although I have no doubt but that there are many defects in the constitution, as well as the management of those institutions in this country, and should be most willing to co-operate, if occasion served, in reforming them, I have no hesitation in acquitting them at least of this charge. Who that has ever heard of the relation between capital and labor, between wages and profits, but must see at once that it is unfounded; and, accordingly, Hume objects to banks that, by their issues, they raise wages, and so hurt the manufacturing interests of a nation. I have already remarked, that one of the effects of an increase in currency is to make a distribution of the wealth of society more favorable to the industrious classes of it—to confiscate in a manner, the property of those who live on fixed incomes, for the benefit of those who produce the commodities on which those incomes are laid out. It is for this reason that the radicals of England—Mr. Atwood, for example—are all strenuous advocates of paper money, and even of inconvertible paper. The idea that the poor are to gain by a return to a metallic currency is, so far as I know, confined to their friends in this country, whose zeal is certainly greater than their knowledge.

It is true, sir, that among other disadvantages attending frequent fluctuations in the currency, it is said that wages are the last thing that rises in a case of expansion. And that may be so in countries where the supply of labor is greater than the demand; but the very reverse is most certainly the fact here, and where the demand, especially when stimulated by any extraordinary increase, real or fictitious, of capital, is always greater than the supply. All price is a question of power, or relative necessity between two parties; and everybody knows that, in a period of excitement here, wages rise immediately, and out of all proportion more than any thing else, because the population of the country is entirely inadequate to its wants. During the last year, for instance, the price of labor became so exorbitant, that some of the most fertile land in South Carolina, rice fields, which had been cultivated for a hundred years, were in danger of being abandoned, from the impossibility of paying for it. Sir, as a Southern man, I represent equally rent, capital, and wages, which are confounded in our estates; and I protest against attempts to array, without cause, without a color of pretext or plausibility, the different classes of society against one another, as if, in such a country as this, there could be any natural hostility or any real distinction between them—a country in which all the rich, with hardly an exception, have been poor, and all the poor may one day be rich—a country in which banking institutions have been of immense service, precisely because they have been most needed by a people who had all their fortunes to make by good character and industrious habits. Look at that remarkable picture—remarkable not as a work of art but as a monument of history—which you see in passing through the rotundo. Two out of five of that immortal committee were mechanics, and such men! * In the name of God, sir, why should any one study to pervert the natural good sense and kindly feelings of this moral and noble people—to infuse into their minds a sullen envy towards one another, instead of that generous emulation which every thing in their situation is fitted to inspire—to breathe into them the spirit of Cain, muttering deep curses and meditating desperate revenge against his brother because the smoke of his sacrifice has ascended to heaven before his own! And do not they who treat our industrious classes as if they were in the same debased and wretched condition as the poor of Europe, insult them by such an odious comparison? Why, sir, you do not know what poverty is. We have no poor in this country, in the sense in which that word is used abroad. Every laborer, even the most humble, in the United States soon becomes a capitalist, and even, if he choose, a proprietor of land; for the West, with all its boundless fertility, is open to him. How can any one dare to compare the mechanics of this land (whose inferiority, in any substantial particular, in intelligence, in virtue, in wealth, to the other classes of our society, I have yet to learn) with that race of outcasts, of which so terrific a picture is presented by recent writers—the poor of Europe? a race, among no inconsiderable portion of whom famine and pestilence may be said to dwell continually; many of whom are without morals, without education, without a country, without a God! and may be said to know society only by the terrors of its penal code, and to live in perpetual war with it. Poor bondmen! mocked with the name of liberty, that they may be sometimes tempted to break their chains, in order that, after a few days of starvation in idleness and dissipation, they may be driven back to their prison house to take them up again, heavier and more galling than before; severed, as it has been touchingly expressed, from nature, from the common air, and the light of the sun; knowing only by hearsay that the fields are green, that the birds sing, and that there is a perfume in flowers.*

When Mr. LEGARE had concluded,

Mr. NAYLOR, of Pennsylvania, after an introductory view of his subject, continued:

Meeting under these circumstances, I ask, had we not a right to expect that Congress once more would resume its independence, and attend faithfully and fearlessly to the business of their constituents, and that the administration would now abandon its projects, and give over its attempts to sway and subjugate and enslave the representatives of the country? But have our expectations been realized? What have we been about? What have we done? Let us see whether we have not again been subserviently echoing the will of the Executive?

Our first act was to pass a bill for the postponement of the payment of the fourth instalment to the States, to withhold from them the sum of upwards of nine millions of dollars, which, by the act of 23d June, 1836, we had contracted to put in their possession. By that law it is provided "that all the money in the Treasury of the United States, on the first of January, 1837, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, should be deposited with the States in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States." Under this law it became the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the first of January, 1837, to reserve five millions out of it for the use of the Government, and appropriate the balance, whatever it might be, to the States as already mentioned. The Secretary of the Treasury performed this duty, and found that there were upwards of forty-two millions of dollars in the Treasury. He reserved the five millions, and then announced to the different States of the Union, that there was in the Treasury, specifically set apart for them, the sum of thirty-seven millions of dollars, to be paid to them in four instalments. The States agreed to receive the money. Three instalments of the money they did receive. The fourth and last instalment of between nine and ten millions of dollars was to have been paid to them on the first of this month. This is a plain unvarnished statement of the case. Thus we see that on the first day of January last, there was in the Treasury thirty-seven millions of money specifically set apart by the law for the States. There it was. The Secretary of the Treasury counted it and declared it to be there. Now, why has not this money been all paid to the States? Was it because this House passed a bill for the postponement of the last payment? No, sir, but because this administration had previously used this money for their own purposes. They, Martin Van Buren and his administration, betrayed the trust reposed in them, squandered this money—and when the representatives of the people assemble here in special session, we are informed by the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, that the money that was in the Treasury for the States is gone, has evaporated, and that we will have to postpone the payment of one-fourth of it. Thus we see that the money was used by the administration. The President and his policy have postponed the payment of the fourth instalment. Congress has had nothing to do with it. The money was there for the States on the first of January last. When we met here in eight months afterwards it was not there. Suppose the bill for postponing its payment had not been passed, could the States have got the money? No. Why? Because the administration had previously used the money that was specifically set apart for them. Thus you perceive that the Executive postponed the payment of it. And, after doing this, he very modestly calls upon Congress to pass a law to do what he had previously done! Well, and what did Congress do? Why again they echo the will of the President, pass a law postponing what had already been postponed, and declaring a solemn falsehood to the whole country, that we, yes, that we had withheld from the people of the States nine millions and a half of money, when it had been done months before by the executive rulers of our country!

This is the first exhibition of the independence of this body! If we continue thus to comply with the behests of power, and to delude and betray the people, I ask, in the name of Heaven, what is to become of our country and its free institutions?

The second great measure which the administration commanded you to pass, and which you did pass, was the bill for the manufacture of ten millions of Treasury notes. Yes, ten millions of paper money—ten millions, not of bank rags, but Government rags—ten millions of old continental paper—ten millions of shin-plasters! And is it possible that these are the fruits of those long years of exciting, convulsing, distracting experiments, which our rulers promised us should produce such a safe and convenient currency, and flood the whole land with gold? Ay, gold, gold, was the cry; and now we have gold with a vengeance! The banner of our rulers has had for its motto, not our country, nor liberty, nor patriotism, nor union, nor any other ennobling or inspiring sentiment; no, sir, but that miserable and mercenary promise “for gold, gold, gold.” For years have our people been mocked and deluded with the empty promise of gold. And now, at the very moment when they reach forth their expecting hands to possess it, like the gold which is said to reward a bargain with the Prince of Darkness, it turns in their grasp into dust and ashes! The Government has been raking it together from all quarters of the earth. They have wrung it with an iron and unrelenting grasp from the possession of the people. They have forced it out of circulation. It is money no longer; it is now merchandise. It is bought and sold, as you would buy your bread or any other necessary or convenience of life. The people are forced to buy it in order to pay their debts to the Government. And what does the Government do with it? pay it back to the people? No, sir, no, but magnanimously gives it to the office-holders! The office-holders then sell it to the people at a profit of from seven to twelve per cent. The people again pay it to the Government from which, as before, it immediately passes to the office-holders, who again sell it to the people at a large profit. Thus it moves round and round in one continued and contracted circle, cursing the people, and taking at every turn from their hard earnings the amount of premium paid for it, and enriching the pampered office-holder, just in proportion as it robs them. In the mean time the office-holders have got the Government exclusively to themselves. They have all the gold to themselves. They tell us that the Government and the people must be separate and distinct, that it was never intended that the Government should sympathize with their sufferings, or extend relief to their distresses. And how, sir, does this golden Government, with its immense professions, pay its own debts? What do they give to the hard-toiling mechanic—the aged, feeble, and tottering war-worn soldier of the Revolution? And what has the country for a currency? Why, rags, rags; not “bank rags” alone; no, (for they grow more scarce every day,) but all kinds of rags—a complete piece of patchwork, an undistinguished gathering together of rottenness and confusion. And, to crown the whole, the President and his gilded partisans, have passed the bill for the manufacture of ten millions more of rags, with which still further to curse the country—the bill creating ten millions of paper money for the people!

What next? The next great measure that we have recommended to us is the last great experiment of those in power, the “Sub-Treasury System.” This project has not yet received the sanction of this House, and I pray Heaven that it never may. It is now before us for consideration. I purpose, in conclusion, to make a few hasty remarks upon it. I am opposed to this measure. Although not yet approved by Congress, it is now in operation. We see its workings. We have eaten of its fruits, and, for myself, they are distasteful to me. I loathe them. I am for cutting down the tree that produced them.

Sir, this scheme proposes to place in the hands of individuals who are dependent alone on the will of the President for their continuance in office, all, yes all the countless millions of the money of this Government for disbursement and safe-keeping. These men are to receive it, hold it, use it, when and as they please, with no earthly barrier between it and the temptation to appropriate it to their own uses, which the personal custody of such immense treasures must offer, than the feeble restraints of poor, weak, fallible human nature, and the fear of the consequences which might result from an ultimate detection.

How many receivers and holders of the public money, or in other words, how many "sub-treasurers" there will be scattered throughout the whole extent of this wide-spread country, no man can at present determine. In France, where a similar system prevails, there are one hundred thousand! Here I have no doubt, in a short time, the number would even exceed that. These men are to hold and absolutely possess the whole treasures of the nation. Some of them, particularly in our large cities, will have millions of dollars in their hands at a time. One uninterrupted golden current will be continually pouring in upon them. What a temptation (even aside from party political influences) is thus offered to use a portion of this money occasionally or continually, as need or circumstances may require? Sir, the temptation will be irresistible. Surrounded by needy or pressing friends in distress, whose families and fortunes they think may be comforted or repaired by a timely loan; in the very midst of the exciting whirl of speculation, with Fortune's dazzling visions urging them on to use the treasures confided to their keeping, and embark in schemes promising to result in the enjoyment of immense possessions, and with a full certainty that a temporary use of even large amounts, cannot be discovered; taking into consideration with these circumstances the fact that there will be one hundred thousand of these men—I say they will, in some cases, inevitably misappropriate the money. Large amounts of it must be lost. The treasures of the country will be plundered. Under such a system there is no safety for the public funds.

A "sub-Treasury bill," it is gently termed in this House. Before the country, for the purpose of deluding the people and exciting popular feelings in its favor, you name it a "bill to divorce the Government from the banks." But what is it? Trampling the mere name under our feet, and looking at it as it is, stripped and naked in all its odious deformity—I ask what is it? Why, sir, it is a bill for arresting the flow of our prosperity—for subverting the fundamental principles of our republic—a bill for laying the corner-stone of despotism. How do those in power recommend it to us? What arguments do they urge in favor of its adoption? "Oh," they say, "it is no new scheme. It exists in France; it flourishes in Prussia and Austria—it has grown into full and vigorous perfection in Russia. It prevails in Turkey, and in every despotism of the new and old world."

My heart shudders, my blood curdles at their recommendations. In every country under heaven where such a system prevails, the people are trampled on and plundered of their rights; ground down to the very dust by the awful despotism of their rulers; bought and sold like cattle with the earth, persecuted by power, plundered by these very sub-treasurers, "chained to the brutes and fettered to the soil." And yet, sir, this administration and its advocates urge the example of these odious tyrannies, as almost the only argument in favor of the adoption of their hateful scheme. They tell us that their plan works very well in those countries. But they do not tell us that it is there the grand engine of despotism, without which the people could not be kept in slavery! Yes, the plan does work well in despotisms. It does the work effectually. It works admirably well. It answers the very purpose for which it was designed—that of plundering and enslaving the people, whilst it deprives them of the power of resistance!

Where am I? Is it possible that here, in this mighty capital of the only free republic on earth, with the deeds of our gallant fathers still green in our memories, with here and there one of their lingering associates now gazing upon our deliberations, and the thunders of Yorktown yet ringing in our ears—is it possible, I say, under these circumstances, that we can calmly listen to a proposition to abandon the settled policy of our Government from its beginning to this day, despise and denounce the wisdom of its immortal founder, reject a course which has secured an unexampled prosperity to our country, and the utmost stretch of liberty to ourselves—and turn back and affectionately embrace—hug to our bosoms, as jewels above all price, the barbarous institutions of the dark and benighted despotisms of the old world? Are we to turn a deaf ear to the counsels of our revolutionary sages, and receive for our guide the arbitrary decrees of autocrats and tyrants? Sir, is the republican seed, scattered far and wide by our immortal sires, to be eradicated with our own hands—and are we to transplant into our fertile soil the sickly shoots of despotism, and nurse, and water, and cherish them into health and vigor and fructification? Heaven forbid. Let every man who wishes well to our republican institutions put the seal of his reprobation on this scheme.

I have said that this very "sub-Treasury system" is one of the great means used by the autocrats of Europe for perpetuating their tyrannies. In the hands of a monarch it is an engine of tremendous power. He appoints every officer. They are all absolutely dependent upon him, and are appointed to do his bidding. They are responsible to him alone. They are scattered all over the empire. Every petty district has its officer to receive and hold the revenues of the Government. They have immediate communication with the people. Of course, as the interest of the officer binds him to serve his sovereign, and as there is no one to interfere between them, the money he receives can be used in influencing the people (or subjects as they are there called) in any way desirable. Thus thousands and tens of thousands of these little treasurers are using the money in their respective districts, so as to produce the desired influence on the people. And yet, in a moment, the whole treasure can be collected in one concentrated mass at the nod of the monarch. This is all done silently and secretly. The evil is felt, and no one can tell whence it comes. Despotism is upon them, and they have no means to break it.

This system of monarchy, this engine of despotism, is the very one which the bill under consideration proposes to introduce into this country. It will make the power of the President as supreme as that of any autocrat of Europe. You will have a hundred thousand office-holders appointed by the President, holding their office at his pleasure, dependent upon his will for the very bread they eat, and commissioned to do his bidding. Every neighborhood will have within its narrow confines one of these "sub-treasurers" "to harass the people and eat out their substance." The land will be filled with spies and informers. All the public money, millions on millions, will be in their hands! It will be scattered about among their partisans, become the source of countless demoralizing speculations upon the industry and property of the people, and must inevitably end in concentrating all power in the breast of the Executive. Adopt this scheme, carry out its provisions in all their ramifications, and there will be no salvation for this republic; republican forms may exist, but despotism will be its very life-blood, its pervading spirit.

This scheme will not only increase the number of your officers four-fold, and thus quadruple the taxes of the people, but it will furnish Government with an irresistible means of controlling the popular will. These officers must use the money to promote the views of their masters. They are appointed for that purpose. He who would dare refuse to do their bidding, would not only be instantly dismissed, but hunted beyond the pale of national consideration; yes, be denationalized and proscribed by the hireling hacks of party power.

SATURDAY, October 14.

Florida War,

The House proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday morning, which was the consideration of Mr. WISE's resolution on the Florida war; and the question being on Mr. McKAY's motion to postpone the consideration of the resolution to the 1st of December next—

MR. UNDERWOOD said that, in the early stages of the debate upon the resolution under consideration, he understood the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) to say that he had been informed, in a manner entitled to credit, that General Jesup had entered into an engagement with Hopothlehohola, stipulating to secure and protect that chief in his possessions, provided he would give his aid to the army of the United States, and assist General Jesup in his operations; that the gallant Indian chief, relying upon the assurances of General Jesup, had devoted himself to our service, and that, after success crowned the operations of General Jesup, he turned upon the chief in violation of his engagement, and drove him from his possessions. I was forcibly impressed at the time with the impropriety of the conduct thus imputed to General Jesup. I could not believe that a gallant soldier, who had risen from the humblest ranks to the command of an army, who had on several occasions displayed a combination of talents and bravery which induced the country to confide in him as a fit commander in the South, would so far debase himself as to decoy an Indian chief into his service, by a promise of protection, and, as soon as he had answered his purposes, turn upon his ally in violation of his engagement, and expel him from his home. Such conduct would not only have been disgraceful to General Jesup as a man, but it would tarnish the reputation of the country, regarding him as the representative of the country. Feeling as I did, I asked the gentleman from Virginia whether General Jesup's engagement with Hopothlehohola, and after conduct, had been the result of orders emanating from higher authority, or whether General Jesup alone was responsible? The gentleman's information did not enable him to answer. I deemed it proper to communicate the substance of the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia, to General Jesup. On the day before yesterday I received his answer, in which he says: "No such treaty or engagement as that stated to have been made was ever thought of; every engagement made with Hopothlehohola, so far as depended upon me, or so far as I am informed, has been faithfully fulfilled." Thus, sir, a direct contradiction is given by General Jesup to the information communicated to the House. His letter evinces a desire to have the "whole subject of the war in Alabama and Florida investigated." Instead of shrinking from it, he invites it. His language is: "Let persons and papers be sent for; let investigation be pushed to the utmost, I have nothing to fear."

In reference to the supposed treaty or engagement with Hopothlehohola, the General indignantly remarks that, had it been made, "no power on earth should have compelled him to violate it." He would have surrendered his commission sooner than have presented himself before the world in the attitude of playing the hypocrite with an Indian chief; and, after securing his confidence and assistance, turning upon him the instruments of destruction. Such sentiments are worthy of an American general; and I trust, sir, they meet with proper sympathy in the bosoms of the members of this House.

I have thought it an act of justice to General Jesup to make the preceding statement; and now that I am up, I shall take the occasion to say, that I trust the resolution will be adopted, and that the fullest investigation may be had into all the operations of the Florida war.

MR. WISE vindicated himself from having, in his own person, made the charge at all: he had stated it as it had been stated to him: he rejoiced to hear the language of General Jesup in relation to it: but insisted that this very reply went to show the importance of the investigation he advocated, that justice might be done to the innocent, while the guilty were exposed.

MR. UNDERWOOD exculpated Mr. Wise from all blame in the matter, and expressed approbation of his course, as an honest discharge of his duty.

Sub-Treasury Bill.

The question being on ordering to its third reading the bill from the Senate imposing additional duties, as depositaries, in certain cases, on public officers—

MR. CLARK, of New York, said: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss the merits of the bill, or to express any opinion in relation to them. I should have preferred that a motion had been made to postpone its further consideration until the first day of the next session. The subject matter of the bill is one on which there is, among the friends of the administration, a difference of opinion, and, I have no doubt, an honest difference. The gentleman from South Carolina, a friend of the administration, in his remarks of yesterday, regretted that he should be called upon at this time for final action on the bill. He preferred to wait until an opportunity should be afforded to him to ascertain the wishes of his constituents. In these views I concur. In voting for the present motion, I shall do so for the same reasons which would influence me to vote for a postponement until the next session, considering the effects the same, neither of which determines the ultimate fate of the bill. The vote I am about to give will furnish no evidence of my opinion as to the merits of the bill, or of my action on the question of its final passage. The sub-Treasury scheme, considered as an administration measure, is novel. In 1835, it was proposed by the whigs in Congress, and received the unanimous and vigorous opposition of the democratic members. Whether it is possible for the opposition to originate a good measure, I will not inquire. They have, however, been unfortunate in presenting at this session any measure, good, bad, or indifferent, always saving and excepting their sovereign remedy, their universal panacea for all our fiscal maladies, the United States Bank.

I repeat that this measure, as a democratic one, is new. Public opinion has not been sufficiently enlightened to draw any correct conclusion of its disposition. It has not been, to any considerable extent, the subject of discussion, either in the social circle, or in the primary assemblies of the people. And the same remark is true as regards the newspaper press. I doubt whether five country papers in the State of New York, previous to the session of Congress, had canvassed this project, or given any opinions thereon. The Albany Argus, the leading democratic journal in that State—a journal which possesses great influence over the country press—had not, up to that period, taken ground on this subject. Under these circumstances, it can hardly be expected that resolutions emanating from county conventions could be considered as furnishing that evidence of the popular will as they otherwise would. All the republican conventions have expressed their approbation of the general principles set forth in the Message; few of them, however, have given any expression of opinion as regards this specific measure. No one is more ready, on all occasions, to bow with deference to the will of his constituents, when formed upon reflection and deliberation, and fairly and fully expressed, than myself; and it will ever be my pleasure to carry that will into execution. Were I opposed to this bill, (and I repeat that I give no opinion in regard to it,) I would, with alacrity, surrender my own opinion at the feet of my constituents.

It has been my misfortune not to have enjoyed any interchange of sentiment with my constituents, as have most of the gentlemen of this House. I wish to obey their will, and for this purpose I should be glad, by a personal interview, to ascertain that will; and when ascertained, I shall not fail to execute it.

MR. C. moved to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were thereupon taken, as follows:

Adjournment.

The resolution which had been received from the Senate, for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that, unless he had other communications to make to Congress, the two Houses were about to close the present session by an adjournment, was now taken up and agreed to, and

Mr. THOMAS of Maryland, Mr. POPE of Kentucky, and Mr. TAYLOR of New York, were appointed of the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. THOMAS having reported that the committee appointed for the purpose had waited on the President of the United States, and received for answer to their message to him that he had no further communication to make,

The House adjourned until the first Monday in December next, the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN THE

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

[The form of the original Debates, as reported, is changed at this date, and the proceedings of each day are placed together, instead of the distinct continuous reports of the proceedings of each House during the entire Session.]

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, Dec. 4, 1837.

The second session of the twenty-fifth Congress convened this day.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the customary resolutions of information to the President and the House of Representatives were passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

December 4, 1837.

The roll of the members of the House was called over by States.

On motion of Mr. MUHLENBERG, a message was ordered to be sent to the Senate, to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled, and that the House was ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. MUHLENBERG, a committee of three was appointed, in conjunction with such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress had convened, and were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 5.

Mr. HUBBARD of New Hampshire, and Mr. TALLMADGE of New York, took their seats.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

We have reason to renew the expression of our devout gratitude to the GIVER OF ALL GOOD for his benign protection. Our country presents, on every side, the evidences of that continued favor, under whose auspices it has gradually risen from a few feeble and dependent Colonies to a prosperous and powerful Confederacy. We are blessed with domestic tranquillity, and all the elements of national prosperity. The pestilence which, invading for a time, some flourishing portions of the Union, interrupted the general prevalence of unusual health, has happily been limited in extent, and arrested in its fatal career. The industry and prudence of our citizens are gradually relieving them from the pecuniary embarrassments under which portions of them have labored; judicious legislation, and the natural and boundless resources of the country, have afforded wise and timely aid to private enterprise; and the activity always characteristic of our people has already, in a great degree, resumed its usual and profitable channels.

The condition of our foreign relations has not materially changed since the last annual message of my predecessor. We remain at peace with all nations; and no efforts on my part, consistent with the preservation of our rights and the honor of the country, shall be spared to maintain a position so consonant to our institutions. We have faithfully sustained the foreign policy with which the United States, under the guidance of their first President, took their stand in the family of nations—that of regulating their intercourse with other powers by the approved principles of private life; asking and according equal rights and equal privileges; rendering and demanding justice in all cases; advancing their own, and discussing the pretensions of others, with candor, directness, and sincerity; appealing at all times to reason, but never yielding to force, nor seeking to acquire any thing for themselves by its exercise.

ernment with scarcely a claim upon its justice, for injuries arising from acts committed by its authority. The most imposing and perplexing of those of the United States upon foreign Governments, for aggressions upon our citizens, were disposed of by my predecessor. Independently of the benefits conferred upon our citizens by restoring to the mercantile community so many millions of which they had been wrongfully divested, a great service was also rendered to his country by the satisfactory adjustment of so many ancient and irritating subjects of contention; and it reflects no ordinary credit on his successful administration of public affairs, that this great object was accomplished, without compromising, on any occasion, either the honor, or the peace of the nation.

With European powers no new subjects of difficulty have arisen; and those which were under discussion, although not terminated, do not present a more unfavorable aspect for the future preservation of that good understanding, which it has ever been our desire to cultivate.

Of pending questions, the most important is that which exists with the Government of Great Britain, in respect to our north-eastern boundary. It is with unfeigned regret, that the people of the United States must look back upon the abortive efforts made by the Executive, for a period of more than half a century, to determine, what no nation should suffer long to remain in dispute, the true line which divides its possessions from those of other powers. The nature of the settlements on the borders of the United States, and of the neighboring territory, was for a season such, that this perhaps was not indispensable to a faithful performance of the duties of the Federal Government. Time has, however, changed this state of things; and has brought about a condition of affairs, in which the true interests of both countries imperatively require that this question should be put at rest. It is not to be disguised, that with full confidence often expressed, in the desire of the British Government to terminate it, we are apparently as far from its adjustment as we were at the time of signing the treaty of peace, in 1783. The sole result of long pending negotiations, and a perplexing arbitration, appears to be a conviction, on its part, that a conventional line must be adopted, from the impossibility of ascertaining the true one according to the description contained in that treaty. Without coinciding in this opinion, which is not thought to be well founded, my predecessor gave the strongest proof of the earnest desire of the United States to terminate satisfactorily this dispute, by proposing the substitution of a conventional line, if the consent of the States interested in the question could be obtained. To this proposition, no answer has yet been received. The attention of the British Government has, however, been urgently invited to the subject, and its reply cannot, I am confident, be much longer delayed. The general relations between Great Britain and the United States are of the most friendly character, and I am well satisfied of the sincere disposition of that Government to maintain them upon their present footing. This disposition has also, I am persuaded, become more general with the people of England than at any previous period. It is scarcely necessary to say to you, how cordially it is reciprocated by the Government and people of the United States. The conviction, which must be common to all, of the injurious consequences that result from keeping open this irritating question, and the certainty that its final settlement cannot be much longer deferred, will, I trust, lead to an early and satisfactory adjustment. At your last session, I laid before you the recent communications between the two Governments, and between this Government and that of the State of Maine, in whose solicitude, concerning a subject in which she had so deep an interest, every portion of the Union participates.

The feelings produced by a temporary interruption of those harmonious relations between France and the United States, which are due as well to the recollections of former times as to a correct appreciation of existing interests, have been happily succeeded by a cordial disposition on both sides to cultivate an active friendship in their future intercourse. The opinion, undoubtedly correct, and steadily entertained by us, that the commercial relations at present existing between the two countries are susceptible of great and reciprocally beneficial improvements, is obviously gaining ground in France; and I am assured of the disposition of that Government to favor the accomplishment of such an object. This disposition shall be met in in a proper spirit on our part. The few and comparatively unimportant questions that remain to be adjusted between us, can, I have no doubt, be settled with entire satisfaction, and without difficulty.

Between Russia and the United States, sentiments of good will continue to be mutually cherished. Our Minister recently accredited to that Court, has been received with a frankness and cordiality, and with evidences of respect for his country, which leave us no room to doubt the preservation in future of those amicable and liberal relations which have so long and so uninterruptedly existed between the two countries. On the few subjects under discussion between us, an early and just decision is confidently anticipated.

A correspondence has been opened with the Government of Austria, for the establishment of diplomatic relations, in conformity with the wishes of Congress, as indicated by an appropriation act of the session of 1837, and arrangements made for the purpose, which will be duly carried into effect.

With Austria and Prussia, and with the States of the German empire, now composing with the latter the Commercial League, our political relations are of the most friendly character, whilst our commercial intercourse is gradually extending, with benefit to all who are engaged in it.

Civil war yet rages in Spain, producing intense suffering to its own people, and to other nations inconvenience and regret. Our citizens who have claims upon that country will be prejudiced for a time by the condition of its Treasury, the inevitable consequence of long-continued and exhausting internal wars. The last instalment of the interest of the debt due under the convention with the Queen of Spain has not been paid; and similar failures may be expected to happen, until a portion of the resources of her kingdom can be devoted to the extinguishment of its foreign debt.

Having received satisfactory evidence that discriminating tonnage duties were charged upon the vessels of the United States in the ports of Portugal, a proclamation was issued on the 11th day of October last, in compliance with the act of May 25, 1832, declaring that fact; and the duties on foreign tonnage which were levied upon Portuguese vessels in the United States, previously to the passage of that act, are accordingly revived.

The act of July 4, 1836, suspending the discriminating duties upon the produce of Portugal imported into this country in Portuguese vessels, was passed upon the application of that Government, through its representative here, under the belief that no similar discrimination existed in Portugal to the prejudice of the United States. I regret to state that such duties are now exacted in that country upon the cargoes of American vessels; and as the act referred to vests no discretion in the Executive, it is for Congress to determine upon the expediency of further legislation on the subject. Against these discriminations, affecting the vessels of this country and their cargoes, seasonable remonstrance was made, and notice was given to the Portuguese Government that unless they should be discontinued, the adoption of countervailing measures on the part of the United States would become necessary; but the reply of that Government, received at the Department of State through our Charge d'Affaires at Lisbon, in the month of September last, afforded no ground of hope for the abandonment of a system so little in harmony with the treatment shown to the vessels of Portugal, and their cargoes in the ports of this country, and so contrary to the expectations we had a right to entertain.

With Holland, Sweden, Denmark, Naples, and Belgium, a friendly intercourse has been uninterruptedly maintained.

With the Government of the Ottoman Porte and its dependencies on the coast of the Mediterranean, peace and good will are carefully cultivated, and have been fostered by such good offices as the relative distance and the condition of those countries would permit.

Our commerce with Greece is carried on under the laws of the two governments, reciprocally beneficial to the navigating interests of both; and I have reason to look forward to the adoption of other measures which will be more extensively and permanently advantageous.

Copies of the treaties concluded with the Governments of Siam and Muscat are transmitted for the information of Congress, the ratifications having been received, and the treaties made public, since the close of the last annual session. Already have we reason to congratulate ourselves on the prospect of considerable commercial benefit; and we have, besides, received from the Sultan of Muscat prompt evidence of his desire to cultivate the most friendly feelings, by liberal acts towards one of our vessels, bestowed in a manner so striking as to require on our part a grateful acknowledgment.

Our commerce with the Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico still labors under heavy restrictions, the continuance of which is a subject of regret. The only effect of an adherence to them will be to benefit the navigation of other countries, at the expense both of the United States and Spain.

The independent nations of this continent have, ever since they emerged from the colonial state, experienced severe trials in their progress to the permanent establishment of liberal political institutions. Their unsettled condition not only interrupts their own advances to prosperity, but has often seriously injured the other powers of the world. The claims of our citizens upon Peru, Chili, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, the Governments formed out of the Republics of Colombia and Mexico, are still pending, although many of them have been presented for examination more than twenty years. New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador, have recently formed a convention for the purpose of ascertaining and adjusting claims upon the Republic of Colombia, from which it is earnestly hoped our citizens will, ere long, receive full compensation for the injuries originally inflicted upon them, and for the delay in affording it.

An advantageous treaty of commerce has been concluded by the United States with the Peru-Bolivian Confederation, which wants only the ratification of that Government. The progress of a subsequent negotiation for the settlement of claims upon Peru, has been unfavorably affected by the war between that power and Chili, and the Argentine Republic; and the same event is also likely to produce delays in the settlement of our demands on those powers.

The aggravating circumstances connected with our claims upon Mexico, and a variety of events touching the honor and integrity of our Government, led my predecessor to make, at the second session of the last Congress, a special recommendation of the course to be pursued to obtain a speedy and final satisfaction of the injuries complained of by this Government and by our citizens. He recommended a final demand of redress, with a contingent authority to the Executive to make reprisals, if that demand should be made in vain. From the proceedings of Congress on that recommendation, it appeared that the opinion of both branches of the Legislature coincided with that of the Executive, that any mode of redress known to the law of nations might justifiably be used. It was obvious, too, that Congress believed, with the President, that another demand should be made, in order to give undeniable and satisfactory proof of our desire to avoid extremities with a neighboring power; but that there was an indisposition to vest a discretionary authority in the Executive to take redress, should it unfortunately be either denied or unreasonably delayed by the Mexican Government. So soon as the necessary documents were prepared, after entering upon the duties of my office a special messenger was sent to Mexico, to make a final demand of redress, with the documents required by the provisions of our treaty. The demand was made on the 20th of July last. The reply, which bears date the 29th of the same month, contains assurances of a desire, on the part of that Government, to give a prompt and explicit answer respecting each of the complaints, but that the examination of them would necessarily be deliberate; that in this examination, it would be guided by the principles of public law and the obligation of treaties; that nothing should be left undone that might lead to the most speedy and equitable adjustment of our demands; and that its determination, in respect to each case, should be communicated through the Mexican Minister here.

Since that time, an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary has been accredited to this Government by that of the Mexican Republic. He brought with him assurances of a sincere desire that the pending differences between the two Governments should be terminated in a manner satisfactory to both. He was received with reciprocal assurances; and a hope was entertained that this mission would lead to a speedy, satisfactory, and final adjustment of all existing subjects of complaint. A sincere believer in the wisdom of the pacific policy by which the United States have always been governed in their intercourse with foreign nations; it was my particular desire, from the proximity of the Mexican Republic, and well-known occurrences on our frontier, to be instrumental in obviating all existing difficulties with that Government, and in restoring to the intercourse between the two Republics, that liberal and friendly character by which they should always be distinguished. I regret, therefore, the more deeply to have found in the recent communications of that Government so little reason to hope that any future efforts of mine for the accomplishment of those desirable objects would be successful.

Although the larger number, and many of them aggravated cases of personal wrongs, have been now for years before the Mexican Government, and some of the causes of national complaint, and those of the most offensive character, admitted of immediate, simple, and satisfactory replies, it is only within a few days past that any specific communication in answer to our last demand, made five months ago, has been received from the Mexican Minister. By the report of the Secretary of State, herewith presented, and the accompanying documents, it will be seen, that for not one of our public complaints has satisfaction been given or offered; that but one of the cases of personal wrong has been favorably considered, and that but four cases of both descriptions, out of all those formally presented, and earnestly pressed, have as yet been decided upon by the Mexican Government.

Not perceiving in what manner any of the powers given to the Executive alone could be further usefully employed in bringing this unfortunate controversy to a satisfactory termination, the subject was by my predecessor referred to Congress, as one calling for its interposition. In accordance with the clearly understood wishes of the Legislature, another and formal demand for satisfaction has been made upon the Mexican Government; with what success the documents now communicated will show. On a careful and deliberate examination of their contents, and considering the spirit manifested by the Mexican Government, it has become my painful duty to return the subject, as it now stands, to Congress, to whom it belongs, to decide upon the time, the mode, and the measure of redress. Whatever may be your decision, it shall be faithfully executed, confident that it will be characterized by that moderation and justice which will, I trust, under all circumstances, govern the councils of our country.

The balance in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1837, was forty-five millions nine hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and twenty-three dollars. The receipts during the present year from all sources, including the amount of Treasury notes issued, are estimated at twenty-three millions four hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-one dollars, constituting an aggregate of sixty-nine millions four hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and four dollars. Of this amount, about thirty-five millions two hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and sixty-one dollars will have been expended at the end of the year on appropriations made by Congress; and the residue, amounting to thirty-four millions one hundred and eighty-seven thousand one hundred and forty three dollars, will be the nominal balance in the Treasury on the first of January next. But of that sum, only one million eighty-five thousand four hundred and ninety-eight dollars is considered as immediately available for, and applicable to, public purposes. Those portions of it which will be for some time unavailable, consist chiefly of sums deposited with the States, and due from the former deposit banks. The details upon this subject will be found in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The amount of Treasury notes, which it will be necessary to issue during the year on account of those funds being unavailable, will, it is supposed, not exceed four and a half millions. It seemed proper, in the condition of the country, to have the estimates on all subjects made as low as practicable, without prejudice to any great public measures. The Departments were, therefore, desired to prepare their estimates accordingly; and I am happy to find that they have been able to graduate them on so economical a scale. In the great and often unexpected fluctuations to which the revenue is subjected, it is not possible to compute the receipts beforehand with great certainty; but should they not differ essentially from present anticipations, and should the appropriations not much exceed the estimates, no difficulty seems likely to happen in defraying the current expenses with promptitude and fidelity.

Notwithstanding the great embarrassments which have recently occurred in commercial affairs, and the liberal indulgence which, in consequence of those embarrassments, has been extended to both the merchants and the banks, it is gratifying to be able to anticipate that the Treasury notes, which have been issued during the present year, will be redeemed, and that the resources of the Treasury, without any resort to loans or increased taxes, will prove ample for defraying all charges imposed on it during 1838.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury will afford you a more minute exposition of all matters connected with the administration of the finances during the current year; a period which, for the amount of public moneys disbursed and deposited with the States as well as the financial difficulties encountered and overcome, has few parallels in our history. Your attention was, at the last session, invited to the necessity of additional legislative provisions in respect to the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money. No law having been then matured, and not understanding the proceedings of Congress as intended to be final, it becomes my duty to again bring the subject to your notice.

On that occasion, three modes of performing this branch of the public service were presented for consideration. These were: the creation of a national bank; the revival, with modifications, of the deposit system established by the act of the 23d of June, 1836, permitting the use of the public moneys by the banks, and the discontinuance of the use of such institutions for the purposes referred to, with suitable provisions for their accomplishment through the agency of public officers. Considering the opinions of both Houses of Congress on the two first propositions as expressed in the negative, in which I entirely concur, it is unnecessary for me again to recur to them. In respect to the last, you have had an opportunity since your adjournment, not only to test still further the expediency of the measure, by the continued practical operation of such parts of it as are now in force, but also to discover—what should ever be sought for and regarded with the utmost deference—the opinions and wishes of the people. The national will is the supreme law of the Republic, and, on all subjects within the limits of his constitutional powers, should be faithfully obeyed by the public servant. Since the measure in question was submitted to your consideration, most of you have enjoyed the advantage of personal communication with your constituents. For one State only has an election been held for the Federal Government; but the early day at which it took place, deprives the measure under consideration of much of the support it might otherwise have derived from the result. Local elections for State officers have, however, been held in several of the States, at which the expediency of the plan proposed by the Executive has been more or less discussed. You will, I am confident, yield to their results the respect due to every expression of the public voice. Desiring, however, to arrive at truth and a just view of the subject in all its bearings, you will at the same time remember, that questions of far deeper and more immediate local interest, than the fiscal plans of the National Treasury, were involved in those elections. Above all, we cannot overlook the striking fact, that there were at the time in those States more than one hundred and sixty millions of bank capital, of which large portions were subject to actual forfeiture—other large portions upheld only by special and limited legislative indulgences—and most of it, if not all, to a greater or less extent, dependent for a continuance of its corporate existence upon the will of the State Legislatures to be then chosen. Apprised of this circumstance, you will judge whether it is not most probable that the peculiar condition of that vast interest in these respects, the extent to which it has been spread through all the ramifications of society, its direct connection with the then pending elections, and the feelings it was calculated to infuse into the canvass, have exercised a far greater influence over the result, than any which could possibly have been produced by a conflict of opinion in respect to a question in the administration of the General Government, more remote and far less important in its bearings upon that interest.

I have found no reason to change my own opinion as to the expediency of adopting the system proposed, being perfectly satisfied that there will be neither stability nor safety, either in the fiscal affairs of the Government, or in the pecuniary transactions of individuals and corporations, so long as a connection exists between them, which, like the past, offers such strong inducements to make them the subjects of political agitation. Indeed, I am more than ever convinced of the dangers to which the free and unbiassed exercise of political opinion—the only sure foundation and safeguard of republican Government—would be exposed by any further increase of the already overgrown influence of corporate authorities. I cannot, therefore, consistently with my views of duty, advise a renewal of a connection which circumstances have dissolved.

The discontinuance of the use of State banks for fiscal purposes ought not to be regarded as a measure of hostility toward those institutions. Banks, properly established and conducted, are highly useful to the business of the country, and will doubtless continue to exist in the States, so long as they conform to their laws, and are found to be safe and beneficial. How they should be created, what privileges they should enjoy, under what responsibilities they should act, and to what restrictions they should be subject, are questions which, as I observed on a previous occasion, belong to the States to decide. Upon their rights, or the exercise of them, the General Government can have no motive to encroach. Its duty toward them is well performed, when it refrains from legislating for their special benefit, because such legislation would violate the spirit of the constitution, and be unjust to other interests; when it takes no steps to impair their usefulness, but so manages its own affairs as to make it the interest of those institutions to strengthen and improve their condition for the security and welfare of the community at large. They have no right to insist on a connection with the Federal Government, nor on the use of the public money for their own benefit. The object of the measure under consideration is, to avoid for the future a compulsory connection of this kind. It proposes to place the General Government, in regard to the essential points of the collection, safe-keeping, and transfer of the public money, in a situation which shall relieve it from all dependence on the will of irresponsible individuals or corporations; to withdraw those moneys from the uses of private trade, and confide them to agents constitutionally selected and controlled by law; to abstain from improper interference with the industry of the people, and withhold inducements to improvident dealings on the part of individuals; to give stability to the concerns of the Treasury: to preserve the measures of the Government from the unavoidable reproaches that flow from such a connection, and the banks themselves from the injurious effects of a supposed participation in the political conflicts of the day, from which they will otherwise find it difficult to escape.

These are my views upon this important subject; formed after careful reflection, and with no desire but to arrive at what is most likely to promote the public interest. They are now, as they were before, submitted with unfeigned deference for the opinions of others. It was hardly to be hoped that changes so important, on a subject so interesting, could be made without producing a serious diversity of opinion; but so long as those conflicting views are kept above the influence of individual or local interests; so long as they pursue only the general good, and are discussed with moderation and candor, such a diversity is a benefit, not an injury. If a majority of Congress see the public welfare in a different light; and more especially if they should be satisfied that the measure proposed would not be acceptable to the people; I shall look to their wisdom to substitute such as may be more conducive to the one, and more satisfactory to the other. In any event, they may confidently rely on my hearty co-operation to the fullest extent, which my views of the constitution and my sense of duty will permit.

It is obviously important to this branch of the public service, and to the business and quiet of the country, that the whole subject should in some way be settled and regulated by law; and, if possible, at your present session. Besides the plans above referred to, I am not aware that any one has been suggested, except that of keeping the public money in the State banks in special deposit. This plan is, to some extent, in accordance with the practice of the Government, and with the present arrangement of the Treasury Department; which, except, perhaps, during the operation of the late deposit act, has always been allowed, even during the existence of a National Bank, to make a temporary use of the State banks, in particular places, for the safe-keeping of portions of the revenue. This discretionary power might be continued, if Congress deem it desirable, whatever general system be adopted. So long as the connection is voluntary, we need perhaps anticipate few of those difficulties, and little of that dependence, on the banks, which must attend every such connection when compulsory in its nature, and when so arranged as to make the banks a fixed part of the machinery of Government. It is undoubtedly in the power of Congress, so to regulate and guard it as to prevent the public money from being applied to the use, or intermingled with the affairs, of individuals. Thus arranged, although it would not give to the Government that entire control over its own funds which I desire to secure to it by the plan I have proposed, it would, it must be admitted, in a great degree, accomplish one of the objects which has recommended that plan to my judgment—the separation of the fiscal concerns of the Government from those of individuals or corporations. With these observations, I recommend the whole matter to your dispassionate reflection; confidently hoping that some conclusion may be reached by your deliberations, which, on the one hand, shall give safety and stability to the fiscal operations of the Government, and be consistent on the other, with the genius of our institutions, and with the interests and wishes of the great mass of our constituents.

It was my hope that nothing would occur to make necessary, on this occasion, any allusion to the late National Bank. There are circumstances, however, connected with the present state of its affairs, that bear so directly on the character of the Government and the welfare of the citizen, that I should not feel myself excused in neglecting to notice them. The charter which terminated its banking privileges, on the fourth of March, 1836, continued its corporate powers two years more, for the sole purpose of closing its affairs, with authority "to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits for a final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and acts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, but for no other purpose or in any other manner whatsoever." Just before the banking privileges ceased, its effects were transferred by the bank to a new State institution then recently incorporated, in trust, for the discharge of its debts, and the settlement of its affairs. With this trustee, by authority of Congress, an adjustment was subsequently made of the large interest which the Government had in the stock of the institution. The manner in which a trust unexpectedly created upon the act granting the charter, and involving such great public interests, has been executed, would, under any circumstances, be a fit subject of inquiry; but much more does it deserve your attention, when it embraces the redemption of obligations to which the authority and credit of the United States have given value. The two years allowed are now nearly at an end. It is well understood that the trustee has not redeemed and cancelled the outstanding notes of the bank, but has reissued, and is actually reissuing, since the third of March, 1836, the notes which have been received by it to a vast amount. According to its own official statement, so late as the first of October last, nineteen months after the banking privileges given by the charter had expired, it had under its control uncanceled notes of the late Bank of the United States to the amount of twenty-seven millions five hundred and sixty-one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars, of which six millions one hundred and seventy-five thousand eight hundred and sixty-one dollars were in actual circulation, one million four hundred and sixty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty-seven dollars at State bank agencies, and three millions two thousand three hundred and ninety dollars in transitu; thus showing that upwards of ten millions and a half of the notes of the old bank were then still kept outstanding. The impropriety of this procedure is obvious: it being the duty of the trustee to cancel and not to put forth the notes of an institution, whose concerns it had undertaken to wind up. If the trustee has a right to reissue these notes now, I can see no reason why it may not continue to do so after the expiration of the two years. As no one could have anticipated a course so extraordinary, the prohibitory clause of the charter above quoted was not accompanied by any penalty or other special provision for enforcing it; nor have we any general law for the prevention of similar acts in future.

But it is not in this view of the subject alone that your interposition is required. The United States, in settling with the trustee for their stock, have withdrawn their funds from their former direct liability to the creditors of the old bank, yet notes of the institution continue to be sent forth in its name, and apparently upon the authority of the United States. The transactions connected with the employment of the bills of the old bank are of vast extent; and should they result unfortunately, the interest of individuals may be deeply compromised. Without undertaking to decide how far, or in what form, if any, the trustee could be made liable for notes which contain no obligation on its part; or the old bank, for such as are put in circulation after the expiration of its charter, and without its authority; or the Government for indemnity, in case of loss, the question still presses itself upon your consideration, whether it is consistent with duty and good faith on the part of the Government, to witness this proceeding without a single effort to arrest it.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, will show how the affairs of that office have been conducted for the past year. The disposition of the public lands is one of the most important trusts confided to Congress. The practicability of retaining the title and control of such extensive domains in the General Government, and at the same time admitting the Territories embracing them into the Federal Union as co-equals with the original States, was seriously doubted by many of our wisest statesmen. All feared that they would become a source of discord, and many carried their apprehensions so far as to see in them the seeds of a future dissolution of the Confederacy. But happily our experience has already been sufficient to quiet, in a great degree, all such apprehensions. The position, at one time assumed—that the admission of new States into the Union on the same footing with the original States, was incompatible with a right of soil in the United States, and operated as a surrender thereof, notwithstanding the terms of the compacts by which their admission was designed to be regulated—has been wisely abandoned. Whether in the new or the old States, all now agree that the right of soil to the public lands remains in the Federal Government, and that these lands constitute a common property, to be disposed of for the common benefit of all the States, old and new. Acquiescence in this just principle by the people of the new States has naturally promoted a disposition to adopt the most liberal policy in the sale of the public lands. A policy which should be limited to the mere object of selling the lands for the greatest possible sum of money, without regard to higher considerations, finds but few advocates. On the contrary, it is generally conceded, that whilst the mode of disposition adopted by the Government, should always be a prudent one, yet its leading object ought to be the early settlement and cultivation of the lands sold; and that it should discountenance, if it cannot prevent, the accumulation of large tracts in the same hands, which must necessarily retard the growth of the New States, or entail upon them a dependent tenantry, and its attendant evils.

A question embracing such important interests, and so well calculated to enlist the feelings of the people in every quarter of the Union, has very naturally given rise to numerous plans for the improvement of the existing system. The distinctive features of the policy that has hitherto prevailed, are, to dispose of the public lands at moderate prices, thus enabling a greater number to enter into competition for their purchase, and accomplishing a double object of promoting their rapid settlement by the purchasers, and at the same time increasing the receipts of the Treasury; to sell for cash, thereby preventing the disturbing influence of a large mass of private citizens indebted to the Government, which they have a voice in controlling; to bring them into market no faster than good lands are supposed to be wanted for improvements, thereby preventing the accumulation of large tracts in few hands; and to apply the proceeds of the sales to the general purposes of the Government; thus diminishing the amount to be raised from the people of the States by taxation, and giving each State its portion of the benefits to be derived from this common fund in a manner the most quiet, and at the same time, perhaps, the most equitable, that can be devised. These provisions, with occasional enactments in behalf of special interests deemed entitled to the favor of the Government, have, in their execution, produced results as beneficial upon the whole as could reasonably be expected in a matter so vast, so complicated, and so exciting. Upwards of seventy millions of acres have been sold, the greater part of which is believed to have been purchased for actual settlement. The population of the new States and Territories created out of the public domain, increased between 1800 and 1830 from less than sixty thousand to upwards of two millions three hundred thousand souls, constituting, at the latter period, about one-fifth of the whole people of the United States. The increase since cannot be accurately known, but the whole may now be safely estimated at over three and a half millions of souls; composing nine States, the representatives of which constitute above one-third of the Senate and over one-sixth of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Thus has been formed a body of free and independent landholders, with a rapidity unequalled in the history of mankind; and this great result has been produced without leaving any thing for future adjustment between the Government and its citizens. The system under which so much has been accomplished cannot be intrinsically bad, and with occasional modifications, to correct abuses and adapt it to changes of circumstances, may, I think, be safely trusted for the future. There is, in the management of such extensive interests, much virtue in stability, and although great and obvious improvements should not be declined, changes should never be made without the fullest examination, and the clearest demonstration of their practical utility. In the history of the past, we have an assurance that this safe rule of action will not be departed from in relation to the public lands; nor is it believed that any necessity exists for interfering with the fundamental principles of the system, or that the public mind, even in the new States, is desirous of any radical alterations. On the contrary, the general disposition appears to be, to make such modifications and additions only as will the more effectually carry out the original policy of filling our new States and Territories with an industrious and independent population.

The modification most perseveringly pressed upon Congress, which has occupied so much of its time for years past, and will probably do so for a long time to come, if not sooner satisfactorily adjusted, is a reduction in the cost of such portions of the public lands as are ascertained to be unsalable at the rate now established by law, and a graduation, according to their relative value, of the prices at which they may hereafter be sold. It is worthy of consideration whether justice may not be done to every interest in this matter, and a vexed question set at rest, perhaps forever, by an asonable compromise of conflicting opinions. Hitherto, after being offered at public sale, lands have been disposed of at one uniform price, whatever difference there might be in their intrinsic value. The leading considerations urged in favor of the measure referred to are, that in almost all the land districts, and particularly in those in which the lands have been long surveyed and exposed to sale, there are still remaining numerous and large tracts of every gradation of value, from the Government price downwards; that these lands will not be purchased at the Government price, so long as better can be conveniently obtained for the same amount; that there are large tracts which even the improvements of the adjacent lands will never raise to that price; and that the present uniform price, combined with their irregular value, operates to prevent a desirable compactness of settlement in the new States, to retard the full development of that wise policy on which our land system is founded, to the injury not only of the several States where the lands lie, but of the United States as a whole.

The remedy proposed has been a reduction of prices according to the length of time the lands have been in market, without reference to any other circumstances. The certainty that the efflux of time would not always in such cases, and perhaps not even generally, furnish a true criterion of value; and the probability that persons residing in the vicinity, as the period for the reduction of prices approached, would postpone purchases they would otherwise make, for the purpose of availing themselves of the lower price, with other considerations of a similar character, have hitherto been successfully urged to defeat the graduation upon time.

May not all reasonable desires upon this subject be satisfied without encountering any of these objections? All will concede the abstract principle, that the price of the public lands should be proportioned to their relative value, so far as that can be accomplished without departing from the rule heretofore observed, requiring fixed prices in cases of private entries. The difficulty of the subject seems to lie in the mode of ascertaining what that value is. Would not the safest plan be that which has been adopted by many of the States as the basis of taxation—an actual valuation of lands, and classification of them into different rates? Would it not be practicable and expedient to cause the relative value of the public lands in the old districts, which have been for a certain length of time in market, to be appraised, and classed into two or more rates below the present minimum price, by the officers now employed in this branch of the public service, or in any other mode deemed preferable, and to make those prices permanent, if upon the coming in of the report they shall prove satisfactory to Congress? Cannot all the objects of graduation be accomplished in this way, and the objections which have hitherto been urged against it cease? It would seem to me that such a step as the restriction of the sales to limited quantities, and for actual improvement, would be free from all just exception.

By the full exposition of the value of the lands thus furnished and extensively promulgated, persons living at a distance would be informed of their true condition, and enabled to enter into competition with those residing in the vicinity; the means of acquiring an independent home would be brought within the reach of many who are unable to purchase at present prices; the population of the new States would be made more compact, and large tracts would be sold which would otherwise remain on hand; not only would the land be brought within the means of a larger number of purchasers, but many persons possessed of greater means would be content to settle on a larger quantity of the poorer lands, rather than emigrate further west in pursuit of a smaller quantity of better lands. Such a measure would also seem to be more consistent with the policy of the existing laws—that of converting the public domain into cultivated farms owned by their occupants. That policy is not best promoted by sending emigration up the almost interminable streams of the West, to occupy in groups the best spots of land, leaving immense wastes behind them, and enlarging the frontier beyond the means of their Government to afford it adequate protection; but in encouraging it to occupy, with reasonable denseness, the territory over which it advances, and find its best defence in the compact front which it presents to the Indian tribes. Many of you will bring to the consideration of the subject the advantages of local knowledge and greater experience, and all will be desirous of making an early and final disposition of every disturbing question in regard to this important interest. If these suggestions shall in any degree contribute to the accomplishment of so important a result, it will afford me sincere satisfaction.

In some sections of the country, most of the public lands have been sold, and the registers and receivers have very little to do. It is a subject worthy of inquiry whether, in many cases, two or more districts may not be consolidated, and the number of persons employed in this business considerably reduced. Indeed, the time will come when it will be the true policy of the General Government, as to some of the States, to transfer to them, for a reasonable equivalent, all the refuse and unsold lands, and to withdraw the machinery of the federal land offices altogether. All who take a comprehensive view of our federal system, and believe that one of its greatest excellences consists in interfering as little as possible with the internal concerns of the States, look forward with great interest to this result.

A modification of the existing laws in respect to the prices of the public lands, might also have a favorable influence on the legislation of Congress, in relation to another branch of the subject. Many who have not the ability to buy at present prices, settle on those lands, with the hope of acquiring from their cultivation the means of purchasing under pre-emption laws, from time to time passed by Congress. For this encroachment on the rights of the United States, they excuse themselves under the plea of their own necessities; the fact that they dispossess nobody, and only enter upon the waste domain; that they give additional value to the public lands in their vicinity, and their intention ultimately to pay the Government price. So much weight has from time to time been attached to these considerations, that Congress have passed laws giving actual settlers on the public lands a right of pre-emption to the tracts occupied by them at the minimum price. These laws have in all instances been retrospective in their operation; but in a few years after their passage, crowds of new settlers have been found on the public lands, for similar reasons, and under like expectations, who have been indulged with the same privileges. This course of legislation tends to impair public respect for the laws of the country. Either the laws to prevent intrusion upon the public lands should be executed, or, if that should be impracticable or inexpedient, they should be modified or repealed. If the public lands are to be considered as open to be occupied by any, they should, by law, be thrown open to all. That which is intended, in all instances, to be legalized, should at once be made legal, that those who are disposed to conform to the laws may enjoy at least equal privileges with those who are not. But it is not believed to be the disposition of Congress to open the public lands to occupancy without regular entries and payment of the Government price, as such a course must tend to worse evils than the credit system, which it was found necessary to abolish. It would seem, therefore, to be the part of wisdom and sound policy to remove, as far as practicable, the causes which produce intrusions upon the public lands, and then take efficient steps to prevent them in future. Would any single measure be so effective in removing all plausible grounds for those intrusions as the graduation of price already suggested? A short period of industry and economy in any part of our country would enable the poorest citizen to accumulate the means to buy him a home at the lower prices, and leave him without apology for settling on lands not his own. If he did not, under such circumstances, he would enlist no sympathy in his favor; and the laws would be readily executed without doing violence to public opinion.

A large portion of our citizens have seated themselves on the public lands, without authority, since the passage of the last pre-emption law, and now ask the enactment of another to enable them to retain the lands occupied, upon payment of the minimum Government price. They ask that which has been repeatedly granted before. If the future may be judged of by the past, little harm can be done to the interests of the Treasury by yielding to their request. Upon a critical examination, it is found that the lands sold at the public sales since the introduction of cash payments in 1820, have produced, on an average, the net revenue of only six cents an acre more than the minimum Government price. There is no reason to suppose that future sales will be more productive. The Government, therefore, has no adequate pecuniary interest to induce it to drive these people from the lands they occupy, for the purpose of selling them to others.

Entertaining these views, I recommend the passage of a pre-emption law for their benefit, in connection with the preparatory steps toward the graduation of the price of the public lands, and further and more effectual provisions to prevent intrusions hereafter. Indulgence to those who have settled on these lands with expectations that past legislation would be made a rule for the future, and at the same time removing the most plausible ground on which intrusions were excused, and adopting more efficient means to prevent them hereafter, appear to me the most judicious disposition which can be made of this difficult subject. The limitations and restrictions to guard against abuses in the execution of a pre-emption law, will necessarily attract the careful attention of Congress; but under no circumstances is it considered expedient to authorize floating claims in any shape. They have been heretofore, and doubtless would be hereafter, most prolific sources of fraud and oppression, and instead of operating to confer the favor of the Government on industrious settlers, are often used only to minister to a spirit of cupidity at the expense of the most meritorious of that class.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of War will bring to your view the state of the Army, and all the various subjects confided to the superintendence of that officer.

The principal part of the Army has been concentrated in Florida, with a view, and in the expectation, of bringing the war in that Territory to a speedy close. The necessity of stripping the posts on the maritime and inland frontiers of their entire garrisons, for the purpose of assembling in the field an army of less than four thousand men, would seem to indicate the necessity of increasing our regular forces; and the superior efficiency, as well as greatly diminished expense of that description of troops, recommend this measure as one of economy as well as of expediency. I refer to the report for the reasons which have induced the Secretary of War to urge the reorganization and enlargement of the staff of the Army, and of the ordnance corps, in which I fully concur.

It is not, however, compatible with the interest of the people to maintain, in time of peace, a regular force adequate to the defence of our extensive frontiers. In periods of danger and alarm, we must rely principally upon a well-organized militia; and some general arrangement that will render this description of force more efficient, has long been a subject of anxious solicitude. It was recommended to the first Congress by General Washington, and has been since frequently brought to your notice, and recently its importance strongly urged by my immediate predecessor. The provision of the constitution that renders it necessary to adopt a uniform system of organization for the militia throughout the United States, presents an insurmountable obstacle to an efficient arrangement by the classification heretofore proposed, and I invite your attention to the plan which will be submitted by the Secretary of War, for the organization of volunteer corps, and the instruction of militia officers, as more simple and practicable, if not equally advantageous, as a general arrangement of the whole militia of the United States.

A moderate increase of the corps, both of military and topographical engineers, has been more than once recommended by my predecessor; and my conviction of the propriety, not to say necessity, of the measure, in order to enable them to perform the various and important duties imposed upon them, induces me to repeat the recommendation.

The Military Academy continues to answer all the purposes of its establishment, and not only furnishes well-educated officers to the Army, but serves to diffuse throughout the mass of our citizens individuals possessed of military knowledge, and the scientific attainments of civil and military engineering. At present, the cadet is bound, with consent of his parents or guardians, to remain in service five years from the period of his enlistment, unless sooner discharged; thus exacting only one year's service in the Army after his education is completed. This does not appear to me sufficient. Government ought to command for a longer period the services of those who are educated at the public expense; and I recommend that the time of enlistment be extended to seven years, and the terms of the engagement strictly enforced.

The creation of a national foundry for cannon, to be common to the service of the Army and Navy of the United States, has been heretofore recommended, and appears to be required in order to place our ordnance on an equal footing with that of other countries, and to enable that branch of the service to control the prices of those articles, and graduate the supplies to the wants of the Government, as well as to regulate their quality and ensure their uniformity. The same reasons induce me to recommend the erection of a manufactory of gunpowder, to be under the direction of the Ordnance office. The establishment of a manufactory of small arms west of the Alleghany mountains, upon the plan proposed by the Secretary of War, will contribute to extend throughout that country the improvements which exist in establishments of a similar description in the Atlantic States, and tend to a much more economical distribution of the armament required in the western portion of our Union.

The system of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi, commenced by Mr. Jefferson, in 1804, has been steadily persevered in by every succeeding President, and may be considered the settled policy of the country. Unconnected at first with any well-defined system for their improvement, the inducements held out to the Indians were confined to the greater abundance of game to be found in the West; but when the beneficial effects of their removal were made apparent, a more philanthropic and enlightened policy was adopted, in purchasing their lands east of the Mississippi. Liberal prices were given, and provisions inserted in all the treaties with them, for the application of the funds they received in exchange, to such purposes as were best calculated to promote their present welfare, and advance their future civilization. These measures have been attended thus far with the happiest results.

It will be seen, by referring to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the most sanguine expectations of the friends and promoters of this system have been realized. The Choctaws, Cherokees, and other tribes that first emigrated beyond the Mississippi, have, for the most part, abandoned the hunter state, and become cultivators of the soil. The improvement in their condition has been rapid, and it is believed that they are now fitted to enjoy the advantages of a simple form of government, which has been submitted to them and received their sanction; and I cannot too strongly urge this subject upon the attention of Congress.

Stipulations have been made with all the Indian tribes to remove them beyond the Mississippi, except with the band of the Wyandotts, the Six Nations in New York, the Menomonees, Mandans and Stockbridges in Wisconsin, and Miamies in Indiana. With all but the Menomonees, it is expected that arrangements for their emigration will be completed the present year. The resistance which has been opposed to their removal by some of the tribes, even after treaties had been made with them to that effect, has arisen from various causes, operating differently on each of them. In most instances they have been instigated to resistance by persons to whom the trade with them and the acquisition of their annuities were important; and in some by the personal influence of interested chiefs. These obstacles must be overcome; for the Government cannot relinquish the execution of this policy without sacrificing important interests, and abandoning the tribes remaining east of the Mississippi to certain destruction.

The decrease in numbers of the tribes within the limits of the States and Territories has been most rapid. If they be removed, they can be protected from those associations and evil practices which exert so pernicious and destructive an influence over their destinies. They can be induced to labor, and to acquire property, and its acquisition will inspire them with a feeling of independence. Their minds can be cultivated, and they can be taught the value of salutary and uniform laws, and be made sensible of the blessings of free government, and capable of enjoying its advantages. In the possession of property, knowledge, and a good government, free to give what direction they please to their labor, and sharers in the legislation by which their persons and the profits of their industry are to be protected and secured, they will have an ever-present conviction of the importance of union, of peace among themselves, and of the preservation of amicable relations with us. The interests of the United States would also be greatly promoted by freeing the relations between the General and State Governments from what has proved a most embarrassing incumbrance, by a satisfactory adjustment of conflicting titles to lands, caused by the occupation of the Indians, and by causing the resources of the whole country to be developed by the power of the State and General Governments, and improved by the enterprise of a white population.

Intimately connected with this subject is the obligation of the Government to fulfil its treaty stipulations, and to protect the Indians thus assembled "at their new residences from all interruptions and disturbances from any other tribes or nations of Indians, or from any other person or persons whatsoever," and the equally solemn obligation to guard from Indian hostility its own border settlements, stretching along a line of more than one thousand miles. To enable the Government to redeem this pledge to the Indians, and to afford adequate protection to its own citizens, will require the continual presence of a considerable regular force on the frontiers, and the establishment of a chain of permanent posts. Examinations of the country are now making, with a view to decide on the most suitable points for the erection of fortresses and other works of defence, the results of which will be presented to you by the Secretary of War at an early day, together with a plan for the effectual protection of friendly Indians, and the permanent defence of the frontier States.

By the report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith communicated, it appears that unremitting exertions have been made at the different navy yards, to carry into effect all authorized measures for the extension and employment of our naval force. The launching and preparation of the ship of the line Pennsylvania, and the complete repairs of the ships of the line Ohio, Delaware, and Columbus, may be noticed, as forming a respectable addition to this important arm of our national defence. Our commerce and navigation have received increased aid and protection during the present year. Our squadrons in the Pacific and on the Brazilian station have been much increased, and that in the Mediterranean, although small, is adequate to the present wants of our commerce in that sea. Additions have been made to our squadron on the West India station, where the large force under Commodore Dallas has been most actively and efficiently employed in protecting our commerce, in preventing the importation of slaves, and in co-operating with officers of the army in carrying on the war in Florida.

The satisfactory condition of our naval force abroad leaves at our disposal the means of conveniently providing for a home squadron, for the protection of commerce upon our extensive coast. The amount of appropriations required for such a squadron will be found in the general estimates for the naval services for the year 1838.

The naval officers engaged upon our coast survey have rendered important service to our navigation. The discovery of a new channel into the harbor of New York, through which our largest ships may pass without danger, must afford important commercial advantages to that harbor, and add greatly to its value as a naval station. The accurate survey of George's shoals off the coast of Massachusetts, lately completed, will render comparatively safe a navigation hitherto considered dangerous.

Considerable additions have been made to the number of captains, commanders, lieutenants, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, in the Navy. These additions were rendered necessary, by the increased number of vessels put in commission, to answer the exigencies of our growing commerce.

Your attention is respectfully invited to the various suggestions of the Secretary, for the improvement of the naval service.

The report of the Postmaster General exhibits the progress and condition of the mail service. The operations of the Post Office Department constitute one of the most active elements of our national prosperity, and it is gratifying to observe with what vigor they are conducted. The mail routes of the United States cover an extent of about one hundred and forty-two thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven miles, having been increased about thirty-seven thousand one hundred and three miles within the last two years. The annual mail transportation on these routes is about thirty-six millions two hundred and twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and sixty-two miles, having been increased about ten millions three hundred and fifty-nine thousand four hundred and seventy-six miles within the same period. The number of post offices has also been increased from ten thousand seven hundred and seventy to twelve thousand and ninety-nine, very few of which receive the mails less than once a week, and a large portion of them daily. Contractors and postmasters in general are represented as attending to their duties with most commendable zeal and fidelity.

The revenue of the Department, within the year ending on the thirtieth June last, was four millions one hundred and thirty-seven thousand and fifty-six dollars and fifty-nine cents; and its liabilities accruing within the same time were three millions three hundred and eighty thousand eight hundred and forty-seven dollars and seventy-five cents. The increase of revenue over that of the preceding year was seven hundred and eight thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars and forty-one cents.

For many interesting details I refer you to the report of the Postmaster General, with the accompanying paper. Your particular attention is invited to the necessity of providing a more safe and convenient building for the accommodation of that Department.

I lay before Congress copies of reports submitted in pursuance of a call made by me upon the heads of Departments, for such suggestions as their experience might enable them to make as to what further legislative provisions may be advantageously adopted to secure the faithful application of public moneys to the objects for which they are appropriated; to prevent their misapplication or embezzlement by those intrusted with the expenditure of them; and generally to increase the security of the Government against losses in their disbursement. It is needless to dilate on the importance of providing such new safeguards as are within the power of legislation to promote these ends; and I have little to add to the recommendations submitted in the accompanying papers.

By law, the terms of service of our most important collecting and disbursing officers in the civil departments are limited to four years, and when reappointed, their bonds are required to be renewed.

The safety of the public is much increased by this feature of the law, and there can be no doubt that its application to all officers entrusted with the collection or disbursement of the public money, whatever may be the tenure of their offices, would be equally beneficial. I therefore recommend, in addition to such of the suggestions presented by the heads of Departments as you may think useful, a general provision, that all officers of the Army or Navy, or in the Civil Department, entrusted with the receipt or payment of public money, and whose term of service is either unlimited or for a longer time than four years, be required to give bonds, with good and sufficient sureties, at the expiration of every such period.

A change in the period of terminating the fiscal year, from the first of October to the first of April, has been frequently recommended, and appears to be desirable.

The distressing casualties in steamboats, which have so frequently happened during the year, seem to evince the necessity of attempting to prevent them, by means of severe provisions connected with their custom-house papers. This subject was submitted to the attention of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report, and will be again at the present session, with additional details. It will doubtless receive that early and careful consideration which its pressing importance appears to require.

Your attention has heretofore been frequently called to the affairs of the District of Columbia, and I should not again ask it, did not their entire dependence on Congress give them a constant claim upon its notice. Separated by the constitution from the rest of the Union, limited in extent, and aided by no Legislature of its own, it would seem to be a spot where a wise and uniform system of local government might have been easily adopted. This District, however, unfortunately, has been left to linger behind the rest of the Union; its codes, civil and criminal, are not only very defective, but full of obsolete or inconvenient provisions; being formed of portions of two States, discrepancies in the laws prevail in different parts of the territory, small as it is; and although it was selected as the seat of the General Government, the site of its public edifices, the depository of its archives, and the residence of officers intrusted with large amounts of public property, and the management of public business, yet it has never been subjected to, or received, that special and comprehensive legislation which these circumstances peculiarly demand. I am well aware of the various subjects of greater magnitude and immediate interest that press themselves on the consideration of Congress; but I believe there is not one that appeals more directly to its justice than a liberal, and even generous, attention to the interests of the District of Columbia, and a thorough and careful revision of its local government.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5th, 1837.

Five thousand copies of the Message, and fifteen hundred copies of the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed.

Death of Senator Kent.

MR. CLAY, of Kentucky, rose and said, that in the absence of the only surviving Senator from Maryland, (whose duty it would have been to have announced the demise of his colleague,) the melancholy task would devolve upon him, of detailing to the Senate what already was but too well known, to wit: the lamented death of Governor KENT, who expired on the 24th of last month, aged 69 years. Mr. C. feelingly and eloquently alluded to the long friendship that had subsisted between himself, and the distinguished deceased, and spoke of his services to his own State, in her Legislature, in the Executive chair, &c., all which stations he had filled with consummate ability, and with general satisfaction to the people. No one, Mr. C. maintained, had ever brought into the public councils more integrity of purpose, or a greater share of strong discriminating sense. It was true he seldom spoke in debate, but when he did it was always to the purpose, without being ambitious of the ornament of language. Twenty-six years ago Mr. C. entered public life with the deceased in the House of Representatives, since which brief space of time how many things had occurred, how many questions arisen, that were supposed would shake the Confederacy to its very centre? Still he was gratified to find that the stars and stripes floated triumphantly, and the country was marching onward to its high destiny, unchecked in its career. Mr. C. adverted to the private worth of his deceased friend: his mansion was the seat of generous hospitality, and his heart ever replete with kindness; his loss was not only to Maryland, to the Senate, but to the country at large, and to none more than the people of this District, whose firm and zealous friend he had ever been, all of whom would recollect the thrilling appeal made in their behalf, not sixty days ago. His place would soon again be filled—ably and respectably filled; but no successor could bring a purer heart or sounder head. It now only remained for them to discharge the last melancholy duties due to departed worth; for which purpose, he would introduce the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in token of respect for the memory of the Hon. J. KENT, of Maryland, the Senators wear crape on the arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Senate do now adjourn.

Which resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ADAMS presented a petition, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia, and moved that it, and the petitions presented by himself and colleagues at the late special session on the same subject, embracing upwards of 50,000 signers, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions to consider and report thereon.

Mr. WISE moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. PORTS asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were:

T. Whittlesey, and Yorke—70.

Mr. ADAMS presented several other petitions from Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, etc., on the same subject, and made the same motions of reference, which were severally laid on the table, on motion of Mr. WISE.

Mr. ADAMS then presented another of the same tenor.

Mr. LAWLER raised the preliminary question of reception, which was decided by—yeas 144, nays 60.

So the petition was received.

When the name of Mr. RIVES was called, he inquired of the Chair the effect of this motion prevailing.

The CHAIR replied that it left the petition at the disposition of the House.

Mr. RIVES said then he should vote for the reception, in order to give this petition the same disposition as had been given to the others, viz., laying them on the table.

Mr. WISE explained, that the reason he had not originally raised the question moved by the gentleman from Alabama, was, that the question just decided had already been decided so often by the House, by Southern as well as by Northern members voting to receive abolition petitions. It was for that reason he had moved to lay the motion of reference on the table, for he was determined to meet the question at every step where it could be met. Mr. W. asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to include all his petitions in one motion.

Mr. ADAMS said he could not assent to it. He then presented a petition for the abolition of slavery in the Territories of the United States, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. WISE moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and were—yeas 127, nays 73.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 13.

MESSRS. BLACK and SOUTHAARD took their seats.

The Hon. WILSON LUMPKIN, Senator elect from Georgia, and the Hon. A. H. SEVIER, Senator elect from Arkansas, were qualified and took their seats.

THURSDAY, December 14.

The Expunging Resolution.

Mr. BAYARD said that at the last regular session of Congress he had presented the resolution of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, against the defacement of the journal by what has been commonly called the Expunging Resolution, and at that time gave notice that he should at the ensuing session, and so long as he had the honor of a seat here, contend against that measure. When he gave that notice, appearances were much against the probability of success, but the dawn of a brighter and better day had broken upon us, which led him to hope the accomplishment of his purpose was near at hand. The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had, in the benevolence of his feelings, when he (Mr. BAYARD) announced his intention of introducing a rescinding resolution at the last session, expressed his hope that he might live to see its adoption; meaning, no doubt, to bestow upon him a lengthened term of existence, if not an immortality, in the same spirit of complaisance in which a Spaniard wishes you may live a thousand years. But, Mr. B. said, he should be very sorry to have his life cut short as speedily as it was now probable that event would occur.

The resolution he presented was to rescind the expunging resolution, without professing to express any opinion on the merits of the original resolution of 1834. He moved that the resolution be laid upon the table, and printed; namely:

Whereas, the Senate of the United States, in the exercise of its functions, as a deliberative assembly, did, on the 28th day of March, 1834, adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And whereas, afterwards, to wit, on the 16th day of January, 1837, the Senate, in reference to the above resolution, adopted another as follows:

"Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the Journal; and, for that purpose, that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript Journal of the session of 1833-4 into the Senate, and, in the presence of the Senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the words following: Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837."

And whereas the Constitution of the United States expressly requires that each House of Congress shall keep a journal of its proceedings, meaning thereby to preserve a faithful and permanent record of those proceedings:

And whereas the Senate of the United States, independently of its legislative, executive, and judicial functions, has the inherent right, as a deliberative assembly, to express its opinions, which can be done only by resolutions:

And whereas its opinions, when thus expressed, become part of its proceedings, of which the constitution provides that a permanent record shall be kept:

And whereas the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837, and the act of the Secretary of the Senate in compliance with it, was a violation of the constitution, inasmuch as, in legal contemplation, it destroyed, and in fact defaced, the record of the proceedings to which it refers: wherefore,

Resolved, That the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837, commonly called the expunging resolution, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and shall for ever hereafter be held as naught; and that, in all future publications of that portion of the Journal which contains the resolution of 1833-4, and in all copies which may hereafter be made of the same, for any official or legal purpose, the said resolution of 1833-4 shall be published and copied as it was originally entered upon the said Journal, without any notice whatever of the superscription, which was erroneously, irregularly, and unconstitutionally made, in pursuance of the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from Delaware must desire a very long existence in this vale of tears, if he expected to live until what was asked by the resolution was adopted. The Senator has been pleased to say he would not be willing to die so soon. He certainly wished the Senator long life and prosperity; but to remain until his aim was accomplished, would be to render him miserable, unless he feasted on the Medean herb to renovate his youth. The gentleman has been pleased to allude to the dawning light which he fancies is beginning to glimmer on his political prospects. I admit (said Mr. B.) that there have been some few dark clouds in our Northern horizon; but we turn from them to the brilliant, sunny skies of the South, where all is bright and cheering. The gentleman and his friends are encouraged, I know, and I am willing they should hope on, having no disposition to throw obstacles in the way of their anticipations; but, unless I am more mistaken than I ever was in all my life, there will come a frost, a nipping frost—[Here some Senator observed “a killing”]—well, “a killing” frost, that will blight all their fair crop of hopes. I should not have made even this short reply, if the gentleman had not alluded to a quaint remark of mine, made at the last session.

MONDAY, December 18.

Mr. CALHOUN, took his seat.

Anti-Texas Annexation Petition.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial from twelve men and thirteen women, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of 115 ladies of Gloucester county, New Jersey, praying the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY said that it was manifest that the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia was extending itself in the public mind, and daily engaging more and more of the public attention. He had no hesitation in saying that Congress ought not to do what was asked by the petitioners without the consent of the people of the District of Columbia. He was desirous of inquiring of the Senator from New Jersey, or any other conversant with the subject, whether the feeling of abolition in the abstract was extending itself in their respective States, or whether it was not becoming mixed up with other matters—such, for instance, in the belief that the sacred right of petition had been assailed. It became the duty of the Senate to inquire into this business, and understand the subject well.

There were many, no doubt, of these petitioners, who did not mean to assert that slavery should be abolished, that were contending for what they understood to be a great constitutional right. Would it not, then, under this view of the subject, be the best course to allay excitement, and endeavor to calm down and tranquillize the public mind?

Mr. WALL said he did not believe, so far as his State was concerned, that the feeling for abolition was on the increase; but he did believe the subject was mixed up with the right of petition: many of the petitioners believing that right was invaded by the manner in which these memorials were treated. He thought if this matter had been in the onset referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and a report made therefrom, (sanctioned by the Senate,) calmly expressing the feeling of the American people, that there would have been no further trouble.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had foreseen what this subject would come to; he knew its origin, and that it lay deeper than was supposed. It grew out of a spirit of fanaticism, which was daily increasing, and if not met in limine, would by-and-by dissolve this Union. It was particularly our duty to keep the matter out of the Senate, out of the halls of the National Legislature. These fanatics were interfering with what they had no right. Grant the reception of these petitions, and you will next be asked to act on them. He was for no conciliatory course, no temporizing; instead of yielding one inch he would rise in opposition, and he hoped every man from the South would stand by him to put down this growing evil. There was but one question that would ever destroy this Union, and that was involved in this principle. Yes: this was potent enough for it, and must be early arrested if the Union was to be preserved.

Mr. SWIFT said he had been intrusted with various memorials of a similar character to this; and he therefore felt called on to say a few words. When these petitions were referred, as was the former practice, to the Committee for the District, there was very little excitement on the subject. There was a great difference of opinion on the subject, some thinking that slavery in the District ought to be abolished by Congress, and others thinking differently; but from the moment that the petitions were refused, to the present time, the excitement had been continually increasing. And the petitioners were not the miserable fanatics which the Senator from South Carolina supposed; they were among the most intelligent and respectable of the community.

Mr. ROANE, of Virginia, said, that warm, ardent, and strong as were all his feelings, and fixed as was his opinion on this subject, he should perhaps not have opened his lips on the present most unexpected occasion, but for the relation he happened to bear towards the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which it is proposed to refer this whole subject. It is one of vast importance, involving the dearest rights and interests of millions of our citizens, and perhaps the Union of these States. A committee raised to take charge of the local concerns of the people of this District is not, I humbly apprehend, the suitable committee for such a subject. That committee was not constituted with reference to questions of such magnitude and extensive bearing; and I do trust that, should this body unfortunately agree to receive and refer these petitions, with a view, as we are informed, to have a calm, deliberate, and full discussion of their merits, they will send them to some other committee—nay, raise a special committee, composed of gentlemen who have the talent and the taste for such discussion; for I take this occasion to say that, neither in committee nor elsewhere, will I ever consent to argue and discuss the merits of this tender and vital question. No, sir; when my life and my property are assailed, I protect them not by argument and discussion.

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has asked whether the multiplication of these petitions in the North, and the spread of feeling which prompts them, is not mainly attributable to a belief, on the part of the people there, that the great right of petition has been invaded by the direction which this body has given to them for the last two years? He has been answered in the affirmative by the Senator from Vermont, (Mr. SWIFT), and it is utterly denied that fanaticism constitutes any part of the spirit which actuates our Northern brethren, in thus eternally stirring a question which they must know is vital to us of the South. Oh, no—it is not fanaticism, it is not humanity, it is not philanthropy, but it is patriotism! it is only to assert and maintain inviolate the great right of petition! I perceive, sir, that one of the petitions presented this morning is signed by, I think, one hundred and eleven women. Allow me to ask when before, on what other occasion, on what other great question, have the females thought it their imperious duty to step forth as the asserters and champions of the great right of petition? Allow me to believe, sir, that such a motive constituted no part of their feelings, never for one moment entered into their brain; no, sir, it is the false fire of philanthropy, so easily kindled in their warm and tender hearts, and too easily fanned into flame by fanatical, vile, and designing men.

No man, sir, in this wide-extended empire, more dearly loves, or would more sacredly guard, than I, the great, the inestimable right of petition, as asserted and practised in England, and thence ingrafted into our own written constitution; but, like all other good things, it is liable to abuse, and has its limits; and I for one am bold to say, that the subject now before the Senate presents a limit to this right. The people have a right peaceably to assemble and petition—for what? To take away my right to enjoy “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?” No, sir: but to redress grievances; grievances to which the law-making power can apply a remedy or corrective. The petitions must not only be sent to a tribunal competent to hear them, but must relate to a subject on which that tribunal can legally and authoritatively act. Sir, the people are occluded; they have occluded themselves; they are occluded by the sacred compromises of the constitution—the charter of all their rights—from bringing this subject before Congress in any manner whatever as one of ordinary legislation. It is in vain to say that this right of petition has no limits. We have been told this morning, that we are the servants of the people; yet we—this Senate—require that every petition which is offered to it, shall be respectful in its language and decorous in its form. This, sir, is a limit; and one liable to abuse; and why not,

I seek to know, require that they shall also be pertinent in their matter and legitimate in their object?

Mr. DAVIS took this occasion to repeat an observation made by him two years ago, viz., “if you wish to make abolitionists, then only continue to pursue the course you have hitherto pursued.” No course, in his opinion, could be more surely calculated to increase the excitement already existing than the rejection of these petitions. How the practice of laying these petitions on the table on the objections of any member, had crept into the Senate, he (Mr. D.) could not conceive. To him it, however, was the same thing, whether these petitions were laid on the table, or whether they were merely received, and then rejected: it was in either way tantamount to a total rejection: it was an infraction of the sacred right of petition. He (Mr. D.) did not doubt that this attack on the right of petition had multiplied greatly the number of petitioners.

As to the merits, no doubt Southern gentlemen have come to their conclusions that the petitioners have no right to come here, in a manner satisfactory to themselves; but if this be true, he would ask, would it not be most expedient to meet them in limine, at once, and say that they have no right, or else to give their prayer due consideration, and give at least some reasons, if there exist any, against the right which they claim?

Their prayer is reasonable, temperate, and just; it is two-fold: 1st, abolish slavery in this District, or, if not, pass at least laws to regulate in a better manner the slave-trade in this District. They disavow the intention of interfering with slavery in any of the States. Such a principle is deliberately avowed in the resolutions of most, if not all, the Abolition Societies in the North. They have no purpose of interfering with the rights of the South. The documents they have published to the world would prove this. If their proceedings agitate the minds of Southern gentlemen, that is their own fault; it is because they choose rather to interfere with the Abolition Societies, and not that the Abolition Societies interfere with them.

No case can be supposed to justify the rejection of the right of petitioning. If men petition for only two Senators, as the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) has supposed a case, why, let them do so. The right is not to be put down on supposed cases of abusing it. The member from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) says, will you deliberate where your mind is made up? He (Mr. DAVIS) would immediately answer “yes!” It is due to the country to meet this subject with deliberation, and to send forth the reasons of our rejection of the prayer of two-thirds of the population.

Mr. KING said that some sessions past, he had advocated the reception of petitions of this description: he considered them as coming from a miserable set of fanatics and deluded females, who were too contemptible to excite apprehension. He was unwilling to give them weight, by adding to their number those who might honestly believe the right of petition had been denied. For many years petitions of this character were received without comment, referred to a committee, and no further notice taken of them. They slumbered until the close of the session, and the committee was then discharged from the further consideration of them. Mr. K. regretted most sincerely that this unfortunate question, so intimately connected with the permanency of this Union, was pressed by gentlemen upon the consideration of the Senate. They urge their reception: for what purpose? For none other under Heaven, that he could perceive, than to produce excitement; to irritate and inflame the public mind. So long as it was confined to deluded females and fanatics, it was of little import; but now it has entered into the politics of the country. Unprincipled aspirants have seized on it, and it has from that cause alone, become alarming. He feared not the great mass of the people, even in New England: they were sound to the core. Not so with the politicians: they were sinning against light and knowledge. They deserved, and should receive, the stern rebuke of this body. He would not receive or give any countenance to these incendiary petitions.

Abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS said he gave way to no one in a desire of maintaining harmony; and his remarks were not made, as imputed to him, in the view of creating discord. He wished the member from Alabama (Mr. KING) was better informed of the great respectability of the petitioners; if he (Mr. K.) could but know the real state of things in the North, he would not speak so contemptuously of the petitioners. As to politicians, Mr. D. maintained that until the question came on here, no politics were mixed up with the subject in any way whatever. It was a question of conscience, of morals, of propriety; men of all parties concurred in these petitions.

Mr. HUBBARD was not aware that any petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia had ever originated in that part of New Hampshire where he resided. He was certain that since he had been a member of the Senate, he had not been called upon to present to the Senate any such memorial. And since he had been a member of Congress, very few petitions in relation to this subject had been forwarded to him from any section of the State he had the honor in part to represent. If such memorials had come hither from New Hampshire, they must have been committed to the care of others. He was assured that the prevailing sentiment with the people of his own State was, to let this whole matter alone; that it was a subject with which they had no concern; that it was their bounden duty, as good and peaceable citizens, not to interfere with the rights of others; that they regarded the question of slavery as a sectional, a local question; and however much they might regret its existence in any portion of this Union, yet they well knew that its existence was sanctioned by the constitution of the land; and with the continuation of its existence in those parts of the Confederacy, they ought not, and they could not, with propriety, make any interference, unsolicited and unasked by those whose interests were affected by it. These were the sentiments of his own State; they certainly were, to a great extent, the opinions of the people of New Hampshire.

Mr. NILES said he did not approve of crooked courses. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. HUBBARD) says that the petition is before us if we lay it on the table, and that so far, it is received; and yet he says that, by laying it on the table, the petition is rejected. He (Mr. N.) could not reconcile this contradiction.

Mr. RIVES replied to the argument, that receiving the petition, and having a report made, would quiet the excitement. Not so: this had been already done two years ago. Then, in the other House, a select committee, composed chiefly of Northern men, had presented an elaborate report, and this had been so far from allaying the excitement, that now gentlemen come forward and tell us that the excitement is increased; therefore, it would be perfectly nugatory to go round the same circle again. To him (Mr. R.) it appeared that the most pacificatory course to be pursued was to act as hitherto, and to lay the motion to receive upon the table.

Mr. PRESTON said, once, perhaps, there was a time when these petitions might have been received; now, it was no longer safe to receive them. It is stated that the excitement has increased. Though the doors of Congress had been thrown open, and they had been heard, yet the fire is spread wider, and is spreading wider and wider. Why so? It is said because the right of petitioning is violated; were it not for this, we are told that the excitement would have died away. But this assertion is in face of the fact that the right of petition was given and secured to the petitioners. We, the South, said at the time that the concession would lead to more concessions, and so it has proved; the fire is not put out, but is kindled worse and worse. We went as far as we could go, for the sake of peace; we gave an amnesty, we received their petitions, and they are not satisfied. Now we say "nulla vestigia retrorsum," we must now go a step further, instead of going backward, and do now, as ought to have been done then, namely, shut altogether the doors of Congress against them. Has the South no sensibilities and prejudices to be considered? Has the North only prejudices, and feelings, and conscience, to be taken into consideration, and have we none? If you consider their views, will you not rouse us? Will you not interfere with them, for fear of irritating them; and shall no such regard be paid to us?

But the period for argument with these people is past. They demand you to adopt their principles and policy. The discussion of these matters was not agreeable to him, (Mr. P.) He thought that if Congress does not protect the South, it will be obliged to protect itself. What the South wants is peace; let not this question be let in to light up the torch of discord. Mr. P. said he should not resort to discussion, but to measures, to acts, for the protection of the South. The South must be protected, and he was disposed to do it quietly if possible; but, if not, he would say, with great emphasis, "we will protect ourselves."

Mr. CUTBERT would not now speak of his regard to the Union; the attachment of gentlemen to the Union had been fully illustrated. But what were they now told? That a certain mode of maintaining the rights of the South would overturn those rights; that a mere error, in point of order, was to destroy the rights of the South. Was this language to be held, that Southern rights rested on so frail a basis that the slightest error would overturn them? For the Union Mr. C. was not so much alarmed as others; there was a disease in the body politic, which would have its course; but the virus would work out in time. This disease had been imported from Europe, and especially from England. Mr. C. said he was astonished at the remarks of a gentleman of so sound sense and extensive information as the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. DAVIS.)

Mr. PIERCE concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) in the opinion that no valuable end was to be attained by discussion here upon this deeply agitating subject. He rose merely to express the hope that the motion to lay the question of reception on the table might not be renewed. He was in favor of the reception, and that question he desired to meet distinctly, and unembarrassed by any other motion.

Mr. CLAY said he would concur with the Senator from Georgia, if the Senate, by persisting in their past course, could produce the same calmness in the country which it had done among themselves. But it was much more important that the country should be quiet than the Senate. Mr. C. had asked whether the excitement had been increased, and by what causes; with the view to ascertain if any thing could be done by the Senate to allay the excitement, and render the people quiet and happy. The reply was, that the excitement was extending, and chiefly by the impression that the great republican right of petition had been assailed, which the petitioners chose to assert, by acting with those with whom they really had no sympathy. Mr. C. preferred that the two classes of petitioners should be separated, to deprive the abolitionists of the advantage of mixing their peculiar objects with other matters.

The petitions, Mr. C. said, were first to be received; but was this all? Was not this understood to imply deliberation on the question? The cold, simple act of reception, followed by an instant rejection, amounted to not receiving, and must give color to the charge that it is a substantial denial of the right of petition. It had been said that this was not a case for argument. Not a case for argument! What was it that lay at the very bottom of all our free institutions? Argument, inquiry, reasoning, consideration, deliberation. We were a reasoning people, and it was our greatest boast that we possessed reasoning powers capable of comprehending the various subjects relating to a free Government. Mr. C. thought the best course was to receive these petitions, and refer them to the Committee for the District, to act on them as they pleased; and if the country should not then be quiet, let them make a report, embodying with the argument the various facts relating to the subject, several of which Mr. C. enumerated.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed his regret at the views of the Senator from Kentucky. For two years past the Senate had pursued the course of laying the questions relating to these petitions on the table. During that time there had been little or no discussion in that body; and it was the discussion in Congress that was doing more mischief on the subject than any thing else. If the coming in of the petitions was to be prevented, how could it be done? By preserving silence upon them. Every time the petitioners observed discussion in Congress, they were encouraged to proceed; but if the Senate persisted in the course to which they had sometimes adhered, their hopes would be cut off. But if this course were now abandoned, they would say that the Senate had been driven to change their ground, and they would consider it as a gain on their part. And could an abler report be made on the subject by any committee than that by the Select Committee of which Mr. PINCKNEY was chairman? And had that produced any effect? Gentlemen said no: the excitement was increasing. And could the Senate produce any effect by a report? No: it would give the petitioners hope that they would finally prevail. Mr. G. would vote to receive the petitions, because he questioned whether a contrary vote might not abridge the right of petition. But he hoped that for the sake of teaching these people that this subject must not be interfered with, they would be laid on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN said he believed that the course proposed by Mr. CLAY was calculated the most of all to produce an excitement. If a single step was yielded, the fanatical spirit would be reanimated with new excitement; and those, therefore, who so yielded, incurred a fearful responsibility. Mr. C. despaired, as far as the Northern part of the country was concerned on the question of abolition. It was interwoven with the political condition of the North, in the nature and state of parties; and it would run, and must run, into their struggles for State ascendancy. It was impossible to prevent its having a control over the political parties of the North. The great mass of Northern people believed that this Southern institution was radically wrong. The result would be this: that abolition efforts would begin with the lowest grades of society, and by gross misrepresentations, but it would go upward and spread; and Mr. C. told a distinguished Senator four years ago, while discussing another subject, that the spirit of abolition would spring up in the North, and however much he, and others like him, were opposed to the doctrine, it would one day spread so as to drive him from public life, or compel him to yield to its dictates.

The Senator from Kentucky had insisted that receiving petitions implied considering, discussing, deciding upon them. But in what situation would all this put the Southern States? It would convert the halls of Congress into places for the discussion of abolition. Mr. C. did not ask how the North would be affected; his object was to keep the South united on this subject, with a susceptibility always alive. They must first preserve themselves, for this was a question involving the very existence of the whole South. Their next object was to preserve the Union; and there was no other course for them to do this, but by a united and firm resistance to these encroachments; and the earlier the better, for the country was sounder to-day than it would be to-morrow, and delay would leave it to proceed from worse to worse.

Mr. C. expressed these sentiments on no sectional ground; he would prevent, by what he had suggested, the destruction of the Union. The measure proposed by Mr. CLAY, he thought, would fail of its object, and he considered the reverse mode the best.

Mr. CLAY said he looked to the whole Union. But he had no such dependencies as the Senator from South Carolina, as to the effects of the slave, or any other conceivable question, on the Union. He had no fears for the Union; but he had a desire to tranquillize every part, and give no just cause of complaint to any portion. The question was not the same as to slavery in the District and slavery in the States. But what question was that in human affairs, so weak or so strong, that it could not be approached by argument and reason? This country would, in every emergency, appeal to its enlightened judgment, and its spirit of union and harmony, and the appeal would not be unsuccessful. Mr. C. remembered that, when the public mind was sick with discussions on the late war, he had said to an illustrious man, now no more, "We must stop this everlasting discussion, this endless diplomacy; let us go to work, and appeal to the valor of our countrymen to sustain us; no other alternative is left us." But he replied, in his calm and dignified way—"Mr. CLAY, recollect our institutions rest on public opinion, on reasoning and argument."

Mr. C. had no fears for the Union; and if the Senator from South Carolina would propose a joint resolution of the two Houses, that the man who expressed a doubt in regard to its stability should be immediately called to order and stopped, it would obtain his (Mr. CLAY's) hearty concurrence. The Union would last, he hoped, forever. Mr. C.'s object was merely to preserve the Union in its true spirit; and separate fanaticism from those who were capable of listening to reason. Let us show our reasons, and then, if we fail, we shall at least have acquitted ourselves of our duty. The best course was that pursued by the Government down to two years ago, in which these petitions were often sent to the District Committee, and there allowed to sleep; or as was sometimes done, followed by reports.

Mr. CALHOUN said there were cases in which reasoning and argument were both absurd and cowardly. If a man should call him a rogue, should he stop to argue the point? There were things which were to be met, not with reasoning, but with instant indignation. Suppose a petition were sent here to burn the manufactories of the North, would the Senator stop to reason about such a petition? Or that the property of the rich should be given to the poor; would he reason about that?

The petitions proposed abolition in the District of Columbia; but on what ground? That Congress were bound to receive petitions in all cases, to discuss and decide upon them. But if they were bound to do so in regard to the District, Mr. C. would ask the Senator if the same rule would not hold in reference to the States. Were they bound to receive petitions for abolition in the States? [Mr. C. waited for a reply.] If not, he resumed, then the right did not exist at all. The universal sentiment with the abolitionists was, that abolition in the District was the first step to abolition in the States. Every abolitionist would say so. The first step would be in the District; the next would be to destroy the trade between the States, making the slaves serfs to the soil; and then an attempt would be made to abolish slavery in the States. What, then, would be the situation of the South? Congress would then discuss their right to property guaranteed to them by the constitution, and the Southern man who would permit it thus to be drawn into discussion, sacrificed the rights of the South. Mr. C. was in favor of the Union as much as others; but unlike the Senator from Kentucky, he was not in favor of silence, when he saw danger approaching.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator had put extreme cases. He might just as well have supposed the abolition of the Christian religion, as the abolition of slavery out of the District. But did he not see that his argument went against receiving all petitions, as much as Mr. CLAY's was in favor of receiving all without distinction? The power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District was believed to exist, and Congress had determined, by their action, that it was right to receive petitions on the subject.

Vermont Anti-Slavery and Anti-Texas Annexation Resolutions.

[25TH CONG.

Was that to be confounded with a case where Congress had certainly no power?

MR. CUTHBERT replied to the argument of Mr. CLAY, that it would be the simplest method to allay this excitement, by receiving the petitions and giving them consideration, and maintained that that argument was to be deprecated, for it would cause debate, and raise up a fury of discussion. Argument (said Mr. C.) teaches what it ought to put an end to; it fomented what it is intended to allay. He solemnly appealed to the Senator from Kentucky to maintain his character of peacemaker. In former situations he (Mr. CLAY) had been obliged to relent the severity of his principles, and to compromise with the South. Having first been a grand disturber in his manufacturing zeal, he had been forced to become a grand pacificator; he begged him (Mr. CLAY) not to depart now from the principle of pacification.

MR. WALL proceeded to vindicate the character of the petitioners. They were not fanatics; they were reasonable, sensible, and temperate men; and though he (Mr. W.) did not agree with them, and though he was ready to say that the prayer of the petition ought to be rejected, yet he was not prepared, as the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) to say that his constituents should come to the door, and that then it should be shut in their faces. The right of petition would interfere with no other rights. The South was not rendered insecure in its rights, by granting to the North the enjoyment of its common and natural rights. Mr. W. insisted that resort should be had to reason and to argument, instead of putting down the right of petition by violence and contempt. If the South seeks to stop the mouths of the North, and prevent petitions from being heard, by so doing they raise a force and arouse an energy which cannot be put down.

MR. BUCHANAN said he did not rise for the purpose of entering upon a general discussion of this question. He thought it had already been amply discussed on former occasions.

During the session of 1835-6, he had presented a petition from a portion of the Society of Friends, requesting Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. And here, in justice to that respectable society, he must observe, that so far as he was acquainted with them in his own neighborhood, although they were decidedly opposed to slavery in the abstract, they were not abolitionists as that term was now generally understood. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) had then objected to the reception of this petition. Upon the question, "Shall the petition be received?" the constitutional right of petition was distinctly raised. After a long, powerful, and interesting debate, in which he (Mr. B.) had exerted his best efforts to sustain this right, the petition was received by the Senate, by a vote of 36 to 10.

After this petition had thus been received by the Senate, he (Mr. B.) had made a motion to reject the prayer of the petition. This opened a discussion upon the question, "Shall slavery be abolished in the District of Columbia or not?" After a long debate, it was decided in the negative: only six Senators voting against his motion.

After these solemn proceedings had taken place, were the Senate bound, whenever a new petition of a similar character was presented, again and again, on each succeeding day, to discuss and decide the right of petition?

This course would have exasperated the feelings of the people, interfered with the transaction of the business of the country, and must have resulted as it had resulted before. In this situation, the course was adopted, in the session of 1836-7, of moving to lay the question of the reception of these petitions upon the table. This was the only mode of avoiding everlasting debate.

The motion to lay upon the table decides nothing but that the subject shall lie upon the table for that day, subject to be again called up for consideration at any future day.

Upon reflection, (Mr. B. said,) he never had been better satisfied with the course which he had pursued on any question than that now before the Senate. He should now purposely avoid saying any thing more upon the subject. Let us enter at this moment upon a discussion of this question, and the debate will continue for weeks, and will light up a flame over the whole country. We have already solemnly discussed and decided the question. Let us now adhere to that decision firmly. He should not have risen to say a word, had it not been asserted that to vote to lay the motion of reception upon the table was inconsistent with the right of petition, a right which he had always asserted and should ever maintain.

MR. HUBBARD renewed the motion to lay the motion to receive the petitions on the table—

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roan, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, White, and Young—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, and Williams—20.

TUESDAY, December 19.

Vermont Anti-Slavery, and Anti-Texas Annexation Resolutions.

MR. SWIFT presented a memorial and resolutions from the Legislature of Vermont, in relation to Texas and slavery in the District of Columbia.

MR. KING said he considered it an infamous libel and insult on the South, let it come from what quarter it would; it was a false statement in relation to the people of the South, when it charged them with disregard for the laws, and he expressed his surprise that gentlemen should present such papers which they could not but feel were untrue.

Mr. SWIFT hoped he should never prove so recreant to the interest of his constituents, as to refuse the performance of his duty, especially to present resolutions coming from the Legislature of his State. The document was the result of no party effort, it was the united voice of the whole State of Vermont.

Mr. CALHOUN deemed the present moment one of the deepest importance. A great step had been taken in the progress of events. The circumstance of the morning had come upon him wholly unexpected. He had never heard that the resolutions in question had been passed by the Vermont Legislature; yet he might have anticipated as much. He had long foreseen the present state of things; and now the time had actually come when it was to be determined whether we are longer to remain as one united and happy people, or whether this blessed Union was to be dissolved by the hand of violence. Vermont has struck a deep and dangerous blow into the vitals of our confederacy. It was a time for action, and he could not, would not, entertain the idea of rejecting or losing sight of the document before the Senate, but as he was unprepared at present to act on the subject, he would move that the memorial be laid upon the table, pledging himself not to oppose the Senator from Vermont, should he see fit to call it up hereafter; and more, would call it up himself when he had time to prepare his mind for action on the subject: determined the subject should not rest until it had received the final action of the Senate. It was his belief that the North were sound in the matter at issue, but some seemed even to prefer the prevalence of this dangerous doctrine to the preservation and continuance of the Union. His mind was unalterably fixed, and nothing should prevent him from putting his views into execution.

Mr. MORRIS thought some respect was due to the source whence these resolutions had emanated—the Legislature of Vermont—and hoped they would at least be laid on the table, and be printed.

Mr. ALLEN said, this motion has the effect of refusing to receive the petition; and it is for this reason only that I will now, as I did in a like case yesterday, vote against it. But it is said that such is not the effect. I will state the proposition in a form which will itself test this question. One Senator presents a petition; another Senator makes a motion that the petition be not received; a third Senator moves to lay that motion upon the table. This latter motion, if successful, puts an end to the business. Now, I ask, where is the petition? Is it in the Senate? Certainly not: because the very form of the motion that the petition be not received, is a declaration that it has not been received, and the very object of that motion is to prevent it from being received. If the petition had already been received, then the motion not to receive would be absurd, and the other motion to lay that motion on the table would effect nothing, because the sole object of this latter motion is to exclude the petition. If this be not its object, what is it? That such are the object and effect of this latter motion is evident from the fact, that if it be agreed to, the petition is then not in the Senate, and this is equally evident from the fact that the Senate cannot proceed to take any further order on the petition. It is, therefore, clear that the effect of the motion now before us is to refuse to receive the petition; and, as I am not prepared to deny the right of petition, I shall, for that reason, vote against the motion.

I, therefore, shall vote against this motion, as I did that on yesterday, because I acknowledge the right of petition, and the correlative obligation on the Senate to receive it. And then, sir, as I do not acquiesce in the prayer of the petitioner, nor admit his right to control the action of the Senate on his petition after it has been received, I will vote for a motion to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, hoped that the memorial would be withdrawn by the Senator from Vermont, and to give notice that he would introduce it at a future day, when the Senate was more prepared to act.

Mr. SWIFT withdrew his memorial, and gave notice that he would introduce it again.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 20.

Abolition of Slavery, and the Slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

The first business was the motion made by Mr. SLADE, on Monday, to refer two memorials, presented by him for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia to a Select Committee.

Mr. SLADE commenced by remarking that the business of the country was transacted here, by a reference of all subjects to their appropriate committees, and that matters of the most trivial nature met with no opposition to such reference. But no sooner did any member present a memorial relating in the slightest degree to a certain subject, the abolition of slavery, than it was directly attacked and placed under prohibition. Were he to present a petition from a constituent involving the sum of twenty dollars, that would not be denied a reference, inasmuch as it might involve an important principle; but here were a large class of petitions, signed by hundreds of thousands, asking the action of Congress on a subject of the greatest interest, and yet they were disposed of with no ceremony at all. He then alluded to the course pursued by certain members in opposition to such petitions, and expressed his belief that all the movements in relation to the subject had been preconcerted with the regularity of clockwork.

DECEMBER, 1837.] Abolition of Slavery and the Slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WISE explained that, as he had hitherto taken upon himself to oppose the reference of such petitions, he would say, once for all, that as far as his knowledge was concerned, there had been no preconcert in relation to the opposition of this subject, neither had he received any intimation from the Speaker, or any one else, as to the mode of proceeding.

Mr. DAWSON wished to ask the gentleman from Vermont if he intended to include him in the charge of preconcerting measures in opposition to the subject.

Mr. SLADE disclaimed any intention of imputing dishonorable motives to the gentlemen who had thought it their duty to adopt such a course. He moved to refer the memorials to a Select Committee, with instructions to report a bill providing for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LEGARE hoped the gentleman from Vermont would allow him to make a few remarks before he proceeded further. He solemnly entreated him to reflect on the possible results of such a course, which involved the interests of a nation, and a continent. He would warn him, not in the language of defiance, which all brave and wise men despised, but he would warn him in the language of a solemn sense of duty, that if there was "a spirit aroused in the North in relation to this subject," that spirit would encounter another spirit in the South full as stubborn.

Mr. SLADE again entered into an argument touching the subject of slavery in the State of Virginia, and was about to read a paper on the same subject, whereupon

Mr. WISE interposed, and said that the gentleman had been discussing slavery in the South, slavery in the State of Virginia, slavery in his district; and he now asked his colleagues to retire with him from that hall.

Mr. HOLSEY made the same request to his colleagues from Georgia, and expressed a hope that the whole Southern delegation would retire.

Mr. GRANTLAND joined in the wish.

Mr. RHETT. The whole of the delegation of South Carolina has already signed an agreement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. One remark, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SLADE. I claim the floor.

The CHAIR. Does the gentleman from Virginia rise to a question of order?

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir. I wish to make one observation.

Mr. RHETT. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish simply to propose to the Southern delegation—

Mr. RHETT. I rise to a point of order. The question of order is, whether the member from Vermont has a right to go into the consideration of slavery in the State of Virginia? I say he has not; and if it is insisted upon, I request the whole Southern delegation to go into the room of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The CHAIR reminded the House that he had repeatedly interposed when the gentleman from Vermont had been going into the question of slavery in the States. He was not permitted to give his own opinions, but they might readily be inferred by the House. He felt it his duty to state, that if it were possibly in his power to allay excitement, and to prevent discussions of this sort, he would do it.

Mr. TURNERY rose to a question of order.

Mr. SLADE. I ask leave to read a paper, and to state what that paper is.

Mr. GRANTLAND. I object to the reading.

The CHAIR. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland. Will it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to take the sense of the House whether the member from Vermont shall be permitted to proceed?

The CHAIR replied negatively.

Mr. McKAY. Mr. Speaker, has not the member from Vermont been declared out of order?

The CHAIR. He has.

Mr. McKAY. Then has he a right to proceed?

The CHAIR. No gentleman has raised that question.

Mr. McKAY. Then, sir, I make that question. I object to his proceeding. I object to his resuming his remarks, and I hope the House will not permit him.

The CHAIR then, under the rule, directed Mr. SLADE to take his seat, and pronounced the gentleman out of order for discussing the question of slavery in the State of Virginia. Referring to the 22d rule, the CHAIR added, that the gentleman could no longer proceed without the leave of the House; and he was about to propound the question, when

Mr. SLADE said he wished to state the position in which he stood. I propose, said he, to read a single paper—

Mr. TURNERY. I object to the gentleman's proceeding at all.

The CHAIR said the rule was imperative. The gentleman could not proceed, under the question made by Mr. McKAY, without leave of the House.

Mr. SLADE. The question now is, whether it is in order for me to ask for the reading of a paper.

The CHAIR. The other question is also before the House, and must be decided by its vote, without debate.

Mr. SLADE. I ask if I am out of order while proceeding with the leave of the House, going on for at least twenty minutes, and then merely asking leave to read a paper.

The CHAIR states that his power to commence was when the question of order was made. Thereafter, the rule was imperative, directing its decision without debate.

Mr. SLADE, (who was still on his feet,) Mr. Speaker—

THE CHAIR. The gentleman will take his seat.

MR. SLADE then pledged himself, if the House would permit him to resume, not to discuss the question of slavery in the States.

THE CHAIR then propounded the question to the House that the gentleman from Vermont have leave to proceed.

MR. ALLEN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

MR. RENOHER moved that the House adjourn.

MR. SLADE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 166, nays 63.

MR. CAMPBELL then gave notice that the Southern delegations were then assembled in the room of the Committee for the District of Columbia; and he said he was instructed by their committee to request the attendance of all gentlemen representing slave-holding interests on that floor immediately.*

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 21.

Small Notes and Shin-plaster Currency in the District of Columbia.

The bill to restrain the issuing of small notes in the District of Columbia, was taken up.

MR. WRIGHT suggested that thirty days would be an appropriate period to fill the blank.

MR. CLAY said that no one more ardently desired the resumption of specie payments than himself; but he doubted the expediency of forcing the banks of this District to resume at a period of uncertainty as to when those of the surrounding country should adopt such a measure. He had that morning received news from New York of the resumption of another of their banks, and that, taken in connection with information derived of late from various quarters, inspired him with much stronger hopes than he had formerly entertained, that the banks would, at an early day, return to specie payments throughout the country. With regard to the banks of this District, it was futile to suppose that they could attempt to pay specie, when those with whom they were so intimately connected did not do so. He thought the wisest, as well as the most prudent step, would be to postpone the matter to an early period in January—say first or second week—when there might be a similar movement on the part of the Baltimore and Richmond Banks. Congress could then with more certainty fix the time when these banks must resume, or have their charters revoked. He thought it wrong for Congress to legislate too hastily for a people under its immediate charge, without reference to the position in which they stood to their neighboring population. As the holidays were approaching, (a period when Congress was not presumed to be subject to any very grave legislation,) he thought the banks might be longer indulged, and he hoped, therefore, there would be little or no opposition to his suggestion.

MR. WRIGHT. The District banks were never authorized by their charters to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars. Now, however, it had become their habit, in common with individuals, to issue notes from twenty-five to six and a fourth cents. "Shin-plasters" (a distinguishing term, and one he disliked as much as any one else) had been necessarily used for change, because the people had in a measure been forced to do so, by the suspension of these banks; but this small money business he believed was carried to a greater extent in this District than in any other portion of our country. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, in his remarks, threw out the idea, that the banks of this District were dependent on their relative position with those in Maryland and Virginia for resumption! Suppose the case was reversed, and the Legislatures of those States depended on the action of Congress to force the banks of this District to resume, under forfeiture of their charters: at what future period should we look for so desirable a result?

MR. CLAY said he could see no good reason why Congress should not extend a corresponding courtesy to the District banks, with that of the Legislatures of the several States to their moneyed institutions.

With regard to these small bills, if immediately suppressed, what was to be done? There was no silver to supply the vacuum; and members of Congress had found this small money very convenient on many occasions. Hackmen, waiters, and others could not be dispensed with; and without this kind of change, how could their services be required? Another objectionable feature in the bill was, that it imposed a penalty alike on the stranger and citizen, for the passage of these bills, whether issued here, or brought from abroad. He had in his purse notes from one dollar down to six cents, originating in the different places through which he had passed from Newport, Kentucky, to Washington city, in the District of Columbia; in fact, business could not progress without them. And would it not be a legal imposition on a stranger to pass this bill with such provisions? Could it be expected that a stranger passing through this small space of ten miles square, could stop to inquire into our laws?

MR. BENTON objected to the postponement. The argument was to postpone both bills—the shin-plaster bill, and the bank bill,—and that not to a certain day, but indefinitely, and until adjoining States should first act upon the same subjects. This was the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY.) His motion was for a postponement until the second Monday in January, but the argument was for indefinite postponement, and for contingent action; and it was evident, from the two speeches just made by that Senator, (Mr. CLAY,) that if the postponement was granted, that another would be demanded when it was out; for the whole tenor of his two speeches was, that the shin-plasters were not to be suppressed, nor the bank in this District required to resume, until the adjacent States had first led the way in the same work. This was indefinite postponement, and contingent action. It was the attempt to do here precisely what had been effected by the party opposed to resumption in the bank convention in New York; it was non-action! it was to do nothing! and get rid of the subject without fixing a day!

* The above report gives only a meagre skeleton account of the most disturbing movement on the subject of slavery ever made in our Congress, and which occupied the whole day, and led to the memorable secession from the hall of the Southern members, to deliberate among themselves what line of conduct it behooved them to take in such a conjuncture. A more full and intelligible account of it is given in the "Thirty Years' View," Vol. II., Chap. 86.

Mr. B. denied that there was any validity in any of the reasons given by the Senator from Kentucky for delaying either of the bills. There was no necessity for these filthy shin-plasters. The Senators alone received for their compensation more hard money than the District required for change. They had received all their pay in gold and silver at the called session, and they were now receiving their pay in hard money and Treasury notes, in the proportion of two-thirds hard money and one-third Treasury notes. This is the manner in which the Senate is paid, its officers and all, and all its expenses. He presumed the House of Representatives was paid in the same way; and as the expenses of the two Houses exceeded three thousand dollars a day, it would follow that upwards of two thousand a day in specie was receivable by the members and officers of Congress. This was the daily supply; so that, leaving all other sources of supply out of the question, Congress alone disbursed vastly more hard money in the District than its business could absorb, and it was accordingly purchased up for exportation by agents whose advertisements could be seen in every newspaper.

Mr. TITTON said that he would vote to postpone the consideration of the bill, to afford time for us to hear from the Legislatures of the States now in session. He was opposed to the issue and circulation of the small bills or notes, familiarly called "shin-plasters," and would go for freeing the people of the District of Columbia from that species of trash. He also felt it to be his duty, so far as his vote would go, to compel the banks of the District to resume specie payments at the time we exclude shin-plasters from circulation here; but he would not now give a vote to coerce the banks of this District to pay specie at an earlier day than that at which the banks of the different States should resume specie payments.

Mr. WRIGHT said he felt bound to call for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone; when the vote stood:

YEAS.—Messrs. Black, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, and Tipton—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Conn., Strange, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

The bill underwent a long discussion on its details, in which Messrs. WRIGHT, BENTON, HUBBARD, and GRUNDY participated.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the blank in the third line was filled with the 10th of April, so as to make it penal to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, after that date.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 21.

Mr. Patton's Resolution—Abolition Petitions to lie on the Table.

Mr. PATTON asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, and papers, touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or transferring of slaves, in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, be laid on the table without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. ADAMS objected.

Mr. PATTON moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 136, nays 60.

Mr. PATTON said he had offered this resolution in the spirit of peace and harmony. It involves, (said Mr. P.,) so far as I am concerned, and so far as concerns some portion of the representatives of the slave-holding States, a concession; a concession which we make for the sake of peace, harmony, and union. We offer it in the hope that it may allay, not exasperate excitement; we desire to extinguish, not to kindle a flame in the country. In that spirit, sir, without saying one word in the way of discussion; without giving utterance to any of those emotions which swell in my bosom at the recollection of what took place here yesterday, I shall do what I have never yet done since I have been a member of this House, and which I have very rarely sustained when done by others: I move the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS said: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman precedes his resolution—(Loud cries of "Order! order!" from all parts of the hall.) Mr. A. He preceded it with remarks—"Order! order!"

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that it was out of order to address the House after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask the House—(continued cries of "Order!" which completely drowned the honorable member's voice.)

Mr. ADAMS then demanded tellers on the second to the previous question, which were

On the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" being propounded, there were—yeas 129, nays 62.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

The main question being on agreeing to the resolution, was then put, and decided by:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bruyn, Buchanan, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Wm. B. Campbell, John Campbell, Timothy J. [When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, that gentleman rose, and said: "I hold the resolution to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States." (Loud cries of "Order! order!" from every part of the hall.)

The SPEAKER said, the gentleman from Massachusetts violates order, and must resume his seat.

Pending the question being propounded,

Mr. DUNCAN inquired of the Chair if he could assign the reasons for the vote he should give.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. WISE (who had not voted) inquired of the Chair the rule in relation to a member being excused from voting, and at what stage the reasons for making such a request must be made.

The CHAIR said before a division of the House, or before the commencement of the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE said, as he could not assign his reasons at length, he desired, at least, that his constituents might know that he was present. He could not vote for the resolution, because it implied or admitted a principle he denied—the right to receive those petitions.

After the vote was taken, Mr. ADAMS rose, and moved that his reasons for not voting on the resolution be entered on the journal.

The CHAIR said it was out of order.

Mr. ADAMS then notified his request to the Clerk to make an entry of his motion, and that it was pronounced by the Chair to be out of order.]

WEDNESDAY, December 27.

Slavery in the States, Territories, and District of Columbia—Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States adopting the same acted, severally, as free, independent, and sovereign States; and that each, for itself, by its own voluntary assent, entered the Union with the view to its increased security against all dangers, domestic as well as foreign, and the more perfect and secure enjoyment of its advantages, natural, political, and social.

2. Resolved, That in delegating a portion of their powers to be exercised by the Federal Government, the States retained, severally, the exclusive and sole right over their own domestic institutions and police, and are alone responsible for them, and that any intermeddling of any one or more States, or a combination of their citizens, with the domestic institutions and police of the others, on any ground, or under any pretext whatever, political, moral, or religious, with the view to their alteration or subversion, is an assumption of superiority not warranted by the constitution, insulting to the States interfered with, tending to endanger their domestic peace and tranquillity, subversive of the objects for which the constitution was formed, and, by necessary consequence, tending to weaken and destroy the Union itself.

3. Resolved, That this Government was instituted, and adopted by the several States of this Union, as a common agent, in order to carry into effect the powers which they had delegated by the constitution for their mutual security and prosperity; and that, in fulfillment of this high and sacred trust, this Government is bound so to exercise its powers as to give, as far as may be practicable, increased stability and security to the domestic institutions of the States that compose the Union; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument to attack the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy such institutions, instead of strengthening and upholding them, as it is in duty bound to do.

4. Resolved, That domestic slavery, as it exists in the Southern and Western States of this Union, composes an important part of their domestic institutions, inherited from their ancestors, and existing at the adoption of the constitution, by which it is recognized as constituting an essential element in the distribution of its powers among the States; and that no change of opinion, or feeling, on the part of the other States of the Union in relation to it, can justify them or their citizens in open and systematic attacks thereon, with the view to its overthrow; and that all such attacks are in manifest violation of the mutual and solemn pledge to protect and defend each other, given by the States, respectively, on entering into the constitutional compact, which formed the Union, and as such is a manifest breach of faith, and a violation of the most solemn obligations, moral and religious.

5. Resolved, That the intermeddling of any State or States, or their citizens, to abolish slavery in this District, or any of the Territories, on the ground, or under the pretext, that it is immoral or sinful; or the passage of any act or measure of Congress, with that view, would be a direct and dangerous attack on the institutions of all the slave-holding States.

6. Resolved, That the union of these States rests on an equality of rights and advantages among its members; and that whatever destroys that equality, tends to destroy the Union itself; and that it is the solemn duty of all, and more especially of this body, which represents the States in their corporate capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate between the States in extending the benefits of the Government to the several portions of the Union; and that to refuse to extend to the Southern and Western States any advantage which would tend to strengthen, or render them more secure, or increase their limits, or population by the annexation of new territory or States, on the assumption or under the pretext that the institution of slavery, as it exists among them, is immoral, or sinful, or otherwise obnoxious, would be contrary to that equality of rights and advantages which the constitution was intended to secure alike to all the members of the Union, and would, in effect, disfranchise the slave-holding States, withholding from them the advantages, while it subjected them to the burthens, of the Government.*

Mr. PRESTON remarked that his feelings in regard to the subject of the resolutions were

* These resolutions, and the debate to which they gave rise, and the modifications which they underwent, and the final vote upon them, constitute the most important proceeding on the subject of slavery which has ever taken place in Congress. They were framed to declare the whole power of Congress upon the subject, and were presented for a "test" vote, and as the future "platform" and "permanent settlement" of the law on the slavery question. The first four related to the States, and the rights of slavery in them under the guarantee of the constitution. The fifth related to the District of Columbia, and to the Territory of Florida, (that being the only slave territory then in the Union,) and placed the abolition of slavery therein in the hands of Congress, but forbid by high expedient reasons. These five resolutions were adopted, with modifications: the sixth was rejected, as looking to the annexation of Texas, and tending to forestall action on that question. The full debate, as prepared by the speakers themselves, follows after the current report of each day's proceedings; and while the whole debate possesses great interest, that of the 11th of January retains the greatest, as showing the unanimity of the speakers on the Missouri Compromise Act, and especially Mr. Calhoun's voluntary declaration, that he was for it at the time, but had since changed his opinion on account of the encouragement which it gave the Abolitionists.

in full union with those of his colleague, (Mr. CALHOUN,) but from the simple reading, he could but gather the sentiments they contained in an abstract form. Yet he would suggest the propriety of some delay in the action of the Senate thereon; as the resolutions from the State of Vermont, shortly to be offered by the Senator from that State, might bring the subject forward in a more applicable form, and anticipate the spirit and sentiments of the resolutions just offered. It had been some years since remarked on the floor of the Senate, that the time had gone by when legislation, by means of resolutions, would be sufficient to meet the wishes of the country on a subject so vitally important. He was still of the same opinion. The settlement of mere abstractions of principles will never answer the desired end. These remarks he had made simply to remind the Senate that it had been his intention, and was so still, to bring the matter forward in some more forcible and effective form at a future day.

Mr. CALHOUN did not feel disposed to await any action on the Vermont resolutions. He was prepared to act now; and as the resolutions just offered contained the whole gist of the matter at issue, he saw no necessity for further delay.

The motion to print was agreed to.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 28.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN said, in calling up these resolutions, it was not his intention, at the present time, to enter into any discussion of their merits or demerits, but merely to repel such objections as might be urged against them. The resolutions spoke definitely, and to all points, for themselves. This confederacy consisted of free, sovereign, and independent States, each vested with supreme and indisputable rights! Some there were, however, who considered this a great National Republic, made up of individuals, with rights common to all; of this class might be deemed the party termed Abolitionists, in the North. It was the object of these resolutions to bring forward the facts, and display them in their true light. He wished the deep deliberation of every Senator, as he desired to make the question, on their rejection or adoption, a test question. All present, every Senator, without exception, had confessed himself opposed to the fanatical doctrine of abolition; yet the South had no rallying point on which to stand; and, although their measures were justified by a great portion of the North, yet there was among them another party, zealots in the cause of Abolition, chiming aloud under the sacred right of petition. Many, doubtless, were drawn into that snare, who, in the first instance, were conservative in their views. Whatever might be the diversity of opinion, of this great country, on other points, on the matter now at issue no one could disagree. These resolutions, if adopted, would present ground where all could stand, and express their real opinions without trenching on or affecting the rights on other points. With regard to the right of slavery, his opinion was unalterable, and he held it an insult to have his rights attacked on the question. He hoped the Senate would take sufficient time to discuss calmly the subject, and that each Senator would express his individual opinion.

He did not desire them to pass by a bare majority; he wished them to pass by a unanimous vote; be that as it might, however, he would repeat what he had before said, that he wished it to be considered a test question. If these propositions were rejected, the Senate will have said to the South "come here no longer for protection;" by such a vote the Senate would legalize a continuance of these assaults. If, on the contrary, they were adopted, it would be a holy pledge of that body to protect it from further aggression; but if postponed or eluded, it would be incontrovertible evidence of the unwillingness of the Senate to express an opinion; and consequently must be considered a silent acquiescence in the insults offered to Southern rights and Southern feelings. If adopted, they would have a salutary effect in tranquillizing the public mind. He looked to these resolutions to create an awakening spirit in the country in favor of the constitution. The idea that this Republic was made up of one great aggregate of individuals, tended to increase the zeal of these fanatics, and a more rapid spread of their doctrines. The remedy must be found in the promulgation of opposite doctrines; and until this course was adopted, we could look for nothing but a continuance of their importunities. When the Republic was in danger, he must look to State rights, (the only true conservative principles,) and on this depended the preservation of the Union; and any other view must prove fatal to its peace.

Mr. PRESTON made a short reply. His objection to the introduction of the resolutions was, that they allowed ground for discussion; and that the subject ought never to be allowed to enter the halls of the Legislative Assembly, was always to be taken for granted by the South. Again: what would abstract propositions of this nature effect? He had them in the decalogue, but did they prevent crime?

Mr. STRANGE said that no measure could be considered child's play when wives, children, property, all that was dear to man, was at stake. Could he be otherwise than excited (said Mr. S.) when this subject is brought on the tapis? He felt sorry that the resolutions had been introduced; it was true he had been consulted, but his mind had not yielded assent, because he was of opinion that the South always lost ground by discussion, and he wished to avoid it from the very bottom of his soul. When a memorial had been presented from the Grand Jury of this District, praying that slavery might not be abolished in the District of Columbia, he had voted against the printing of that memorial, simply because he did not wish the question to go before the world. If the North sets us the example of excitement, why did we follow it? So far as he was concerned, he agreed with the whole spirit of the resolutions, but still did not think them sufficient to meet the exigency of the case. He was opposed to their postponement, because it would result in a long and protracted discussion, in which the South could not fail to be the sufferer. Let whatever action be had upon them, on this question, as in all others of magnitude, the greatest good must result from the most speedy action.

The greatest objection he had to the resolutions, was the danger of producing mischief by the discussion—mischief by the excitement that must necessarily be created in dipping into these disquieting topics. The proper course for the South, was, as he had before observed, to remain still, and pay no attention to the movements of these idle fanatics. When these abolition movements came from a higher source, he would point to the constitution, and that under that instrument our possessions are guaranteed. Vermont he thought had degraded herself by the adoption of the resolutions, (which on a former occasion, had been read in the Senate,) and by the presentation of them to this body, had forfeited her claims to respect. He was willing to believe that a majority of her citizens were opposed to their adoption, and that by some fatuitous circumstances, her Legislature had become momentarily filled with abolitionists! He hoped, for her everlasting credit, that the result of her earliest deliberations would be to retrace her steps, and retract the odious document directed to be presented. He was decidedly in favor of voting against the reception of all petitions, memorials, or resolutions, (come from whatever quarter,) in relation to the subject of slavery.

Mr. SWIFT said he had observed, that unpleasant allusions had been made to the resolutions which he had offered, and improper reflections passed upon the State of Vermont. He trusted gentlemen would forbear any further allusions, either to the documents or the State from which they emanated, during the present discussion, and which was manifestly on a different subject. He thought it would be time enough when the memorial from his State should be brought before the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) was averse to the discussion of this subject; so was every one else; but he ought to preach that to the abolitionists, not to the defenders of the sovereignty of the States. Was it not better to meet the question a little offensively than not to meet it at all? With regard to the doctrines of the constitution, all might be well acquainted with them; and yet how were they observed? Was the South to sit still and see the constitution trodden under foot, and its principles assailed? Would it not be better to try and rally around that body all who were orthodox in their political adherence? Look to the alien and sedition law. Was that odious measure defeated by sitting still, and quoting the authority of the constitution? Was it not rather by a series of brief, summary, and abstract resolutions? By that straight-forward, manly course we would protect our own rights, and at the same time show that it was our aim to defend to the last the charter handed down to us by our forefathers. He wished these resolutions by no means to be considered as strictly a Southern measure. He hoped that the vote that would be given upon them, would be a Northern and Western, as well as Southern vote.

The question was taken on the postponement, and carried.

FRIDAY, December 29.

Mr. WEBSTER appeared, and took his seat.

Slavery—Mr. Morris's Resolutions, counter to Mr. Calhoun's.

Mr. MORRIS offered some resolutions, remarking that he had prepared them by way of amendment to those offered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) In drafting them he had, as far as his own opinion would permit, followed the text of those to which he had alluded, yet with variations calculated, in his view, to protect the right of petition, the freedom of speech, and the liberty of the press.

In offering the resolutions, the Senator from South Carolina had thrown the glove, and with expressions of triumph asserted that none in the Senate could vote, in his opinion, against his views. He, however, dared to enter the lists single-handed, and engage with him.

Mr. CALHOUN had expressed his hopes that his proposition would meet with general favor from the Senate. He had expected some trifling opposition, but nothing in the light of the present movement. It was, however, now decided that no concession or sacrifice would satisfy the opposition. We had here a fair specimen of the doctrine in full color. Yes, here was displayed the absolute creed of the abolitionists, fully developed; and from this he had little hope that his desire to promote the harmony of the Union would be gratified. He, however, sternly denied throughout the charges brought against him by the gentleman who had offered the resolutions.

A motion to print was then agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, January 3.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not rise with a view to discuss the merits of the doctrines in the resolutions, but to repel the ground assumed by those opposed to them in their peculiar regard for freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the sacred right of petition. His chief object in urging an early action was, that the ground taken by these resolutions was distinctly different from that assumed by the other side; and his main wish in asking that the resolutions from Vermont might be postponed, was a desire to meet them in a manner which he deemed most consonant with the duties he owed to the South as an individual, and the relation he bore to the country as a firm and unflinching supporter of the Union. He had remarked at the time the Vermont resolutions were presented, that if no other member called them up, he pledged himself to do so. In the mean time, he had consulted his own mind as to the best mode of meeting the momentous subject, and had come to the fixed conclusion that the resolutions he had presented were the best calculated to fix the ground on which all could meet, and dispassionately and sincerely consult the interests of the whole. The resolutions from Vermont were to have been presented tomorrow; and had he retained his former opinion, he would have voted against their reception; but they, coming from a sovereign State, (and being himself the advocate of State rights,) he should urge a free and full discussion concerning them, as having a higher claim than the petitions of infatuated individuals. As an advocate of State rights, he would not feel himself bound to vote against hearing these resolutions, but as a Southern man, feeling his dearest privileges so dangerously assailed, he could not vote for their reception. Thus trammelled as he was, he felt unwilling to leave the field, and in order to obtain a right to present his own views, he had prepared these resolutions as best adapted for the purpose, by presenting an antagonist course. His wish was to test the entire strength of the Senate on the subject, and to decide whether any neutral ground could be adopted, on which to rally, and check this dangerous and fatal doctrine. It was the one and the only one, as he before observed, of sufficient magnitude to endanger the Union, and this already had force enough to shake our political system to its very centre. On one side, there was a portion of the people of the North, who assert and maintain that our domestic institutions are sinful and immoral. On the other we claim our institutions as secured to us under the constitution, which we will not suffer them to interfere with, and there was the point at issue.

2D SESS.]

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. MORRIS asked to take the vote on each separate amendment. The resolutions in themselves were, to his mind, broad, sweeping, and denunciatory. What was the object of these resolutions? Was it not that a free discussion on an important question should not only be discountenanced, but silenced by a vote of that body? They were partial in their bearing, speaking on one side, and not on the other. Mr. M. for one, did not believe that Southern rights existed antagonistic to those of any other portion. Why talk of attacks on Southern interests and Southern feelings? Such sentiments might lead to geographical distinctions, but could never lead to the peace and happiness of the whole country. Mr. M. professed himself a State rights man, and had as high a devotion to the Union as any one; but he did not agree with the views of the Senator, that this Republic was a Confederacy of separate and independent States. He considered the constitution to be adopted and ratified by the united voice of the people. Mr. M. wished to know what the Senator from South Carolina meant by interfering with domestic policy? Would that gentleman contend that because he (Mr. M.) talked of slavery in the abstract as a moral sin, that he should have his rights abridged? Freedom of speech, of the press, and the sacred right of petition, were all sought to be put down at one fell swoop. If we could not meet together and discuss subjects and compare conditions with others, for evil or for good, we should, instead of progressing in our high destiny, retrograde, and be the merest ciphers.

Mr. ALLEN suggested that it might be as well to strike out the word religious, as all discussions in relation to it were, in his opinion, improper and not called for.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the whole spirit of the resolution hinged upon that word.

Mr. MORRIS moved to strike out the words "moral or religious;" on which he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRESTON thought the difficulty might be obviated by letting the resolution read, "under any pretence whatever."

Mr. CALHOUN objected. This spirit of abolition was nothing more than that fanaticism that had carried thousands of victims to the stake. What aroused that demoniacal spirit, but the opinion that the faith of one man was criminal in the sight of another. Here the same spirit was attempted to be revived, under the name of abolition, and he trusted to the good sense of the nation to put it down. It was impossible for him to consent to the suggestion of his colleague. The South had been assailed upon the principle that slavery was wicked and immoral; and could we meet it with such a milk-and-water measure, as that "under any pretext whatever," which, to his mind, was depriving it of its very essence.

Mr. BUCHANAN would express his opinion as firmly and decidedly as any man, in relation to the subject; not wishing to excite prejudices in the minds of any, he thought the resolution quite as strong with the modification as without it.

Mr. ALLEN was unwilling that there should be any allusion to religion in any way whatever; it was not a subject for discussion in the Legislatures of States or in the Senate; it was a matter left entirely to the citizen himself.

Mr. YOUNG thought nothing short of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina would have the desired effect. He had many friends in Illinois, who were decided Abolitionists, with whom he had reasoned on the danger of their course to the Union, to which all were attached; but with them it was considered a religious duty they had to perform; and hence was of opinion that the provision ought not to be stricken out.

Mr. BAYARD took a constitutional view of the question; and, though he denounced the spirit of abolition as dangerous and wicked in the extreme, yet he did not feel himself authorized to vote for the resolutions. If the doctrine contained in them was correct, then nullification was correct; and, if passed, might hereafter be appealed to as a precedent in favor of that doctrine.

Mr. CALHOUN wished merely to cover the common creed of the State rights party, and he had appealed to gentlemen directly antagonists to him, that if they saw any thing in the resolutions at all savoring of what had been suggested by the Senator, he would immediately pass his pen through it.

Mr. LUMPKIN was in favor of the resolutions, and retaining them as originally drafted by the Senator from South Carolina. He still believed that there were a very large portion of the North sincerely attached to the Union, and had neither part nor lot in these mischievous proceedings.

On Mr. MORRIS's motion to strike out the words "moral and religious," there appeared—yeas 14, nays 31.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and carried,—yeas 31, nays 13.

Mr. WEBSTER admitted the necessity of some definite action on the subject on the part of Congress; but his objection to the adoption of the resolutions now under consideration was based solely on the belief that they were at variance with the correct interpretation of the constitution. Though the States might have certain vested rights, yet they were such as were strictly of a local nature, and limited in their extent to strict compliance with constitutional provisions.

If the resolutions set forth that all domestic institutions, except so far as the constitution might interfere, and any intermeddling therewith by a State or individual, was contrary to the spirit of the confederacy, and was thereby illegal and unjust, he would give them his hearty and cheerful support.

Disturbances on the Northern Frontier.

The Confederacy could never have existed without this prevailing power of the constitution, and could no longer exist without its continuance. It was difficult to define what domestic institutions were without the pale of the constitution. Judicature was one of the class, and so with commerce, except inasmuch as the making of treaties was concerned. Yet it was not so as regards slavery. It was the express power of Congress to prohibit the importation of slaves, though the institution was in itself guaranteed by the constitution.

If the resolutions could be modified to meet the constitutional requisitions, asserting that the constitution permitted slavery, and protected the institution, he would then vote for them. An assertion here that the constitution cannot meddle with domestic institutions, if supported, utterly deprives it of power or effect.

Mr. CALHOUN assumed that there were now many institutions so far domestic as to be wholly within the control of States wherein they existed. Such was negro slavery. The gentleman's views evidently differed materially from his. No one could support an argument against his views respecting slavery. He could name a long catalogue of institutions controlled wholly by States on the same ground. He would not, in establishing such control, inquire and mark out the dividing line of public opinion in the premises. It was alike the sacred right of all, whether of the North or South. These rights, were institutions growing out of the constitution, and which must be maintained, and could never be meddled with by others, but with the greatest danger to the Confederacy.

Mr. WEBSTER inferred from the gentleman's argument, that the question was not whether there were not some domestic institutions beyond the reach of the constitution, but it claims that all such were beyond its control.

Mr. CALHOUN had no objection to striking out all to meet the views of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORRIS moved to strike out certain words in the second resolution; lost—yeas 12, nays 32.

Mr. SOUTHARD objected to further amendment. There was now nothing left of the second resolution but simply a declaration that the States "have just what rights they have."

The question was taken on the adoption of the second resolution, and carried—yeas 31, nays 9.

Disturbances on the Northern Frontier.

The CHAIR communicated the following Message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

Recent experience on the southern boundary of the United States, and the events now daily occurring on our northern frontier, have abundantly shown that the existing laws are insufficient to guard against hostile invasion, from the United States, of the territory of friendly and neighboring nations.

The laws in force provide sufficient penalties for the punishment of such offences, after they have been committed, and provided the parties can be found; but the Executive is powerless in many cases to prevent the commission of them, even when in possession of ample evidence of an intention on the part of evil-disposed persons to violate our laws.

Your attention is called to this defect in our legislation. It is apparent that the Executive ought to be clothed with adequate power effectually to restrain all persons within our jurisdiction from the commission of acts of this character. They tend to disturb the peace of the country, and inevitably involve the Government in perplexing controversies with foreign powers. I recommend a careful revision of all the laws now in force, and such additional enactments as may be necessary to vest in the Executive full power to prevent injuries being inflicted upon neighboring nations by the unauthorized and unlawful acts of citizens of the United States, or of other persons who may be within our jurisdiction, and subject to our control.

In illustration of these views, and to show the necessity of an early action on the part of Congress, I submit herewith a copy of a letter received from the Marshal of the northern district of New York, who had been directed to repair to the frontier, and take all authorized measures to secure the faithful execution of existing laws.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1838.

Mr. CLAY rose to express his full conviction of the necessity of some early action on this important subject. No spectacle could be more revolting to the feelings of a free people, than a war either among themselves or with another country. The views of the Executive met his highest approbation, but it was the duty of Congress to examine, and, if the existing laws were not adequate to prevent the alleged interference of our citizens, others should be forthwith enacted for the full accomplishment of an object so desirable. Mr. C. adverted, in connection, to the vexatious and unsettled state of our Northern boundary, which state of things tended to increase the danger which now threatened us.

If the people of this country choose to renounce their citizenship, it was perhaps allowable; but any interference with a rebellion in a country with which we were at peace, should meet the earliest attention of our Government. We might, as citizens, freely, and in any manner we thought proper, express our sympathies with either belligerent party, but in no case lend them aid or countenance.

He hoped that to whatever committee the subject might be referred, they would examine whether or not the action of our citizens had not been limited to some disputed territory, or whether arms, munitions of war, or supplies, had been furnished, and which, if proved true, such conduct must be viewed by Government as in the highest degree reprehensible.

Mr. CALHOUN had felt from the beginning of the troubles in Canada the greatest anxiety, and a fear that it might result in difficulties to this country. He hoped the existing laws, prohibiting the interference of our citizens, would be rigidly enforced; and if, on examination, they should be found insufficient to meet the exigencies of the case, that new ones would be speedily enacted. He would set forth in the strongest light the terrible consequences of a war with Great Britain at the present time. He urged in the most emphatic manner, the necessity of clothing the Executive with all needful additional power, if the laws in force were in this respect too limited. He moved the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

After some remarks by Mr. BENTON in favor of the motion to commit, the documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 8.

Message from the President—British Invasion of American Soil—Attack on the Caroline.

The following Message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States.

To the Senate and

House of Representatives, United States:

In the highly excited state of feeling on the northern frontier, occasioned by the disturbances in Canada, it was to be apprehended that causes of complaint might arise on the line dividing the United States from her Britannic Majesty's dominions. Every precaution was therefore taken on our part authorized by the existing laws, and as the troops of the provinces were embodied on the Canadian side, it was hoped that no serious violation of the rights of the United States would be permitted to occur. I regret, however, to inform you that an outrage of a most aggravated character has been committed, accompanied by a hostile though temporary invasion of our territory, producing the strongest feelings of resentment on the part of our citizens in the neighborhood, and in the whole border line, and that the excitement previously existing has been alarmingly increased. To guard against the possible recurrence of any similar act, I have thought it indispensable to call out a portion of the militia to be posted on that frontier. The documents herewith presented to Congress, show the character of the outrage committed, the measures taken in consequence of its occurrence, and the necessity for resorting to them.

It will also be seen that the subject was immediately brought to the notice of the British minister accredited to this country, and the proper steps taken on our part to obtain the fullest information of all the circumstances leading to and attendant upon the transaction, preparatory to a demand for reparation. I ask such appropriations as the circumstances in which our country is thus unexpectedly placed require.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8, 1838.

Mr. Rogers to the President.

BUFFALO, Dec. 30, 1837.

SIR: Our whole frontier is in commotion, and I fear it will be difficult to restrain our citizens from revenging, by a resort to arms, this flagrant invasion of our territory. Every thing that can be done will be by the public authorities to prevent so injudicious a movement. The respective sheriffs of Erie and Niagara have taken the responsibility of calling out the militia, to guard the frontier, and prevent any further depredations.

I am, sir, with great consideration,

Your obedient servant,

H. W. ROGERS,

District Attorney for Erie county.

STATE OF NEW YORK, Niagara county, ss.

Gilman Appleby, of the city of Buffalo, being sworn, says, that he left the port of Buffalo on the morning of the 29th instant, in the steamboat Caroline, owned by William Wells, of Buffalo, and bound for Schlosser, upon the east side of the Niagara River, and within the United States. That this deponent commanded the said Caroline, and that she was cleared from Buffalo with a view to run between said Buffalo and Schlosser, carry passengers, freight, etc. That this deponent caused the said Caroline to be landed at Black Rock, on her way down; and that, while at Black Rock, this deponent caused the American flag to be run up; and that, soon after leaving Black Rock harbor, a volley of musketry was discharged at the Caroline from the Canada shore, but without injury. That the said Caroline continued her course down the Niagara River unmolested, and landed outside of certain scows or boats attached to Navy Island, where a number of passengers disembarked, and, as this deponent supposes, certain articles of freight were landed. That from this point the Caroline ran to Schlosser, arriving there at three o'clock in the afternoon; that, between this time and dark, the Caroline made two trips to Navy Island, landing as before. That, at about six o'clock in the evening, this deponent caused the said Caroline to be landed at Schlosser, and made fast with chains to the dock at that place. That the crew and officers of the Caroline numbered ten, and that, in the course of the evening, twenty-three individuals, all of whom were citizens of the United States, came on board of the Caroline, and requested this deponent and other officers of the boat to permit them to remain on board during the night, as they were unable to get lodgings at the tavern near by; these requests were acceded to, and the persons thus coming on board retired to rest, as did also all of the crew and officers of the Caroline, except such as were stationed to watch during the night. That about midnight, this deponent was informed by one of the watch that several boats filled with men were making towards the Caroline from the river, and this deponent immediately gave the alarm, and before he was able to reach the deck the Caroline was boarded by some seventy or eighty men, all of whom were armed. That they immediately commenced a warfare with muskets, swords, and cutlasses, upon the defenceless crew and passengers of the Caroline, under a fierce cry of "G—d damn them, give them no quarters; kill every man; fire! fire!" That the Caroline was abandoned without resistance, and the only effort made by either the crew or passengers seemed to be to escape slaughter. That this deponent narrowly escaped; having received several wounds, none of which, however, are of a serious character. That immediately after the Caroline fell into the hands of the armed force who boarded her, she was set on fire, cut loose from the dock, was towed into the current of the river, there abandoned, and soon after descended the Niagara Falls; that this deponent has made vigilant search after the individuals, thirty-three in number, who are known to have been on the Caroline at the time she was boarded, and twenty-one only are to be found, one of whom, to wit, Amos Durfee, of Buffalo, was found dead upon the dock, having received a shot from a musket, the ball of which penetrated the back part of the head, and came out at the forehead. James H. King and Captain C. F. Harding were seriously, though not mortally wounded. Several others received slight wounds. The twelve individuals who are missing, this deponent has no doubt were either murdered upon the steamboat, or found a watery grave in the cataract of the falls. And this deponent further says, that immediately after the Caroline was got into the current of the stream and abandoned, as before stated, beacon lights were discovered upon the Canada shore, near Chippewa; and after sufficient time had elapsed to enable the boats to reach that shore, this deponent distinctly heard loud and vociferous cheering at that point. That this deponent has no doubt that the individuals who boarded the Caroline were a part of the British forces now stationed at Chippewa.

GILMAN APPLEBY.

STATE OF NEW YORK, Niagara county, ss.

Charles F. Harding, James H. King, Joshua H. Smith, William Seaman, William Kennedy, William Wells, John Leonard, Sylvanus Staring, and John Haggarty, being sworn, severally, depose and say that they have heard the foregoing affidavit of Gilman Appleby, read; that they were on the Caroline at the time she was boarded as stated in said affidavit, and that all the facts sworn to by said Appleby as occurring after the said Caroline was so boarded as aforesaid, are correct and true.

*Mr. Poinsett to Gen. Scott.*DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 5, 1838.

SIR: You will repair, without delay, to the Canada frontier of the United States, and assume the military command there.

Herewith you will receive duplicate letters to the Governors of the States of New York and Vermont, requesting them to call into the service of the United States such a militia force as you may deem necessary for the defence of that frontier of the United States.

This power has been confided to you in the full persuasion that you will use it discreetly, and extend the call only so far as circumstances may seem to require.

It is important that the troops called into the service should be, if possible, exempt from that state of excitement which the late violation of our territory has created, and you will therefore impress upon the Governors of these border States the propriety of selecting troops from a portion of the State distant from the theatre of action.

The Executive possesses no legal authority to employ the military force to restrain persons within our jurisdiction, and who ought to be under our control, from violating the laws, by making incursions into the territory of neighboring and friendly nations, with hostile intent. I can give you, therefore, no instructions on that subject; but request that you will give us your influence to prevent such excesses, and to preserve the character of this Government for good faith, and a proper regard for the rights of friendly powers.

The militia will be called into the service for three months, unless sooner discharged; and in your requisitions you will designate the number of men, and take care that the officers do not exceed a due proportion.

It is deemed important that the administrative branch of the service should be conducted, wherever practicable, by officers of the regular army.

The disposition of the force, with regard to the points to be occupied, is confided to your discretion, military skill, and intimate knowledge of the country; and the amount of that force must depend upon the character and duration of the contest now going on in Canada, and the disposition manifested by the people and the public authorities of that colony.

The President indulges a hope that outrages, similar to that which lately occurred at Schlosser, will not be repeated; and that you will be able to maintain the peace of that frontier without being called upon to use the force which has been confided to you.

*Mr. Poinsett to Gov. Marcy.*DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 5, 1838.

SIR: The territory of the United States having been violated by a party of armed men from the Canada shore, and apprehensions being entertained, from the highly excited feelings of both parties, that similar outrages may lead to an invasion of our soil, the President has thought proper to exercise the authority vested in him by law, and call out such a militia force as may be deemed necessary to protect the frontiers of the United States.

I am, in consequence, instructed by the President, to request you will call into the service of the United States, and place under the command of Brevet Major-General Scott, such militia force as he may require to be employed on the Canada frontier, for the purpose herein set forth.

*Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, Jan. 5, 1838.

SIR: By the direction of the President of the United States, I have the honor to communicate to you a copy of the evidence furnished to this Department of an extraordinary outrage committed from Her Britannic Majesty's province of Upper Canada, on the persons and property of citizens of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the State of New York. The destruction of the property, and assassination of citizens of the United States on the soil of New York, at the moment when, as is well known to you, the President was anxiously endeavoring to allay the excitement, and earnestly seeking to prevent any unfortunate occurrence on the frontier of Canada, has produced upon his mind the most painful emotions of surprise and regret. It will necessarily form the subject of a demand for redress upon Her Majesty's Government. This communication is made to you under the expectation that, through your instrumentality, an early explanation may be obtained from the authorities of Upper Canada of all the circumstances of the transaction; and that, by your advice to those authorities, such decisive precautions may be used as will render the perpetration of similar acts hereafter impossible. Not doubting the disposition of the Government of Upper Canada to do its duty in punishing the aggressors and preventing future outrage, the President, notwithstanding, has deemed it necessary to order a sufficient force on the frontier to repel any attempt of a like character, and to make known to you that if it should occur, he cannot be answerable for the effects of the indignation of the neighboring people of the United States.

The Message having been read,

Mr. HOWARD said, that seeing the President, in the conclusion of the Message, called for an appropriation, he should move its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, otherwise he should have moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that so much of the Message as related to the call for appropriations be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the residue thereof to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GRAY did not rise for the purpose of excusing the deed which was said to have been done, but he was opposed to any course during the present state of things which would have the least tendency to place us in a warlike position with Great Britain.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought it extremely important that the feeling of excitement in the North should not be further excited by discussions in that Hall. No gentleman knowing the high and liberal policy of Great Britain, could suppose that she would refuse to discountenance and deliver up those murderers, provided the facts alleged were properly established. But, at the same time, he considered it highly necessary that our citizens on the frontier ought to be protected from such attacks, and not to be left defenceless. He hoped that troops would be sent immediately to preserve the peace, and prevent a retaliation from our own people, if possible, still more violent. But, this state of things ought to have been foreseen more than a month ago, and measures provided accordingly.

Mr. BRONSON regretted to see that there was a greater disposition to make war on the Administration than on Great Britain. He was as much averse to a war with Great Britain as any one, but he could not restrain his surprise that gentlemen should throw the whole blame of the recent occurrences upon the Administration. He would ask if the Administration had not done all that was possible it could do under all the circumstances of the case? Was the Administration to be blamed for the peculiar situation of that portion of our frontier, and because a party from the other side had come over and murdered a number of our citizens? Until within the last thirty days there were no indications in that quarter which would authorize the Executive to adopt such measures as were now necessary.

Mr. RILEY thought the House should, in the first place, look at the matter calmly, and ascertain who was to blame. Was it with the Administration? Candor, certainly, would declare not, whilst not a regular soldier was available at its command; and the civil officers on the frontier, who had been called upon to repress the excitement, appear by their conduct to have been the instruments of increasing and continuing it. How, sir, asked Mr. R., had the difficulty commenced? Was it not caused by a fugitive from Canada, a traitor according to the laws of his country, for whose head a price had been offered, coming over the lines into the United States, and in open day, in the streets of Buffalo, by his inflammatory speeches, inducing the citizens of the United States to take up arms, and assist in a rebellion of the subjects of a friendly power, who was rightfully endeavoring to maintain her institutions? This fugitive had not only been harbored and entertained by us, but recruits from amongst our citizens were openly mustered to his standard. Now, have we forgotten the laws of nations as we applied them when Gen. Jackson seized upon Pensacola, because her authorities harbored our Indian enemy, and furnished them with munitions of war? He then ably demonstrated, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, then Secretary of State, that for such a cause we had a right to take possession by the sword of the city of a friendly nation; and have the citizens of Buffalo done less than the Governor of Pensacola? Suppose the subjects of Great Britain should gather together upon our frontiers, in combination with some discontented, factious citizens, with the avowed purpose of overturning our republican institutions—how would we bear it? and how would we tolerate the idea that munitions of war, provisions, and fire-arms, should be furnished these our enemies by British subjects? Unquestionably we would consider ourselves as grossly wronged, and would be very slow in recognizing any spirit of friendship as dictating such measures.

Mr. MENIFEE endeavored to show that greater causes had been at work, previous to the attack on the steamboat Caroline, to produce the present state of things. He alluded at some length to the policy of this Government toward Mexico, which, he contended, had engendered a lawless and dishonorable feeling in our citizens, and had influenced their conduct in relation to Canada. He was in favor of a reference of the whole subject to committees.

Mr. THOMPSON said he would not prejudice the case—he would not rely upon newspapers and ex parte statements on either side; he wanted information in an authentic form. But if that statement is true, (and the President seems to think it so,) it is a cold-blooded, unmitigated, and savage murder of unoffending American citizens, with circumstances of atrocity unprecedented among civilized nations, even in a state of actual war. He sincerely hoped that there were facts which would excuse or explain the statement which we now have. If there are not, no disclaimer on the part of the British Government, no atonement by that Government short of a surrender to our tribunals of the ferocious assassins, should, or would satisfy the American people. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MENIFFE) had said that there was no danger of war; that there was no principle involved; none such as the right of search. No principle involved! Great God! sir, are we to be told that there is no principle involved in the invasion of our territory by a hostile band of another nation, and the murder, with fiendish atrocity, of our sleeping and unoffending citizens? The gentleman has alluded to another topic, which, although Mr. T. had anticipated, he did not expect from that quarter. The gentleman said that the course of our Government towards Mexico had been infamous, cowardly, but that we were now about to be forced by England, our peer, our equal, to do that which our sense of justice had not prompted towards Mexico. He had no wish to see our Government presented in this light to the civilized world. He had watched the course of the Administration through the whole progress of the war in Texas, and he was prepared to prove that our Government had exerted every power under the constitution and laws to enforce neutrality.

The laws upon that subject are, in the main, penal, not preventive. There was no power to prevent our citizens from expatriating themselves to Texas or any other country, nor to prevent them from bearing arms in the wars of their new country. Such was almost, in every instance, the case with our citizens who went to Texas. Not one in one hundred has gone there with other views than of permanent settlement. The only law which could have prevented this was the act of 1818, forbidding enlistment for foreign service. In all cases, along our whole border, the district attorneys were earnestly and repeatedly urged to enforce the law. If they did not, it was no fault of the Government. It resulted from a universal sympathy of our people with the gallant struggle of the Texans, which rendered the enforcing the law impossible. Quid volent leges sine maribus. You never can enforce a law which violates the general feeling of the country, without breaking down the most sacred guarantee of public liberty—the trial by jury. So much, sir, for the infamous violation of our neutrality, for which the gentleman from Kentucky desires to see us forced to a different course by the power of England. I agree with my friend and colleague, (Mr. RHETT,) in his reprehension of the conduct of some of our citizens on the Canada frontier. Their conduct is not only wrong; it is criminal. Every citizen is bound, in law and in honor, to respect the treaty stipulations of his Government. There is scarcely a political crime more dangerous in its consequences than a violation of this duty. But I do not see justification or excuse in the fact of some of our citizens having, as individuals, gone to Canada, and engaged in the insurrection, for an armed band, said to be a portion of the Canadian army, invading our soil, and murdering our citizens who were innocent (and such is the statement) of any participation in the war now raging in Canada.

Mr. WISE moved the previous question on the motion of reference; which, being ordered, the question was taken on the main question, and agreed to.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 9.

Message from the President—British Invasion of American Soil—Attack upon the Caroline.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, on the subject of the recent invasion of our territory on the Canada frontier, and destruction of the lives of our citizens, by the British authorities of Upper Canada.

[It is the same document as that given in the House proceedings of yesterday.]

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, moved that that portion of the Message which relates to an appropriation be referred to the Committee on Finance; and that the other portion of it, relating to our foreign affairs, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. While up, Mr. C. said he must take occasion to say, that he did think that the recent outrage committed on the soil of the United States, and on the lives of its citizens, was of the most atrocious nature in its character and consequences—wholly unjustifiable, and not in the slightest degree palliated by any thing which preceded it. And, sir, (said Mr. C.) there was a character of deliberation attending it which aggravates the enormity. It was in the dead hour of the night; it was from a shore in a belligerent condition, and therefore in a state of constant watchfulness; it was after a state of preparation, which must have been at least three or four hours, showing that the commander of the British forces was apprised of it, and the destination of the attacking force. It was altogether impossible that he was ignorant of the fact that this vessel was lying quietly at anchor within our jurisdiction, and therefore in a condition which could not justify an attack. It was under all these circumstances that the attack was made. Neither the people of the United States, in the aggregate, nor those in the immediate neighborhood of the disturbed district, nor the Government of the United States, had done any thing to justify this most unparalleled outrage. I want no further evidence (said Mr. C.) than that now presented to me, to satisfy me that there is nothing to justify it. It was to be regretted (Mr. C. said) that in our own history examples had been furnished by which this outrage might be palliated. Without, however, adverting to them, or to any recent occurrences, he would only say that the true ground for a great nation to place itself on, was that of justice; that it should respect the rights of all nations, the weak as well as the powerful; and to abstain from all acts which might hereafter be brought up as precedents against them. While he made these remarks, he by no means wished to be understood as desiring to kindle up a spirit of war between this country and Great Britain; though he thought that ample, prompt, and full indemnity should be given us. He should, as much as any man, deplore a war; but, looking to the vast resources of our country, the valor of our citizens, and our achievements in former times, he would not fear the result.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his hopes that, in this early stage, and before we were fully advised, that no attempt would be made to excite the feelings of the public by debating the subject, which must be the natural result of such a course.

The late difficulties on our frontier might, by any reasonable person, have been anticipated. There are so many ties which necessarily bind the feelings of the population on either and both sides of the boundary line on that part of our frontiers, which has been the scene of bloodshed and outrage, that any attempt by either Government to oppress such population, would call forth the sympathies of the other; and in case of any movement in Canada, what could we expect but that our citizens would take part with the inhabitants, even though their wrongs were but pretended, in case due care was not taken by Government to prevent such interference?

What more distressing event could come than a war between two such nations as Great Britain and the United States? The human mind cannot conceive of a greater calamity. And this may be averted by a careful examination of all the facts on both sides of the subject as now presented for our consideration. Many wrongs may have been committed by our citizens of which we are now unadvised, and many palliations may be produced in favor of the other side.

It would be time enough to discuss the question after the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations should have been heard. We should be then better advised as to a future course of conduct. Mr. C. implored the Senate not to adopt any rash or hasty measures.

Mr. BENTON said that before this question went out of the Senate, he must be permitted to say a solitary word arising out of it. A statement had been made on the other side of the chamber, (by Mr. CLAY,) which he was unwilling should go forth to the world contradicted. After characterizing this outrage in very appropriate language, and in a manner becoming an American, the member said, as it had caught his ears, that "this outrage had a precedent in our conduct towards other nations." Now, lest the British should derive an excuse for it, from hearing it said in this chamber, that an example for this outrage had been given by our Government, he (Mr. B.) would take this occasion to say, emphatically, that he knew of no such example to be found in our history.

VOL. XIII.—37

THURSDAY, January 11.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The consideration of Mr. CALHOUN's resolutions was resumed.

Mr. CLAY, at the suggestion of Mr. SEVIER, assented to an amendment, by striking out the clause relating to the treaty with Spain of 1819.

Mr. CLAY proposed further to amend, by striking out such parts as relates to the Indians, except in cases where, by their influence, the institution of slavery has extended north of the compromise line.—(36 deg. 30 min. N. lat.)

Mr. SEVIER opposed this motion, and on the question being taken, the result was:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Merrick, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Williams, and Young—31.

NAYS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and White—10.

Mr. RIVES moved, as an amendment,

Resolved, That any interference with the subject of slavery in the Territories of the United States in which it may exist, is inhibited by all the considerations in regard to the rights and interests of the inhabitants of said Territories, the security of the slaveholding States, and the danger to the Union, which are mentioned in the preceding resolution as forbidding any interference with, or action on, the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia; and for the further reason that the people of those Territories, when admitted into the Union as States, will be exclusively entitled to decide the question of the existence of slavery within their respective limits for themselves.

The question resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Lumpkin, Preston, Rives, Roane, Sevier, Tipton, and White—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Rives, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Walker, Webster, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

The resolution was amended so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That any attempt of Congress to abolish slavery in any Territory of the United States in which it exists, would create serious alarm and just apprehension in the States sustaining that domestic institution; would be a violation of good faith towards the inhabitants of such Territory, who have been permitted to settle with and hold slaves, because the people of such Territory have not asked for the abolition of slavery therein, and because that, when any such Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the people thereof will be entitled to decide that question exclusively for themselves.

The question on its adoption, was carried by—

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—34.

NAYS.—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Grundy, McKean, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Webster—9.

FRIDAY, January 12.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

MR. CALHOUN'S sixth and last resolution was then taken up, when Mr. CALHOUN supported it with a few preliminary observations.

MR. PRESTON moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken, and carried by—

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Lumpkin, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, and Young—9.

The following is a copy of these resolutions, as they passed the Senate:

1. Resolved, That, in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States adopting the same acted, severally, as free, independent, and sovereign States; and that each, for itself, by its own voluntary assent, entered the Union with the view to its increased security against all dangers, domestic as well as foreign, and the more perfect and secure enjoyment of its advantages, natural, political, and social.

2. Resolved, That in delegating a portion of their powers to be exercised by the Federal Government, the States retained, severally, the exclusive and sole right over their own domestic institutions and police, to the full extent to which those powers were not thus delegated, and are alone responsible for them; and that any intermeddling of any one or more States, or a combination of their citizens, with the domestic institutions and police of the others, on any ground, political, moral, or religious, or under any pretext whatever, with the view to their alteration or subversion, is not warranted by the constitution, tending to endanger the domestic peace and tranquillity of the States interfered with, subversive of the objects for which the constitution was formed, and, by necessary consequence, tending to weaken and destroy the Union itself.

3. Resolved, That this Government was instituted and adopted by the several States of this Union as a common agent, in order to carry into effect the powers which they had delegated by the constitution for their mutual security and prosperity, and that in fulfilment of this high and sacred trust, this Government is bound so to exercise its powers, as not to interfere with the stability and security of the domestic institutions of the States that compose the Union; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist, to the extent of its constitutional power, all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument to attack the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy such institutions.

4. Resolved, That domestic slavery, as it exists in the Southern and Western States of this Union, composes an important part of their domestic institutions, inherited from their ancestors, and existing at the adoption of the constitution, by which it is recognized as constituting an important element in the apportionment of powers among the States, and that no change of opinion or feeling, on the part of the other States of the Union in relation to it, can justify them or their citizens in open and systematic attacks thereon, with the view to its overthrow; and that all such attacks are in manifest violation of the mutual and solemn pledge to protect and defend each other, given by the States respectively, on entering into the constitutional compact which formed the Union, and as such are a manifest breach of faith, and a violation of the most solemn obligations.

5. Resolved, That the interference by the citizens of any of the States, with the view to the abolition of slavery in this District, is endangering the rights and security of the people of the District, and that any act or measure of Congress designed to abolish slavery in this District, would be a violation of the faith implied in the cessions by the States of Virginia and Maryland, a just cause of alarm to the people of the slave-holding States, and have a direct and inevitable tendency to disturb and endanger the Union.

And Resolved, That any attempt of Congress to abolish slavery in any Territory of the United States in which it exists, would create serious alarm, and just apprehension, in the States sustaining that domestic institution; would be a violation of good faith towards the inhabitants of any such Territory who have been permitted to settle with, and hold slaves therein, because the people of any such Territory have not asked for the abolition of slavery therein, and because when any such Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the people thereof will be entitled to decide that question exclusively for themselves.

The final vote upon the adoption of these resolutions, was:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Webster—9.

[The debate on these resolutions was deemed so material, that each speaker drew up his own remarks after the current debate was published, and placed them in the Appendix to the current debate, from which they are now taken to follow the subject to which they belong.]

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

WEDNESDAY, January 3.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The second resolution being under consideration, and Mr. MORRIS having moved to strike out the words "moral or religious;" on which he asked the yeas and nays—

Mr. YOUNG said that he had risen to request the honorable Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) to insist upon the form of the resolution under consideration as it then was. Why, sir, strike out the words political, moral, or religious, when it is known, or ought to be known, that this is the identical language employed by the Abolitionists as the pretext for interfering with the domestic relations of the South? Shall we not use terms as forcible, and as expressive of the object we have in view, as have been used by them to propagate their mischievous doctrines, which have well nigh arrayed one section of the Union against another? If I mistake not, Mr. President, this is also the language of the Vermont resolutions, of which we have had notice. This, sir, is the very ground upon which the Abolitionists place the argument—that domestic slavery, in every form, is "unbecoming a moral and religious people"—and upon this ground I desire to meet them. Yes, sir, the question, if we expect to effect any good purpose by these resolutions, should be met promptly and directly. Gentlemen tell us that the object, aim, and end of these memorials is abolition in the District of Columbia—nothing more. Is this the fact, Mr. President? On the contrary, do we not know, does not every Senator know, that this movement in the District, if successful, is intended to reach slavery in every part of the country, under whatever form it may exist? It is but the entering wedge to their grand scheme of universal emancipation and elevation throughout the country. Mr. President, how can we mistake the object, if we look into the numerous abolition papers which are continually laid upon our tables, (from what quarter, or at whose expense, I know not,) and which are as constantly filled with the grossest misrepresentations and perversions of the Southern character, as connected with the domestic institution of slavery, as it exists under the constitution in that portion of the confederacy? I read these papers, sir; I have considered their purport, and cannot be mistaken in the opinion, that a general war (a moral and religious one if you choose) upon domestic slavery, as it exists in the South and South-western States, is intended. I wish the gentlemen from the South, instead of throwing them into the fire, would read them also, and they will soon discover, if they are not already informed, the nature of this war, and the weapons to be employed by one of the parties to the contest, the better to insure the victory. Yes, sir, the garb of religion is to be assumed, and under that specious pretext, the constitution itself is to be first rent, and then torn to pieces. Mr. President, I reside in a non-slaveholding State; the people of that State are essentially in favor of emancipation, and I am proud of its free institutions. But, sir, as much as we prefer freedom to slavery, the great mass of our inhabitants are as decidedly opposed to all interference with the domestic relations of the other States which differ with us in sentiment on this all-important subject. They regard slavery as it exists under the Constitution of the United States, as not now a debatable question. But the State of Illinois has not left her sister States of the South to doubt and conjecture as to her position on this great question. That State, by its Legislature, has, in the solemn form of resolutions, as far as she could consistently go without infringing the constitutional rights of her citizens, stamped its seal of disapprobation upon the doctrine of modern Abolitionism in all its forms.

I trust, sir, that the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) will insist upon the resolution as it is, and that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. MORRIS,) to strike out the words "moral or religious," may not prevail. Strike out the words in the resolution, as proposed sir, and it is mutilated. It would not meet the case fully as it is presented.

THURSDAY, January 4.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the resolutions offered by Mr. CALHOUN, the third of the series being before them,

Mr. NORVELL rose to move that so much of the third resolution of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) as pledged this Government to give "increased" stability and security to the domestic institutions of the States, and as pronounced it to be its duty to "strengthen" them, be erased from the resolution. It would then read: "that this Government was instituted and adopted by the several States of this Union as a common agent, in order to carry into effect the powers which they had delegated by the constitution for their mutual security and prosperity; and that, in fulfilment of this high and sacred trust, this Government is based so as to exercise its powers as not to interfere with the stability and security of the domestic institutions of the States that compose the Union; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts by one portion of the Union to use it as an instrument to attack the domestic institutions of another, or to weaken or destroy such institutions."

Slavery in this country was entirely a domestic question. Congress could not touch it. The States in which slavery was still tolerated had never, even by implication, given up any portion of their exclusive power over the whole subject. They could not, with any regard to their own safety, permit it to be drawn into question by their sister States, or by the General Government. It was not a subject open to discussion with a view to legislation anywhere but in the States recognizing and suffering the existence of slavery. Nor could Congress, in his opinion, either constitutionally, or consistently with the public faith, abolish it in the District of Columbia, unless the people of the District desired it, and petitioned for it. The District was ceded to Congress by the States of Virginia and Maryland, on the condition that the rights of private property, as before existing, were to be held sacred; and the United States received the cession upon that condition. The power granted to Congress, to "exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over the District," conferred no authority to violate the public faith, or to take from its inhabitants their property without their consent. It simply and clearly meant, that legislative powers could be exercised by no other body than Congress over the District. It meant no more. It did not mean that Congress could pass any law dictated by its arbitrary will and pleasure, in violation of the right of property, or of any other right asserted in the acts of cession to the United States. If Maryland and Virginia had imagined that this question would have been here raised, they would never have ceded the District.

But taking views, as he did, of the subject, he could not agree to confer upon this Government, by implication, any right to give increased stability, security, and strength to the domestic institution of slavery in any of the States. He was not willing to pledge this Government so to administer its affairs as at all to interfere, on one side or the other, with a subject which the constitution had not confided to it. The South cannot desire this. All that the South asks on this subject is to let her alone. To this extent he would cheerfully pledge the Government. He would commit it, mind and soul, to sustain the constitution as it was; to protect the institutions and the interests of every part of the Union, so far as its constitutional powers would authorize it to go for that purpose. The resolution, amended as he proposed, was strong enough.

MR. CALHOUN entertained every sentiment of respect for the feelings of the Senator from Michigan, (MR. NORVELL.) He believed his feelings were sound throughout, and were based upon sound policy. He begged leave to state his reasons for inserting the words "the several States," etc. It was his belief that in many things it was admitted by the General Government that the States had separate, distinct, and vested constitutional rights. In this belief and understanding, there had so long existed a general good feeling between the two Governments, their acts were in all things correlative, and were, so far as they acted together, promoting individual and confederative rights, by which course of action each ever strengthened the other, and tended to produce union and harmony throughout; and, what was more, it tended to uphold the domestic institutions of the States.

Every one must admit, continued Mr. C., that the quarantine laws were wholly under the State control, while the laws of commerce were controlled wholly by Congress; yet the two were inseparable, and each depended upon the other. Congress never claimed a right to interfere in the regulation of one branch, nor did the Government of the several States deny the jurisdiction of the United States over the other.

During the French Revolution, an insurrection broke out in the French colony of St. Domingo among the blacks. There was a danger of intercourse and interference of the blacks on the island and those of our States. To prevent this, State laws, prohibiting such intercourse, were passed. These laws were sanctioned by Congress.

There was a strong analogy in this case to the one now under discussion. Congress had here passed laws distinctly to meet the views of the States. In farther illustration he would cite the laws and regulation of the port of Charleston: his position was here still more strengthened. He alluded to the prohibition of black sailors on board vessels trading with that port. Congress had yielded and fully assented to the provisions of the law, and even the British Government had assented, and acknowledged the propriety of such enactments and regulations. Having said this much, for the purpose of convincing his friend from Michigan, (MR. NORVELL,) he should look with the greatest confidence for his vote in support of the resolution, without his proposed amendment.

MR. NORVELL responded, that yesterday the Senator from South Carolina had expressed a desire to transfer this whole Abolition war to the North and the North-west; a belief that there was to be the great battle-ground of the conflict. Could that honorable Senator then wish to weaken the hands, to impair the moral vigor, of those who were to fight that great battle for the safety of the South, and the preservation of the Union? This he would do, if he were to persist in requiring us to lend our aid to "increase" and "strengthen" the institution of slavery. The Senator had alluded to the perfect beauty and harmony of our system as it was. For this very reason was it, that the amendment had been proposed. It was to preserve, not to mar the harmony and beauty of our system, that this Government should not be required to go beyond the maintenance of the domestic institutions of the States as they exist and are protected by the Federal Constitution. The Senator had illustrated his views, by adducing special cases in which the Government had by law interfered to sustain and strengthen the health laws of the States, and to protect the South against the effects of the agitation in St. Domingo, some years ago. That was all proper; it was constitutional; but the illustrations did not sustain the general proposition contained in the resolution.

Mr. PRESTON said: The resolution in its present shape, asserts that the General Government is bound to protect the domestic institutions of the several States. This ground he never wished to assume. The States should be suffered to maintain and protect their own rights, and their own institutions. The General Government was rather, in his opinion, bound, from its very nature, not to intermeddle with these rights, but strictly, and in every instance, to keep hands off. To illustrate his argument he would revert to some few of these institutions in various quarters. One of the greatest and most important domestic institutions of Maryland was the State Colonization Society. It was a State corporation. Would his colleague wish to see the direct action of Congress to support this institution? Would there not be as many conflicting sentiments on the subject as upon that of domestic slavery? The great manufactories of the North are incorporated, and have vast amounts of funds invested; should these be either directly protected or invaded by Congress?

He would admit that Government might by its action contribute to establish proper security to State institutions, so far as is consistent with the constitution, and with State rights and enactments, and the constitutions of the States, but no further.

Mr. CALHOUN was willing to assent to the amendment, if it was the wish of the Senate to do so. He would make any concession to meet the views of those opposed to the doctrine of Abolition, in order to get a strong vote in favor of the general doctrines set forth in the resolutions.

Mr. PRESTON followed in support of the opinions he had expressed in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD said: The avowed purpose of the Senator from South Carolina was, that the Senate should express, by resolution, as their deliberate opinion, that any interference on the part of any section of the Union, or any intermeddling of any portion of the community, under any pretext whatever, with domestic slavery as it exists in the Southern States, with a view to its alteration or subversion, would not only be grossly unjust, but a course of proceeding not warranted by the constitution. This was the declared object of the Senator, and to all this he most readily yielded his assent.

He need not assure the Senator from South Carolina, that no man was more willing than himself to carry out such a purpose—and most cheerfully would he support any resolution drawn out in the strongest terms, and in the most forcible language, fully to express such a sentiment. He did not agree with Senators who thought nothing was to be gained by the adoption of these resolutions. Much, very much, in his judgment, would be accomplished by agreeing to the resolutions (with some amendments) which had been offered by the Senator from South Carolina. If this did not go far enough as the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) expressed—if they would not inspire confidence and give security in the South, he firmly believed that their adoption would be productive of much good in the non-slaveholding States. He represented on this floor, with his respected colleague, one of those States; and he could not doubt that the adoption of these resolutions substantially, would tend to allay in that quarter, the spirit of Abolitionism—would be a direct appeal to the intelligence and to the patriotism of the free citizens of the North; and he could not for a moment doubt that they would have a controlling influence upon the course and conduct of the Abolitionists themselves. If the adoption of that resolution would not directly influence the action of the Abolitionists, they could not fail to produce a powerful effect on public opinion; and through the influence of popular sentiment would this fell spirit of fanaticism be stayed. He was therefore prepared to go with the Senator from South Carolina in carrying out the purpose avowed. But, while he was thus prepared to give his support to the resolutions of the honorable Senator—believing, as he conscientiously did, that their adoption would do good at home—he could not agree to the adoption of the third resolution, as the Senator had drawn it. It went further than he was willing to go. His doctrine had been, ever since he had been a member of Congress, that it was the bounden duty of the North “to let the whole matter alone.” That the institution of domestic slavery, as it existed in the Southern section of the Union, was no concern of theirs. He would suggest an alteration in the first paragraph of the resolution, not that it was objectionable to himself as it was; but the alteration, he was satisfied, would make it more acceptable to some of its friends. He would have that part of the resolution read—“that this Government was instituted to carry into effect the powers delegated by the constitution for the mutual benefit and prosperity of the States.”

He would not press this alteration, but he was assured that it would be more acceptable to some friends in that form. It would receive his support, whether altered or whether it remained unchanged in this particular; but he felt a great solicitude to have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan adopted. Such would be the import of the resolution, without the amendment, that he could not (friendly as he was to the object) vote for it. The resolution declares, in substance, “that this Government is bound so to exercise its powers as to give, as far as may be practicable, increased stability and security to the institution of domestic slavery; and that it is the solemn duty of the Government to resist all attempts to weaken or destroy, but is bound to strengthen and to uphold the institution of domestic slavery." He was sure that the Senator from South Carolina could not ask this at his hands.

Mr. PRESTON inquired how the resolution would read were the amendment adopted?

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, "Exactly right."

Mr. CALHOUN announced his full assent to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, moved the following as a proviso to the third resolution, on which he asked the yeas and nays:

"Provided, That nothing contained in these resolutions shall be construed or understood as expressing an opinion of this Senate adverse to these fundamental principles of this Government, 'That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That the freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble to petition the Government for redress of grievances, shall never be abridged. That error of opinion may be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it. That the Union must be preserved.' But, on the contrary, all those constitutional, fundamental, and political truths, are expressly recognized by this Senate."

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his regret that the Senator from Indiana should attempt to embarrass the passage of the resolutions, by the introduction of an abstract proposition, not relevant, and not calculated to have any salutary effect. If the resolutions were incorrect in principle, vote them down; but, on the contrary, if they were based on proper constitutional ground, why not sustain them in a crisis like the present, which all must admit to be dangerous to the best interests of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, denied that he had ever on any occasion, in that or any other body, sought to do by indirect means what he could do directly. He said, if the proviso was but an abstraction, as it had been named, the resolution itself was no more; one abstraction was surely as good as another; and if the Senate is to be engaged in building up abstractions, those which he now offered were too important to be overlooked; they were the abstractions of Washington and Jefferson, and might be safely deemed as worthy of attention as the more modern ones of present Senators.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he had said nothing of the truth or error of the principles contained in the proviso, but had simply entered his protest against its being attached to his resolutions. Was there any thing in his resolutions that infringed the right of speech or the freedom of the press? When that was aimed at, it would then be time to make the objection. He had said before, and would repeat it, that the only object was to have a common ground on which all might stand, North as well as South, to repel aggression.

Mr. YOUNG, of Illinois, said: The Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) in speaking of the domestic institutions of the South, and especially in regard to slavery, says "hands off" as to the slave-holding States, and they will take care of themselves. He not only denies the power of the General Government to secure and protect the State institutions in every case, and under every variety of circumstances, but solemnly protests against its exercise, as an unwarrantable and uncalled-for interference. Now, sir, I will ask the Senator what construction he gives to the third clause of the second section of the fourth article of the constitution, which provides that "no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due?"

Suppose the act of 1793, passed in pursuance of this provision in the constitution to enable owners to reclaim their fugitive slaves, should be repealed; that the General Government should, in accordance with the opinion of the Senator, act upon the principle of "hands off" in future; and one of the slaves of South Carolina, owing service under the laws of that State, should escape into Pennsylvania or Ohio, and should be protected there, in what way would the honorable Senator reclaim him? Would he march an army against the offending State, and make recapture vi et armis—with force of arms? Surely not, sir. But, Mr. President, I believe, upon reflection, that the Senator did say something about his remedy, and that remedy, if I mistake not, was to hang the offender if caught within their borders. I deny, sir, that any power exists in any of the States to punish even Abolitionists for supposed offences committed in any other State. The same constitution which secures to the slave-holder the right of going into a non-slaveholding State to recover his fugitive slave, equally protects the Abolitionist in the privilege of going into a slave-holding State, if he chooses to do so, provided he commits no offence against the laws of such State during his stay within its limits. It has been denied here, again and again, that the Abolitionists have any designs upon the institution of domestic slavery in the States. I am astonished that the Senators from these States should not have detected, and exposed in a proper manner, one design at least, of a highly important character, which, if not checked and rebuked in time, is calculated to inflict a fatal blow upon the peace and prosperity of this Union. I understand, sir, that under that clause in the constitution to which I referred as providing a remedy in cases of fugitive slaves, the Abolitionists contend that it is the rightful province of the State Legislatures, and not of Congress, to provide that remedy; and that, acting under this supposed influence, one at least of the State Legislatures (that of Massachusetts) had already interfered so far as to provide for a trial by jury in such cases. I would inquire of the honorable Senators from that State (Messrs. WEBSTER and DAVIS) whether such is the fact or not?

[Both the Senators having denied all knowledge of any such law or proceeding, Mr. YOUNG proceeded:]

Then, Mr. President, I have been misinformed in relation to this matter; and many of the Abolitionists who would not intentionally mistake the truth, have also been misinformed and imposed on; for such has been the belief. But, sir, this much I know of my own knowledge, that Abolitionists are required to circulate memorials addressed to their State Legislatures, requesting the passage of laws to secure the trial by jury, under State authority, in all such cases. I handed to the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) a few days since a paper containing the form of one of these memorials, which was given to me by a professed Abolitionist, (and who is, in my opinion, in all other respects, a Christian and a worthy man,) as containing an exhibition of their principles, motives, and actions, by which it will be seen, that a direct attack is in this way intended against that leading principle in the constitution, which alone secures the possession and enjoyment of this great interest of the South. And yet the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) says "hands off"—that they want none of our interference from the free States. Then, Mr. President, why are these resolutions here? Why are we of the free States solicited to participate in their consideration, and finally to vote upon them, if the South requires no aid at our hands? Sir, we too are interested in settling great constitutional questions; and being interested, will exercise our privilege of debating these propositions, if we choose to do so, and of voting afterwards in such manner as our judgment may direct for the good of the whole. Sir, I desire, under existing circumstances, that this provision in the constitution, and the construction now put upon it by the Abolitionists and their advocates, may not be overlooked.

Mr. PRESTON expressed some doubt in regard to such help as the Senator just up had proposed. If the Government should not protect the interests of the South in accordance with the constitution, they would take care of themselves. The gentleman had admitted that a slave could not be recovered by an abolition jury in Pennsylvania, or other non-slaveholding State; and yet he demanded that the General Government should extend its protection to incendiaries within the slave-holding States.

Mr. ALLEN said it appeared to him there was a general disposition on the part of the Senate to have this discussion as limited as possible, and it was therefore a source of regret to him to observe the attempts made to embarrass these resolutions in their progress. He had determined to offer, after the resolutions had been passed, the following amendment, to be appended:

"That nothing in the foregoing resolutions is intended to recognize the right of Congress to impair in any manner the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of petition, as secured by the constitution to the citizens of the several States, within their States respectively."

But the course taken by the Senator from Indiana would induce him to move it as an amendment to the proviso, to strike out all after the word "provided," and insert what he had just read.

Mr. CALHOUN was willing to yield every inch of ground that he could, to fortify those who saw the danger that was pending, and wished to meet it in a proper manner. He could have wished his resolutions to have passed as he originally drafted them; but that spirit of concession which he felt under the responsibility he had assumed, would induce him to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. ALLEN,) because not adverse to the spirit of his resolutions, and because it might have a tendency to reconcile others not otherwise disposed to sustain them.

Mr. MORRIS, adverting to remarks which had been made relating to the punishment of Abolitionists by State laws, said he regarded this and other similar doctrines which had been advanced in this debate, as subversive of all freedom, and of the institutions of the country. He insisted that all classes of men had an imprescriptible right, above all government, to the freedom of speech and the right of petition. He repelled the imputation that those who were unfriendly to these resolutions were in any way unfriendly to the Union.

Mr. M. proceeded to defend the right of all men to trial by jury, which right, he insisted, was expressly guaranteed by the constitution. And if the right to trial by jury belongs to every citizen, on what pretext could a free State deny this right to any man within such State? Could the State deny it on pretext of color? Or could it be denied or refused on account of the oath of another man who might swear that any other man was his property?

FRIDAY, January 5.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The question being on Mr. ALLEN's substitute for Mr. SMITH's proviso to the third resolution, which substitute required that the resolution should not so be construed as in any way to impair the freedom of speech or of the press or the right of petition—

It was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Ala., Clay of Ky., Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Con., Southard, Strange, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, Young—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clayton, Davis, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Wall—14.

Mr. MORRIS offered an addition to this resolution, declaring that the right of the people to speak, write, print, and publish any thing whatever, was indisputable; and that they were amenable only to the State in which they might be at the time.

MR. CALHOUN said: Mr. ALLEN's amendment covered the whole constitutional ground on this subject; and Mr. C. had made up his mind to accept it on this ground, that it would tend to fortify the Senators of the North, in relation to their votes in favor of these resolutions. He was willing so to fortify them; and he would agree to any amendment which would not impair the principles of the resolutions.

MR. MORRIS was not to be intimidated, or driven from the course which he thought it his duty to pursue, by an allusion of an intention to embarrass this body or any other. He, as well as the Senator from South Carolina, knew what he was about, and understood his own course; and he would be here free and unshackled, and exempt from all party restraints, as an American citizen ought to be, and would express freely and fully his opinion on every subject before this body. Sir, said Mr. M., am I at liberty to say what was intended by the resolutions of the Senator?

The CHAIR said, to do so was out of order.

MR. M. said he would not then suppose that the resolutions themselves were intended for greater and more remote objects than those expressed; but it was legitimate to speak of the objects to which they must and would lead. In the arguments here on the liberty of speech, changes were continually rung on the Union. Now it was a question whether the resolutions themselves had not a strong squinting to a dissolution of the Union. It was not for Mr. M. to say that they were intended to produce that effect, but they would be judged of; and whether or not they went to establish the doctrine that the States were independent of each other, Mr. M. would not now fully discuss; but he believed they would operate to confirm that doctrine. The question was, whether the doctrines of Mr. M.'s amendment were true. Was the right of a citizen indisputable to speak, write, print, publish, on the laws and institutions of other States? I say it is so; it is the right of every citizen. If that right is put down by the laws of the country, I must submit to those laws, and I ask now that I may know what liberty they will leave me. I desire to know this by the vote on my amendment, and I hope that the question will not be evaded, that I may know how much I am to be abridged of these privileges.

MR. SMITH, of Indiana, said, when he offered the amendment he intended merely to record his vote, leaving other Senators to discuss the matter. Nor should he now be driven from the course he had originally marked out for himself, was it not for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, (MR. CALHOUN.) That Senator had thought proper to intimate that he (MR. S.) had moved the amendment for the purpose of defeating the resolutions by indirection. He would say to the Senator that he had wholly mistaken the character of the mover of the amendment. He could assure the Senator that he would never resort to indirection to defeat any measure. He feared no other responsibility than that which he was to meet in his State, in the discharge of his public duties; and even there he had no hesitation in believing, that in this instance he was representing the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the people. The Senator had objected to the amendment on the ground that it was a collection of mere abstractions. Sir, can the Senator be serious? What are his whole resolutions but abstractions? Have there been any petitions or memorials referred on the subjects embraced in the resolutions? Were the resolutions reported by a committee? Was it intended by the mover to ingraft any legislative enactment upon them? No, sir; they are the mere abstract effusions of the mind of the gentleman himself; and yet the Senator objects to the amendment because it expresses abstract opinions. Sir, if the Senator gives us one-sided abstractions, can he object to be met by abstractions on the other side? If abstractions are to be resolved here, let us have the whole of them; let us not affirm a part of a creed, and not the whole.

He was opposed to the whole matter; he could see no good that could possibly grow out of these resolutions, and they may do much harm. He was willing to leave the constitution and its exposition with the people; it was plain enough for him, and he would say to the mover of these resolutions, that if that instrument did not give the necessary security to the domestic institutions of the States, no resolves of this body as to the extent of the powers conferred by it could do it. The Senator from South Carolina, in answer to some remarks of the Senator from Ohio, (MR. MORRIS,) had stated that he did not intend to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press by the resolutions, and that Senator, a few minutes ago, stated that he admitted the truth of the principles contained in the amendment he (MR. S.) had offered; if he was mistaken in the admissions of the Senator, he would correct him.

[MR. CALHOUN said he had neither denied nor admitted their truth.]

Then, said Mr. S., it is important that the Senate should either deny or admit them. The Senator says that the amendment is intended to overthrow his resolutions by indirection. Does not the Senator see that he admits away his whole case, that his argument proves too much? For, if the amendment be true, and if the principles contained in it are orthodox, and if, as the Senator admits, they are antagonistical to his resolutions, it follows of course that the resolutions cannot be correct in principle. If the two, the amendment and the resolutions, cannot stand together, which must fall? The first part of the amendment was copied from the Declaration of Independence. Is it possible, at this day, that the memorable and glorious declaration of those departed statesmen and heroes, which stimulated the people of the infant colonies to deeds of glory and renown, and which has been thought worthy to form a part of the constitution of the several States, is it to be set aside by the Senate of the United States, to give place to the new-fangled doctrines of the Senator from South Carolina? The next provision of the amendment was copied from the first section of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The principles contained in it were considered so important, that it was thought necessary to incorporate it in the constitution by an amendment, as it was omitted in the original. Are these principles also to be set aside, denied, repudiated, abrogated, and contemned by this Senate, because, forsooth, they are antagonistical to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina? These, with the next provision in the amendment, which was copied from Mr. Jefferson's inaugural address, are altogether worthy of the high source from which they emanated; they are just such principles as freemen must cherish. They recognize the doctrines for which the patriots and sages of the Revolution contended in that glorious struggle. The equality of man, the freedom of the press and of speech, the right to assemble together in a peaceable manner to consult on their common good, and to petition the Government for redress of grievances, tolerating error of opinion, but leaving reason free to combat it—"error of opinion may be tolerated, while reason is left free to combat it." Yes, sir, error of opinion is not, in this country, to be met or put down by the resolutions and opinions of this body alone, unless our acts are seconded by public opinion. Sir, these declarations of the sage of Monticello should have a resting-place, and should be nourished in the hearts of his countrymen. Yes, sir, combat error of opinion by reason, not by gag laws, not by mobs, not by inquisitions, not by establishing censorships over the press, not by abridging the freedom of speech, but by reason, holding the parties responsible for the abuse of all these privileges, or rather rights, to the party aggrieved; and then the question, what are and what are not errors of opinion, must be left to the final arbiters—the people, where they must be left in every country where liberty dwells. The last clause of his amendment was the celebrated saying, he believed it was a toast on a public occasion, of ex-President Jackson, "the Union, it must be preserved." He (Mr. S.) had called this a political truth in the amendment. Was he mistaken in the character he had given it? He believed not. He was satisfied that it was not only a political truth, but it was a truth that met the hearty approbation of every sane mind in the nation; and, while the Senator from South Carolina is pressing his resolutions—in almost every one of which a reference is made, in some shape or other, to the possibility of weakening or destroying the Union—is it not proper, nay, more, is it not *demand*ed, of this body, to reaffirm that most vital political truth, "the Union must be preserved?" Yes, sir, if we resolve any abstractions, how can we do less than to point our countrymen to these truths, and to say to them, in the name of our country, Liberty and Union are one and inseparable, now and forever. Why do Senators object to its adoption? Why not let the whole go to the people together? Are gentlemen afraid to trust them? If our opinions on these abstract questions are worth any thing to the people, let us give them the whole of this matter. He, for one, was not afraid to trust them.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The Senator from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) had in part torn the mask from the first one; he had clearly shown that it embodied the principles of nullification as they are understood in the State from which the mover came. He (Mr. S.) entirely concurred in that opinion. But that was not the only principle involved in the resolutions to which he objected. In his mind it was clear that they strike at the freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people to assemble peaceably to consult their common good, and to petition their Government for redress of grievances. It will be seen by Senators that they deny the right of the States to "intermeddle" with the domestic institutions of the other States. Now, sir, what does the word "intermeddle," as it is here used, mean? Does it merely mean that the people of the free States have no right to go into the slave-holding States and excite an insurrection, or otherwise interfere with that domestic institution? If so, it had his most hearty approbation. But if the meaning was, as he believed it to be, that to speak, write, print, or petition, in the free or non-slaveholding States, on any subject connected with slavery, is "intermeddling" with that institution, then he put it to gentlemen to say whether the constitutional, fundamental, and political truths contained in his amendment were not directly controverted by the resolutions.

Sir, these resolutions contain all the principles of the alien and sedition laws, known as the gag laws of the elder Adams, in a much more odious form. The pretext for the enactment of those laws, history tells us, for his age prevented him knowing any thing personally of the matter, was, that the Government and its officers had been maliciously and wantonly assailed in meetings, in speeches, through the press, by caricatures and otherwise; that the people were instigated and moved by foreign emissaries hostile to our Government; that it was calculated to bring the Government and its officers into disrepute with the people, and weaken, if not eventually destroy the Union.

What was the ground, Mr. President, occupied by the Jeffersonian party of that day? It was the very same which has been so frequently quoted, and which Mr. Jefferson perpetuated by incorporating in his inaugural address, "error of opinion may be tolerated while reason is left free to combat it." What is the pretext for these resolutions? The same, the very same that produced the gag laws. If the freedom of speech is tolerated, if the freedom of the press is not abridged, if the right of petition is not silenced in the non-slaveholding States, if the people in these States speak, write, print, assemble or petition on any subject connected with slavery, they are "intermeddling" with the domestic institutions of the South, and fall within the denunciations of these resolutions, on the assumption that the Union is endangered, by arraying one people against another. Look at your leading party presses everywhere: do they not publish daily inflammatory, and, not unfrequently, false matter, calculated to array the people against each other, and, in the language of these resolutions, to weaken the Union? And yet who is prepared to establish a censorship over the press? He would not say who, but he would say, that in his opinion, the resolutions under consideration assert the principle in terms not to be misunderstood. He (Mr. S.) was asked why he had offered the amendment? He had many reasons for introducing it. He would give a few of them; first, because he wished the antidote to go with the poison; if either was to be sent forth as the doctrines of the Republic. Secondly, because the principles contained in the amendment were such as he loved to recur to and cherish. Because he had some anxiety to ascertain whether the ancient landmarks were still left standing amidst the revolution of parties, or whether they had been erased by the political tornado that has swept over the land; whether he had read the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the history of his country in vain; whether those doctrines and fundamental principles have become too old-fashioned for the times, and whether he had to study a new political creed before he could discharge his duty to his State and the nation here. Senators favorable to the resolutions have been pleased to express their regret that the amendment has been offered. To those gentlemen he had only to say that he regretted the introduction of the resolutions as honestly as they regretted the introduction of the amendment; he would, therefore, with the consent of Senators, set off his regret against theirs.

Mr. BENTON thought the whole subject had better be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report at some future day; premising, at the same time, that the committee should be chosen chiefly of Senators from the North, where, to his view of the question, the brunt of the action would necessarily have to be fought.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the motion would not succeed. Much progress had already been made in the discussion. Should the motion prevail, he would consider it but a mode of getting clear of the resolutions. He had offered them as the antagonist of the Vermont resolutions, and to ascertain whether, in the opinion of the Senate, there was any constitutional ground adequate to resist the assaults on our rights and property, on which the slaveholding States could stand. The discussion had clearly shown that there was none other. On the right of rejecting abolition petitions, although, in his opinion, one of the clearest that can be imagined, we of the South were, unfortunately for the peace of the country, in a minority. So, also, on the question of the constitutional right of abolishing slavery in this District and the Territories, and also on every other particular question which has been attempted to be raised on constitutional grounds, as a barrier to our rights and security. What remains, then, short of taking our protection into our own hands, but to find some barrier in the general character and structure of our political system? and where can we find that but in the view of the constitution, which considers it as a compact between sovereign and independent States formed for their mutual prosperity and security? If we required proof that these resolutions assumed the only constitutional ground which could give peace and quiet to the country, and security to the South and West, it would be found in this debate. He had challenged, again and again, those who took a different view of our system, to point out where protection could be found in the constitution according to their conception of that instrument. None had been, or even attempted to be, shown. It would, then, be in vain to refer the resolutions, to discover some new principle in the constitution calculated to effect the object for which they were introduced. Nor would it be more useful to refer them, to modify the language or the details. They were abstract resolutions, involving little or no details, and he had again and again avowed his readiness to make the language acceptable to all, as far as it could be, without sacrificing the principles on which they rest; of which he had given already abundant proof, and was prepared to give additional. But the Senate must remember that the difficulty heretofore encountered did not originate so much in any objection to the principles of his resolutions, nor to the details, or any peculiar expression, as the desire to ingraft additional matter entirely foreign to their nature or object, and the consequence of which would be to obstruct their passage, or to neutralize their effects if they should pass. This difficulty could not be avoided; and a reference, so far from diminishing, would but tend to increase it.

Thus thinking, he was constrained to conclude that a reference would be fatal to the resolutions, be the object of the mover what it might; and, with this impression, should the motion succeed, he would leave them to their fate; and, like the mover, he would decline acting on the committee should he be appointed a member.

In assuming State rights grounds as the basis of his resolutions, and calling a rally at this solemn and dangerous juncture of that great, though in a measure dormant, party, which has ever professed the State rights creed, he did not intend to imply that gentlemen opposite to him, or the party to which they belong, were Abolitionists, or disposed to countenance their creed. On the contrary, he believed that the great mass of the party was sound, and adverse to the dangerous projects of the fanatics; but candor compelled him to declare that he could not look to them in this hour of danger. We had their good wishes, it is true. They were even willing to vote it inexpedient and dangerous to agitate the subject; but when we touched the constitution, and asked them what barrier, according to their conception, that instrument contains against their incendiary and mad projects, they are silent. Their political creed not only admits of none, but, in fact, rouses into action that dangerous spirit of fanaticism which threatens to subvert our institutions. It is this responsibility for what they deem our sins, which has roused this fell spirit into action; and the conception of their responsibility originates in that mistaken conception of our system, which regards it, not as it really is—a union of States for the mutual good and security of each, but a great and consolidated community, in which the States bear the same relation to the whole as counties do to States; and, of course, in which the whole is responsible for all the parts. This is no new opinion with him. He long since foresaw, before this spirit was roused into action, that this false and dangerous view of the constitution would, one day or another, lead to the state of things in which we now find ourselves, and so told the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) when he advocated his consolidation doctrines in the discussion on the force bill, in 1833, that such would be the consequence, as he must remember.

Thus thinking, the gentlemen opposite must excuse him, if he could not, in the hour of danger, look to them. He thanked them for their good feelings, and he accepted their avowal of opposition to abolition with all sincerity; but he wanted something more substantial; something that would not pass away with the present incumbents; some constitutional barrier and guaranty; and for these he was constrained to look to those who professed the opposite political creed. How little reliance we can place on those who take the view of the constitution they do, this debate has furnished ample proof. The Senator from Indiana has been among the most forward to disavow abolition sentiments, and to express his good wishes for us and our institutions, of the sincerity of which he (Mr. C.) had no reason to distrust; and yet, while he makes these avowals, he moves amendments to these resolutions, which are intended to exhibit the strength of our cause, in the very language of the perverted creed of the abolitionists, and in which, if he had succeeded, he would, in fact, not only have neutralized all the intended effects of the resolutions, but would have given a triumph and a new impulse to those whose objects he denounces, and to whom he professes to be so much opposed.

I fear (said Mr. C.) that the Senate has not elevated its views sufficiently to comprehend the extent and magnitude of the existing danger. It was perhaps his misfortune to look too much to the future, and to move against dangers at too great a distance, which had involved him in many difficulties, and exposed him often to the imputation of unworthy motives. Thus he had long foreseen the immense surplus revenue which a false system of legislation must pour into the Treasury, and the fatal consequences to the morals and institutions of the country which must follow. When nothing else could arrest it, he threw himself, with his State, into the breach, to arrest dangers which could not otherwise be arrested; whether wisely or not, he left posterity to judge. He now saw with equal clearness, as clear as the noon-day sun, the fatal consequences which must follow, if the present disease be not timely arrested. He would repeat again what he had so often said on this floor. This was the only question of sufficient magnitude and potency to divide this Union, and divide it it would, or drench the country in blood, if not arrested. He knew how much the sentiment he had uttered would be misconstrued and misrepresented. There were those who saw no danger to the Union in the violation of all its fundamental principles, but who were full of apprehension when danger was foretold or resisted, and who held not the authors of the danger, but those who forewarned or opposed it, responsible for consequences. But the cry of disunion by the weak or designing has no terror for him. If his attachment to the Union was less, he might tamper with the deep disease which now afflicts the body politic, and keep silent till the patient was ready to sink under its mortal blows. It is a cheap, and, he must say, but too certain a mode of acquiring the character of devoted attachment to the Union. But seeing the danger, as he did, he would be a traitor to the Union, and those he represented, to keep silence. The assaults daily made on the institutions of nearly one-half of the States of this Union by the other—institutions interwoven from the beginning with their political and social existence, and which cannot be other than, without their inevitable destruction, will and must, if continued, make two people of one, by destroying every sympathy between the two great sections, obliterating from their hearts the recollection of their common danger and glory, and implanting in their place a mutual hatred, more deadly than ever existed between two neighboring people since the commencement of the human race. He feared not the circulation of the thousands of incendiary and slanderous publications which were daily issued from an organized and powerful press among those intended to be vilified. They cannot penetrate our section; that was not the danger; it lay in a different direction. Their circulation in the non-slaveholding States was what was to be dreaded. It was infusing a deadly poison into the minds of the rising generation, implanting in them feelings of hatred, the most deadly hatred, instead of affection and love, for one-half of this Union, to be returned on their part with equal detestation.

The first and desirable object is to arrest it in the non-slaveholding States; to meet the disease where it originated; and where it exists; and the first step to this is to find some common constitutional ground on which a rally, with that object, can be made. These resolutions present the ground, and the only one, on which it can be made. The only remedy is in the State rights doctrines; and, if those who profess them in the slave-holding States do not rally on them, as their political creed, and organize as a party against the fanatics, in order to put them down, the South and West will be compelled to take the remedy into their own hands.

Mr. President, (said Mr. C.,) we are reposing on a volcano. The Senate seems entirely ignorant of the state of feelings in the South. The mail has just brought us intelligence of a most important step taken by one of the Southern States in connection with this subject, which will give some conception of the tone of feeling which begins to prevail in that quarter.

A slave was kidnapped or stolen by some persons belonging to a trading vessel from the State of Maine. The Governor of Georgia demanded a surrender of the fugitive criminals, (for such they are, be their motive what it may,) under the constitution, from the Governor of Maine. It was not complied with. The Governor of Georgia brought the subject before the Legislature. They have, as he understood, acted on it, and unanimously passed resolutions on the subject, and, among others, one, if the surrender of the fugitives be not made, after another and more solemn demand, providing for the convening of the people of Georgia, in their high sovereign capacity, as a member of the Union, to take the subject into their consideration. All who know that State, know that when she moves she intends no idle menace.

With these views and facts, I leave it now to the Senate to decide whether the time has not arrived when they ought to say what attitude they ought to assume in relation to this, the most momentous and dangerous question that has ever agitated this Union. As to himself, he has done his duty. He has raised his warning voice, regardless of the unworthy imputations to which he knows he exposes himself. He has presented the result of his most mature and deliberate reflection, in order, if possible, to prevent the conflict between the two great sections, which any one capable of reflection must see is approaching, and must take place, if not arrested. He has done his duty. Let what may come, he wishes to free himself from all responsibility in the eyes of the country and the world, and of the present and future generations. He was not sanguine, he must say, of the success of the measure, even if it should be adopted. He had presented it as the most likely to do good, and in the desire to do any thing that promised in the least to avert the approaching catastrophe, which he was most anxious to avoid. Should the motion prevail, he would take no further control or responsibility, which would then, of course, rest on those who may take the resolutions into their own hands.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, had determined this morning to move a reference of these resolutions to a Select Committee, but was dissuaded. This motion has now been made by another gentleman, (Mr. BENTON,) and I am called upon to vote either for or against it. As I am still clearly of opinion that an immediate reference of these resolutions to a Select Committee would, under existing circumstances, be the wisest course, whether we regard the interest of the North or the South, I am prepared to give this motion my hearty support.

On this exciting question I desire to do nothing as a member of this body which can, in the slightest degree, interfere with the constitutional rights of the slave-holding States. My fate as a public man is as deeply staked upon the preservation of these rights as that of any other individual in the country. I have long since taken my stand, and from it I shall not be driven. I do not desire to maintain myself at home, unless I can do it with a due regard to the rights and the safety of the people of the South. I am prepared, therefore, to adopt any just measure, within the pale of the constitution, to settle this dangerous question, and to afford the greatest security to the slave-holding States. Notwithstanding these are my sentiments, I cannot believe that the Senator from South Carolina has chosen the course best calculated to attain these results. This is the great centre of agitation. From this capitol, it spreads over the whole Union. I therefore deprecate a protracted discussion of the question here. It can do no good, but may do much harm, both in the North and in the South. It was for this reason that, after the right of petition had been recognized by a solemn vote of this body, I was content to act as we have done for the last two years, and leave the questions to be discussed by the people of the country themselves. We have now abandoned this safe, this prudent course, and what has been the result? For the last three days we have been engaged in a discussion eminently calculated to irritate and inflame the public mind; and as yet we have not adopted the third of the series of resolutions. If we proceed, I shall be agreeably disappointed if another week should close this debate. And what shall we gain by the adoption of these resolutions? Nothing; worse than nothing. Those who look to the votes upon them, as the standard by which to ascertain how many are in favor of, and how many opposed to, their main object, will be greatly mistaken. Some thirteen or fifteen votes have been recorded against these resolutions, when, from my knowledge of Senators, I am firmly convinced that there are but very few, if any, who are not prepared to vote for resolutions prepared in such a conciliatory spirit, as not to encounter the opinions or the prejudices of any, and which ought to give, and I believe would give, entire satisfaction to the South. The moral effect of such a unanimous, or almost unanimous, vote of the Senate, would be great upon the country. It is, therefore, for the purpose of arresting this unprofitable debate, and of having such resolutions reported by a Select Committee, that I shall vote in favor of the proposition.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

What have we witnessed upon the present occasion? The Senators from Delaware, although representing a slave-holding State upon this floor, have voted against these resolutions, because, in their opinion, they can detect in them the poison of nullification. Now, I can see no such thing in them, and am ready to avow that in the main they contain nothing but correct political principles to which I am devoted. But what then? These Senators are placed in a false position, and are compelled to vote against resolutions the object of which they heartily approve. Again: my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. WALL,) votes against them, because they are political abstractions, of which he thinks the Senate ought not to take cognizance; although he is as much opposed to abolition, and as willing to maintain the constitutional rights of the South as any Senator upon this floor. Other Senators believe the right of petition has been endangered; and until that has been established, they will not vote for any resolutions upon the subject. Thus we stand; and thus those of us in the North, who must sustain the brunt of the battle, are forced into false positions. Abolition thus acquires force by bringing to its aid the right of petition and the hostility which exists in the North against the doctrines of nullification.

Mr. PRESTON hoped the resolutions would not be referred; it could no do good, and would protract the discussion, of which he was already heartily wearied.

Mr. BERTON then withdrew the motion to commit the subject to a Select Committee.

Mr. WALL had hoped the subject would have been referred to a committee, as it was clearly incompetent to the Senate to sit day after day, making abstract creeds, and establishing particular interpretations of the constitution; all which was foreign to the purposes of legislation. He would ask, on whom were these codes, creeds, and abstractions, to operate? They could have no force whatever as law; whom, then, would they bind? No one person whatsoever! Did, then, the Senate expect to settle a thousand disputed constitutional questions by propounding theories and abstract propositions? To legislate was the duty of legislators, not to broach or to promulgate abstract opinions and theories. If a law were introduced on the subject, he (Mr. W.) would be able to act; or, if the report of a committee had come up, it might be received or rejected. As it was, however, the course pursued appeared to him irregular, anomalous, and fraught with bad consequences, converting the Senate into a mere arena of theoretical disputations.

SATURDAY, January 6.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The question being on Mr. MORRIS's amendment to the third resolution,

Mr. DAVIS said that he had several times briefly addressed the Senate upon this subject, which for two years or more had been greatly agitated, more so, probably, than was useful.

At the first session of the last Congress, after a long, animated, denunciatory debate, carried on chiefly by the members from the South, the Senate arrived at certain results in regard to abolition petitions, in which he (Mr. D.) did not concur, but a very great majority did. It was proper to recur to the state of things then, and to call to mind the sentiments of that day. The leading argument in that debate was, that the agitation of the question was a source of great danger, pregnant with ruinous consequences to the country, causing serious obstruction to the action of Congress, and great uneasiness out of doors. And it was most urgently insisted that it was one of those delicate topics which it was not safe to discuss; which, in truth, we had no right to discuss, either as regarded the States interested, or the District of Columbia or the Territories.

I have many objections to these resolutions, more than I shall find physical ability to express, and the strongest of those objections are to their political character.

They are not called for, are not more efficient than the measures now in force, and can do no good. They are, as has been well said, (a part of them at least,) mere abstractions or avowals of abstract doctrines no way demanded by the occasion. They embrace matters having no connection with abolition, and call upon us to commit ourselves to an interpretation of the constitution when there is no emergency arising in the course of our public duty requiring us to give interpretation to that instrument. It is an unnecessary attempt to influence the public judgment, and such works of supererogation are best let alone. Any and all these reasons are a most ample justification for voting against even that which may seem to be right in the abstract; for I would give no countenance to making a creed of avowals for politicians, and to the publication by the Senate of abstract opinions, merely because they may contain apparent truisms. They ought also to be useful, and put forth for some useful public purpose.

But, sir, the leading reason urged for disposing of the whole abolition matter is, that the agitation of the topic disturbs the public harmony and endangers the Union. I am quite disposed to respect all such fears and apprehensions, when urged with seriousness; to listen to public sentiment, and to yield much to public judgment; and, I am happy to perceive that the thought now and then flashes across the minds of gentlemen, that there are two ends to this Union, both of which should fall under the protection and paternal regard of this Government. We are the representatives of the whole, and our affections and watchfulness should be commensurate with the whole. The resolutions before us propose no measures for the general harmony, but to give certain interpretations to the constitution favorable to the slave interest. This is to avoid the dissolution of the Union. I cannot see how the end is to be reached by the means.

I wish to ask, sir, what your recollections are in regard to the history of public policy. You have probably for the last thirty years been a witness and participator in what has occurred here, and your memory can go much beyond that. You know what has been the public feeling on the subject of the integrity of the Union, and what kind of a reputation those have acquired who have been suspected only of agitating this alarming topic. How stands the Hartford Convention in public estimation? How other conventions and assemblies of men of more recent date, who were supposed to meditate unfriendly feelings to the Union? All hostility to the Union has at all times been viewed by the great body of the people with the most profound sorrow and regret.

The Abolitionists can have no motive to dissolve the Union. They have never been charged with such an object, to my knowledge. Their acts may create alarm and discontent, which may tend to that. There may be selfish men among them, for the ambitious always mould the moving elements, when they can, to aid their own selfish purposes. It would not be singular if such were found among them, but their number cannot be great. But how is the Abolitionist to be profited, if his wishes are all realized? If all the slaves on the globe were made free, how will it mend his condition? In no way whatever. He can gain nothing by the change. But they repudiate, and very properly, all right to interfere with the States, and confine themselves to the Territories and the District of Columbia.

The worst, then, which can be said of them, is, that they are deluded, misguided philanthropists, fanatics—dehated with an unbecoming zeal. I do not mean to touch the question of the expediency of their course in asking for immediate abolition in the District. That I will meet whenever the Senate will open it by receiving their petitions, but not until then; for the right of petition is the higher right, and must first be vindicated. I shall, however, at all times go for the Union, and the whole Union; and against the Abolitionists if they propose to interfere with constitutional rights or guarantees.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had, he believed, been in a standing minority from the time the subject of abolition was first agitated in this body till the introduction of these resolutions; and, although he had steadily objected to the reception of any abolition petitions, so far from taking a lead in laying them on the table, as the Senator stated, he had not, in a single instance, made such a motion. He was, on the contrary, wholly opposed to the course. He had never doubted the folly of the position, that we were bound to receive petitions, but might lay them immediately on the table, without consideration or discussion. In the original debate, he told the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) who took a lead in favor of that course, that it was utterly indefensible, and that the reasons he (Mr. B.) assigned to prove that we were bound to receive, would be equally cogent to show that we were bound to refer, report on, discuss, and decide on them. He also told him what would be the consequences of his false position, all of which have already been realized. The Senator from Kentucky has already taken the precise ground which he foretold would be taken. Nor is the Senator less mistaken in supposing that he has been opposed to the discussion of the subject. He has, it is true, been utterly and unalterably opposed to any discussion with the abolitionists. They have no right to come here, and he was and is for shutting the door in their face; but he never shunned discussion when the subject came fairly up, nor would he, so long as the Senator's constituents and others continue to agitate the subject; in proof of which, he referred the Senator to the course he adopted in relation to the President's Message, some years since, on the circulation of incendiary publications through the mail. So far from avoiding discussion, he raised a special committee on that portion of the Message, made a full report adverse to the President's views, accompanied by a bill, which gave rise to much discussion. So now, acting on the same principle, he had presented the resolutions as the antagonists of the Vermont resolutions.

But this is not the only instance of the misstatement of his course by the Senator. Assuming, erroneously, as he had shown, that his position had been that Congress has no right to agitate or discuss this subject, however presented, he accuses him (Mr. C.) of challenging debate on the present occasion, and says that he (Mr. DAVIS) would have remained silent had it not been for his challenge. It is true he had stated that the political creed of the Senator, and those who thought with him, in reference to the origin and structure of our Government, so far from affording any constitutional protection against the assaults of the Abolitionists, had roused their fanatical spirit into action; and he had called on the party generally who entertained it, to show, if he was in a mistake as to the effect of their creed, what protection it afforded. If the Senator has construed this into a challenge to discuss these resolutions, he must say he has most signally failed to meet it. He has not even attempted to show that the view which he and his party take of the constitution, can afford the least protection against the dangers which now so seriously menace the country and its institutions. His silence he had a right to consider as conclusive proof of the truth of his assertion, and the Senator ought not to be surprised if, after this tacit confession, he should turn to those who entertained the opposite constitutional views, and call on them exclusively to rally to the rescue at this hour of danger. The Senator was so conscious of his weakness on this point, that instead of attempting to point out a remedy, when his political theory afforded none, he took the opposite course, to deny that there was any danger to be repelled. He told us, gravely, that the Abolitionists were no Disunionists; that they had no ambitious objects; no corrupt purpose; that they repudiated all interference with the States; that they only aimed to abolish slavery in the Territories and in this District, where there were not more than 2,000 slaves; and that they claimed no right, but to beg you to grant them the innocent and harmless boon they craved, (of cutting our throats and burning our houses,) and that these beggars were but a handful, of whom a large portion were females. Such is the picture which he gives of this small band of innocents, and the harmless motives that actuate them; and this, in the face of the constant, uniform, and open avowal, that their object is the total abolition of slavery in the States, as well as in this District and the Territories, and that they consider the abolition in the latter but as the first step to abolition in the former.

As brief as has been his notice of the Senator's apology for the Abolitionists, (for such he must consider his speech,) it is much longer than he would have made it, had it not been for the respect which he has had for his talents and character. He cannot consider the course he has pursued in his speech as indicative of his actual feelings and fairness, and is compelled to regard it as indicative of the distempered state of the public sentiment of those he represented. Thus viewed, it affords an important lesson to those he represented. Throughout, not a censure of the Abolitionists is whispered. All is excuse, defence, apology. It is we, not they, who are the agitators; it is we, not they, who are the disturbers of the peace and quiet of the country; it is we, not they, who are the assailants; it is we, not they, who harbor ambitious and improper designs; and, finally, it is we, not they, who meditate disunion. It is no crime to attack us, but a heinous offence in us to defend ourselves.

Mr. NILES felt that the resolutions before the Senate had placed himself and some others in a delicate situation; he was, and ever had been, decidedly opposed to the agitation of this subject in Congress, in any form; he was opposed to its discussion here, believing that it would tend to increase the evil which it was designed to remove. But it has been brought before us, and we are compelled to act upon it.

He had a few remarks to offer upon the resolutions. They are here, whether properly or not, and we are called on to decide upon them; and when we arrive at that point, they ought to stand or fall upon their own merits. They are objected to on several grounds: first, as being mere abstractions, having no practical bearing; and if by this is meant that they are, if adopted, to have no operation on the rights of any one, this objection is correct. But he would not add to what he had said on that point. They are also objected to on the ground of their having a double aspect—one political, the other having reference to the abolition question. Some gentlemen think that they are altogether unsound and dangerous, as the affirmation of a political creed. They think they discover a lurking treason in them, or a squinting towards nullification. Remove the veil, says the Senator from Massachusetts, and you discover that little thing called nullification.

These objections had no great force on his mind. So far as the resolutions embraced political principles, he had no difficulty; he believed them to be sound and just. They contained a brief exposition of the true theory of our Government; there was nothing new in them; their doctrines were those of the old Republican school of '98, which he regarded as the true interpretation of the constitution; the doctrines of State rights, which were the true principles of union and liberty. They had stood the test of public opinion and of public scrutiny, in every way and form, for nearly half a century, and he thought it rather too late to call them in question now. If, in the infancy of the Confederacy, these principles were deemed just, and the only bulwark against consolidation, the experience of the last forty years has added immeasurable weight to the conviction by which they were then sustained. This Government has exhibited a steady tendency towards consolidation; and this tendency, whilst it is constantly impairing the rights of the States, is the source of greatest danger to the Union. But it is said that the political features of these resolutions, whether right or wrong, are irrelevant, and have nothing to do with their avowed object. He thought very differently. Petitions are before the Senate, asking us to abolish slavery in this District, and to prohibit the slave-trade between the States. We present these resolutions as an answer to these requests. We hold up the mirror of the constitution, that the petitioners and all others may see the objections and difficulties existing in the very theory and nature of the Government—that they may see that some of the objects prayed for are directly in conflict with the constitution, and that others have a direct and necessary tendency to disturb the Union. The designs of these agitators are not confined to this District; we have evidence that they are not; they are praying for the prohibition of the trade in slaves; they are already directly interfering with this matter within the States. These unfortunate men, who, I fear, are to be the disturbers of their country's peace, view this subject in a religious rather than a political or civil aspect. They regard slavery as a moral evil; as a sin in the sight of God, which they are in conscience bound to set their faces against and attempt to extirpate. Does not this show that they consider themselves in some sense responsible for what they regard as a crime, which must proceed from the consideration that we are one people, one community, for local as well as general purposes? These men mostly belong to the clergy, who, with many honorable exceptions, are, of all men, the most liable to fall into error on this subject. Their course of reading, reflections, associations, and duties, all tend to lead them into error in regard to the nature of our Government and political and social rights. If they do not entertain erroneous views on this subject, why do they confine their efforts to slavery in the United States? Is there no slavery elsewhere? Why do they not give their attention to Cuba and the islands lying along upon our coasts? Does not slavery exist there? and is it not known to be much more cruel, severe, and oppressive? Who has ever heard of the exertions of abolitionists to abolish slavery in the Island of Cuba? Depend upon it, sir, these fanatics act under an impression that they are in some respect responsible for the existence of slavery in the United States, because they are citizens of the same country and belong to the same general community. These resolutions present this subject in its true light; they hold up the States as separate and independent communities, except for a few general purposes; as much separate and distinct in all their concerns and institutions purely local, as though the Union did not exist; as much separate and distinct as these States are from Canada, or Cuba, or Mexico. A citizen of Vermont has no more right to interfere with the subject of slavery in South Carolina, than a citizen of Canada. Is there not reason to believe that there is much delusion on this subject?

But what is the real source of danger? We are told that no force can be brought against the Union or the South. This is true, sir; the danger is not from force. What is the strength of this Government, and of this Union? Is it force? Is it backed and sustained by your army and navy; your militia, or other military establishments? Far from it: that is not the design of those national institutions. The strength of this Union, of this Government, is public opinion. This is its only abiding foundation; the rock on which it rests, or upon which it must founder. As long as that remains sound, we have nothing to fear, and hence we discover the danger from the movements and apparent designs of the abolitionists. Are not all their efforts directly calculated to poison public sentiment? Are they not calculated to alienate the opinions and feelings of the people of one section of the Union from those of another? If their schemes are persisted in, is there not reason to fear that feelings will be engendered in both ends of the Union, hostile to each other and the Union itself? Does any one suppose that this Confederacy of States can be preserved with public sentiment hostile to it; with feelings unfriendly and hostile between the people of the two extremities? Does any one suppose it can be maintained when the time arrives (but he hoped it would never arrive) when the entire population of one section of the country, comprising nearly half the States, become fully and deeply impressed with the solemn conviction that the Union, instead of adding to their security, is the fruitful source of danger to their domestic institutions, their property, their peace, and their lives? He must know little of the nature of this Government, and little of human nature, who can entertain such an opinion. Sir, the strength of this Union is in the hearts and affections of the people; in a settled, abiding conviction, that it is a source of security, a benefit, a blessing, to all parties to it.

Sir, (said Mr. N.,) I will not undertake to predict what will be the issue of this struggle at the North. For a time, very possibly, the side of error may prevail. It was a subject peculiarly calculated to take hold of the feelings and prejudices of large classes of the people; it was a subject calculated to delude and mislead. But if the abolition party should prevail, and abolition principles triumph, we shall have then reached the third stage of the evil; the contest will then be brought here, and between the different States of this Union. Then are to follow reproaches, criminations and recriminations, and real or supposed aggressions offered and repelled; agitation, alarm and confusion may prevail, and the noble fabric of the Government appear to be falling to pieces. This will be the final crisis, which may fill the country with calamities, but the Union will not be dissolved. When the waters of bitterness have spread over the land—when the people have drank deep from the cup of affliction—when they have seen and tasted enough of the bitter fruits of fanaticism, folly, rashness, and passion—the good sense and reason of the people will return, the delusion will subside, and the dark clouds which have lowered over our horizon will gradually disappear, until the sun breaking through them shines once more on our favored land. Sir, the Union will not be dissolved, although it may be put to a severe trial. He felt a strong conviction, an abiding confidence in this; but if he could for a moment believe that Providence has ordered otherwise—that this Confederacy is to be broken down—it would make no difference as to his course. When driven from every other position, he would make his last stand on the ramparts of the constitution, where he would make the last rally for the last struggle in its defence. If unsuccessful—if he fell—he would fall with the glorious standard of the Union in his hand, and the words of the venerable ex-President on his lips—"THE FEDERAL UNION MUST BE PRESERVED."

MR. BAYARD moved to strike out the words "the several States," and insert the words of the constitution itself, viz: "the people of the United States." His object was to avoid a committal to a political creed, to which he could not consent.

MR. CALHOUN objected, that those words were ambiguous; they might be taken in a geographical sense, meaning the inhabitants of the northern continent of America; or they might mean the people, as a people; or they might mean the people only of the several separate States. The latter was the only sense he could admit.

MR. BAYARD urged that the very words of the constitution, to which every Senator had sworn, could not surely be objected to. It appeared to him that Mr. C. was contending rather to put his own peculiar interpretation upon that instrument, rather than following the instrument itself, leaving the interpretation open.

MR. CLAY of Kentucky said, if the Senator from Delaware would frame his amendment according to the historical fact, in the adoption of the constitution, MR. CLAY would vote for it. The historical fact was, that the constitution was adopted by the people of the several States, acting within their respective limits.

MR. CALHOUN. We rely on the historical fact; and the Senator from Delaware ought not to force his interpretation on us.

MR. BAYARD. The historical fact is, that it is the Government, in the words of the constitution, of "the people of the United States." It is so decided by Chief Justice Marshall. When the preamble of the constitution was "We, the people of New Hampshire, Vermont," &c., the names of the several States were stricken out, and the existing expression inserted, in order to avoid all ambiguity. I do not depend at all on the preamble, but on the discussion in the Convention. I can demonstrate that it was regarded as a Government emanating from the people as a general body; and on this subject I shall be ready to wield a lance with the Senator on any substantial occasion.

MR. BAYARD's amendment was lost—yeas 8, nays 34; and the third resolution was adopted—yeas 31, nays 11.

TUESDAY, January 9.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of MR. CALHOUN's resolutions, on the relations, &c., of the States and General Government. The question being on the fourth of the series.

MR. GRUNDY said that, having been absent from sickness when the votes were recorded on the passed resolutions, he took this opportunity of saying that he zealously concurred with the object of the resolutions, and, had he been present, should have voted in favor of every one of them.

The question was taken on the 4th resolution, and was carried, as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Smith of Indiana, and Swift—5.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the fifth resolution as follows:

"Resolved, That the intermeddling of any State or States, or their citizens, to abolish slavery in this District, or any of the Territories, on the ground, or under the pretext, that it is immoral or sinful, or the passage of any act or measure of Congress, with that view, would be a direct and dangerous attack on the institutions of all the slave-holding States."

MR. SMITH, of Connecticut, did not intend to press on the Senate any remarks of his while these resolutions were under discussion. But he rose to express his views as to the difference between the resolutions which had been passed and the one at present before them. Those that were passed were only declaratory of constitutional rights, which he thought they were bound to recognize, and on these grounds he gave his support to them. But what was this fifth resolution? Was it not wholly different from the others? This was a field in which the people of these United States had a right to enter and to discuss—the expediency of slavery in this District. If we are called on here to act as legislators, he, for one, would be ready to say that it would not be expedient to legislate on the subject, because it would be unjust to the holders of slave property, but he would be unwilling to say that it was unconstitutional to abolish slavery in this District.

When they came to talk of prescribing limits to the discussions of the people of the United States, they were not acting within the limits of their duty. If, said Mr. S., we do not act in conformity to the will of the people of the United States, they can exercise a proper check or control over us. What was this fifth resolution but the prescribing a rule to limit the discussions of the people of the United States hereafter, and the setting themselves up as censors over them? This Mr. S. thought, was going far beyond the limits of their duty. While he would cheerfully oppose any unconstitutional interference with the institutions of the States, he would at the same time avoid expressing any opinions adverse to the right of the people to discuss such subjects as were properly open to them.

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, said: The District of Columbia was now emphatically the battle-field of the abolitionists, and the resolution immediately under consideration, with, perhaps, some modifications in phraseology, would present the true issue here and to the country.

If the grave objections suggested on the other side were sustained by an examination of the resolutions themselves, or a course of sound argumentation, they would insure my opposition. What are they? The first that reached my ear was, that they contain latent nullification. I have waited to hear the particular resolution, sentence or phrase pointed out in which this heresy is supposed to be concealed, and I have waited in vain. Having, then, assertion on one side, and what appears to me to be the plain reading of the resolutions and the frank and unqualified declaration of the mover on the other, I must be excused if I do not take the alarm.

We have next eloquent disquisitions upon the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press. To every sentiment uttered upon these subjects I yield my cordial assent; but why introduced on this particular occasion, I have been at a loss to determine. Would any man here abridge the liberty of speech, or assail the freedom of the press? I take it not. Is there any thing in the resolutions to sanction an invasion of either? Not a syllable. That these are privileges most dear to every American, is freely admitted by all. Why such a variety of changes have been rung upon them in this debate, others may determine.

But it is further urged against the resolutions, that they are mere abstractions. Sir, it is quite immaterial what name you apply to them; sufficient is it that they meet the case, that they encounter the Abolitionist upon sound and tenable ground, and furnish a conclusive answer to his importunities. To say that the petitions refer only to this District, and that the principles asserted in the preceding resolutions are consequently without application, is perfectly idle. It is impossible to read a single number of the leading Abolition periodicals, without perceiving that their object reaches far beyond this District, and stops at no point short of general emancipation in the States. And yet, sir, I suspect that you would find few intelligent Abolitionists, who would assert that Congress has the constitutional power to interfere with slavery in the States; but admitting the want of power here, they hold it to be their duty, as individuals, to persevere in the cause. Regarding the institution of slavery as morally wrong, or sinful, if you please, they consider themselves, as citizens of the Union, responsible for its continuance, wherever it may exist within our borders. This feeling has its origin, to some extent, in a misapprehension of the structure of our Government, and this error the preceding resolutions are calculated to correct. They assert, in effect, that the citizen of New Hampshire is no more responsible, morally or politically, for the existence and continuance of this domestic institution in Virginia or Maryland, than he would be for the existence of any similar institutions in France or Persia.

Now, let these doctrines be universally understood and admitted, and you take one great step toward satisfying the consciences of honest, but misguided people, in one section of the country, and quieting the irritation, for which there has been too much cause, in the other. This we have attempted to do. We are bound to go further, and frankly to declare to these petitioners, that so long as slavery shall continue in Virginia and Maryland, it is vain for them to expect its abolition here; that we are forbidden to legislate upon this subject, under existing circumstances, by obligations hardly inferior to the constitution itself; that Congress cannot abolish slavery in this District, against the wishes of the inhabitants, without a gross breach of public faith, and an outrageous infraction of private rights.

At the time the cession was made, domestic slavery existed in the States of Maryland and Virginia: it still exists there; and it has also existed here from that day to this. Now, how is it possible to mistake what must have been the understanding of both parties at the time? No man, it strikes me, can doubt for a moment, who will regard, without prejudice, the relative position of this "ten miles square," the objects of the cession, and the manifest interests of the States making it. Who can believe that these patriotic States would have parted with their territory, if they could have supposed that the rights and property of their citizens, living upon it, were to be invaded, against their consent, and in defiance of their remonstrances? I have no hesitation in saying that I consider slavery a social and political evil, and most sincerely wish that it had no existence upon the face of the earth; but it is perfectly immaterial how it may be regarded, either by you or myself; it is not for us to sit in judgment, and determine whether the rights secured to the different States by the constitution are blessings or otherwise; it is sufficient for the argument that they are rights, which the inhabitants do not choose to relinquish.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, rose. He said that, if the object of these resolutions was to produce peace and allay excitement, it appeared to him that they were not very likely to accomplish such an object. More vague and general abstractions than they were could hardly have been brought forward, and they were more calculated to produce agitation, and stir up discontent and bad blood, than to do any good whatever. Such, he knew, was the general opinion of Southern men, few of whom, however they assented to the abstractions, approved of this method of agitating the subject. He was quite at a loss to comprehend what good such resolutions could effect; there was nothing practical in them; they were in the air, aerial, unbusiness-like, theoretical abstractions, only calculated to agitate, and to bring the rights of the South to trial, to bring them up for discussion, to create difference and discord on abstract questions among those who all agreed on the one practical point, viz: that the rights of the South must be preserved. He would not say that they were the work of abolitionism, but of this he was certain, that such a mode of bringing the South to trial, and putting up her rights to be disputed, by drawing out theories on which no two men could absolutely agree, was most eminently calculated to aid, and no doubt would greatly aid, the abolitionists. The mover of these resolutions relies mainly upon two points to carry the Senate with him: first, he reiterates, over and over again, the trite theme and cry of "danger to the Union;" and next, that, if he is not followed in this movement, he urges the inevitable consequence of the "destruction of the Union."

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. C. thought it possible the gentleman might be mistaken. It possibly might not be exactly true that, to save the Union, it was necessary to follow him. On the contrary, some were of opinion, and he for one was much inclined to be of the same view, that, to follow the distinguished mover of these resolutions, to pursue the course of irritation, agitation, and intimidation which he chalked out, would be the very best and surest method that could be chalked out, to destroy this great and happy Union. The Senator (Mr. CALHOUN) is daily, and almost twenty times a day, telling us that the disease is great—is terrible—is frightful—is absolutely incurable! But, if it be as he represents, if the disease be incurable, why does he come forward as a physician to heal a disease which he himself declares to us is past all healing? What can possibly be the object of the resolutions, if the evil they propose to assuage is past all cure? What was the use of bringing them forward, if the gentleman is sincere in thinking that no application can be of any benefit to a disease, which he paints every hour of the day as being frightfully removed from all the powers of remedy? Is such language, on the other hand, only intended as a politic method of carrying by force and terror and alarm every trembling vote in his train? Whatever might be the object of the gentleman, it certainly appeared rather strange to him (Mr. CRITTENDEN) that he should bring forward his resolutions as a remedy, and descant most forcibly upon their healing, testing, curing, and sanatory powers, and almost in the same breath tell us that the disease is so fearful, so far gone, so alarming, so terrific, that his very remedy which he offers is good for nothing!

So far it appeared to Mr. C. that Mr. CALHOUN's course was not calculated to heal, or to produce peace, though such he professed were his objects. There was again another argument on which he rested, which also appeared to Mr. CRITTENDEN calculated to produce confidence in the Abolitionists, and alarm in the South, and all the friends of the South; calculated, he thought, if it were not exposed and avoided, to add thickly to the ranks of abolitionism, and to weaken the ranks of the South, by forcing out many of its warmest and most ardent friends and supporters. The argument was—though not of course so plainly and openly expressed—that there could be no confidence in any opposition to abolitionism, unless it came from Mr. CALHOUN and his party! unless it came from the State rights party! And, therefore, the necessary consequence which follows is, that unless the whole country shall follow the gentleman, and range themselves behind him in his party, there can be no preservation of the Union, there can be no available opposition to abolitionism! Such a mode of acting and reasoning upon the subject appeared to Mr. C. as making a stalking horse, a tool, of abolitionism, to serve as a mean, and as an instrument of promoting personal views and party ambition, under the pretence of infinite good to the country.

Mr. PRESTON suggested to the mover to strike out the words "on the ground or under the pretext that it was immoral or sinful," and insert "on any pretext whatever."

Mr. CALHOUN objected to striking out the words referred to by his colleague; they meet the Abolitionists directly; but would accept as a modification the words he proposed to add.

Mr. PRESTON moved further to insert the words "also a violation of the public faith implied in the cession of this District by the States of Virginia and Maryland."

Mr. CALHOUN had always been of the opinion that any interference with slavery in this District would not only be a violation of the public faith to the States of Virginia and Maryland, but would also be a direct violation of the 8th amended article of the constitution.* He had not, however, thought proper to assert it, as he knew that there was a majority in the Senate of a different opinion, and as his object was to place the question on no particular portion of the constitution, but on its general character and structure, which he thought was much stronger, and much less liable to be disputed. He would neither object nor assent to the proposed modification.

* There must be some error in this reference, as the eighth amended article has no relation to the subject, and merely forbids excessive bail to be required, or excessive fines imposed, or cruel and unusual punishments inflicted: nor does any other article seem to apply to it.

Mr. PRESTON's second amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that he could vote for neither the fifth nor sixth resolutions, in the shape in which they were presented by the Senator from South Carolina.

I have voted, (continued Mr. C.,) without hesitation, for the first resolutions offered by that Senator, after they were modified or amended, not from any confidence which I have in their healing virtues. With respect to the point so much insisted upon in this debate, and which had produced great controversy in former times, whether the constitution is to be regarded as the work of the people of the United States collectively, or of the separate States composing the Confederacy, I have always thought that more importance is attached to it than it deserves. The real question in considering the instrument is, not how the constitution was made, but what is it, as it is? I have always understood, according to historical fact, that the constitution was framed by a convention, composed of delegates appointed by the Legislatures of the several States; and that after it was adopted, it was submitted to conventions of Delegates, chosen by the people of the several States, each acting separately by and for itself; and, being ratified by the conventions of a sufficient number, it became the Constitution of the United States, or, in its own language, of the people of the United States.

The series of resolutions under consideration has been introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, after he and other Senators from the South had deprecated discussion on the delicate subject to which they relate. They have occasioned much discussion, in which hitherto I have not participated. I hope that the tendency of the resolutions may be to allay the excitement which unhappily prevails, in respect to the abolition of slavery; but I confess, Mr. President, that, taken altogether, and in connection with other circumstances, and especially considering the manner in which their author has pressed them on the Senate, I fear that they will have the opposite effect; and particularly at the North, that they may increase and exasperate, instead of diminishing and assuaging the existing irritation. And I cannot but regard the unnecessary combination of the subject of abolition with that alien and the most exciting of all subjects at the present period, the annexation of Texas to the United States, in the same series of resolutions, as peculiarly unfortunate. I know that Texas is not specially mentioned in the last resolution, but the country will understand the intention and allusion. It cannot be forgotten that, immediately after the tidings of the memorable battle of San Jacinto reached this city, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) expressed in the Senate his opinion that the independence of Texas ought immediately to be recognized, and his wish that, before the adjournment of Congress, it should be annexed to the United States. A resolution now lies upon the table of the Senate, introduced by the other Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) proposing a contingent annexation of it to the United States. When these facts are borne in mind, will not all understand the last resolution, although abstract in form, as intended to commit the Senate, in advance, to the annexation? Our purpose, our anxious aim, should be to compose the North, to arrest the progress of the spirit of abolition, and to give strength and confidence to the numerous friends of the Union in that quarter. Is it then wise and discreet to blend these two unhappy causes of agitation together?

The Senator from South Carolina has offered his resolutions, he tells us, to revive and rally the State rights party. But I cannot think that the slave-holding States ought to consent to place their peculiar interests in the exclusive safe-keeping of any one party, however correct some of us may believe its principles to be. Parties rise up and go down, but the constitution remains a perpetual and sure bulwark against all attacks upon the rights of the slave-holding States, from whatever quarter they may proceed. No, sir: do not let us put our trust in any party exclusively; let us invoke the united guardianship of all—the Whigs, the Democratic party, the Republican party, the Jackson Van Buren party, the Federal party, the Union party, the Nullifiers, and the Loco Focos—all, in preserving the inviolability of the constitution, and protecting against every encroachment delicate and momentous interests, which cannot be seriously touched without endangering the stability of our entire political fabric.

We want in the slave-holding States nothing done here to stimulate our vigilance, or to unite us upon the subject of our present deliberations. We may differ there in the degree of sensibility which we display; but we are all firmly and unanimously resolved to defend and maintain our rights at all hazards; and should the hour of trial ever come, those who appear now the least agitated, will not be behind those who are foremost and loudest in proclaiming the existence of danger. I have inquired of Northern Senators, charged with the presentation of abolition petitions, whether the spirit of abolitionism was spreading; and, if so, what was the cause. Their answer was, that it was increasing; and that the cause was the impression which the Abolitionists had been able to make on the Northern mind, that the constitutional right of petition was denied them by the two Houses of Congress.

The people may attempt to exercise that right of petition in three different descriptions of cases: 1st. In instances where Congress manifestly does not possess the constitutional power to grant the relief prayed for. In these, the petition may be rejected instantly, without reference and without debate, and no just cause of complaint would exist. 2d. In cases where the constitutional power, the exercise of which is invoked, is controverted, doubtful, or uncertain. In these, a reference of the petition may be necessary to examine into the existence of the power, as well as into the expediency of exercising it. Of this controverted nature is the legislative power of Congress in this District. No one would contend that a petition to establish a Bank of the United States should be instantly rejected, without debate and without reference, upon the sole ground that a large portion of the Senate should think it unconstitutional. And 3d. In cases where the power is incontestably possessed by Congress to grant the redress prayed for. In the two last descriptions of cases, I think that Congress is bound attentively to receive the petitions, and respectfully to dispose of them.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

It has been argued that, when a petition is once put in the possession of the Senate, the right of petitioning has been practically enjoyed; and that the Senate may reject it instantly, refer it, lay it upon the table, or dispose of it as may be thought proper. Undoubtedly this is true; but in the great business of human life, public and private, the manner in which it is transacted is often as important, sometimes more important, than what is done or refused. And a wise Government should be particularly careful not to wound or inflame popular sensibility on subjects respecting which large masses choose to exercise the constitutional right of petition. The course which the Senate has pursued, in regard to these abolition petitions, for about two years past, is this: a Senator states from his place that he is charged with the presentation of one of them, and moves that it be received. Another Senator thereupon rises, and moves that the motion to receive the petition be laid upon the table; and the Senate accordingly orders the motion to receive the petition to be laid upon the table; and thus the petition is not received in a parliamentary sense. The Senate does not decide the question of its reception.

This course I have always thought unfortunate. It is unsatisfactory. The petitioners feel that they have been neglected, and they allege that the right of petition has been denied. But it has been contended that these petitioners are mad and reckless fanatics, and it has been indignantly asked whether they merit respectful treatment. Mr. President, my observation and experience in life have taught me, that when we are addressed or assailed, our conduct should not be regulated by the harsh, vituperative, or fanatical language, or the condition, whatever it may be, of those who approach us, but by the standard of our own respectability, standing, and character in life. And in regard to these petitions, the question should not be so much what do the petitioners deserve, as what is due from the calm, elevated, dignified, august character of the Senate of the United States?

It appears to me, sir, that what becomes us is to keep the Abolitionists separate and distinct from all other classes, standing out in bold and prominent relief; and the subject of abolition separate and distinct from the right of petition, from Texas, and from all other subjects; let them stand alone, unmixed with the rest of the community, without the general sympathy, and exposed to the overwhelming force of the united opinion of all who desire the peace, the harmony, and the union of this Confederacy. I would receive, respectfully receive, their petitions, refer them, and occasionally present calm, dispassionate, and argumentative reports against them. This is the manner in which petitions for abolition were received in the first Congress, upon the recommendation of Mr. Madison; and that in which they were ever afterwards received, until the practice was changed about two years ago.

But it is said that these fanatics are beyond the reach of any argument; and it is triumphantly asked, Will you condescend to argue with such deluded persons? Yes! I say, yes. To preserve these admirable institutions of ours, and this glorious Union from the possibility of all danger, I would argue with any one, with lunatics themselves, in their lucid intervals, and argue again and again. It is not, however, to call alone the Abolitionists to a sense of peace and duty, that these appeals to the reason, the judgment, and the patriotism of the country, should be sent forth from these halls. They would address themselves, with powerful effect, to all that, vastly the largest, portion of the Northern community who are uninfected by abolitionism. When has Congress unsuccessfully appealed to the intelligence, the patriotism, and the valor of the American people? In such a cause we should never tire nor despair.

Mr. President, I have no apprehension, not the smallest, for the safety of the Union, from any state of things which now exists. I will not answer for consequences which may ensue from harsh and opprobrious language, and from indiscretion and rashness on the part of individuals or of Congress, here or elsewhere. We allow ourselves to speak too frequently, and with too much levity, of a separation of this Union. It is a terrible word, to which our ears should not be familiarized. I desire to see in continued safety and prosperity this Union, and no other Union. I go for this Union as it is, one and indivisible, without diminution. I will neither voluntarily leave it, nor be driven out of it by force. Here, in my place, I shall contend for all the rights of the State which has sent me here. I shall contend for them with undoubting confidence, and in all the security which the Union confers, under all the high sanctions which the guarantees of the constitution afford, and with the perfect conviction that they are safer in the Union than they would be out of the Union. I am opposed to all separate confederacies and to all sectional conventions. No state of actual danger exists to render them expedient, or to justify deliberation about them. This Union, this Government, has done nothing, nothing whatever, to excite the smallest alarm. It will do nothing; but if it should; if, contrary to all human probability, the rights and the security of the slaveholding States shall be assailed by any authoritative act emanating from this capitol, a state of things for resistance, forcible resistance, will then occur. It will be time enough then to act. No man in full health will take medicine because he may be sick, amputate a perfectly sound limb, because it may be fractured or seized with gangrene, or perpetrate suicide because death is his ultimate and inevitable doom. And, sir, when that fatal day shall come, if it ever do come, when the slaveholding States have to defend, by force, their rights, the State whose servant I am will rush to battle, as she always has done, with her accustomed ardor, and with gallantry unsurpassed by that of any other State. And those States and their citizens will be found to sustain these rights with most vigor and success, who, unmoved by false alarms or imaginary or aggravated dangers, with a firm and fixed purpose of soul, stand prepared, in every real exigency, to vindicate them at every extremity.

Having, Mr. President, said so much on the general subject, with the permission of the Senate, I will read certain resolutions which I have prepared, embracing the whole ground occupied by any of the petitions in respect to domestic slavery in the United States. They are the following:

Resolved, That the institution of domestic slavery, as now existing in many of the States of this Confederacy, is subject to the exclusive power and control of those States respectively; and that no other State, nor the people of any other State, nor Congress, possess, or can rightfully exercise, any power or authority whatever to interfere in any manner therewith.

Resolved, That if any citizens of the United States, regardless of the spirit of peace, harmony, and union, which should ever animate the various members of the Confederacy, and their respective citizens, shall present to the Senate any petitions touching the abolition of slavery in any of the States in which it exists, all such petitions shall be instantly rejected, without debate, and without further or other proceedings thereon, as relating to an object palpably beyond the scope of the constitutional power of Congress.

Resolved, That when the District of Columbia was ceded by the States of Virginia and Maryland to the United States, domestic slavery existed in both of those States, including the ceded territory; and that, as it still continues in both of them, it could not be abolished, within the District, without a violation of that good faith which was implied in the cession, and in the acceptance of the territory, nor, unless compensation were made to the proprietors of slaves, without a manifest infringement of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, nor without exciting a degree of just alarm and apprehension in the States recognizing slavery, far transcending, in mischievous tendency, any possible benefit which could be accomplished by the abolition.

Resolved, therefore, That it is the deliberate judgment of the Senate, that the institution of domestic slavery ought not to be abolished within the District of Columbia; and it earnestly hopes that all sincere friends of the Union, and of harmony and general tranquillity, will cease to agitate this disturbing question. But the Senate feels itself, at the same time, constrained, from a high sense of duty in respect to the constitutional right of petition, to declare that it holds itself bound to receive and respectfully to treat any petitions, couched in decorous language, which may be presented by citizens of the United States, touching slavery within the District of Columbia.

Resolved, therefore, That, upon the presentation of any such petitions, they shall be received, and referred to the appropriate committee.

Resolved, That it would be highly inexpedient to abolish slavery in Florida, the only Territory of the United States in which it now exists, because of the serious alarm and just apprehensions which would be thereby excited in the States sustaining that domestic institution; because the people of that Territory have not asked it to be done, and, when admitted as a State into the Union, will be exclusively entitled to decide that question for themselves; and, also, because it would be in violation of a solemn compromise, made at a memorable and critical period in the history of this country, by which, while slavery was prohibited north, it was admitted south of the line of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude.

Resolved, That no power is delegated, by the constitution, to Congress, to prohibit, in or between the States tolerating slavery, the sale and removal of such persons as are held in slavery by the laws of those States.

Resolved, That, whilst the Senate, with painful regret, has seen the perseverance of certain citizens of the United States in the agitation of the abolition of domestic slavery, thereby creating distrust and discontent and dissatisfaction among the people of the United States, who should ever cherish towards each other fraternal sentiments, it beholds, with the deepest satisfaction, everywhere prevailing an unconquerable attachment to the Union, as the sure bulwark of the safety, liberty, and happiness of the people of the United States.

There is nothing abstract or metaphysical in them. They relate to the abolition of slavery in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in Florida, the only Territory of the United States where it exists, and to the sale and removal of slaves in the States whose laws recognize the institution of slavery. They do not seek to renovate any party, nor to place the high interests to which they relate in the exclusive custody of any one party. Resting upon, and sustained by, the constitution, they appeal to the sound discretion, the sober judgment, and the patriotism of all parties. I may not ask the sense of the Senate to be expressed upon each of them; but I shall offer that relating to the District of Columbia, and that to the Territory of Florida, as an amendment to the fifth resolution, submitted by the Senator from South Carolina. I think the charge upon the petitioners of intermeddling with abolition in this District is harsh, and that some less offensive word should be used. The District of

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Columbia is the seat of the common Government of the United States. It was ceded for that express purpose. Each State has as much interest in it, and as much right to petition about any thing within it, as any other State, and no more. Nor can I concur with the resolution, in declaring that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be a direct and dangerous attack upon the institution of slavery in the States. I am prepared to say that it would excite "a degree of just alarm and apprehension in the States recognizing slavery" far transcending in mischievous tendency, any possible benefit which could be accomplished by the abolition, or to use any other equivalent language. In conclusion, I move the third resolution of the series which I have suggested, as an amendment to the fifth resolution proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN felt some inducement to persevere in the course he had heretofore pursued, by now seeing the concessions which were proposed by the resolutions just read by the Senator from Kentucky. He now saw it conceded, that where the object was clearly unconstitutional, the Senate was not bound to receive a petition. At first, the broad ground was taken that the right of petition was so sacred that any refusal to receive a petition, no matter on what subject, and no matter how objectionable its language, would be an invasion of it. Now it was conceded that they were not bound to receive a petition when the subject of it was clearly unconstitutional. Now, as to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky to the fifth resolution. He would state, in general terms, what was the great characteristic difference between them. The Senator went on the principle that concession was the way to meet these Abolitionists. He, on the other hand, went on the ground that we have no safety but in standing fast on our rights. The Abolitionists tell you that their object is to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia as but one step towards final abolition in the States. With this object, avowed by the Abolitionists, what do duty and policy demand on our part? We see the end; and that, if it can be effected, it would be our destruction. Shall we yield, or stand fast? That is the question. If we yield an inch, we are gone. The very ground on which we are asked to make the first concession will be urged on us with equal force to make the second, the third, and every intermediate one, till the last is consummated. The first is to yield the right of petition, and to discuss the subject with the Abolitionists, in order to appease them, and to stop agitation. This the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) urges on us, which he tells us would have a happy effect in quieting the public feeling. Does he not see that, if we should have the folly to make this concession, we will be next urged to yield to the abolition of slavery in this District on the very same ground? We will be told that there are but two thousand slaves in the District, and if we yield to so small a request, all will be quiet. If that be conceded, we will be next told, we must yield to the abolition in the Territories, and then to the abolition of what they call the slave-trade between the States, and, finally, to abolition in the States. At every step they would become stronger, and we weaker, if we should be so infatuated as to make the first concession; and the Senator from Kentucky, at each step, would no doubt be able to read just such a letter as he had just read, from some well-intentioned but weak individual from the North, telling us, if we would only yield the immediate point at issue, all will be quiet, and that our cause will be strengthened. No: there never was a question agitated where the most unyielding opposition was so necessary for success. The difference between him and the Senator from Kentucky was as wide as the poles.

Mr. CLAY, in reply to Mr. CALHOUN, observed, the Senator from South Carolina seems highly delighted with having gained a point which he calls a concession on my part: that is, the immediate rejection of all petitions touching abolition in the States. But who ever contended that Congress was bound to entertain petitions relating to an object manifestly beyond the scope of its constitutional powers? We have only insisted upon its obligation to receive petitions when Congress possesses power, or the power, being controverted, is a fit subject of investigation. Whatever has been gained by the Senator, in respect to these, I fear is more than neutralized by a loss to the slave-holding interest, arising from the handle which is made of an alleged denial of the right of petition. If our object really be to diminish the number of petitioners, we should present no collateral or false issues to the country.

But the Senator expresses his alarm at the reception of petitions. Why, sir, what is there justly alarming in the mere fact of receiving a petition? Action, Congressional action, alone can justify alarm. The Senator thinks my resolutions make a concession. Of what? The right to abolish slavery in the States? No. They demand an instantaneous rejection of all such petitions, as being palpably beyond the powers of Congress, and therefore not even debatable. The right to abolish slavery in the District? No. The strongest grounds—stronger than the Senator's own resolution—are assumed against it. The right to abolish it in the Territory of Florida? No. All the considerations against it are arrayed in forcible language. The right to prohibit the sale and removal of slaves from State to State? No. The constitutional power of Congress to do that is denied. And it is remarkable that, while my resolutions deny that power, his are altogether silent about it.

Concession! We cannot alter the constitution. It is that which guarantees the right of petition; and the alleged concession is to be found not in my resolution, but in the constitution. But what, again I ask, is there in the fact of receiving a petition which is to throw us into a nervous fit? Why, sir, if a man were to present me a petition to grant him Ashland, (or Orozimbo! exclaimed some Senator—or Orozimbo, said Mr. CLAY, whose death I am sorry to announce to the Senate, and he was a great loss, public and private,) I would, without the least apprehension for the loss of my property, put it in my pocket, or lay it upon the table. Will not the Senator comprehend the difference between the act of receiving a petition, and the grant of the thing petitioned for?

The Senator from South Carolina has adverted to the radical difference between us on this subject. I regret it, but I fear that it is not confined to this matter. For a long period of our service in the public councils, no two public men ever coincided upon all great measures of policy more than the Senator and myself. We agreed as to the War, the Tariff, Internal Improvements, a National Bank, &c. But when, to my utter astonishment, I heard the Senator, at the extra session, declare that he had always thought a national bank unconstitutional, the last link in the chain of opinion which connected us was broken and destroyed.

The honorable Senator is not more firmly resolved than I am to sustain the just rights of the slave-holding States. We differ as to the means. He goes for strong language, menacing tones, and irritating measures; I for temperate, but firm, language, conciliation, and for obeying the injunction of the constitution, in respect to the right of petition, which is never improperly denied without wounding popular sensibility. He, doubtless, does not desire to affect the stability of the Union; but I cannot but fear that his whole course on this subject has that tendency. I think that all our proceedings here should be regulated by the fact that the States are all parts of one great confederacy, and should seek to increase the harmony and strengthen the union between them. We should never act as if we were a divided people, or could possibly become so. We are too much in the habit of speaking of divorces, separation, disunion. In private life, if a wife pouts, and frets, and scolds, what would be thought of the good sense or discretion of the husband, who should threaten her with separation, divorce, disunion? who should use these terrible words upon every petty disagreement in domestic life? No man, who has a heart or right feelings, would employ such idle menaces. He would approach the lady with kind and conciliatory language, and apply those natural and more agreeable remedies, which never fail to restore domestic harmony. [A general burst of laughter, which continued for some time.]

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that if he had really been inconsistent, as the Senator supposes, in reference to the bank, he might find a justification in the example of the Senator himself. The only difference between them would be that the Senator had changed from an anti-bank to a bank man, and he from a bank to an anti-bank man.

The subject of the bank, and the consistency of himself and the Senator, had been gratuitously introduced, and did not belong to the question under consideration; but as the Senator had thought proper to make the charge of inconsistency, he felt called on to repel it. He, then, had never been, in any proper sense of the term, a bank man, as he had been opposed to the system ever since he had formed a deliberate and mature opinion in relation to it. It is true, he supported the chartering of the late Bank of the United States in 1816, but it is no less true that he was opposed to the system at that time, and so expressed himself in his opening speech on the question. In supporting the bank then, he yielded to what he believed to be the necessity of the case, growing out of the connection between the Government and the banks—a connection which originated before his time, and was beyond his control. He then said that, so long as that connection existed—so long as the Government received and treated bank notes as gold and silver—it was bound to regulate the banks, and that a Bank of the United States was the only efficient and legitimate means of effecting it; and such is still his opinion.

If, then, his course in 1816 and now, was different in relation to the bank, it must be traced to a change of circumstances, and not to a change of opinion. At the former period, the connection between the Government and the banks existed with no prospect of its termination, or the possibility of rescinding it; but, now, fortunately, it has ceased by operation of law; and he, for the first time since he had been in public life, was free to take a position in reference to the bank in conformity to his principles. Four years ago, on questions growing out of the removal of the deposits, he explicitly avowed his opinion, in the strongest terms, against the system. If this was the only charge of inconsistency that could be brought against him in a long political life, he had reason certainly to congratulate himself as not being inconsistent, and he certainly had as much right to accuse the Senator of separating from him, as he had to make the charge against him.

But the Senator is not content with making the charge of inconsistency. He makes the grave accusation against him of alluding to the possible dissolution of the Union; but fortunately for him, there was but a slight difference between the Senator and himself in reference to this accusation. We both speak of the possible dissolution of the Union; the Senator when the bank is the subject of discussion, and he when abolition. That is all; and he might with as much justice charge the Senator with hostility to the Union, as he had him.

But the Senator tells us that we set out in public life together; that we travelled a long time the same road, but have separated. He believed it was true, that we both set out on the same principles, and in the same party. We both professed at the start the doctrines of '98, and belonged to the Republican party; and it is true that we are now separated. He left it to the world to judge which had departed from the original faith.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator himself was the first to speak of a radical difference between him and me on all subjects. We set out in life together; but in his opinion the Bank of the United States cut asunder the last chain between us. We were together in '98, and since then we have taken long voyages; but whither did the principles of '98 carry him? into what port? They carried me into the port in which I always anchor—the port of the Union—the whole Union—without the separation from it of any member.

The Senator chose to repeat what is no novelty, but has been often suggested on this floor, that I have changed my opinion as to a Bank of the United States.

[Mr. CALHOUN. I accused him of no change.]

But I have changed, resumed Mr. CLAY; and I have changed with the country. I opposed the old Bank of the United States, on the want of constitutional power, and on other grounds. But the war came, then a suspension of specie payments, and a derangement of the currency; and the whole country cried out for a Bank of the United States. If the country had been adverse to a bank in 1816, it could not have been established. If I am taunted with such a change, I thank God it is the only point of national policy which, in the whole of my public life, I have changed.

In 1815-'16 the constitutional power to establish a bank was admitted. We were then in habits of the greatest intimacy. I was then Speaker of the House, and he at the head of the committee out of which the bank grew. Never then did I hear from him a sentiment adverse to the power of the Government to establish a bank; and when, afterwards, in company with a gentleman from Virginia, I heard it for the first time, mutual surprise was expressed and felt.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that the Senator draws a feeble conclusion, if he intends to impeach the correctness of his memory in reference to his course in 1816. It would indeed be surprising if, after more than twenty years, the Senator should recollect the position which he assumed in discussion at that time in reference to the banking system, while it is not at all surprising that he should forget it, even if it attracted his attention at the time. Four years since, on an occasion not less memorable, he made the strongest declaration against the system which stands on record, and yet the Senator does not recollect it; and with what propriety, then, can the Senator venture to appeal to the absence of his recollection on the same subject twenty-two years since, with the view of impeaching the correctness of his memory?

Mr. CLAY said he would not controvert the assertion of the gentleman, but he had not heard him.

WEDNESDAY, January 10:

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the fifth of these resolutions, together with the substitute offered by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had examined the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) which had been offered as a substitute for the fifth resolution, and that it was impossible for him to bring his mind to give it his support, or to vote for it if it should be adopted in any thing like its present shape.

It, in the first place, entirely abandoned the Territories to the Abolitionists. His fifth resolution covered both this District and the Territories, but the amendment wholly omitted the latter, and left them defenceless to the invasion of the foe.

He next objected, that it conceded, by almost necessary implication, the right of Congress to appropriate the public funds to purchase and emancipate slaves; a concession among the most dangerous and unconstitutional that could be made. If once admitted, it would be very easy to complete the end the Abolitionists have in view, and that wholly at our expense. If we yield that point, the work will soon be consummated.

His next objection was, that it impliedly admitted it to be the duty of Congress to receive and discuss petitions to abolish slavery in the District: in his opinion a most unflinching and dangerous assumption; but he had so fully expressed his opinion on that point, on former occasions, that he would not now occupy the time of the Senate in repeating the reasons for his opinion.

He finally objected, that the tone of the amendment, and of the remarks with which it was ushered in, was altogether too low for the subject and the occasion. He was adverse to all violence of language, in the expression of legislative opinions; but when the subject was one of such unprovoked outrage on one-half of the States of the Union, and so pregnant with disastrous consequences to all, he could not reconcile it to his impression of propriety to speak in the low and subdued tone of the amendment.

Mr. CLAY said: As to the amendment not providing protection for the Territories in the series of resolutions which he had offered yesterday, there was one that expressly provided for Florida, the only Territory concerned, placed on the strongest grounds.

As to the right of the Government to purchase the slaves in the District, the amendment recognized no such thing. It simply says you cannot emancipate them without compensation. But whether you can do it at all or not, it does not assert.

My idea in framing that resolution was to throw around the District of Columbia every security, in three distinct propositions. One was the plighted faith of this Government in the transaction by which the District was acquired. The next was, that you have no right to abolish slavery here without indemnity. The third was, that you cannot do it without exciting a degree of alarm in the Southern States of this Union—without transcending all the benefits of any results.

The Senator's third objection is to the right of petition involved in the amendment. I warn the Senate that there can be no continuance of the invasion of the right to petition. Mr. C. mentioned a State Legislature that had now under consideration this subject of the invasion of the right of petition; and from Kentucky, a slave country, he had this morning received a letter from one of the most intelligent men, in which he says you cannot maintain your ground; beware how you attempt it. This is a point on which I know I differ from the Senator, and I should regard nothing more fatal than a deliberate determination of this body to invade the right of petition. Does not every State claim in the District equal rights? There is but one measure more fatal than the invasion of the right of petition, and that is to adopt the concluding resolution of the Senator from South Carolina.

The last objection was that the tone of the amendment was subdued; but with what propriety is this charge? It is in language as strong as ever was used. You cannot abolish slavery without a breach of the public faith. Can any thing be stronger? It equals the constitution itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired if he was to understand the Senator from Kentucky as having modified his resolution.

Mr. CLAY said he would readily do so, and accordingly struck out that part of the resolution relating to compensation to the owners of slaves.

Mr. C. said that there was one observation peculiarly applicable to the resolution under consideration. He believed that we had but one Territory, that of Florida; and how could we assert that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the Territories of the United States would be a violation of faith, implied in the cession of the District, since Florida was acquired twenty years after the cession.

Mr. PRESTON, with the consent of the Senate, modified his amendment, so as to append the words "violation of the public faith, implied in the cession of the District of Columbia," at the end of the resolution.

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's amendment or substitute, and it was adopted, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Niles, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, and Williams—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Walker, Wright, and Young—18.

The question then occurring on the amendment, as amended,

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired if the question was divisible.

The VICE PRESIDENT replied that, according to Parliamentary rules, the question at its present stage was not divisible.

Mr. STRANGE said: The present discussion had, he believed, done mischief; and the most likely method of counteracting that mischief was by making, in the result, a strong expression of opinion with much unanimity. The apprehension that many of our friends would not go with us upon the fifth resolution in its original terms, had induced him to vote for the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) as modified by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. NILES.) For himself, he greatly preferred the original resolution, if for no other reason, for its condensation of substance and terseness of style. The advantage of a resolution so constructed had been fully and happily expressed by the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. ALLEN;) but, fearing they could not make so imposing a show upon it as upon the substitute, he had voted for it. He had, in fact, feared an actual defeat. But the result of the vote upon the adoption of the amendment, being 19 to 18, had satisfied him that, in point of numbers, they could do quite or nearly as well upon the original resolution, and, in point of expression much better; and he therefore moved a reconsideration of the vote for the adoption of the amendment.

The question on Mr. STRANGE's motion to reconsider the vote on adopting Mr. CLAY's substitute being taken, it was carried. So Mr. CLAY's resolution then came up as an original question.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the first part of the amendment which had been proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, as modified by the Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. NILES,) in regard to slavery in the District of Columbia, met his decided approbation. It placed the question upon its true principles. We will not abolish slavery in this District, because it was originally a slave-holding territory, and the surrounding States by which it was ceded are still slave-holding States; and because it would establish in the midst of them a place of refuge for their fugitive slaves; it would be destructive of the rights and security of their citizens, and would erect a citadel from whence to scatter the seeds of servile insurrection throughout their borders. Now he wished a distinct vote to be taken upon that portion of the amendment which related exclusively to the District of Columbia, and he supposed this could only be obtained by striking out all that portion of the amendment which related to Florida and the Indian country. In making this motion, he desired to be distinctly understood. He did not wish to prevent a direct vote on this second portion of the resolution. It could be offered afterwards as a substantive resolution. All he desired was to detach that portion of the amendment which related to this District from what followed; and thus obtain the strongest possible vote in its favor. Mr. B. concluded by moving to strike out the second part of the resolution.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

Mr. SEVIER was perfectly satisfied with the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and regretted that the Senator from South Carolina had not consented to receive it. As for the second part of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, he was in favor of it, and should therefore vote against the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCHANAN's motion was carried—ayes 24, noes 13.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, to prevent any difficulty, asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if he would agree, in case his motion should prevail, to offer the second part of the resolution as a distinct resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, certainly. He could have no objection to place it in the same situation in which he had found it; without, however, thereby pledging himself to support all the principles which it contained.

Mr. WEBSTER said he could not concur in this resolution. I do not know (said he) any matter of fact, or any ground of argument, on which this affirmation of plighted faith can be sustained. I see nothing by which Congress has tied up its hands, either directly or indirectly, so as to put its clear constitutional power beyond the exercise of its own discretion. I have carefully examined the acts of cession by the States, the act of Congress, the proceedings and history of the times, and I find nothing to lead me to doubt that it was the intention of all parties to leave this, like other subjects belonging to the legislation for the ceded territory, entirely to the discretion and wisdom of Congress. The words of the constitution are clear and plain. None could be clearer or plainer. Congress, by that instrument, has power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the ceded territory, in all cases whatsoever. The acts of cession contain no limitation, condition, or qualification whatever, except that, out of abundant caution, there is inserted a proviso that nothing in the acts contained should be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil so as to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than as such individuals might themselves transfer their right of soil to the United States. The acts of cession declare that the tract of country "is forever ceded and relinquished to Congress and to the Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside therein, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution of the United States."

Now, that section to which reference is thus expressly made in these deeds of cession, declares that Congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District, not exceeding ten miles square, as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States."

Nothing, therefore, as it seems to me, can be clearer than that the States making the cession expected Congress to exercise over the District precisely that power, and neither more nor less, which the constitution had conferred upon it. I do not know how the provision, or the intention, either of the constitution in granting the power, or of the States in making the cession, could be expressed in a manner more absolutely free from all doubt or ambiguity.

If the assertion contained in this resolution be true, a very strange result, as it seems to me, must follow. The resolution affirms that the faith of Congress is pledged indefinitely. It makes no limitation of time or circumstance. If this be so, then it is an obligation that binds forever, as much as if it were one of the prohibitions of the constitution itself. And at all times hereafter, even when in the course of their history, availing themselves of events, or changing their views of policy, the States themselves should make provisions for the emancipation of their slaves, in this District, nevertheless, the existing state of things could not be changed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that in his opinion, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) had not placed the question upon its true grounds. He would ask, did any human being suppose that the States of Virginia and Maryland would have ever thought of ceding this District to the United States, if they had imagined that Congress would convert those ten miles square, in the very heart of their territory, into an asylum for their fugitive slaves, and a spot from whence the peace and safety of both were to be constantly endangered? It is true that no express faith was pledged in the cession, because no such apprehension was then entertained. If there had been, does any man doubt that they would have insisted upon an express stipulation against such an alarming danger? If (said Mr. B.) I freely grant to you a valuable possession, could you, as an honorable and honest man, think you had a right to wrest this grant from its original purpose, and convert it into an instrument of my destruction? If you know that the gift never would have been made by me, had I supposed you were capable of using it in such a manner, you are under the strongest moral obligation not to pervert it to such a purpose. It is true you may have the constitutional power to abolish slavery in this District; but would it not be a violation of implied faith, under all the circumstances, to exercise this power? I think it would, I feel that it would, and therefore shall vote that it would.

Again, said Mr. B., no inference can be drawn from the language of the resolution, that its friends intend that slavery shall exist in the District, after it has been abolished in the surrounding States. In thus supposing, the Senator has misapprehended the terms of the resolution. Abolish slavery in Virginia and Maryland, (said Mr. B.,) and it will no longer, it can no longer, exist in this District. The people of these States had been making rapid strides towards the accomplishment of this object, until they were arrested in their career by the abolition excitement, and the proceedings of the abolition societies. This resolution presented the very point of the question, on which he was willing to stand or to fall. It contemplated the existence of slavery here, so long as it should continue to exist in the surrounding States; but not a day longer. It contained the very principle for which he had always contended, that slavery here and slavery there must share the same fate.

Mr. WEBSTER. The words of the resolution will speak for themselves. They require no comment. They express an unlimited plighted faith. The honorable member will so see, if he will look at those words. The gentleman asks whether those who made the cession could have expected that Congress would ever have exercised such a power? To this I answer, that I see no reason to doubt that the parties to the cession were as willing to leave this as to leave other powers to the discretion of Congress. I see not the slightest evidence of any especial fear, or any especial care, or concern, on the part of the ceding States, in regard to this particular part of the jurisdiction ceded to Congress. And, I think, I can ask on the other side, a very important question for the consideration of the gentleman himself, and for that of the Senate and the country; and that is, would Congress have accepted the cession with any such restraint upon its constitutional power, either express or understood to be implied? I think not. Looking back to the state of things then existing, and especially to what Congress had done so recently before, when it accepted the cession of the North-western Territory, I entertain no doubt whatever that Congress would have refused the cession if offered with any condition or understanding that its constitutional authority to exercise exclusive legislation over the District in all cases whatsoever should be abridged.

I have said nothing on the expediency of abolition, immediate or gradual, or the reasons which ought to weigh with Congress should that question be proposed. I can well conceive, I think, what would be a natural and fair mode of reasoning on such an occasion.

When it is said, for instance, by way of argument, that Congress, although it have the power, ought not to take a lead in the business of abolition, considering that the interest which the United States have in the whole subject is vastly less than that which the States have in it, I can understand the propriety and force of the observation. It is, as far as it goes, a pertinent and appropriate argument, and I shall always be ready to give it the full weight belonging to it. When it is argued that, in a case so vital to the States, the States themselves should be allowed to maintain their own policy, and that the Government of the United States ought not to do any thing which shall, directly or indirectly, shake or disturb that policy, this is a line of policy which I can understand; for I have always not only admitted, but insisted, that slavery, within the States, is a subject belonging absolutely and exclusively to the States themselves.

But the present is not an attempt to exhibit any such course of reasoning as this. The attempt is to set up a pledge of the public faith to do the same office, as a constitutional prohibition, in terms, would do; that is, to set up a direct bar, precluding all exercise of the discretion of Congress over the subject. It has been often said in this debate, and I believe it is true, that a decided majority of the Senate do believe that Congress has a clear constitutional power over slavery in this District. But while this constitutional right is admitted, it is at the same moment attempted to be effectually counteracted, overthrown, and done away with by the affirmation of plighted faith, as asserted in the resolution before us.

Now, I have already said I know nothing to support this affirmation. Neither in the acts of cession, nor in the act of Congress accepting the District, nor in any other document, history, publication, or transaction, do I know a single fact or suggestion, supporting this proposition, or tending to support it. Nor has any gentleman, so far as I know, pointed out, or attempted to point out, any such fact, document, transaction, or other evidence. All is left to the general and repeated statement, that such a condition must have been intended by the States. Of all this I see no proof whatever. I see no evidence of any desire on the part of the States thus to limit the power of Congress, or thus to require a pledge against its exercise.

I am altogether unable to see any ground for supposing that either party to the cession had any mental reservation, any unexpressed expectation, or relied on any implied, but unmentioned and unsuggested pledge, whatever. By the constitution, if a district should be ceded to it for the seat of Government, Congress was to have a right, in express terms, to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever. The cession was made and accepted, in pursuance of this power.

As to any provision in the acts of cession stipulating for the security of property, there is none, except only what I have already observed—this condition, that no right of individuals in the soil should be construed to be transferred, but only the jurisdiction. But no doubt all rights of property ought to be duly respected by Congress, and all other legislatures.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

And since the subject of compensation to the owners of emancipated slaves has been referred to, I take occasion to say, that Congress, if it should think that a wise, just, and politic legislation for this District required them to make compensation for slaves emancipated here, they have the same constitutional authority to make such compensation as to make grants for roads and bridges, alms-houses, penitentiaries, and other similar objects in the District.

Mr. CLAY concurred with Mr. BUCHANAN, and he must express his astonishment that Mr. WEBSTER did not view the matter in the same light. He believed, with Mr. B., that if those States could have imagined that while slavery existed with them it would be ended here, they never would have made the cession. Mr. C. would put it in another shape. Suppose Pennsylvania had ceded a portion of her soil as a site for the Government, then he would ask, if, when Pennsylvania was a non-slaveholding State, it would not be deemed a breach of faith to introduce slavery into the midst of her soil? So in this District it would be a breach of faith to abolish, while the ceding States retained that institution. Besides, when the cession was made, there was an express reservation of the right of property, and therefore this kind of property, being included, was, as a matter of public faith, to be preserved.

Mr. WEBSTER. The honorable member from Kentucky asks the Senate to suppose, that the seat of Government had been fixed in a free State, Pennsylvania for example; and that Congress had attempted to establish slavery in a district over which, as here, it had thus exclusive legislation. He asks whether, in that case, Congress could establish slavery in such a place? This mode of changing the question does not, I think, vary this argument; and I answer at once, that however improbable or improper such an act might be, yet if the power were universal, absolute, and without restriction, it might unquestionably be so exercised.

And in the other cases, of forts, arsenals, &c., if Congress has exclusive and absolute legislative power, it must, of course, have the power, if it could be supposed to be guilty of such a folly, whether proposed to be exercised in a district within a free State, to establish slavery, or in a district in a slave State, to abolish or regulate it; yet, if it be a district over which Congress has, as it has in this District, unlimited power of legislation, it seems to me that whatever would stay the exercise of this power, in either case, must be drawn from discretion, from reasons of justice, and true policy, from those high considerations which ought to influence Congress in questions of such extreme delicacy and importance; and to all these considerations I am willing, and always shall be willing, I trust, to give full weight.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he should succeed in one object he had in view when he introduced these resolutions—to ascertain the sense of the Senate on the subject of abolition, and how far it was disposed to take ground against it. They embraced two leading propositions that he had hoped to carry out—that neither a State, nor its citizens, had a right to interfere with the peculiar institutions of the other States; and that this Government, as a common agent of the States, has no right, in any of its acts, either in this District or elsewhere, to discriminate between the domestic institutions of the slave-holding and non-slaveholding States, by favoring one, and opposing the other, on any ground whatever.

These were the elevated and strong grounds assumed in the resolutions, and he regretted that they should have been departed from in this resolution as amended. Thus regarded, he should vote for it with much reluctance. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. NILES) had removed many of the objections he had to that offered by the Senator from Kentucky, to which it would have been impossible for him to give his assent; and, even as it stood, he should vote for it only on the ground of preserving harmony and union among those whom he believed to be opposed to the Abolitionists.

The question was again taken on the first branch of Mr. CLAY's substitute, and carried—ayes 36, noes 9.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. CALHOUN on the 27th December, in relation to domestic slavery, the question being on the second branch of Mr. CLAY's substitute to the fifth resolution, which had been struck out yesterday, and reinstated on Mr. BUCHANAN's motion, as follows:

Resolved, That it would be highly inexpedient to abolish slavery in Florida, the only Territory of the United States in which it now exists, because of the serious alarm and just apprehensions which would be thereby excited in the States sustaining that domestic institution; because the people of that Territory have not asked it to be done, and, when admitted as a State into the Union, will be exclusively entitled to decide that question for themselves; and, also, because it would be in violation of a solemn compromise, made at a memorable and critical period in the history of this country,* by which, while slavery was prohibited north, it was admitted south of the line thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude; and, also, against the treaty stipulation with Spain of 22d February, 1819, which guarantees the right of property.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that, in pursuance of the pledge given by him last evening, he felt himself bound to bring forward the second branch of Mr. CLAY's amendment, which had been struck out on his motion, and to leave it as he found it. He had therefore done so, but he did not thereby mean to say that he was in favor of every part of the resolution. He had simply restored it to the place where it was, and he left it to its friends, or rather to the parents of the bantling, the Senators from Kentucky and Alabama.

* The Missouri Compromise line being confined by its terms to Louisiana, could not be applicable to Florida, and the reference to it was immediately dropped on objection.

Mr. KING proposed that so much of the resolution as made mention of the compromise act should be stricken out, and it was stricken out.

Mr. CALHOUN wished to state why he could not vote for the resolution as amended.

The main reason assigned in the resolution as it now stands, why slavery should not be abolished in Florida, was that it would be highly inexpedient. He regarded the reason as wholly fallacious, and that it would be of not the slightest force in staying the tide of abolition. We must bear in mind, that the two points towards which the Abolitionists are directing their attacks, were this District and the Territories. These they considered our weak points; and they were sanguine in the belief, and that not without reason, if they can effect their objects there, the main difficulty in their way would be surmounted. With this knowledge, our policy ought to be to strengthen and fortify those points most effectually. Now, sir, the main barrier which the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) proposes to throw around the Territories in this amendment is, that it is inexpedient to abolish slavery in Florida. Will this oppose any obstacle to the assaults of the foe? Let us see how it will operate. An abolition petition to abolish slavery in the Territories is presented to an individual in the non-slaveholding States for his signature. He is opposed to the object, and refuses to sign. He is asked his objections. He answers in the language of this amendment, that, in his opinion, it is highly inexpedient. He then is asked, Do you not consider slavery a political evil? Do you not consider it immoral? Do you not consider it sinful? He answers, Yes, for such will be the answer of nine in ten in the non-slaveholding States. Now mark the reply. He is next asked, How can you justify yourself in refusing to put down what you acknowledge to be immoral, sinful, and a great political evil, on the ground that it is inexpedient? The question is overwhelming, and the petition is signed and a convert made. To stay its progress, far higher grounds must be taken; grounds as high as those assumed by these deluded madmen, and which will show them that, while they are acting in the name of morals and religion, they are violating plighted faith, and subverting the entire fabric of our political system; and, as such, are guilty of violating the most solemn obligations, political, moral, and religious.

Mr. C. next objected, that he disliked the designation of the particular Territory of Florida. The Abolitionists ask to abolish slavery in the Territories; and we reply, that it is inexpedient to abolish it in Florida, assigning for a reason, that it was our only Territory in which slavery existed. They make a general demand, extending to all Territories that now are, or may be hereafter, created; and we meet this broad and sweeping prayer with the modest answer, that it is inexpedient to abolish it in Florida. In giving this diffident response, are we afraid of offending, or are we indisposed to commit ourselves as to Territories hereafter to be created?

He was glad that the portion of the amendment which referred to the Missouri compromise had been struck out. He was not a member of Congress when that compromise was made, but it is due to candor to state, that his impressions were in its favor; but it is equally due to it to say, that with his present experience, and knowledge of the spirit which then, for the first time, began to disclose itself, that he had entirely changed his opinion. He now believed that it was a dangerous measure, and that it has done much to rouse into action the present spirit. Had it then been met with uncompromising opposition, such as a then distinguished and sagacious member from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) now no more, opposed to it, abolition might have been crushed forever in its birth. He then thought of Mr. RANDOLPH, as, he doubts not, many think of him now, who have not fully looked into this subject, that he was too unyielding, too uncompromising, too impracticable; but he had been taught his error, and took pleasure in acknowledging it.

With these views (said Mr. C.) he could not vote for the resolution as it stood, and they were greatly strengthened, when he contrasted it with his fifth resolution, which has been struck out to insert this. That resolution declares that any attempt, by any State or States, or their citizens, or any act or measure of Congress, to abolish slavery in this District, or the Territories, on the ground that it was immoral, or sinful, or otherwise obnoxious, was a dangerous attack on the domestic institutions of all the States. Now (said Mr. C.) what have we done? what have Southern Senators done? Struck down the strong barriers which placed this District and the Territories under the same high constitutional protection with the States themselves, and which made an assault on them an assault on all the slave-holding States, and have erected in their place the most feeble of all barriers, that of mere inexpediency. Why was this done? Was it because the resolution struck out asserted any thing false in fact or principle? No one pretended to say so. No: it is time to speak out; to tell the truth; it was because there was more dread of wounding the feelings of the Abolitionists than the people of the slave-holding States. They are more intent on our destruction than we for our own safety. They mark and punish, by withholding their votes, and throwing them in the opposite scale, all who dare oppose them; while a feeling of indifference and inattention prevails on the part of the people of the slave-holding States.

Thus regarding the resolution as it stands, he was placed in a position which he did not often occupy. He could not vote for it, for the reasons he has stated; and he would not vote against it, for reasons which must be apparent to all; and he was of course constrained not to vote at all.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he was very sorry that the Senator from South Carolina could not reconcile his judgment to vote for the resolution now under consideration. He thought the declaration in the resolution, that abolition was inexpedient, was not strong enough, and that higher grounds ought to be assumed. But what higher grounds? Was any one prepared to say that the naked power of abolition did not exist? Mr. C. spoke of the naked power, and not of its exercise, but the abstract question of the existence of the power. Now, though it did not exist in relation to the States, on the mere question of abstract power, Mr. C. thought the Senator from South Carolina would not declare that it would be unconstitutional for Congress to abolish slavery in the District or Territories. The power, like many others, was not to be exercised, on high considerations, amounting in the District to the plighted faith of the Government, during the existence of a state of things which put a restriction on the exercise of the power; but when that state of things should no longer exist, the power might be exercised. So as to Florida: the power existed, but, for high considerations, was not to be exercised.

The Senator objects because Florida alone is embraced by the resolution. We have stricken out the Indians, regarding them as perfectly safe. And what other Territory but Florida is there in which slavery exists? I framed the resolution as it is, because there is no other such Territory. There are many who send petitions here that appear to be ignorant of this fact, that there is but one such Territory. I wanted them to know that there is but one.

Then the Senator thinks the tone of the resolution is not strong enough. Perhaps he would say that, as slavery is represented as a moral evil, as sinful, we ought to take the opposite ground, and maintain that slavery is not sinful, but in conformity with religion; and he thus maintain the one side, and they the other. And then, he says, the Abolitionists will present a number of questions, which he enumerated. Sir, suppose you should declare slavery accords with the Declaration of Independence, and that it is consistent with every high and holy principle, would it make any converts? Sir, I want to do nothing to aggravate this spirit at the North, and to increase the Abolitionists. I want to prevent the residue of the North from going over to join them. There lies our danger, and there, also, are we to look for safety. The Senator's resolutions are all sound; but there will nothing be gained by them of safety to the cause, or of permanency to the Union.

The Senator speaks of the compromise on the Missouri question, and refers to the course of a distinguished member from Virginia, who was present on that memorable occasion. There were two compromises: the first was that when the bill passed, authorizing the State to form a separate Government for itself, for admission into the Union. It was then that 36° 30' was fixed as the line of separation. But after the State was admitted into the Union, she introduced a clause into her constitution, by which free persons of color were not to remain within Missouri. There was the great point of difficulty which shook the Union with more alarm than any thing I have seen, from that day to this. It was that compromise for which, I understood the Senator, he would not now have voted.

[Mr. CALHOUN was understood to assent.]

No one (said Mr. CLAY) was anxious to have slavery exist north of that line, except in Missouri. With the second question came the great struggle; and I should not refer to the part taken by Mr. RANDOLPH, whose death I sincerely deplored, if it had not been referred to by the Senator. But I feel compelled to say that at the second compromise, in which nothing was sacrificed by the slave-holding States, and in which a mere matter of form was conceded to the free States, which admitted them a ground to stand on at home, the course of that distinguished member from Virginia came nearer hazarding the Union than any other event in our history. He was opposed to all compromises; and I recollect that when the second compromise was under discussion, I was in the chair, and another member from Virginia fainted under the influence of the fumes of the lamps. He was taken to a back seat, and I went to see how he was; but observing that his case was not dangerous, and that he would soon recover, on my return to the Speaker's chair I met the gentleman from Virginia, who, not having spoken with me before, said, "How do you do, sir; I wish you would go with me to Kentucky." I understood him, and that he proposed in this manner a separation of the Southern delegation, retiring from Congress, and leaving the North in possession of the Government. I replied, "Not now; but I will see you to-morrow morning." In the morning I spent an hour with him, in which he urged me to make no compromise, even provided gentlemen would grant us every thing we wanted, in return for giving the North ground to stand on. We parted, promising to be friends in future; and to the end of the session he never spoke to me again. The two words [dough (doe) faces] with which that gentleman raved and taunted our Northern friends, did more injury than any two words I have ever known. Sir, I hope no similar course will be pursued by any one at the present day, in respect to any portion of the delegation of the country. And, sir, I tell the Senator, that I think if he would deal more calmly with all parts of the Union, and say to them that the South are animated to a man on this subject, and would vindicate their rights; if he would turn to the quarter where the blaze is, and endeavor to extinguish the flame and not to aggravate it; if he would unite with us, to bring the whole country together as in one band of brethren in the same public vessel, I think the result would be more happy.

MR. CALHOUN moved to amend MR. CLAY's substitute by inserting the words "dangerous attack upon the States in which slavery exists."

MR. BUCHANAN thought the debate had now become exceedingly dull. It had almost worn itself out, and was now dragging its dull length along. He would not, however, suffer it to close without making a few observations, in consequence of what had repeatedly fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, (MR. CALHOUN,)

It had been often said, in the course of this debate, that these resolutions were intended as a platform on which we of the North, who were disposed to sustain the constitutional rights of the South, might stand, and defend ourselves against the attacks of the Abolitionists. Now, for his part, he disclaimed the idea of having any such platform erected for him. We can sustain ourselves better without it. "The blood of Douglas can protect itself." All we desire upon this question is, "hands off." We know best how to fight our own battles.

These resolutions had emanated from the South; and he most fervently hoped that they might do some good in tranquillizing and soothing the feelings of the people there, and in convincing them that they had numerous friends in the North, who would stand by them in any emergency. He protested, however, against the idea that they were passed for the benefit of the North.

Some commiseration (said MR. B.) has been expressed for our situation. It has been said that our intentions were very good, and that we would be willing to go further, if we dared to do so. Now, he protested against any such inference. He had always gone as far as his sense of right and justice dictated, and if there had not been an Abolitionist in existence, he would have gone no further. We wanted no platform on which to stand, save the constitution of our country. What fanatic had there ever been in the North so mad as to assert that we had any right to attack slavery in the States where it exists? That principle had been settled by the first Congress, and that principle, so long as he held a seat in the Senate, he should maintain to the death. These have been the motives of my conduct throughout upon these resolutions. They are a Southern, and not a Northern, measure; intended for the benefit of the South, rather than the North. In the portion of the Union from which he came, we deprecate agitation and excitement from this source.

We adopted one resolution yesterday in regard to slavery in the District of Columbia, which may have a good effect in the North. Opinions which are united there against any interference with slavery in the States, are not so unanimous in regard to this District. That resolution places the subject on its true principles, and will strike the common sense of all impartial men as just and expedient. It asserts the proposition that when Congress accepted the cession, there was an implied faith pledged to the ceding States that we should not convert that act of their kindness into an instrument of their destruction; and that whilst slavery existed in them, it should not be abolished within these ten miles square in the midst of their territories. The avowal of this distinct principle by the Senate, for which he had always contended, might be productive of beneficial effects in the Northern States.

The second part of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky had been offered by him (MR. B.) as a distinct proposition this morning. He had pledged himself yesterday to bring it forward in this shape, provided the Senate would then strike it out of the amendment, and take a separate vote on the remaining portion of it, which related exclusively to the District of Columbia. This had been done; and thus the resolution had, strangely enough, become the child of his adoption, though not of his affections. After it had been amended by striking from it the Indian territory, and modified and remodified in such a manner as to suit the views of the partnership concern between the Senators from New Hampshire and Kentucky, (Messrs. HUBBARD and CLAY,) he (MR. B.) would have cheerfully given it his support. He was, therefore, much astonished and disappointed when these two Senators, apparently without the slightest regard for their own offspring, consented to abandon it without a struggle. He greatly preferred it to the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi, (MR. WALKER,) which they had accepted, and which was now before the Senate. The truth was, that the resolution which he had offered this morning, to redeem his promise, had undergone so many modifications, and mystifications to make it conform to the views of everybody who desired any change, that no man who was acquainted with its original features could imagine how it had been transformed into the resolution now before the Senate. But so it was. We once had a Senator from New Hampshire, (MR. HILL,) who was made of sterner stuff than to have yielded up his resolution to the solicitations of gentlemen, as the present Senator from that State had done. And here, as he had alluded to that Senator without having previously intended it, he would take occasion to say of him, that he was a man of strong and determined character, and was a good lover as well as a good hater. MR. B. had never met on that floor a Senator who possessed more extensive and minute political information in regard to

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

our domestic affairs, and however much he may have been traduced, there was no man in the Senate, at the present day, who loved his country better. He well recollected the time when that Senator had formed a coalition with the Senator from Kentucky, and they had fought the battle together without yielding a single inch. It is true that but a small force was rallied under their united banner. He (Mr. R.) was almost their only follower; but they never thought of surrendering. He could have wished that the new coalition between the present Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Kentucky, had been animated by the same spirit. At the instance of many gentlemen, the resolution had been changed, rechanged, and modified, until he had become tired of the process. He had determined for himself to quit setting to every new partner that might offer. He would now consent to take the last edition of the resolution, as it had come from the hands of the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) but he would not, for one, agree to any other changes.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania were of a character that he could not permit then to pass in silence. He understood the Senator to say that he (Mr. BUCHANAN) had been actuated solely by the desire to soothe and tranquillize the feelings of the South, or, in other words, in pity of her weakness and fears. [Mr. B. shook his head.] Mr. C. said he would be glad to understand what the Senator did mean.

Was he to understand the Senator that all he said about soothing and tranquillizing the feelings of the South, originated in a belief that these resolutions were intended for that purpose by the mover? If so, he would tell him that he was grossly mistaken. She needed not this, nor any other measure, to tranquillize her. She was calm and collected, and instead of being agitated, was too indifferent. She had no fears for herself. She was full of resources, and would, he trusted, be prepared to meet the crisis, whenever forced on her by the injustice, or insults, of the other portion of the Union. No: these resolutions originated in far different motives—from a sincere desire to prevent, if possible, the shock to which the present current of events was rapidly leading, and which, if not prevented, would bring to the ground the institutions of the country. He was anxious, before it was too late, to present some common constitutional ground on which the reflecting, and patriotic, of every quarter of the Union, might rally, to arrest the approaching catastrophe, and avert what the North was at least as much interested to do as the South. A platform for that purpose (if the Senator preferred the word) was indispensable, if it be thought worth while to oppose the coming disasters.

But the Senator exclaimed, speaking in relation to the two sections of the country, hands off! The North says, hands off, to the South! The Senator, in the name of his constituents, says, hands off to me, in the name of mine, when he knows that a large portion of them are daily and hourly, in violation of the constitution, and the most solemnly plighted faith, aiming a most deadly blow, not simply at our peace and prosperity, but at our very existence as a people! When did the South ever place her hand on the North? When did she ever interfere with her peculiar institutions? When did she ever aim a blow at her peace and security? When did she ever demand more than naked, sheer justice of the Union? Never! never! And can we reverse these questions, and have the same response from the North? With what propriety or justice, then, can the Senator proclaim, hands off to us—the aggressor to the aggressed?

Mr. BUCHANAN was very sorry that the Senator from South Carolina had misunderstood his remarks. He trusted and believed that his course upon this subject, had been such as to place him above all suspicion. He could not believe that any other Senator had fallen into the same mistake. The ardor of the gentleman's feelings upon this subject must have blinded his judgment.

The commiseration which I said had been expressed by himself and others for our condition in the North, he understood directly the reverse of what my words imported, and had construed them into an expression of pity and commiseration, on my part, for the condition of the people of the South. Such an idea as that of applying the term pity to that gallant people, had never entered my mind. They are far above it. I know them too well, and respect them too highly, to have ever thought of applying to them any such term.

He did not blame the Senator from South Carolina for having introduced those resolutions. Certainly not. Had he not voted for them, one and all, except that which related to the District of Columbia, and instead of that one, he had voted for another on the same subject, which he solemnly believed would be productive of greater good? Now what he had disclaimed, and what he meant to disclaim, was that these resolutions were intended for the benefit of the friends of the Union in the North. They had not been brought forward by the North, but by the South: and hence it was fair to infer that their purpose was to satisfy and tranquillize public opinion in that portion of the Union. He had voted for them with pleasure, under this belief: and he trusted that our friends in the South would now be convinced that we were ready to stand by them in the assertion and maintenance of all their constitutional rights over their slaves.

These resolutions could not aid him at home. There the battle had been already fought, and what part he had taken in it two years ago, was well known to every man in the country who had thought his humble career worthy of any observation. He was fully convinced that the protracted discussion of the abolition question here at this time could do the friends of the Union in the North little, if any good; he wished he were convinced that it would do them no harm. This was the great centre of agitation. When it was commenced here, its baneful influence must spread over the whole Union. Deeply impressed with the belief, he had for two years, when abolition memorials were presented, uniformly voted in favor of such a disposition of them as would prevent useless and dangerous discussion upon this theatre.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that in compliance with the urgent wishes of his friends, rather than with his own judgment, he would consent to vote for the resolution as amended. It had undergone important modifications, making it out stronger than at first, but yet it was still very feeble, and not at all suited to the occasion.

On taking the question to agree to the resolution as modified, namely:

Resolved, That any attempts of Congress to abolish slavery in any Territory of the United States, in which it exists, would create serious alarm and just apprehension in the States sustaining that domestic institution; would be a violation of good faith towards the inhabitants of any such Territory who have been permitted to settle with, and hold slaves therein; because the people of any such Territory have not asked for the abolition of slavery therein; and because, when any such Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the people thereof will be entitled to decide that question exclusively for themselves:

It was determined in the affirmative—

THURSDAY, January 12.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. CALHOUN on the 27th of December, in relation to Domestic Slavery, the sixth resolution being under consideration.

Mr. CALHOUN said that frequent attacks had been made on the resolution under consideration, in advance, which he did not think were altogether fair. The Senate had determined to consider each resolution by itself. We had now arrived at the sixth, and one of the most important in the whole series. He had reviewed it with care, and believed it was critically true and correct in all its parts; and now stood prepared to meet and repel, he trusted successfully, all attacks that might be made on it.

Its first and fundamental position is, that the Union rests on an equality among the several States that compose it. To support so obvious a truth, he did not deem it necessary to cite various parts of the constitution, which expressly recognize it; nor to refer to the journals of the convention that formed the constitution, nor the debates of the conventions of the States by which it was adopted; all of which would prove that it was constantly acted on as the principle on which the Union rested, and that, as such, it was watched throughout with the greatest care and jealousy.

The next position assumed was, that whatever destroyed this equality, tended to destroy the Union itself. One so manifestly and irresistibly true, if the first be conceded, as not to admit of dispute.

The next declares that it is the solemn duty of all, but especially of this body, which represented the States in their corporate capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate between the States, in the action of this Government, so as to give one an advantage over another, which is no less clear.

The next asserts, that to refuse to extend to the Southern and Western States any advantage fairly due them, and which might tend to strengthen them, or render them more secure, by extending their limits and population by the annexation of additional territories or new States, on the ground that their domestic institutions were sinful, immoral, or otherwise obnoxious, would be contrary to that equality intended to be secured by the constitution alike to all the members of the Union. It claims nothing for the Southern and Western States on account of their domestic institutions. It simply asserts, that to withhold advantages on their account, to which they would otherwise be fairly entitled, would be contrary to the equality to which, as members of the Union, they are entitled. It does not affirm that new territory or States (Texas in a word) should be annexed. That is left an open question, to be decided whenever it may be presented, on its general merits, in reference to the whole, as well as the adjacent section, and not on the ground of the peculiar character of the domestic institutions of the States of that section, on which the Vermont resolutions and the hundreds of petitions which have been presented, place it.

Thus regarded, he would ask if there was any one who would venture to controvert this position?

It is next and finally asserted in the resolution, that to withhold from the Southern and Western States the equality of advantages to which they are entitled, would be, in effect, to disfranchise them, and to subject them to all the burdens of the Government, without its advantages—a proposition too clear to admit of argument or illustration. He had now stated clearly and distinctly every position taken in the resolution, and he called on the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) and others who had attacked it in advance, to bring forward their objections now, when the resolution is before us, and when their assaults can be fairly met. All he asked was, that their objections should be specific—no generalities; no abstractions.

Mr. PRESTON moved to lay the resolution on the table, on the ground that this branch of the subject would be more appropriately discussed in connection with the resolutions introduced by him for the annexation of Texas, and because it would be more advantageous to the interests of the South to take the question involved on the Texas resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN would assure his colleague that he had not the slightest intention to interfere with his resolution in reference to Texas;* nor did he think there could, by possibility, be any interference. They related to different objects. His was introduced, as antagonist to the Vermont resolutions, and the various petitions against the domestic institutions of the South. Among other objections, they took position against the annexation of Texas to the Union, on the ground that our peculiar institutions were sinful and immoral. In drawing up these resolutions, he felt himself compelled to cover the whole ground assumed against us, and could not by possibility omit so prominent a one as the objection to the annexation of Texas, without a manifest surrender of one of our most important points to the Abolitionists.

The resolution of his colleague was, on the contrary, a direct question of annexation, which opened the whole ground, in the broadest view of policy and the constitution. The only effect of the adoption of his resolution would be to raise one of these questions, and that not the least embarrassing, and as such could have no possible injurious effect on the resolution offered by his colleague. But he understood his colleague to say, that a decision on his (Mr. C.'s) resolution could be had under his, which was broader, and that it would be more easy to get a favorable decision on the whole question than on the isolated point which his presented.

Mr. C. said he could not but believe that his colleague was mistaken. Even an affirmative decision would not cover the broad and general principle of equality, and would discriminate between the institutions of the States of the Union, which his resolution asserted, and which he believed to be all-important to the slaveholding States to be recognized. Nothing more could be inferred from such a decision than that, under all the circumstances of the case, it was expedient to annex Texas, without a distinct recognition of any one principle on which it might be admitted. But he could not think, with his colleague, that it would be more easy to annex Texas than to pass the resolution under consideration. It presented but a single point, and that so unquestionable as to command the assent of all who did not deny so fundamental a principle of our Union as the political equality of the members who composed it; while his colleague's presented, and would have to encounter, all the possible objections which could be urged against the annexation, constitutionally; and all objections as to time, as to mode, as to its effects on our relations with Mexico, as to its disturbing the equilibrium of the Union, as to the hazard of extending its present limits, as to its constitutionality, and many others besides the one presented in his resolutions.

His colleague had objected to acting on this resolution, on the ground that it would bring up the whole Texan question. He must think that he was mistaken in his suppositions. The debate heretofore has been strictly confined to the questions involved in the resolutions, and he saw no reason to believe that there would be a departure on the present occasion. Its decision involved none of the regular and fair objections that might be urged against its admission. To involve them in the discussion, would be unfair, and would be a tacit confession, on the part of those who should force such topics into the discussion, that his resolution was true, and could not be fairly met. He could not believe the able members, who he expected would be opposed to the resolution, would take a course so unworthy of them. If they believe the resolution to be true, he expected them to say so, and to vote for it; but if not, to say so, and to assign their reasons boldly and directly, and not to kill it by arguments foreign to the question.

In conclusion, he expressed his regret that his colleague should think proper to make the motion he did, and would assure him that, whatever might be their difference of opinion on the great political questions of the day, he would, on all occasions, abstain from making any motion to embarrass any measure which he might think proper to introduce.

After some further remarks from Mr. PRESTON, the question was taken on his motion to lay the resolution on the table, and it was adopted—

Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—35.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, January 15.

Neutral Relations.

The bill to amend the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, was taken up.

* Mr. Calhoun's resolutions were introduced on the 27th December, and Mr. Preston's on the 4th January, on a previous notice, given early in the session.

MR. BUCHANAN said: The Committee on Foreign Relations have carefully examined the act of the 20th April, 1818, which embodied all the former laws on the subject of our neutral relations, and have found that it is well adapted to enforce the observance of our duties towards belligerent nations. They, therefore, do not propose to make any material change in its provisions. Under that law, the citizens of the United States are not prohibited from carrying on any trade sanctioned by the laws of nations; nor is it the purpose of this bill to abridge or interfere with any such lawful trade. The citizens of the United States have an unquestionable right to sell arms and munitions of war to the citizens or subjects of belligerent powers who come here to purchase them, without any violation of our neutral obligations. After this purchase has been made, the buyer must get these articles to the place of their destination as well as he can. If they are captured beyond the jurisdiction of this country, by the forces of his enemy, he sustains the loss; but that enemy has no right to ask our Government to prevent such sales. Again: any citizen of the United States may carry arms and munitions of war for sale to one belligerent nation without violating the neutrality of his country towards the other. Such a trade is not prohibited by the law of nations. It is true that such articles, if captured by the enemy on their passage, will be forfeited as contraband of war; but this is the only penalty imposed on such a trade by the law of nations. It is a question in which the Government of the neutral country has no concern. Our policy has ever been to promote the greatest freedom of commerce consistent with our neutral obligations. As regards our trade by sea with all foreign nations in arms and munitions of war, this bill makes no change.

We have three neighbors on our frontiers, Canada, Texas, and Mexico; and the duties of good neighborhood required something more from us in relation to them than could be strictly demanded under the law of nations. In Europe, reciprocal treaties between conterminous nations generally regulate this matter. In order to preserve peace along the frontiers, it is absolutely necessary that such regulations should exist. It is against all reason and justice, that in case of a sudden commotion in a neighboring country along our frontiers, the citizens of the United States should be permitted to take part with the insurgents, by furnishing them with vessels, arms, and munitions of war, for the express purpose of aiding and assisting in such hostilities. If this be tolerated, then it is in the power of the people along the borders of our country to force the whole nation into a war, whenever any number of dissatisfied individuals rise against the established Government of a neighboring State. It is our duty to prevent our citizens from aiding in every revolutionary movement against a neighboring Government. To prevent and to remedy such evils, is the sole object of the present bill. This bill inflicts no penalties whatever: it is a measure of prevention, not of punishment. The first section provides for the seizure of any vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, and of the arms and munitions of war which may be found therein, which is about to pass our frontier, when the circumstances of the case shall render it probable that she is destined to be employed in carrying on hostilities against the citizens, subjects, or property of a conterminous friendly State or Territory, or in giving aid or comfort to the persons carrying on such hostilities, by conveying to their assistance men, arms, or munitions of war. The vessel and the arms thus seized are to be restored to the owner, as soon as he gives security that they shall not be employed in violating the provisions of the bill. In case he shall not give such security, they will be detained until the President orders them to be restored. It will strike every Senator at once, that such a provision is necessary to preserve the tranquillity of the country along the lakes and rivers which are the boundaries of our territory.

The second section makes a similar provision for the seizure and detention of arms and munitions of war belonging to a citizen of the United States, when the circumstances of the case render it probable that they are about to be carried across the frontier for the same hostile purposes.

Such provisions are not new to our law. The 10th and 11th sections of the act of April, 1818, afford a precedent for the first two sections of this bill. The owner of any vessel described in those sections, before it is permitted to leave the United States, is obliged to give security that it shall not be employed in carrying on hostilities against a friendly power.

Mr. B. said he had seen a letter from Col. McNabb, commanding a portion of her Britannic Majesty's forces in Canada, in which he not only avows that the outrage on the steamboat Caroline was committed by his orders, but he glories in the deed. He fancies that a captain in the royal navy has acquired fresh laurels by becoming his agent in conducting this cowardly attack upon our unarmed and unsuspecting citizens. If any thing were wanting to aggravate the enormity of this wanton outrage upon our territory and jurisdiction, it would be found in its open avowal of justification by a British officer, high in command. The British Government would have had an equal right to send one of their ships of war into the harbor of Boston or New York, to capture any American vessel at anchor there, which they suspected of hostile intentions against their country. The sovereignty and jurisdiction of the United States over our own territory has been grossly violated; and if any thing could prevent him from doing his duty in regard to this bill, it would be the indignant feelings which had been excited in his bosom by a perusal of this letter of Col.

McNabb. But the wrong which we have suffered ought not to prevent us from doing justice. We were bound to perform our duties towards all nations; and we were imperatively bound to demand of the British Government to hold Colonel McNabb to a strict account for his conduct.

He would now conclude, by offering three sections as a substitute for the first three sections of the bill. The purpose was to render the bill more specific.

Mr. RUGGLES hoped the Senator from Pennsylvania would not press the consideration of his amendment at the present time. He was not now prepared to say what effect the provisions of the bill would have upon the condition of things on our North-eastern border. It is doubtless in the recollection of the committee, that a large portion of the territory of Maine is now, and has been for a number of years, in the possession of Great Britain. If troops or arms should be transported into that part of the territory of Maine by the Government of that State, for the purpose of taking possession of and defending it, would it be a violation of the provisions of the bill, and justify the President in ordering their apprehension and seizure? If this Government does not protect her jurisdictional rights, he trusted she would be left at liberty to defend her own soil. He said it was understood that despatches had been recently received from the British Government, or are soon expected. They might perhaps contain something from that Government relating to the subject of the boundary. If satisfactory, very well. If the matter is left where it has been for the last eight or ten years, it will be time to consider whether our relations with that Government require the passage of this bill, or what modifications it ought to receive.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: The amendment he had proposed to this bill did not vary its several principles in any respect; but it confined their operation, in express terms, to the foreign States and colonies continuous with the United States. The committee thought that the bill required this amendment; otherwise it might possibly interfere with the general law which regulated our trade with foreign nations. If the Senator (Mr. RUGGLES) had any amendment to offer in reference to Maine, it would be as well to consider it now as at any other time. The committee had charged him with the duty of bringing forward this bill at the earliest period, and it was his fault, perhaps, that it had been delayed till the abolition question was determined.

Mr. RUGGLES did not wish to be understood by that Senator, nor by the Senate, as having any disposition to throw unreasonable embarrassments in the way of the progress of the bill. He alluded to the information we have received this morning, that the gross and flagrant outrage on the Niagara frontier, (he referred to the attack upon, and destruction of the Caroline,) was avowed by the commanding officer in that vicinity, as having been committed by his direction.

Mr. BUCHANAN considered that it would be very unfortunate if the question of the Maine boundary should be mixed up with the matters contained in this bill. At present, he understood from high authority, that an answer was daily expected at the Department of State, from the British Government, to the last proposition made by this Government. The negotiation was about to close; and, at this moment, to take the question out of the hands of the Executive, would, in his opinion, be exceedingly ill-timed.

The amendment did no more than to define, with greater precision, the objects to which the bill was intended to apply.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill made the order of the day for to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 16.

Mississippi Election.

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to seats in this House.

Mr. WISE moved the preliminary motion that the gentlemen referred to have leave to appear within the bar of the House.

Mr. BELL referred to the case of Arnold of Tennessee, and proposed to amend the resolution so as to make it conform to the precedent established in that case, as follows:

Resolved, That S. S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word have leave to occupy seats within the bar of this House pending the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections upon their application; and that they have leave to speak to the merits of their application, and the report of the committee thereon.

Mr. WISE accepted the modification, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then directed the officers of the House to provide seats for Messrs. Prentiss and Word, and informed them that they were at liberty to address the House in relation to their application.

Mr. HOWARD renewed his application to present a paper prepared by Mr. CLAIBORNE, one of the sitting members, who was confined to his bed from illness, which was read as follows:

[EXTRACT.]

Mr. Claiborne's Argument.

A severe illness, which confines me to my room, will prevent my taking part, personally, in the discussion of the questions in which I am interested, growing out of the recent elections in the State of Mississippi. I feel it to be proper and necessary, therefore, to communicate, in writing, those views which, were I able, I should, at a fitting time, express on the floor of the House of Representatives. This course seems to be the more requisite, inasmuch as my colleague, who has a joint interest with me in the subject, is also confined to his room by indisposition.

I am fully aware of the kindness and ability of the friends who, in my absence, will maintain my rights; and perhaps I may only weaken the effect of their exertions in my behalf, by what I may now say. I believe, too, that no unfair advantage of my absence would be taken by any one member of the House. But it is right that the views entertained by me should be expressed, in justice to myself, so that, whatever may be the result, there may remain some evidence that I supported, to the best of my ability, what I conceive to be the cause of those whose votes entitled me to a seat upon the floor; and that there may be no ground for saying hereafter, that, from overweening confidence, or carelessness, or doubt, I did not avail myself of the best opportunity of doing so that circumstances afforded. I am fully persuaded, too, that the gentlemen who claim the seats of my colleague and myself, would themselves prefer that we should adopt this mode of presenting our views to the House; so that their success, were they to succeed even, might not, in any degree, be attributable to our absence or our silence.

At the special session in September last, the House, after full investigation, decided that my colleague and myself were entitled to our seats for the entire term of the 25th Congress. The question then settled was one of law, arising out of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Mississippi. The only facts involved were the proclamation of the Governor of that State, and the consequent election, by a majority of votes, of my colleague and myself; facts which no one then or since has pretended to deny, and the evidence of which was before the Committee of Elections, and afterwards before the House. Although we were the only persons claiming seats as members elect from Mississippi, the decision made in our case cannot be termed an ex parte one. An ex parte decision is one in which the facts on one side only are exhibited; or, all the facts being exhibited, the argument on one side only is heard. In the case of my colleague and myself, our right to qualify was denied and put in issue, when we presented ourselves for that purpose, before the House was organized. The affirmative and negative of the proposition were distinctly made out, and their respective supporters in the House were arrayed against each other. My colleague and myself were, in fact, placed, by the course that was pursued, upon the defensive; and in the prolonged debate to which the subject gave rise, the talent, industry, perseverance, and warmth manifested on both sides, left nothing unsaid which, by way of argument or illustration, could be brought to bear upon the questions involved in the discussion. Neither for want of facts nor of argument, therefore, can the decision of the House, in September last, in the matter of the Mississippi election, be called an ex parte one; but it must be considered as a grave and solemn adjudication deliberately made by the competent and only authority.

The question that now presents itself is, Shall the decision thus made, be reviewed, to the end that it may be reversed; because, differing in opinion from a majority of the House of Representatives, the Governor of Mississippi, pursuing the literal tenor of a law of that State, has ordered a new election to fill a supposed vacancy in its representation, after the House of Representatives, the only constitutional judge in the matter, had determined that no such vacancy existed? Had the new election not been ordered, or had the present claimants not appeared, it is not for a moment to be supposed that the House of Representatives, of its own motion, would have reversed its decision in favor of my colleague and myself, at this or at any other time. Is there any thing in the facts which requires it to do so now? Has any new fact necessary to a correct decision been brought to light, which was not before the Committee of Elections and the House in September last?

I have heard it suggested that, in September, the credentials of my colleague and myself were not before the committee. Now, it is well known that the credentials of a member elect are rarely, if ever, demanded, when he presents himself to qualify; and that, perhaps, not one-half of the members have their credentials in their possession. All that is necessary is satisfactory evidence of the election of the individual. The law points out no particular mode in which this is to be given. The House, which, by the constitution, is "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members," is the judge, necessarily, of the evidence of their election, or, in other words, their credentials; and cases have occurred in which the House, not satisfied with the evidence of election presented, has taken testimony to show that the party presenting it has received illegal votes; and therefore, although holding the ordinary credentials, was not entitled to his seat. The credentials of the ordinary form are, therefore, of themselves, of no binding authority; and if the exhibition of them would not estop an examination into our title to our seats, the want of them, if the House were satisfied of our election by other means, could not defeat our title: this is evident. The evidence of our right to our seats, presented in September last, was a statement from the Secretary of State of Mississippi, under the great seal of office, of the votes cast in the then recent (July) election. The ordinary certificate of election, or credentials, were forwarded to my colleague, but never received by him. Those sent to me were received; but, perceiving that they contained the limitation of the term of service mentioned in the Governor's writ to hold the election, we applied for, and obtained, the statement from the Secretary of State to be used in their stead. All this was distinctly stated by us to the Committee of Elections in September last. Now the only matter which appeared in the credentials, besides the election of my colleague and myself, was, that we were elected for the special session only. This is all that is pretended. Had this appeared in the credentials only—had we, by not presenting the credentials, withheld the only evidence of this matter, there would be some ground for the suggestion now made, that the credentials, not having been before the committee or the House, all the facts were not presented; and that the case, at this time, should be reopened to let in a new fact. But is this so? Why, what was the question that so long occupied the attention of the House in September? Did it not grow out of the very fact, now pretended to be a new one, that the Governor's writ was for an election for the special session only? Was not the only question before the House, the question whether we were elected for the special session, or for the whole term of the Congress? And is it not strange that it should be contended now, that the House was without evidence of the fact, the existence of which—the uncontroverted truth of which—was the sole cause of all the protracted and excited debate to which the Mississippi election of July gave rise? The fact that we received a majority of the votes then cast, was undeniable. The fact that those votes were given at an election held under a writ ordering one for a less period than the entire Congress, was also undeniable; and out of this fact grew the only discussion that took place.

Vermont Anti-Slavery Resolutions.

It has also been suggested that the official proclamation of the Secretary of State of Mississippi, summing up the whole number of votes given, was not presented by my colleague or myself to the committee in September last. Such proclamation was never given to us; but if it had been, and we had presented it, it would have only amounted to proof, in a different form, of that of which other proof had already satisfied the committee, and which was not then, nor has it since been, denied—our election by a majority of the votes cast under a writ ordering an election for a less period than the whole term of the Twenty-fifth Congress.

I have thus shown that there were no facts existing at the time the House decided the rights of my colleague and myself to our seats, which were not then known to the House; and that the matter now suggested as new, so far from being so, is the very matter that gave rise to the discussions of September. The fact is independent of the form in which it is presented: and, whether the House was informed that the election at which we were chosen representatives was held for a shorter term than the whole Congress, by the production of the Governor's writ, the proclamation of the Secretary of State, the exhibition of credentials in the ordinary form, or universal admission of the fact, is immaterial, if the House was in the possession of the fact when it came to its decision.

JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE.

January 15, 1838.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 16.

Vermont Anti-Slavery Resolutions.

Mr. SWIFT said he had given notice of his intention at a future day to present the report and resolutions of the State of Vermont, which had been offered on a former occasion, but withdrawn. His intention was not to bring them before the Senate until the discussion on the resolutions introduced by the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) had been finished. As that discussion was presumed to be terminated, he would now introduce them. He would offer no other apology for presenting them now, than the duty he owed to his State. The resolutions spoke for themselves; nor did Vermont require him to vindicate them on that floor. He expressed his regret, however, that they should have been so harshly assailed as they had been. Not only the sentiments contained in them, but the motives of those who adopted them, had been subjects of unjust censure and reproach. What principles were asserted that should call forth the invectives that had fallen from gentlemen on the opposite side of the House? It was contended that Congress had the power, and it was respectfully asked to exercise that power, in abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, over which it was presumed to have exclusive control. Could any just exception be taken to that? Nothing has been hinted by the Legislature of Vermont, that Congress ought to interfere with slavery in the States. Such an opinion was nowhere breathed in the document before them. One of the resolutions in question had not passed the Legislature, but received the sanction of the popular branch only, that might have asserted doctrines offensive to the South. It was not Vermont only that was opposed to the extension of slavery, but it was the general feeling throughout the Northern States. The annexation of Texas, which was looked to by the South to give it preponderance over the North, was presumed by many to involve principles of high national importance.

Mr. PRESTON presumed the document would not have been presented, unless under authority of command, in obedience to higher powers, where the servant could exercise no discretion. Coming from a sovereign State, we were, he presumed, bound to treat it with respect and deference. Vermont certainly had the right to come here, and her memorials were entitled to reception and consideration. But the question was whether we were to respect that Government more than this Government. Respect was certainly mutual and co-relative. He was disposed to speak with great forbearance on the subject. Here was a report wantonly presented, characterized by language which, if used by any individual or Senator of this body, would be rejected with disdain. In it the South is charged with immorality and irreligion; and when, with becoming dignity, we repel the charge, we are "uncourteous" and "offensive" in our language. Yes, at the very moment of presenting to this body a document, in language so justly characterized by the Senator from Alabama as false, scandalous, and libellous—at the very moment of presenting a document deliberately concocted by order of the Vermont Legislature, the member presenting it complains of the indignant retort of those whose feelings are outraged and insulted by it. While we are stigmatized as debauched, sensual, immoral, sinful, God-offending creatures, and when we speak of fanatics and incendiaries, we are rebuked and chidden. Was this fair? was it proper? So long and so tamely had the South borne all this, that when a proper reply was made, she was greeted as the assailant; and if she bore it much longer, Mr. P. would agree that she was all she had been represented.

Mr. PRENTISS was not prepared to say there was quite as much fervor in the Legislature of Vermont as was expressed in the resolutions. As far as he was concerned, he had been careful to make no improper or exciting remarks; he had not only a high respect for the people of the South; but respect their feelings in relation to these questions. Mr. P., however, did not like to hear the people of Vermont branded as fanatics and incendiaries, because they chose to assert the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, as a States rights man, in the strongest sense, he believed that the State of Vermont had a right to come there and be heard. Upon the best reflection he could give to the subject, he could not vote for rejecting the resolutions, and, on the other hand, he considered the language to be so exceptionable that he could not vote for receiving them. It was owing to, and foreseeing this difficulty, that he had introduced the series of resolutions, on the same subject, which had been so recently discussed and disposed of, and though he made no complaint, he profoundly regretted that he had been disappointed in getting a direct vote on one important principle involved. Situated as he was, as a representative of the South, which was so vilely calumniated in these resolutions, he could not vote for receiving them.

Mr. ROANE observed that these resolutions came here with instructions to the Senators from Vermont to use their influence to carry out the objects for which they were passed. They were equally bound, he continued, to press them forward and get them acted on in that body. He entertained no doubt that there were assertions contained in these resolutions that he, as an individual Senator, could not allow to be true. On the other hand, as they came from a sovereign State, he could not say that he would not receive them. He intended, therefore, to stand neuter; and when these resolutions should be received, as no doubt they would be by the votes of the members from the non-slaveholding States, and referred, he trusted that they would be referred to a committee from those States. From the report of a committee so constituted, at least one advantage would be gained: we shall understand their true position in regard to this matter.

Mr. STRANGE renewed his motion to lay the question of the reception of the resolutions on the table—yeas 12, nays 26.

The CHAIR then said that the resolutions were before the Senate.

Mr. SWIFT moved that they be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, said that if the question was taken on printing, he hoped that it would be divided, and taken on printing the resolutions and accompanying report separately. He wished to know distinctly whether the Senate would lend its aid to the publication of such a document as the latter.

Mr. SWIFT then varied his motion, so as to lay all the papers on the table, which was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 17.

Mississippi Election.

The House resumed the consideration of the Mississippi election case, the questions pending being as follows:

Mr. BRONSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress, and are not entitled to their seats in the House as such.

The question pending being on the motion of Mr. BELL, who on yesterday moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting as follows:

"That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, was agreed to without a knowledge of all the facts which were material to a correct decision of the question presented, and the same is hereby rescinded."

Resolved further, That Messrs. Prentiss and Word were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, from the State of Mississippi, in November last, and are entitled to take their seats as such.

Mr. PRENTISS addressed the House at length against the sitting members; and, without concluding, gave way to Mr. CHAMBERS.

And especially to inform the House whether said capture was authorized, commanded, or sanctioned, or has been avowed by the British authorities or officers, or any of them. Mr. McKEAN presented the memorial of 4,757 women of Philadelphia, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, the Territories of the United States, and to suppress the slave-trade between the different States, also a memorial of ninety-eight women of Chester county, Pennsylvania, of similar import. Also a memorial from Robert McAlister and others, praying Congress to abolish slavery immediately in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. STRANGE, the question as to the reception of the above petitions was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Seminole Indians.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reported a bill, making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and sent to the Clerk's table, to be read, a letter from the Secretary of War, and another from the acting Quartermaster General, setting forth the absolute necessity for an immediate appropriation.

Mr. C. then explained that he had been unanimously instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report this bill of one million of dollars, the amount required for the year being $2,480,000. When that bill should come up, there would, undoubtedly, be a general debate; but in order that the operations of the War Department might not be stopped, and that the necessary payments might be made, the committee had directed him to report this bill, and ask the House, when it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to go at once into committee upon it.

Mr. DOWNING expressed his hope that the motion of the gentleman from New York would prevail, for it was indispensable that this bill should be passed without delay. Two thousand of the Florida militia have been disbanded without having been paid. If this course is followed up, and moneys are not appropriated, the result will be that the people in that section of country will lose confidence in the Government, and it will not be in its power hereafter to enlist men into the service. It was his opinion that this war would be brought to a speedy termination, if the means were put in the hands of the Government for carrying it on; and gentlemen need not be apprehensive of its prolongation.

The bill having been committed—the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, and proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. WISE inquired if this bill did not also contain appropriations for other branches of the Indian service.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said this bill was for appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities generally.

Mr. WISE said this bill was precisely of the character which he expected, before the House went into committee. Instead of its being a mere partial appropriation bill for the immediate exigencies of the service in Florida, it was a general appropriation bill for the expenditures in the Indian service. It was in this way that appropriations were extracted from this House, like teeth, without the proper investigation and inquiry. The officers of Government waited until appropriations were immediately wanted, and then they called upon the House to pass them, without investigation, without inquiry, and without discussion. In this manner that nine-tenths, if not all of the eight, nine, or ten millions of dollars which had been appropriated for this fatal, disastrous, disgraceful Seminole campaign, had been obtained. We have been told by the delegate from Florida that the troops had been discharged without being paid; and the chairman of the committee tells us this money is wanting, without examination and without debate. Was this the way appropriations were to be made? Would any corporation or company take thirty millions of dollars to pay the expenditures of this disgraceful Indian war. He, for one, would take the responsibility of saying, and acting out what he said, that he would not appropriate another dollar for this purpose, until he had some information as to the manner in which former appropriations had been expended, and until he had correct data as to the sum now needed. He wished to know how much had been expended for steamboats which had performed no service to the Government, and the amounts paid to heartless contractors, who rendered no equivalent for the money paid them. He wished information, too, in relation to the perfidy which had been practised by the officers of the army towards these Indians, with all other necessary information, before he was prepared to vote for any other and further appropriations; as he believed the greatest outrages had been committed upon them, which was the only reason of the war being kept up.

MR. DOWNING said it was with the deepest regret that he had listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia.

The gentleman had charged that the war was iniquitous in its inception, base and infamous in its uses, and would be ridiculous in its conclusion. But he would tell that gentleman, and he defied contradiction, that the war was based on a solemn treaty with the Indians, made deliberately, and with their full consent. Hitherto, there had not been the slightest charge against its validity; not even a whisper had been breathed about unfairness or fraud. The treaty had been executed on the part of Government, not in a hurried manner, but in a calm and deliberate way; the chiefs on the part of the Indians having had ample time to reflect and consider the proposition. But it was with the Seminoles as it was with the Cherokees; who, after having received our money beforehand for their lands, when the time arrived for their evacuation, they then set up the cry of fraud, of unfairness, and of the treaty having been made without their consent, etc.

The gentleman had called it an unfortunate war. So it was. The war had been prolonged beyond the calculation of any human being. Its prolongation had been caused by the gentleman, and the friends of the gentleman who now opposed the appropriation. It was well known, and he challenged proof to the contrary, that every officer engaged in the war had acted his part zealously and effectively; but the evil was, that they had to check their efforts, because they were compelled to bend to that sympathy manifested so generally for the "red man" in the North and other portions of the Union, where the true state of things was not known. The only reason that the war was not ended long ago, was, that the troops had been compelled by that sympathy to hold out the white flag to the "poor devils," to give them time to make peace, when they were entirely in our power. Had the people of Florida been permitted to adopt their own measures, and if the rope and the gallows had been used, as they would in the case of white men committing such enormities, the affair would have been settled long before this.

But, notwithstanding the atrocious conduct of these villanous objects of sympathy—notwithstanding they had murdered our citizens, destroyed our property and besieged our towns—notwithstanding all this, yet the gentleman refused to grant an appropriation for the purpose of protecting our citizens from a recurrence of such outrages. The white men of the South might be butchered by hundreds, and the act looked upon with indifference; but when colored skins were concerned, then it was that an outcry was raised. It was for the Indian and the negro for whom public sympathy boiled and bubbled over.

The gentleman had intimated that the people of Florida were "fattening upon the appropriations." He would ask that gentleman to cast his eyes upon their desolated cities, their wasted and impoverished country. Their horses, their wagons, their provisions and sustenance were gone, and the whole of their property had been destroyed and taken by the enemy. Had the gentleman been able to show but one instance where the public money had fell to the share of the people of Florida, and been improperly used; could he adduce one instance of fraud on their part? It was true that charges had been made in the House, through the medium of anonymous letters, about $10 being paid for wagons, when the same could be had for $5, etc.; and it had also been alleged that a certain quartermaster had taken a receipt for more than an article had cost, for the purpose of pocketing the money. But were they thus to be influenced by charges through such sources? If gentlemen knew of any such cases where fraud had been practised, it was their duty to make complaint to the proper department.

MR. D. then alluded to the treachery of the Seminoles, and said he was ready to prove, that although here they pretended to desire peace, yet when they returned to their tribes, they breathed nothing but war. He adverted to the conduct of the two chiefs, Jumper and Alligator, in instigating the enemy to hold out to the end of spring, as Congress would make no appropriation, etc.

It has been charged by the gentleman from Kentucky, (MR. UNDERWOOD,) that there were more troops in Florida than the whole number of Seminoles, including squaws and children. For his part, he did not profess to know the exact number of the enemy, but if from the obstacles presented it was found that ten thousand troops were not sufficient why it was their duty to send twenty thousand.

MR. D. then alluded to the peculiarity of the Florida war, and the impossibility of meeting the Indians in a body, so as to attack them with any chance of success. They are scattered over the country, east, west, north, and south; they are here and there, and yet nowhere. He appealed to the gentleman, if, for the sake of a few paltry dollars, they would sacrifice the lives of our troops, when fighting with a white enemy, by sending out only a certain number. When the war commenced, it was thought that an appropriation of five millions would be sufficient. He thought so too. But because, from a combination of unlooked-for events, a greater amount was required, gentlemen complained that the war was unjust, and demanded an investigation.

Mr. CULLEY defended the policy of the Government; which, he insisted, was humane and benevolent. The sympathy evinced for the tawny red men, he described to be of the same character as the hobby professed for the race a little darker, in the North. When he found his country at war, he was not for staying to inquire into its origin, or to investigate little, petty, miserable details about it, but to take such measures as would be most likely to bring it to a favorable termination. Whether the Government had pursued the best course or not, whether there had been a prodigal expenditure, he feared there had, he could not say; but he was for continuing the war with vigor, on the old New England plan, where the Indians had been wholly exterminated; for it was false policy and false philanthropy to carry on a feeble war.

Mr. EVERETT expressed his regret that any debate should have arisen on this subject at this time; the more so, because he had reason to believe that the House and the country would be perfectly satisfied with the response of the Secretary of War to Mr. E.'s resolution on the topics adverted to in this discussion. This was in relation to the capture of Osceola. Another subject upon which he wished to make a remark or two, was a more painful one, viz: in reference to the capture of Sam Jones and his companions. He had every reason to know that these men came in under the most sacred pledges, and that it was with the greatest difficulty the Cherokee delegation could induce them to come in. And when they did, what was Gen. Jesup's first proposition? Why, as preliminary to any negotiation, that those people should bring in their wives and children; and what was Sam Jones's answer? Why, that he never heard of such a preliminary to a treaty as that of surrendering the children and arms, and that he could not assent to it.

Mr. E. avowed himself unwilling to carry on this war any longer, though he was not for yielding. He wished a pacificatory course to be tried. He would arm the Executive with authority and appropriations to enable him to terminate it pacifically.

Mr. HAYNES said he had risen solely for the purpose of bringing back the committee to the question before it. Some weeks ago the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill to cover the whole sum necessary for the current year. Since that bill was reported, the committee had been called upon or notified by the War Department, that drafts were lying over for services already performed, and supplies already furnished, and there was no money to meet them. Upon this representation the Committee of Ways and Means had come to the House and asked a suspension of its rules, for the purpose of considering the propriety of making a partial appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities. Now, neither the committee, nor, as Mr. H. believed, had any other friend of the Administration, who proposed to support this bill, designed taking the House by surprise. The very document read at the Clerk's table gave to the House the information that this partial appropriation was asked for under extraordinary circumstances; and it was equally well known that the bill covering the whole sum estimated for the service by the Secretary of War then remained untouched, for as general, liberal, violent discussion as gentlemen pleased. Why, then, should so many irrelevant topics be brought in now?

Mr. WISE moved to amend by striking out "one million," and inserting "five hundred thousand dollars."

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24.

Seminole War.

The House went into committee, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. WISE to reduce the appropriation from $1,000,000 to $500,000.

[The bill was further debated by Messrs. Cambreleng, Waddy Thompson, Biddle, Wise, Underwood, Patton, Glascock, Bynum, and Pope.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 26.

Distribution of Books.

Mr. RARIDEN asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to furnish such members of the present House of Representatives as have not received the same under former orders, with the following books, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of this House, being such as have been supplied to members of the last and preceding Congress, viz:

The Diplomatic Correspondence, The Documentary History of the Revolution, The Land Laws, American State Papers, Register of Debates, Contested Elections, and Commercial Regulations, Elliott's Debates, and Elliott's Diplomatic Code—

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the reprinting of either of the above works.

Mr. HAYNES thought that some of these books had never been furnished to old members.

Mr. McKAY would be glad to know from the gentleman who offered this resolution, if there was not a proviso attached to the bill making appropriations for the contingent expenses, expressly prohibiting any portion of the expenditure to be made therefrom, except for the ordinary purposes of the House. In reference to the merits of the resolution, he said it was a practice which, if not put a stop to, would form an indefinite claim upon the Treasury, for there would always be new members, and they would claim copies of all the books ever given to members of old Congresses. He was not prepared to say what expense this resolution involved, but he supposed somewhere about forty or fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. TILLINGHAST contended that, if the resolution embraced the same books heretofore ordered, it was not material whether the books had been received or not. It was but right and fair that the new members should be placed on the same footing as the old. If it was proper for the nation to furnish books to its legislators, it was only right that all should be furnished equally; and if there was any difference, it should be in favor of the new members, who might be supposed to be more in want of them than the old.

Mr. BRONSON, in reply to Mr. McKAY, remarked that the contingent appropriation bill had not been passed, and therefore they were not tied up by the proviso alluded to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG apprehended his colleague was mistaken if he thought the proviso would not be passed by the House, unless the present Congress differed very essentially in opinion from the two former Congresses. It had been invariably introduced into each bill for the last four years, and was designed to correct what Mr. C. considered a growing abuse, of paying matters entirely foreign to it out of the contingent fund. Whether the books were purchased or not, he did hope that appropriations of this character would not be charged upon the contingent fund of this House, by which it had been enormously increasing, from year to year, by the action of the House itself. If this appropriation were made, let it be done by law.

Mr. BOND expressed his surprise that the House should suspend its rules, and set aside all its business, for the purpose of considering a resolution of this kind; a resolution looking alone to the personal benefit of the members. He strenuously opposed the measure, and asked if the House was aware of the expense it involved? When the former resolution was under consideration, he recollected that a then member from Tennessee (Mr. Cave Johnson) made a calculation demonstrating that it was about one thousand dollars to each member, in the aggregate upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. Mr. B. insisted that they had no right in the present exhausted state of the Treasury, thus to give to themselves the people's money; and if Congress had committed a mistake originally, they ought to correct it.

Mr. RARIDEN inquired of Mr. BOND, if under the influence of the opinions he had expressed, he had allowed himself to accept the books ordered under the former resolutions of the House.

Mr. BOND would state frankly, that the books having been sent to his lodgings, he had sent them home, and should do so again, unless under some general order to return them, which he should willingly yield obedience to; still he was opposed to the principle, always had been, and should continue to be so.

Mr. McKAY contended that no proposition for paying money could be authorized without being committed. The fact of the contingent bill not being passed, rather strengthened his point.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 26.

Pre-emption to Actual Settlers.

The bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was taken up.

Mr. CRITTENDEN commented on the frauds alleged to have been practised under the pre-emption laws, submitted an amendment to strike out that part of the bill relating to settlement and cultivation, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following: "by actual residence thereon, on or before the 1st day of December, 1837, and the cultivation of at least one acre in corn, and continued residence and cultivation to this time."

Mr. WALKER had no objection to defining more accurately the habitation and cultivation; but he hoped the gentleman would not confine the cultivation to corn, as that would exclude a great many meritorious cultivators who did not grow that article.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, suggested to the Senator from Kentucky, who no doubt had only in view the defining more strictly an actual settlement and cultivation, to modify his amendment by striking out "corn," leaving the nature of the cultivation to be determined by the land office. As the Senator from Mississippi had remarked, it would be extremely hard to confine the cultivation to corn, as many cultivators bought all they used, though he (Mr. C.) regarded it as a very injudicious way of farming, and one that no doubt resulted very much to the advantage of the constituents of the gentleman from Kentucky, as there were times when every bushel of corn carried down the Mississippi was worth from a dollar to a dollar and sixty-five cents per bushel.

Mr. CRITTENDEN modified his amendment by adding "wheat and cotton."

Mississippi Election.

The special order being the contested election of members from Mississippi, was called, the question pending Mr. BELL's amendment to the resolution of Mr. BRONSON (ante, p. 613.)

Mr. MAURY addressed the House in favor of the claim of the applicants to a seat on the floor.

Mr. BRONSON was not sure that he could shake any of the positions taken by the gentleman who had addressed the House, (Mr. PRENTISS,) but he would try. However, he could not refrain from paying a tribute to the eloquence and zeal with which the gentleman had defended what he called the rights of the State of Mississippi. The question had been presented to the House in a false light by the contestants, for he contended that no indignity whatever had been offered to the State of Mississippi; her rights of representation had been respected and defended, and the simple question was, a question between individuals as to who should have the right of so representing her.

The decision of the House at the late special session was a judicial decision, and could not be altered; and Mr. B. argued that the Governor of Mississippi was authorized by the constitution to fill a vacancy. He portrayed the disastrous consequences which would ensue if the various Legislatures had not that power. The country might be ravaged by an invading enemy, or might be at war with ten nations at once, without having the power of calling together and assembling the House of Representatives to act on the subject. He was fully aware of the strength of the arguments adduced by one of the contestants, (Mr. PRENTISS,) viz: that the Governors of States might thus anticipate, defeat, or destroy the regular election. But there was not the slightest probability of such a course ever being adopted; and, if it were, there were means of speedy redress.

Perhaps the most important question, after assuming that the Governor had the power, was, "did he exercise that power?" It had been contended that such was not the case, and that the proclamation of the Governor was a nullity. For his part, he maintained that the Governor had a right to fill the whole vacancy, or none. Therefore, if the gentlemen elected in July were elected at all, they were elected for the whole term of the Twenty-fifth Congress.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 1.

Independent Treasury.

The Senate took up the bill to impose additional duties as depositaries upon certain public officers, and to appoint Receivers General of public money, &c.

The amendments submitted yesterday by Mr. WRIGHT, one to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to hire, temporarily, suitable rooms for the offices of the Receivers General, and the other providing that the receipts given by the Treasurer, authorized by the 2d section, for money deposited for the purchase of land, shall not be negotiable by transfer or assignment, were adopted.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the bill by striking out the 21st section, which relates to funding the surplus that may be in the Treasury, when it exceeds four millions, by investment in State or United States securities, bearing interest.

Mr. WRIGHT stated that this provision was introduced to obviate the objections of those who contended that the bill would have the effect to accumulate money in the Treasury.

Mr. CALHOUN had read the bill with great care, and considered it exceedingly well drawn, and calculated to produce the most beneficial effects. But this provision he considered not in accordance with its general principles, and he therefore wished it to be struck out. One of the most important objects of this measure was to avoid having a surplus. He thought, therefore, it would improve the bill to strike out the section.

Mr. CALHOUN's motion was adopted—yeas 24, nays 13.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 2.

Mississippi Election.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Mississippi Election case, the question being on the amended resolution of Mr. BELL:

"Resolved, That the resolution of this House of 3d of October last, declaring that SAMUEL J. GHOLSON and JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE were duly elected members of the 25th Congress, be rescinded, and that Messrs. GHOLSON and CLAIBORNE are not duly elected members of the 25th Congress."

The question was on the following amendment of Mr. HOWARD:

"Resolved, That Messrs. S. S. Prentiss and T. J. Word are not members of the 25th Congress."

Mr. GHOLSON said: His colleague and himself were not before the people at the November election, and they distinctly stated to the people, in a printed circular addressed to them, that they were not candidates upon that occasion. That circular was published, and it was announced, at least in all the Democratic papers in the State, that they were not candidates. Mr. G. also wrote at least a hundred letters to his friends in different parts of the State, declaring that, in consequence of that decision, he was not a candidate.

In twenty counties, where no votes were given for himself and his colleague in the November election, they received about five thousand votes at that of July; thus showing, conclusively, that there was no general turn out of the people at the November election, induced, as he firmly believed, not to vote by the decision of the House. That was the main fact he wished to state. The House, by its vote, had said the election of July was void. Mr. G. was as well satisfied with that decision as any one else, but he wished them to vote, with a knowledge of the facts.

He had good grounds to know that the election in many other counties was partial, from the fact of his colleague and himself not being before the people, and therefore, by no kind of calculation, was the strength of parties tested in November. The people had been misled by the decision of the House.

MONDAY, February 5.

Mississippi Contested Election.

Mr. McKAY proposed to the gentleman from Maryland, that as the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) on Saturday had raised some critical objections, he hoped the resolution would be modified so as to conform to former precedents of the House, declaring that the gentlemen claiming seats (Messrs. Prentiss and Word) were not so entitled.

Mr. HOWARD said that he had drafted his resolution in this way in the first place, but had modified it afterwards at the suggestion of some gentlemen. He then modified his amendment as follows: "and that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats on this floor as members of the 25th Congress."

Mr. CRISHMAN then called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, which were ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. HOWARD's amendment, declaring "that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats in this House, as members of the 25th Congress," and decided—yeas 117, nays 117.

The CHAIR voted in the affirmative, so the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS, one of the contestants, addressed the House at some length, protesting against the decision of the House, so far as it was made, depriving the people of Mississippi of a representation on this floor, replying to remarks of gentlemen made on former occasions, and declaring that, if he was spared life till the next session of Congress, and he saw any prospect of then having justice done the people of Mississippi, he would again present himself, and see if he could not have this unconstitutional resolution rescinded, as the one was which was adopted in September last.

The question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for a division of the question, so' as to take the vote on the first part, rescinding the resolution of September last; and on this part of the resolution there were—yeas 121, nays 118.

On the second branch of the resolution, declaring "that Messrs. Prentiss and Word are not entitled to seats in this House, as members of the 25th Congress,"—yeas 118, nays 116.

On the third branch of the resolution, directing the Speaker to inform the Governor of Mississippi of the decision of the House,—yeas 122, nays 88.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 5.

Independent Treasury.

The Independent Treasury bill was taken up, the amendment of Mr. RIVES being under consideration.

Mr. RIVES said he indulged the hope that, after the failure of this measure in the other branch of the National Legislature, and the opinions so clearly manifested by the recent elections, that this subject would not again have been pressed upon the consideration of the Senate, but that the Committee on Finance would have presented some scheme upon which the great interests of the country might have harmonized. Mr. R. contended that this bill was a reproduction of that of the last session, with additional deformity of feature, calculated to increase the patronage of the Executive to a far greater extent, and with the same tendency to create disorder and convulsion in the currency. Mr. R. spoke until near 4 o'clock, and gave way to a motion to adjourn, without having concluded his argument.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

Oregon Territory.

Mr. LINN, of Missouri, introduced a bill authorizing the occupation of the Columbia or Oregon River, [establishing a territory north of latitude 42 degrees, and west of the Rocky Mountains, to be called the Oregon Territory; authorizing the establishing of a fort on that river, and the occupation of the country by the military force of the United States; establishing a port of entry, and requiring that the country should then be held subject to the Revenue laws of the United States; with an appropriation of $50,000.]

Mr. LINN moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. He expressed his regret that some other Senator had not moved in this matter; he had failed in his endeavors to that effect, and had in consequence now presented the subject himself, as one of great importance. There was reason to apprehend that if this Territory should be neglected, in the course of five years it would pass from our possession.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he thought the Senator and the committee would do well to make inquiries as to the stipulations of the present treaty with Great Britain, and whether we could occupy this country now without giving cause of offence. The country had been taken possession of by Great Britain, in contravention of the treaty of Ghent. There was a clause in that treaty, or rather a word, which was intended to cover this identical case, connected with the Oregon, and which covered no other case. It was founded on these circumstances: A settlement had been made on the Oregon by Mr. Astor, and the establishment was called Astoria. During the war it was taken possession of by a British armed vessel. In the stipulation of the mutual surrender by the two countries of places taken during the war, Mr. C. had introduced the word "possession" as descriptive of the hold which we had on the Oregon country prior to the war.

Mr. LINN said he was aware of that provision, and it was his intention that the inquiry should be made. He designed to get all the information he could on the subject, and lay it before the committee or the Senate, that the Senate might make such modifications of the bill as they might think proper. He wished the bill to be made as perfect as it could be.

Mr. BUCHANAN was very glad that his friend from Missouri had moved in this business; and he had done himself injustice when he said it might have been moved more appropriately by another person. The time had come when we ought to assert our right to the Oregon country, or abandon it forever. We know, by information received from an agent of the Government, that the Hudson Bay Company were establishing forts in that quarter, cutting down the timber and conveying it to market, and acquiring the allegiance of the Indian tribes; and while they had been thus proceeding, we had patiently looked on during a long period of years. Our right ought to be now asserted; but it should be done in a prudent and delicate manner. We were obliged by the treaty to give a year's notice. The time had arrived to settle this question, and there were too many such questions unsettled with the British Government already. While we should be careful to violate no treaty stipulations, we ought promptly to assert our right to this country.

Mr. BENTON urged the propriety of having this subject referred to a Select Committee, of which his colleague should be the chairman: he knew of no one better qualified.

Mr. LINN withdrew his motion of reference to the Military Committee, and the subject was referred to a Select Committee of five, of which the VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to make the appointment.

Independent Treasury.

Mr. NILES finished at a late hour, the very able speech which he commenced yesterday in opposition to the amendment offered by Mr. RIVES, and in favor of the original bill. Mr. N. said that the Senator from Virginia seemed to think that his twenty-five banks constituted the whole country; but what constituted the whole country in the opinion of Mr. N., was the producing classes, who were swindled out of their labor through the paper system. Mr. N. glanced at the rotten state of the banking system in this country, and its vast increase of paper, (in some instances forty-one dollars for one of specie,) until it had blown up, exploded, and scattered ruin far and wide. There were banks, he said, that had not yet broken, but were now rocking and trembling; so much so, that persons in their immediate neighborhood would keep their notes no longer than they could get rid of them; and yet we were called on to deposit the treasures of Government, the common property of the people, in banks like these. That the currency of the nation was in a deplorable condition, all admitted; but the remedy was the subject of dispute. The question was one of vast magnitude, and of vital importance to the people of the nation, and it was deeply to be regretted that it should have become mixed with politics; but, unfortunately, it had so, and all the evils were charged upon the present Administration; how justly, would be left to the good sense of the people to determine. What had the Administration sought to do? Merely to increase the metallic currency, which it had effected to a very considerable extent, and to suppress the issue of small notes. This was all that had been done by the present or past Administration to derange the currency of the country. Some gentlemen contended that it was "tampering with the currency" that had brought on its present deranged state. As well, said Mr. N., might we charge temperance societies with all the drunkenness that occurred, because they were tampering with sobriety.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 14.

350 Anti-Slavery and anti-Texas Annexation Petitions.

Mr. JOHN Q. ADAMS stated that he had before him about three hundred and fifty petitions, signed by between thirty-four and thirty-five thousand names, which he had been requested to present to this House. He wished to do so with as little consumption of the time of the House as possible. He had, therefore, been obliged to alter the manner pursued heretofore in presenting petitions separately, one by one, announcing the place from which the petitions came, the name of the first petitioner, and the number of names signed to such petitions; instead of which he proposed now to offer them by classes, stating the number of petitions in each class, and as well as he could, the number of petitioners included in each. He would state, however, that he had a considerable number of petitions in relation to which he himself entertained doubts as to whether they came under the general order of the House, which prescribed that petitions of a certain description should be laid upon the table without reading, or any other action of the House being taken upon them. It has happened, that in consequence of the decision of this and former Houses of Congress in relation to the right of petition, a great degree of excitement has been produced in a certain portion of the country, and the effect of this proceeding, on the part of the House, and of the excitement occasioned by them, had tended very much to multiply these petitions, which the House appears to be so little disposed to receive and to treat in the manner in which, in his opinion, all respectful and decent petitions ought to be treated. One of the consequences of this course of proceedings on the part of the House was, that petitions were sent to him of an anonymous character, ambiguous and equivocal. These were of two descriptions. One description came from a geographical portion of this country very much attached to the right of petition, and opposed to the order of the House on this subject, and some of them would not come under that rule.

Mr. PICKENS desired to know if this question was to be opened up in this direct manner, that he might be prepared to meet it.

The CHAIR stated what the usual course was in relation to the presentation of petitions.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded to present his petitions, some separately, and some by classes, some of which were referred. Those which related to the question of slavery were laid on the table, under order of the House; those in relation to the annexation of Texas, those praying for a repeal of the order of the House, and all others which were supposed to relate in any way to slavery, were laid on the table, on motions made to that effect.

FRIDAY, February 16.

Northern Frontier.

Mr. HOWARD stated that he had received last night a communication from the Secretary of War, enclosing some papers, which satisfied him that it was his duty to move the House to suspend its rule, in order to take up the bill now for the preservation of peace on our frontier. The purport of the papers was to show that an expedition was preparing on the south side of Lake Erie to invade Canada, and the information rested upon the authority of an eye witness, a naval officer, who saw the assemblage, their collection of arms, and saw them in march.

The bill was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. HOWARD explained the principles of the bill and the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which amendment he himself did not feel very solicitous about.

The great object which the committee kept in view was to provide the means of executing our duties towards other countries, without interfering with what had in this country always been considered a legal and justifiable trade between the citizens of this and of a foreign country, and it was the consideration of this point which had caused much delay and difficulty in the committee. When two nations are engaged in war, the right of the merchants of this country to furnish either party with provisions and munitions, had always been claimed and exercised, and there was no disposition in the committee to infringe this right. The object of the committee was to have this right remain upon the same footing on which it formerly stood; but at the same time our Government was bound to prevent our citizens from interfering in the affairs of a neighboring Government, for the purpose of stirring up insurrection—of keeping up a civil war. If this was permitted to be done, the war might be rolled back upon us, and we would suffer for the indiscretion of a few of our citizens.

Mr. HOLSEY thought we ought to pause before we made any fundamental alteration in those principles in relation to our export trade, which had existed since the foundation of our Government. He considered that our citizens had a perfect right to carry on a trade with either of the belligerent parties in a neighboring Government, where a foreign war existed, without affecting the neutrality of the Government; and he would be sorry to see any restrictions imposed upon this just and proper trade, such as he feared this bill would impose. The proper provision to make on this subject, would be to prevent our citizens from interfering personally in a dispute in a neighboring Government; but this bill went far beyond that, and put it in the power of this Government, or the officers of the Government, to seize any vessels having on board arms, or any other things which it was supposed it was conveying into a neighboring territory, for the purpose of being used there for carrying on the war. He was not disposed to go this far in placing it in the hands of the Government, or the officers of the Government, to use this discretionary power to the prejudice of the citizen, or the seizure of the property of the citizen. Our citizens had a perfect right to trade with either of the contending parties to a war which might be going on on the continent of Europe, without compromising the neutrality of the United States; and he would not now consent, by his vote, to have such restrictions as were proposed by this bill imposed on the citizens of this country. The framers of our constitution had guarded our export trade so that no restrictions should be imposed upon it in the shape of a tax; and why should we in this manner attempt to place restrictions upon it, in contravention of the spirit of the constitution, if not of the letter of it.

Postponement of the Sub-Treasury Bill.

[FEBRUARY, 1838.]

Mr. Loomis reviewed the circumstances connected with the recent disturbances upon the Canada frontier. There was a long line of frontier, separating the two countries from each other, yet placing so narrow a barrier between them, as to render it impossible that local disturbances breaking out on one side of that line should not spread to the other. The inhabitants of the American side were peculiarly sensitive on this point. Their native love of liberty, and deep-rooted hatred of tyranny, were inflamed, very naturally, whenever an appeal was made to those noble principles. Thus it happened that they were very easily led to take a deep interest, if not an active part, in those struggles.

He deemed the bill inefficient to answer the end it professes to reach. What did it propose to do? To give to United States marshals, deputy marshals, and other officers, power to seize, without process of law, or any other limitation than their own individual discretion, any vessel, or vehicle, suspected of being used for the purpose of bearing arms or munitions of war into the conterminous country, to aid in its civil contests, and to detain them until satisfactory surety should be given that they should not be used. Suppose the officer in whom this extraordinary power was vested, to have exercised his discretion, and, in execution of this power, to have seized the property of a citizen: what does the latter do? The bonds are fixed; it may be assumed, fairly fixed; the surety is found, and the party proceeds on his way over the line, into the adjoining country, in the very face and eyes of the officers of Government. Who is to prevent this? Nothing in this law gives any power of prevention to anybody. What becomes of the bond? It is in the hands of one of these officers; perhaps it may, by good fortune, have been put into the hands of a district attorney. How is he to know whether the obligation has been violated—the bond broken? How is he to prove that these arms or munitions of war, or whatever else had been seized and given up upon the bond, have been used in the manner designated? Does his jurisdiction extend to the only place where these facts can be ascertained—beyond the line?

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 19.

Postponement of the Sub-Treasury Bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate: I rise to present to the Senate a resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which I received from Governor Ritner on yesterday afternoon, requesting their Representatives in Congress, and instructing their Senators, "to vote and use their influence for a postponement, until the next session of Congress, of the act introduced by the Hon. SILAS WRIGHT, of New York, commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill, or any other act or acts of a similar character; and that they vote at this session for no act of a similar nature." The Legislature also, by the same resolution, declared that they "have full confidence in MARTIN VAN BUREN, and in the wisdom and intelligence of their Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress;" and further instruct and request their Senators and Representatives "to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government."

I feel confident that the Senate will pardon me, considering the peculiar position in which I am placed, for making a few remarks in explanation of the course which I intend to pursue under this resolution. It is well known, both to the Senate and to the country, that at the last session of Congress, I presented my views in detail in favor of a separation of the Treasury from all banks, as fiscal agents of the Government. My opinion upon this subject remains unchanged: nay, it has been confirmed by subsequent events and subsequent reflections. After a careful examination of the bill reported by the Senator from New York, as it has been since amended, I think, in the main, it is well calculated to carry into practice this principle of separation. Whilst it increases Executive patronage to a very small extent, and no more than is absolutely necessary to carry into effect its principles, it confers no power whatever upon the Secretary of the Treasury over the public money, except that which he has exercised ever since the origin of the present Government; and a provision of the bill, which has never existed heretofore, renders it impossible that the ordinary Treasury drafts which are delivered to the public creditors should ever be used as currency. With some further amendments, which I need not now specify, but which I had intended to move, on a proper occasion, I should have given a cheerful support to this bill. But I am instructed: and it remains for me to decide what course I ought to pursue, under this change of circumstances.

Ever since I was capable of forming an opinion upon this subject, I have believed that the Legislatures of the several States had a right to instruct their Senators. In my opinion, this right results from the very nature of our constitution, which is a Federal compact between distinct and sovereign States. It has even been considered, with but few exceptions, a fundamental article in the political creed of that party to which I am proud to belong. I have, in public and in private, in the face of the Senate and before the country, often expressed this opinion; and I shall never preach one doctrine of political faith, and practise another.

I know that some of my most valued friends in Pennsylvania who hold the right of instruction to be sacred, are of opinion, that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I ought to disobey these instructions. But do they not perceive that if the Senator can look behind his instructions, the right is at once abandoned? Under the pretext, or, if you please, under the honest belief, that they do not speak the voice of the people, or that they have been corruptly or improperly obtained, a Senator could always justify himself to himself for disobedience. I shall, therefore, not disobey my instructions. My only alternative, then, is either to obey or to resign.

Upon questions of mere expediency, in which no constitutional principles are involved, it ought to be a very strong case to induce the Senator to abandon his post. If every difference of opinion between the Senator and his Legislature should produce this effect, the right of instruction itself would soon grow into disrepute, and the Senatorial term of six years, as fixed by the constitution, would terminate whenever such a conflict of opinion should arise.

I can conceive of extreme cases in which, on questions of mere expediency, an honorable man might feel himself disgraced in even becoming the agent to give the vote of his State. No person, of any party with whom I have conversed, considers the present to be such a case; and I am confirmed in my own opinion upon this subject by the example of the Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) I shall, therefore, obey my instructions honestly and in good faith; and, like him, on every question of proposed amendments, shall give such a vote as a fair and honorable opponent of the bill ought, in my judgment, to give.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania have shown to the world that they justly appreciate the merits of the statesman whom the people of the United States have placed at the head of the Government, by declaring "their full confidence in MARTIN VAN BUREN." Such a well-deserved tribute to superior merit might be considered as the incense of flattery, had it been offered by his political friends. The reverse is the case upon the present occasion. The resolution containing this expression of confidence, on its final passage, received the vote of every Opposition member of the House of Representatives, and, I am informed, of the Senate, whether Whig or Antimason, and was approved by Joseph Ritner, Governor. Thus, even his very enemies are made to praise him.

A compliment equally well deserved is paid by the resolution to the Democratic portion of the Representatives of the State in Congress. I heartily commend the Legislature for expressing full confidence in their wisdom and intelligence. A more firm, faithful, intelligent, and patriotic set of men has never represented Pennsylvania.

We are also instructed, in the conclusion of the resolution, "to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government." Now it is our duty, if possible, to reconcile and render consistent the first with the last clause of the instruction, and to give to each of them its proper weight. My conception of their meaning, when thus fairly construed, is, that whilst we are bound to oppose the separation of the banks from the Government in the manner proposed by the bill of the Senator from New York, or by any bill of a similar nature, yet we are equally instructed to support any other and different "mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, which will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government." In short, the Legislature are friendly to such a separation; but they are opposed to its accomplishment in the manner proposed by the bill now before the Senate. Whether any other practicable mode of effecting this separation can be devised, I shall not at present pretend to say.

Mr. BRICHANAN presented the resolutions, and gave notice that he would, at the first convenient opportunity, after consulting his colleague, move, in obedience to his instructions, to postpone the bill reported by the Senator from New York, until the next session of Congress.

Mr. WALKER presented the credentials of the Hon. J. F. TROTTER, Senator elect from Mississippi. Mr. TROTTER was then duly qualified, and took his seat.

Independent Treasury.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, was entitled to the floor, and after some preliminary observations, went on to say:

Hitherto, I have considered this new project as it is, according to its true nature and character, and what it must inevitably become. I have not examined it as it is not, but as its friends would represent it to be. They hold out the idea that it is a simple contrivance to collect, to keep, and to disburse, the public revenue. In that view of it, every consideration of safety and security recommends the agency of responsible corporations, rather than the employment of particular individuals. It has been shown, during the course of this debate, that the amount which has been lost by the defalcation of individuals has exceeded three or four times the amount of all that has been lost by the local banks, although the sums confided to the care of individuals have not been probably one-tenth part of the amount that has been in the custody of the local banks. And we all know that, during the forty years of the existence of the two Banks of the United States, not one cent was lost of the public revenue.

Who, Mr. President, are the most conspicuous of those who perseveringly pressed this bill upon Congress and the American people? Its drawer is the distinguished gentleman in the white house not far off; its endorser is the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, here present. What the drawer thinks of the endorser, his cautious reserve and stifled enmity prevent us from knowing. But the frankness of the endorser has not left us in the same ignorance with respect to his opinion of the drawer. He has often expressed it upon the floor of the Senate. On an occasion not very distant, denying to him any of the nobler qualities of the royal beast of the forest, he attributed to him those which belong to the most crafty, most skulking, and one of the meanest of the quadruped tribe. Mr. President, it is due to myself to say, that I do not altogether share with the Senator from South Carolina in this opinion of the President of the United States. I have always found him, in his manners and deportment, civil, courteous, and gentlemanly; and he dispenses, in the noble mansion which he now occupies, one worthy the residence of the Chief Magistrate of a great people, a generous and liberal hospitality. An acquaintance with him of more than twenty years' duration has inspired me with a respect for the man, although, I regret to be compelled to say, I detest the magistrate.

The eloquent Senator from South Carolina has intimated the course of my friends and myself, in opposing this bill, was unpatriotic, and that we ought to have followed in his lead; and, in a late letter of his, he has spoken of his alliance with us, and of his motives for quitting it. I cannot admit the justice of his reproach. We united, if, indeed, there were any alliance in the case, to restrain the enormous expansion of Executive power; to arrest the progress of corruption; to rebuke usurpation; and to drive the Goths and Vandals from the capital; to expel Brennus and his horde from Rome, who, when he threw his sword into the scale, to augment the ransom demanded from the Mistress of the world, showed his preference for gold; that he was a hard-money chieftain. It was by the much more valuable metal of iron that he was driven from her gates. And how often have we witnessed the Senator from South Carolina, with woeful countenance, and in doleful strains, pouring forth touching and mournful eloquence on the degeneracy of the times, and the downward tendency of the Republic? Day after day, in the Senate, have we seen the displays of his lofty and impassioned eloquence. Although I shared largely with the Senator in his apprehension for the purity of our institutions, and the permanency of civil liberty, disposed always to look at the brighter side of human affairs, I was sometimes inclined to hope that the vivid imagination of the Senator had depicted the dangers by which we were encompassed in somewhat stronger colors than they justified. The arduous contest in which we were so long engaged was about to terminate in a glorious victory. The very object for which the alliance was formed was about to be accomplished. At this critical moment the Senator left us; he left us for the very purpose of preventing the success of the common cause. He took up his musket, knapsack, and shot-pouch, and joined the other party. He went, horse, foot, and dragoon, and he himself composed the whole corps. He went, as his present most distinguished ally commenced with his expunging resolution, solitary and alone. The earliest instance recorded in history, within my recollection, of an ally drawing off his forces from the combined army, was that of Achilles at the siege of Troy. He withdrew, with all his troops, and remained in the neighborhood, in sullen and dignified inactivity. But he did not join the Trojan forces; and when, during the progress of the siege, his faithful friend fell in battle, he raised his avenging arm, drove the Trojans back into the gates of Troy, and satiated his vengeance by slaying Priam's noblest and dearest son, the finest hero in the immortal Iliad. But Achilles had been wronged, or imagined himself wronged, in the person of the fair and beautiful Briseis. We did no wrong to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. On the contrary, we respected him, confided in his great and acknowledged ability, his uncommon genius, his extensive experience, his supposed patriotism; above all, we confided in his stern and inflexible fidelity. Nevertheless, he left us, and joined our common opponents, distrusting and distrusted. He left us, as he tells us in his Edgefield letter, because the victory which our common arms were about to achieve, was not to enure to him and his party, but exclusively to the benefit of his allies and their cause. I thought that, actuated by patriotism, (that noblest of human virtues,) we had been contending together for our common country, for her violated rights, her threatened liberties, her prostrate constitution. Never did I suppose that personal or party considerations entered into our views. Whether, if victory shall ever again be about to perch upon the standard of the spoils party, (the denomination which the Senator from South Carolina has so often given to his present allies,) he will not feel himself constrained, by the principles on which he has acted, to leave them, because it may not enure to the benefit of himself and his party, I leave to be adjusted between themselves.

The speech of the Senator from South Carolina was plausible, ingenious, abstract, metaphysical, and generalizing. It did not appear to me to be adapted to the bosoms and business of human life. It was aerial, and not very high up in the air, Mr. President, either; not quite as high as Mr. Clayton was in his last ascension in his balloon. The Senator announced that there was a single alternative, and no escape from one or the other branch of it. He stated that we must take the bill under consideration, or the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia. I do not concur in that statement of the case. There is another course embraced in neither branch of the Senator's alternative; and that course is to do nothing: always the wisest when you are not certain what you ought to do. Let us suppose that neither branch of the alternative is accepted, and that nothing is done: what, then, would be the consequence? There would be a restoration of the law of 1789, with all its cautious provisions and securities, provided by the wisdom of our ancestors, which has been so trampled upon by the late and present Administrations. By that law, establishing the Treasury Department, the treasure of the United States is to be received, kept, and disbursed by the Treasurer, under a bond with ample security, under a large penalty fixed by law, and not left, as this bill leaves it, to the uncertain discretion of a Secretary of the Treasury. If, therefore, we were to do nothing, that law would be revived; the Treasurer would have the custody, as he ought to have, of the public money, and doubtless he would make special deposits of it in all instances with safe and sound State banks, as in some cases the Secretary of the Treasury is now obliged to do. Thus, we should have in operation that very special deposit system, so much desired by some gentlemen, by which the public money would remain separated and unmixed with the money of banks. There is yet another course, unembraced by either branch of the alternative presented by the Senator from South Carolina; and that is to establish a Bank of the United States, constituted according to the old and approved method of forming such an institution, tested and sanctioned by experience; a Bank of the United States which should blend public and private interests, and be subject to public and private control, united together in such manner as to present safe and salutary checks against all abuses. The Senator mistakes his own abandonment of that institution as ours. I know that the party in power has barricaded itself against the establishment of such a bank. It adopted, at the last extra session, the extraordinary and unprecedented resolution, that the people of the United States should not have such a bank, although it might be manifest that there was a clear majority of them demanding it. But the day may come, and I trust is not distant, when the will of the people must prevail in the councils of their own Government; and when it does arrive, a bank will be established.

The Senator from South Carolina reminds us that we denounced the pet bank system; and so we did, and so we do. But does it therefore follow that, bad as that system was, we must be driven into the acceptance of a system infinitely worse? He tells us that the bill under consideration takes the public funds out of the hands of the Executive, and places them in the hands of the law. It does no such thing. They are now without law, it is true, in the custody of the Executive; and the bill proposes by law to confirm them in that custody, and to convey new and enormous powers of control to the Executive over them. Every custodary of the public funds provided by the bill is a creature of the Executive, dependent upon his breath, and subject to the same breath for removal, whenever the Executive, from caprice, from tyranny, or from party motives, shall choose to order it. What safety is there for the public money, if there were a hundred subordinate executive officers charged with its care, whilst the doctrine of the absolute unity of the whole Executive power, promulgated by the last Administration, and persisted in by this, remains unrevoked, and unrebuked.

Whilst the Senator from South Carolina professes to be the friend of State banks, he has attacked the whole banking system of the United States. He is their friend; he only thinks they are all unconstitutional! Why? Because the coining power is possessed by the General Government, and that coining power, he argues, was intended to supply a currency of the precious metals; but the State banks absorb the precious metals, and withdraw them from circulation, and, therefore, are in conflict with the coining power. That power, according to my view of it, is nothing but a naked authority to stamp certain pieces of the precious metals, in fixed proportions of alloy and pure metal, prescribed by law, so that their exact value may be known. When that office is performed, the power is functus officio; the money passes out of the Mint, and becomes the lawful property of those who legally acquire it. They may do with it as they please, throw it into the ocean, bury it in the earth, or melt it in a crucible, without violating any law. When it has once left the vaults of the mint, the law-maker has nothing to do with it, but to protect it against those who attempt to debase or counterfeit, and, subsequently, to pass it as lawful money. In the sense in which the Senator supposes banks to conflict with the coining power, foreign commerce, and especially our commerce with China, conflicts with it much more extensively. That is the great absorbent of the precious metals, and is, therefore, much more unconstitutional than the State banks. Foreign commerce sends them out of the country; banks retain them within it. The distinguished Senator is no enemy to the banks; he merely thinks them injurious to the morals and industry of the country. He likes them very well, but he nevertheless believes that they levy a tax of twenty-five millions annually on the industry of the country! Let us examine, Mr. President, how this enormous and iniquitous assessment is made, according to the argument of the Senator from South Carolina. He states that there is a mass of debt due from the community to the banks, amounting to $475,000,000, the interest upon which, constituting about that sum of $25,000,000, forms the exceptionable tax. Now, this sum is not paid by the whole community, but only by those individuals who obtain discounts from the banks. They borrow money at six per cent. interest, and invest it in profitable adventures, or otherwise employ it. They would not borrow it if they did not suppose they could make profit by it; and the probability is that they do make profit by it. Instead, therefore, of there being any loss in the operation, there is an actual gain to the community, by the excess of profit made beyond six per cent. interest, which they pay. What are banks? They are mere organized agencies for the loan of money and the transaction of monetary business; regulated agencies acting under the prescriptions of law, and subject to a responsibility, moral and legal, far transcending that under which any private capitalist operates. A number of persons not choosing to lend out their money privately, associate together, bring their respective capitals into a common stock, which is controlled and managed by the corporate government of a bank. If no association whatever had been formed, a large portion of this capital, a large portion, therefore, of that very debt of $475,000,000, would still exist, in the shape of private loans. The Senator from South Carolina might as well collect the aggregate amount of all the mortgages, bonds, and notes which have been executed in the United States for loans, and assert that the interest paid upon the total sum constituted a tax levied upon the community.

In the liquidation of the debt due to the banks from the community, and from the banks to the community, there would not be as much difficulty as the Senator seems to apprehend. From the mass of debts due to the banks are to be deducted, first, the amount of subscriptions which constitute their capitals; secondly, the amount of deposits to the credit of individuals in their custody; and, thirdly, the amount of their notes in circulation. How easily will these mutual debts neutralize each other! The same person, in numberless instances, will combine in himself the relations both of creditor and debtor.

The only general operation of banks beyond their discounts and deposits, which pervades the whole community, is that of furnishing a circulation in redeemable paper, beyond the amount of specie to redeem it in their vaults. And can it be doubted that this additional supply of money furnishes a powerful stimulus to industry and production, fully compensating any casual inconveniences, which sometimes, though rarely, occur? Banks reduce the rate of interest, and repress inordinate usury. The salutary influence of banking operations is demonstrated in countries and sections of country where they prevail, when contrasted with those in which they are not found. In the former, all is bustle, activity, general prosperity. The country is beautified and adorned by the noble works of internal improvement; the cities are filled with splendid edifices, and the wharves covered with the rich productions of our own or of foreign climates. In the latter, all is sluggishness, slothfulness, and inactivity. England, in modern time, illustrates the great advantages of banks, of credit, and of stimulated industry. Contrast her with Spain, destitute of all those advantages. In ancient times, Athens would present an image of full and active employment of all the energies of man, carried to the highest point of civilization, while her neighbor, Sparta, with her iron money, affords another of the boasted benefits of metallic circulation.

The Senator from South Carolina would do the banks no harm; but they are deemed by him highly injurious to the planting interest! According to him, they inflate prices, and the poor planter sells his productions for hard money, and has to purchase his supplies at the swollen prices produced by a paper medium. Now, I must dissent altogether from the Senator's statement of the case. England, the principal customer of the planter, is quite as much, if not more, a paper country than ours. And the paper-money prices of the one country are neutralized by the paper-money prices of the other country. If the argument were true, that a paper-money country trades disadvantageously with a hard-money country, we ought to continue to employ a paper medium, to counterbalance the paper medium of England. And if we were to banish our paper, and substitute altogether a metallic currency, we should be exposed to the very inequality which has been insisted upon. But there is nothing in that view of the matter which is presented by the Senator from South Carolina. If, as he asserts, prices were always inflated in this country beyond their standard in England, the rate of exchange would be constantly against us. An examination, however, into the actual state of exchange between the two countries, for a long series of years, evinces that it has generally been in our favor. In the direct trade between England and this country, I have no doubt there is a large annual balance against us; but that balance is adjusted and liquidated by balances in our favor in other branches of our foreign trade, which have finally concentrated in England, as the great centre of the commercial world.

Of all the interests and branches of industry in this country, none has profited more by the use and employment of credit and capital derived from banks and other sources, than the planting interest. It habitually employs credit in all countries where planting agriculture prevails. The States of Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, have almost sprung into existence, as it were, by magic, or, at least, have been vastly improved and extended under the influence of the credit system. Lands, slaves, utensils, beasts of burden, and other supplies, have been constantly bought, and still continue to be purchased, upon credit; and bank agency is all-essential to give the most beneficial operation to these credits. But the argument of the Senator from South Carolina, which I am combating, would not be correct, if it were true that we have inflated prices on this side of the Atlantic, without a corresponding inflation of price on the other side; because the planter generally selling at home, and buying at home, the proceeds of his sale, whatever they may be, constitute the means by which he effects his purchases, and consequently neutralize each other. In what do we of the West receive payment for the immense quantity of live stock and other produce of our industry, which we annually sell to the South and South-west, but that paper medium now so much decried and denounced? The Senator from South Carolina is very fond of the State banks; but he thinks there is no legitimate currency except that of the constitution. He contends that the power which the Government possesses to impose taxes restricts it, in their payment, to the receipt of the precious metals. But the constitution does not say so. The power is given in broad and unrestricted terms; and the Government is left at liberty to collect the taxes in whatever medium or commodity, from the exigencies of the case, it can collect them. It is, doubtless, much the most convenient to collect them in money, because that represents, or can command, every thing, the want of which is implied by the power of taxation. But suppose there was no money in the country, none whatever, to be extorted by the tax-gatherers from an impoverished people: is the power of Government to cease, and the people to be thrown back into a state of nature? The Senator asks if taxes could be levied and collected in tobacco, in cotton, and other commodities? Undoubtedly they could, if the necessity existed for such an inconvenient imposition. Such a case of necessity did exist in the colony of Virginia, and other colonies, prior to the Revolution, and taxes were accordingly levied in tobacco or other commodities, as wolf-scalps, even at this day, compose a part of the revenue of more than one State.

The argument, then, of the Senator against the right of the Government to receive bank notes in payment of public dues, a practice coeval with the existence of the Government, does not seem to me to be sound. It is not accurate, for another reason. Bank notes, when convertible at the will of the holder into specie, are so much counted or told specie, like the specie which is counted and put in marked kegs, denoting the quantity of their contents. The Senator tells us that it has been only within a few days that he has discovered that it is illegal to receive bank notes in payment of public dues. Does he think that the usage of the Government under all its administrations, and with every party in power, which has prevailed for nigh fifty years, ought to be set aside by a novel theory of his, just dreamed into existence, even if it possesses the merit of ingenuity? The bill under consideration, which has been eulogized by the Senator as perfect in its structure and details, contains a provision that bank notes shall be received in diminished proportions, during a term of six years. He himself introduced that identical principle. It is the only part of the bill that is emphatically his. How, then, can he contend that it is unconstitutional to receive bank notes in payment of public dues? I appeal from himself to himself. The Senator further contends, that general deposits cannot be made with banks, and be thus confounded with the general mass of the funds on which they transact business. The argument supposes that the money collected for taxes must be preserved in identity; but that is impossible, often, to do. May not a collector give the small change which he has received from one tax-payer to another tax-payer, to enable him to effect his payment? May he not change gold for silver, or vice versa, or both, if he be a distant collector, to obtain an undoubted remittance to the public Treasury? What, Mr. President, is the process of making deposits with banks? The deposit is made, and a credit is entered for its amount to the Government. That credit is supposed to be the exact equivalent of the amount deposited, ready and forthcoming to the Government whenever it is wanted for the purposes of disbursement. It is immaterial to the Government whether it receives back again the identical money put in, or other money of equal value. All that it wants is what it put in the bank, or its equivalent; and that, in ordinary times, with such prudent banks as alone ought to be selected, it is sure of getting. Again: the Treasury has frequently to make remittances to foreign countries, to meet the expenditure necessary there for our naval squadrons, and other purposes. They are made to the bankers, to the Barings or the Rothschilds, in the form of bills of exchange purchased in the market by the agents of the Government here, with money drawn out of the Treasury. Here is one conversion of the money received from the tax-gatherer into the Treasury. The bills are transmitted to the bankers, honored, paid, and the amount credited by them to the United States. Are the bankers bound to retain the proceeds of the bills in identity? Are they bound to do more than credit the Government for an equal amount, for which they stand responsible whenever it is wanted? If they should happen to use any portion of those very proceeds of bills remitted to them in their banking operations, would it be drawing money from the Treasury, contrary to the provisions of the constitution?

Neutral Relations.

The House took up the "Act to amend an act, entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned.'"

The question on the motion of Mr. WISE to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole was taken, and disagreed to.

The question then pending was the substitute for part of the first and the whole of the second sections of the bill submitted by Mr. PATTON.

Mr. HOWARD stated that the principles on which this bill was based, had been the uniform principles of this Government ever since its formation. It had always been the policy of this Government to remain at peace with all nations, and to enforce its neutrality whenever it became necessary to do so. This principle was adopted in the act of 1794, which he wished the House to bear in mind. At that time this country began to feel the situation in which it was placed, by being called upon by a foreign power to enforce its neutrality. Congress then passed a law to prevent the enlistment of men, within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of carrying on hostility against any Government with which we might be at peace.

Neutral Relations.

This bill vested power in the President to employ the army and navy for the purpose of enforcing this law. This bill, then, only provided for the prevention of the fitting out of naval expeditions, and the enlisting of soldiers within our territory, to carry on war against a nation with which we might be at peace. Afterwards, when a war broke out between France and England, it became necessary to make further provision to preserve our neutrality in consequence of the change of circumstances. It then became necessary to prevent the fitting out of privateers in our waters; and in addition to the provisions of the law of 1794, it became necessary to vest in the President power to authorize the collectors to seize upon vessels fitting out in our waters. Now, the face of things has again changed, and it becomes necessary for us to make further changes in our legislation. In consequence of the small number of our collectors on the frontier, it became necessary that the President should call to his aid other officers, for the purpose of enforcing our neutrality. It became necessary for us to bring the aid of the civil power to co-operate with the military power in preserving our neutrality, as that duty is now conferred almost exclusively on the military power. This he considered to be improper, and hoped gentlemen were not disposed to keep up such exhibitions as we have had for the last few weeks. He hoped we were not to have a body of armed men marching to and fro, arresting and disarming persons who might be about to violate our neutrality, when that duty could be as well and better performed by the civil authority. We have recently seen a part of the army of the United States, engaged in marching several hundred miles, for the purpose of arresting and disarming some two or three hundred persons, who had assembled for the purpose of entering Canada. This was a spectacle which he did not desire to see kept up, and he hoped the House would make such provision speedily as would supersede the necessity of such military operations. The civil authority, he maintained, ought first to be applied, and when it failed, there would be time enough to call in the aid of the military power. The civil power, however, he believed would be amply sufficient to preserve our neutral relations with Canada.

Mr. MERCER contended that the power under the laws of 1794 and 1818, was ample for the purpose of arresting all the expeditions which might be undertaken against Canada. The defect was not in the law, but in the administration of the law. It was with infinite surprise that he had seen the President of the United States call upon the Governor of New York to issue his proclamation to enforce a law, when the Executive should have issued his own proclamation, as it was a law of the United States which was to be enforced.

Mr. HOLSEY considered it to be the duty of this Government to preserve its neutrality towards all nations with which it might be at peace, and he contended, that there was no way of doing this but by the Government preventing its citizens from interfering in the affairs of foreign Governments.

This principle had been held by this Government from its foundation, and he would ask gentlemen if they were prepared now to pursue a different course of policy? He referred to the correspondence between Mr. Madison, when Secretary of State, and Mr. Pinckney, our minister at that time in Spain, in which Mr. Madison took the ground that it was the duty of that Government not only to restrain its own citizens from fitting out expeditions against foreign Governments, with which that Government might be at peace, but that it was the duty of that Government to restrain foreigners within their borders from interfering or meddling with the affairs of other Governments.

Mr. ADAMS denied that any haste was necessary, for this was not a case of the tomahawk and scalping-knife character. Mr. A. went on to argue against the original, though he believed he should vote for the modified substitute to the first section submitted by Mr. LOOMIS, and that of Mr. PATTON.

THURSDAY, February 22.

Neutral Relations.

The question pending was on agreeing to the modified amendment of Mr. LOOMIS, to the first section of the bill.

Mr. TOUCEY said it had been objected that the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States came into conflict with this bill as to the right of seizure. He apprehended, however, that there was no foundation for this objection, as, in his opinion, the fourth article applied merely to general search warrants, and had no application to the kind of seizures referred to in this bill. He supposed the case of an embargo law being passed, would any one doubt that the officers of the Government would have a right to seize vessels about to violate that law? Again: in the case of goods about to be smuggled, would there be any doubt of the right of Government officers to seize the goods? This was his idea in relation to this article of the Constitution of the United States on this subject.

The Constitution of the United States declares that the right of the people to bear arms shall remain inviolate. Then how does this amendment apply to the case? and how are the people to be secured in their right to bear arms, if this amendment passed. Why, if this amendment was adopted, any citizen of the United States who might be found with arms or munitions of war in his possession, and he expressed an intention of using them in carrying on hostilities in a conterminous country, he is guilty of a high crime by your law, and subject to fine and imprisonment. Not only this, but if he has any wagon, vessel, or vehicle of any description, and he says he is going to use those vehicles in carrying on any war in a conterminous territory, they are liable to seizure, and the person is liable to a fine of $3,000, and imprisonment for three years.

These were the principles of this amendment, and these were principles which he entirely detested and abhorred, and he protested against this kind of legislation. Further than this, the amendment under consideration would apply in a most odious manner to persons emigrating from this country to a country conterminous with our country. If a citizen of this country should attempt to pass from this country to Mexico or Texas, and hostility should be going on there, he might have his property seized, and himself fined and imprisoned under the provisions of this section, as it was proposed now to amend it. Further than this, every citizen of the United States on the frontier who might have arms or ammunition in his possession, and might express an intention of using them in the prosecution of hostilities in a conterminous country, he would be subject to the penalties provided in this section.

Again: if Mexico should invade Texas, and a citizen of Texas in this country should attempt to go home to his own country to defend his own soil, he would be subject to the penalties of this bill, and thrown into jail. If, on the other hand, Texas should invade Mexico, and any citizen from Mexico should attempt to go from this country to defend his country, he would be held liable to fine and imprisonment. Again: if any Canadian or any subject of the King of Great Britain, who might be in this country, should attempt to go home while hostilities were going on there, he would be subject to the penalties here imposed. He contended, if this bill was passed, as it was attempted to amend it, and it was attempted to carry out its provisions, that it would involve us in interminable difficulties.

The act of 1818, in his opinion, went far enough, and as far as any act ought to go, and he would not consent to go beyond the principles contained in that law, and the principles under which we had acted, without being involved in difficulties, for the last half century. The bill of the Senate was drawn up with an eye to these principles, and so far as it went, he was willing to go, but no further.

Mr. UNDERWOOD opposed both the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York and the original bill, as a measure entirely improper to be adopted by this country. By the provisions of this bill, he expected that, in case of difficulties between Mexico and Texas, the citizens of the West might be prohibited from trading in horses and mules, as well as arms and ammunition, with the people of Texas or Mexico. It might also prevent emigration from the South and West to those countries, or it may prevent emigration from the United States to Canada. Suppose a party of a hundred families going from the West to Texas, of course they would take their rifles and ammunition with them. Then, if your United States officer met them, and asked them what use they were going to make of the arms they were taking with them, and they said they would use them to carry on a war with Mexico, in case their rights were invaded, they would be subject to arrest and imprisonment by this bill.

It was nothing more nor less than a bill to trammel trade and commerce, and he hoped every gentleman who was in favor of a free trade upon the principles laid down in the laws of nations, would oppose it. He maintained that it was the right of the citizens of the United States to carry on a trade with any country that had a war raging within her borders; and he maintained further, that if there were two hostile armies at the present time in Canada, (the one on the one side of one of their great rivers, and the other on the other side,) we had a perfect right to trade with both, and furnish both with bread and beef, without, in any manner, compromising our neutrality. This bill imposed penalties which were never thought of at any former time in our history. It would impose a penalty on the citizens of a foreign country who might be driven into this country by the stress of circumstances, with arms in their hands. Such persons were liable to be seized, fined, and imprisoned.

Now this was a monstrous principle; and he hoped never to see it carried into execution in this country. Suppose the case of two European nations being engaged in carrying on a maritime war, and one of the fleets should be driven into the harbor of New York by a superior force. Would you seize that fleet, and hold the officers and seamen guilty of a high crime, and fine and imprison them? He thought not. It would be our duty to protect them whilst in our waters. Again: suppose a superior force at Malden should drive out a part of the inhabitants who might be in arms, and those inhabitants of that place should take refuge in Detroit; would you seize upon them? hold them guilty of a high crime, and subject them to a fine and imprisonment? Was this the principle you were about to establish? If it was, he must say that he utterly detested any such principle.

The British authorities in Canada went upon the principle of protection so far, that they gave protection to all our renegade slaves who escaped and went within their dominions, and why should we be prevented from giving protection to the oppressed of their people? As this bill had undergone so many phases, he hoped that it might yet undergo a total eclipse, because it was a measure which he believed calculated to do very great injury to the people of this country. He had no idea of making a law of this kind, which was only to apply to conterminous countries, and thought if any bill of the kind was passed, that it ought to be general in its character. With the view of testing this question, whether the House was disposed to legislate solely with reference to conterminous territories, he moved to strike out the words "conterminous with the United States."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 26.

Death of the Hon. Jonathan Cilley.

Mr. FAIRFIELD addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: An event has occurred since our last adjournment, which has spread a deep gloom over this community, and deprived this body of one of its most valuable members. I allude, sir, to the death of my late colleague, the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, which, it is my painful duty to announce, took place on Saturday last near this city. One hour we saw him in full life, standing in the midst of us in all the pride and vigor of manhood; the next, a helpless, inanimate corpse. It is a case, sir, most melancholy and heart-rending in all its circumstances, (of which, however, this is not the occasion to speak,) and brings home to our minds, with peculiar emphasis, the trite but solemn truth, that "in the midst of life we are in death."

My deceased colleague was a man of uncommon talents. His mind was strong, vigorous, well stored, and well disciplined. He had, moreover, that indomitable spirit of perseverance in all the pursuits of an elevated and honorable ambition, which would not rest satisfied with low attainments. He partook, largely, too, of that fearless patriotism of his ancestors, which made them "pour out their blood like water," in the war of the Revolution, and which also displayed itself in the brave and chivalrous conduct of an only brother during the late war.

His fellow-citizens had often elected him to places of honor and trust in the State of his adoption, and had now given him a seat among the Representatives of the nation;—among us, who are now spared to deplore his abrupt and tragical removal. Though he had not long been a member of this body, he had established an enviable and an enduring reputation. His ready powers of debate, his warm and fervid eloquence, his manly bearing towards opponents, and courteous demeanor to all, will be readily acknowledged, and long remembered by the members of this House.

That his sudden and melancholy death will produce a deep sensation in Maine, and indeed throughout the whole country, no one can doubt; but the annunciation of the dreadful fact to the partner of his bosom, sitting in the midst of the young pledges of their mutual affection, little dreaming of the blow that awaits her, it is shocking to contemplate. No one can think of it but with feelings of the most poignant and heartfelt grief. May "He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," and who "will not break the bruised reed," give her that consolation and support which she needs, and which no earthly power can give.

With this brief and imperfect announcement, I beg leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of JONATHAN CILLEY, deceased, late a member of the House from the State of Maine, at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of JONATHAN CILLEY, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of JONATHAN CILLEY, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and on motion of Mr. FAIRFIELD, the House then adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 26.

Death of the Representative Jonathan Cilley, Esq.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, a member of that House from the State of Maine, and stating that the funeral would take place from the hall of the House to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I came into the Senate this morning, exhausted and overwhelmed, to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to you and to the Senate of the United States the sudden and lamented death of my friend and colleague, the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, a Representative from Maine in the Congress of the United States.

At the last adjournment of the Senate, Mr. CILLEY was in perfect health, full of hope and expectation of making himself useful in asserting and vindicating the violated rights of his State, and of distinguishing himself in the great questions which now so deeply agitate the public mind; full of zeal and ardent patriotism, and of devotion to the great cause of human liberty and of human rights, he considered that a crisis had arisen when his country had a right to claim the services of her sons. He obeyed the call of his constituents, relinquishing the enjoyments of the domestic circle of a wife and three children. He is now a lifeless corpse; all his hopes are blasted and destroyed, and his constituents are deprived of the services of an able and faithful representative.

Mr. CILLEY was a native of New Hampshire, and belonged to one of the most ancient and respectable families in that State. Patriotism and bravery were his inheritance. His grandfather was the distinguished patriot and brave officer of the Revolution, General Cilley; and his brother, Captain Joseph Cilley, was the gallant leader of the heroic charge under Colonel Miller, at the Battle of Bridgewater Heights, in the last war.

The deceased was a graduate of Bowdoin College, in Maine, and by his superior talents and application attained a high standing at the bar in that State. He was a good lawyer, an able advocate, and a powerful debater.

From early life Mr. CILLEY was ardently attached to the principles of free Government; a zealous advocate of the rights of the whole people, and a determined opponent of the claim of the few to tyrannize over the many.

In 1832, Mr. CILLEY was elected to the House of Representatives in Maine, and in 1835 and 1836 was Speaker of that body, where his talents and love of country became so conspicuous, that in 1837 he was elected to Congress in a district in which the majority were his political opponents.

Of his conduct here I need not speak, for all who hear me, and all who knew Mr. CILLEY in the other end of the Capitol, will bear testimony to his ability, to his open, frank, and determined course, to the high order of his talents and powers as a debater, and to the respect and deference he paid to the rights of others.

As a man, Mr. CILLEY was warm, ardent, generous, noble; as a friend, true, faithful, abiding. He was in the meridian of his life, aged 35: the past was the earnest of the future.

In his death, Maine has lost one of her brightest ornaments, and the nation is bereft of a devoted patriot, and an ardent, zealous supporter of its free institutions.

The sun which set upon the lifeless corpse of my late friend and colleague, rose bright and cheering upon his distant fireside circle, and the wife of his bosom blessed its glad beams, and told her innocent children that it brought the return of their father one day nearer.

Alas! nor wife nor children shall see him more. Who shall now penetrate that bereaved mansion, and witness the tears, the agony, the distraction of the widow and the fatherless? Mr. President, I cannot. May the Father of all mercies be their comforter and their support.

Of the cause and manner of the death of Mr. CILLEY, I forbear to speak; but allow me to say, that it is my solemn conviction that he entertained no ill will, and intended no disrespect, to Mr. GRAVES, in any thing that occurred; and that in accepting the call, he did nothing more than he believed indispensable, to avoid disgrace to himself, to his family, and to his constituents.

Mr. WILLIAMS then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of the House of Representatives, from the State of Maine, at the hour of twelve o'clock to-morrow, and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

And, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased,

Resolved, That the Senate do now adjourn.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 27.

Mr. WHITE rose and said, that in order that the Senate might carry into effect the resolution adopted yesterday in relation to attending the funeral of the deceased member from Maine, he would move that the Senate adjourn; which motion was concurred in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 28.

Death of Honorable Jonathan Cilley.

Mr. FAIRFIELD asked leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of seven members, be appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of this House, and the circumstances connected therewith, and report thereon to the House.

Resolved, That said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. BELL objected. He thought that whatever was done in this matter, had better be postponed until the House became more calm, and was able to act more coolly on the subject.

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. PARKER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 113, nays 31.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said: Mr. President, entertaining the views and feelings which I do entertain in regard to the awful tragedy in which certain members of this House lately participated, I could not refrain from offering the resolutions which have just been read. Sir, if I had held back, and refused to move in this affair, "the voice of my brother's blood would cry to me from the ground." My late colleague and friend has been shot down and deprived of life in a manner, and under circumstances, that seem to me most imperiously to demand an investigation. It is due to the surviving family and friends of the deceased, that we should take cognizance of this affair: it is due to ourselves, to our country, to humanity, and to God; and I trust that no member will shrink from the high and solemn responsibility thus cast upon him. But, aside from the peculiar circumstances of this case, and our peculiar duties resulting from them, it appears to me that an opportunity is presented, which every good man should be quick to improve, for assailing the barbarous and inhuman practice of duelling—a practice which does violence to the laws of God, to the best feelings of our own nature, and to the dictates of reason—a practice which is entirely behind, and unworthy of the age of civilization in which we live, and which should unite the earnest and faithful efforts of every friend to his species for its extermination.

Under the circumstances of this case, however, the deceased being my friend, and my own feelings being deeply and strongly excited, I feel that there would be a propriety in the Speaker's departing from the usual rule, by omitting to place me upon the committee; and I accordingly make that request.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he had voted against the suspension of the rule to introduce these resolutions, because, on hearing them read, he came to the conclusion that no good could result from them. No one could feel greater grief than himself at the calamity which befell the friends of the gentleman whose death we all now mourned, but he had voted against bringing in these resolutions because he did not know what power Congress had to suppress duelling. It was an evil in the state of society, which made it necessary in some cases for gentlemen to resort to this mode of settling personal disputes, and he much regretted that it was so; but he did not apprehend that this inquiry was going to correct the evil, or that any salutary good could be effected by this inquiry. As to the particulars in this case, if it was desired to obtain them, the morning papers gave all the facts and circumstances connected with it; and if it was intended to enact an anti-duelling law, he would ask where, under the constitution, you obtain the right to enact it. That was a matter which belonged to the States alone, and many of them have passed laws on this subject; and, in his opinion, it would be a usurpation of power for Congress to undertake to act on this subject. He should vote against this resolution, because he considered that it would be a reflection upon all the parties connected with the unfortunate occurrence alluded to in the resolution. He looked upon it as reflecting upon the wisdom and the justice of the parties engaged in it. He would ask any gentleman if either of these parties had been guilty of any moral delinquency, or of any act which would bring him so far within the rules and laws of the House as to justify his expulsion? If any gentleman would rise in his place, and state that either of them had violated the rules of honor, or done any act which would make him an unfit associate for the members of this House, he would go as far as any one to have this inquiry instituted; he would vote not only for a committee of inquiry, but he would vote to expel such individual from the House; and he would almost go to expel him from off the face of the earth. But no such thing had been intimated against any member of the House, and what right have we to go into this matter? What right have we to inquire into the private relations of gentlemen? What right have we to institute ourselves into a board of honor to inquire into a matter of this kind?

Mr. PARKER regretted that he found himself compelled to differ in opinion from his friend from Maryland, (Mr. JOHNSON;) that he had heard from him no good reason expressed against the adoption of the resolutions. It was said that Congress had no power to legislate on this subject, and that that power was reserved to the States. Surely Congress has the power to act in reference to the District of Columbia, and it could not be denied that the House of Representatives had jurisdiction over its own members. His friend had said that if any member would state on this floor that the unfortunate transaction had not been conducted according to the rules of the "code of honor," he would vote for this resolution. Mr. P. said he made no assertion of that kind. He did not profess to be skilled in the nice technicality of those rules, as they were understood by some gentlemen here; that with his constituents the rules of honor were the rules of law, religion, and morality; but he would say that the transaction referred to was a violation of the laws of God and man, and called imperiously upon this House to guard against the recurrence of such heart-rending scenes; and every consideration of duty to the public and to ourselves required prompt and decisive action.

Death of the Representative Jonathan Cilley, Esq.

Mr. DAWSON said that no gentleman regretted more than himself, the unfortunate occurrence which had taken place, but he considered that when we were about to involve the feelings of all the gentlemen connected with the affair, that we ought to pause before we acted. He would inquire of gentlemen what the result of this inquiry would be, and what benefit could accrue to the community from it. He admitted that Congress had a right to pass a law to prohibit duelling in the District of Columbia, and for such a measure, when brought forward, he would vote; but he would ask gentlemen what good was expected to result from this inquiry?

Mr. MATTHIAS MORRIS had no disposition to take part in the discussion of this question, but on hearing the resolution read, it occurred to him that it did not reach far enough, and he proposed an amendment with a view of having some action of Congress on this subject, which would prevent the practice of duelling in future.

Mr. BELL did not doubt that the introduction of this resolution was well intended; and he had no doubt that the motive of the House, in suspending the rules for the purpose, was a very laudable one; but it was his deliberate judgment that this resolution was not calculated to produce that desirable result which was expected to arise from it. Instead of its being a benefit, he feared that it would be the cause of additional mischief.

Mr. McKENNAN said that the peculiar position in which he stood towards his constituents, demanded that he should say a word in explanation of the vote he had given against the suspension of the rule, and state the reasons why he would vote in favor of the motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject for one week. His constituents, he said, condemned the practice of duelling in the most unqualified terms; and in that condemnation he most heartily agreed with them. He abhorred the practice, from the very bottom of his soul, and would go as far as the farthest on this floor in suppressing it. He further said, he would yield to no gentleman in deploring the tragical event which had cast a melancholy gloom over the city, and which we had all been called upon to mourn. He sympathized, deeply sympathized, with the relatives of the deceased; and if he could pour the oil of consolation into the bosom of his surviving partner, nothing would afford him more satisfaction. [Here the SPEAKER interposed, and said the question was on postponement.]

Mr. BOON had voted for the suspension, and should now vote for the resolution upon the ground of its being a matter of privilege, involving the right of debate in this House.

Mr. PORTER could not see any good result which could arise from the postponement of the question. No honorable gentleman would suffer any other feelings to influence his course than those which pertain to high and pure principles of a moral character and duty to his country. If he could concur in opinion with his honorable colleague, that this proceeding cast any reflection upon the living, or the memory of the dead, he would pause, and ask for more time to consider and reflect upon the subject.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, in order to meet the views of gentlemen, modified his resolution, by adding to the end thereof the following: "And further to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, any breach of the privileges of this House."

Mr. LOOMIS said it appeared to him, when they had so plain a state of facts as was here presented, that there could be no difficulty in deciding upon it at once.

Mr. GRENNELL had heard no good reason for immediate action on this question, and he trusted the question would be postponed until the present excitement had passed away.

Mr. BRONSON said: At present, the question is not what we shall do, but whether we shall act at all; whether we shall proceed to investigate the matter; whether we shall take any cognizance of the late most tragical and unfortunate occurrence. If we act at all, we should act promptly. Our duty to our country and ourselves requires of us that we should entertain the resolution—that we should at once show our willingness to investigate. On this point there should not be any delay.

The House refused to postpone—yeas 84, nays 117.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, stated, that if he had been in the House when the vote to suspend was taken, he should have recorded his name against it, for he was opposed to any investigation of the matter.

Mr. CLOWNEY demanded the previous question on the resolution as modified; which was seconded—yeas 105, noes not counted.

So the House determined that the main question, being on the adoption of the resolutions, be now put.

Books for Members.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House to subscribe for ten copies of Niles' Register for each of the members of Congress, provided that he would consent to publish the proceedings of Congress, with the yeas and nays on each question so taken, and also a supplement at the end of the session, containing all public and private laws of Congress, and furnish to each member one copy of this supplement free of charge.

Mr. BENTON said it was time for this business to be stopped, and he should call for the yeas and nays on the question. The argument used, in the first instance, by gentlemen who advocated this system of book purchasing, was, that some members had been furnished with books which the new Senators had not. In this case the argument would not apply, and we had now reached that point where the whole system might be abandoned, and he hoped it would be.

Mr. ROBBINS said he would move to lay it on the table for the present.

Mr. BENTON. There let it lie, and I hope forever.

Mr. ROBBINS said he would not consent to that.

The question on laying it on the table, was carried in the affirmative.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 1.

The following Select Committee on the resolution to inquire into the circumstances which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, was read from the journal this morning: Mr. TOUCEY, of Connecticut; Mr. POTTER, of Pennsylvania; Mr. BRIGGS, of Massachusetts; Mr. ELMORE, of South Carolina; Mr. BRUYN, of New York; Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri; Mr. RARIDEN, of Indiana.

Mr. BRIGGS and Mr. HARRISON were excused, and the vacancy ordered by the House to be filled up.

FRIDAY, March 2.

Mr. GRENELL, of Massachusetts, and Mr. GRANTLAND, of Georgia, were announced as being appointed by the CHAIR to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Mr. BRIGGS and Mr. HARRISON, on the Select Committee to investigate the causes of the death of the late Hon JONATHAN CILLEY.

The Neutrality Bill.

The bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was taken up. The provisions of the bill will be understood from the debate.

Mr. HOWARD explained that this bill had been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in consequence of the difficulty of amending the Senate's bill in such manner as to meet the views of the members of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out the words which authorized the President to release goods which may be taken in certain cases, in order to prohibit the President from acting in a judicial capacity.

Mr. HOWARD stated that this provision was introduced, because it was considered that the President was the most competent judge in these cases. He was fully acquainted with our relations with foreign countries, which made him more competent to judge in such cases than the judges of courts. If the matter was referred to the courts, there might be difference of opinion between the judges, in consequence of the information which was in their possession; but the President, having all the information, could decide more understandingly and properly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied, that his objection to the clause which he had moved to strike out, was, that it invested the Executive with judicial powers, which powers belonged exclusively to the Judiciary department; because it enabled him to determine whether or not an offence had been committed. He apprehended it would not do in this country to vest judicial powers in the Executive.

Mr. McKAY considered that this clause simply gave power to the Executive, in cases where property had been seized, to release it. The law provided for the seizure of property, but not for its forfeiture; therefore, it was proper that the President should have the power to release it, under certain circumstances. In case this amendment prevailed, and the clause was struck out, goods could only be restored by the judgment of courts; and where they had been seized in consequence of a violation of the law, there must be great delay and loss.

The motion to strike out was disagreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to strike out that part of the second section which made the bill applicable only to conterminous territories. It might be said that there was very little danger of getting into any difficulty with countries which did not lie contiguous to the United States; but he thought our legislation ought to be uniform.

Mr. HOWARD remarked that it was necessary to shape our legislation to the circumstances in which we were placed. We already had laws which were applicable to expeditions fitted out for service at sea, and against foreign countries, and it now became necessary to pass laws to preserve our neutrality with conterminous countries, and this law had been introduced to effect that object.

Mr. HOLSEY contended that this bill was to place us in the same relation to conterminous countries which it did to other foreign countries.

Mr. FILLMORE sustained his amendment on the ground that the bill created invidious distinctions, which ought never to exist in the legislation of any country.

The amendment of Mr. FILLMORE was disagreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved to strike out that clause which provided that the law should not interfere with the trade authorized to be carried on by the laws of nations—lost.

Mr. ROBINSON moved an amendment, providing that in all cases of seizure, affidavit should first be made, and a warrant issued.

Mr. R. urged his amendment on the House, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of making seizures without due course of law.

Mr. PATTON replied to Mr. R., pointing to the third section of the bill, which provided that immediately after the seizure, a warrant should be obtained in due form from some judicial officer, for the purpose of holding the property seized. This he contended was all that was necessary to guard against the abuse of power, and he argued that if a warrant under oath was to be obtained before seizure, that the law would be wholly ineffectual, as it would in almost every instance, if not in every one, be evaded.

Mr. MENIFEE then addressed the House at some length, in opposition to the bill, on the ground of its unconstitutionality.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. LEGARE, MENIFEE, MAXWELL, and UNDERWOOD; when

Mr. CUSHMAN moved the previous question; which was seconded—83 to 41, and the main question ordered, and was passed—yeas 130, nays 45.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 2.

Anti-Duelling Bill.

Mr. PRENTISS, agreeably to leave, introduced a bill to prohibit the giving or accepting within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Mr. PRENTISS said: Mr. President, in bringing forward this measure, I have acted from a high sense of duty. The moral and religious principles in which I have been educated, and which I regard as binding upon me in all circumstances and situations, whether public or private, in which I am placed, would not allow me to hold a seat here, and remain inactive in this matter. And I call upon Senators, upon grave, considerate Senators, heads of families, fathers of the land, to interpose their authority and influence to stay a practice as unsuited to the enlightened age in which we live, as it is revolting to the moral and religious feeling of the country. I call upon them by their regard to the rising generation, upon whom the hopes of the country rest; by their regard to the eternal and immutable principles of moral rectitude; by every consideration of justice and humanity; by the duty they owe to God and their country, to give their aid and support to a measure demanded by the moral sense of the nation, and no less necessary to maintain freedom of discussion here, than it is essential to personal security, and to the preservation of law, liberty, and social order.

Independent Treasury.

The Senate took up the Independent Treasury bill. Mr. STRANGE occupied the floor until 4 o'clock in favor of the bill, and gave way for a motion to adjourn.

MONDAY, March 5.

Neutral Relations.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the Neutral Relations.

bill from the House of Representatives "to amend an act entitled 'an act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," reported the same with amendments.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that it was certainly a matter of some importance that this bill should be acted on speedily; and as the amendments which the Committee on Foreign Relations had proposed were very short, and very simple, he was ready at any time to give an explanation of them.

The first amendment was read as follows:

Strike out from the eighth and ninth lines of the first section the words, "other means or materials," and insert instead thereof the words, "any arms or munitions of war;" and, in the same section, after the word "enterprise," in the tenth line, insert the following words, to wit: "against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, contiguous with the United States, and with whom they are at peace."

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the first section of this bill as it came from the House was entirely new, and introduced new provisions into our neutrality laws, the extent of which could not well be foreseen. It was not confined to the particular exigency which had called for the passage of this act, but was co-extensive with the whole world, and might operate very injuriously against the commerce of the United States.

Under the 6th section of the Neutrality Act of April 20, 1818, any person who shall, within the territory of the United States, "begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise," against a friendly power, was punishable by a fine not exceeding $3,000, and imprisonment not exceeding three years. The 8th section of the same act conferred upon the President the power of employing the army, the navy, and the militia of the United States, to prevent "the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise," from our territory, against any power with which we should be at peace. The Senate will observe that this power of prevention was not to be exerted until the expedition had been prepared, and was ready to leave the United States for the purpose of accomplishing the object of its destination.

Although it was rendered criminal for any person "to provide or prepare the means" for such an enterprise, and after a regular trial and conviction, the offender was liable to severe punishment, yet the framers of the act of 1818, which was admirably drawn, did not deem it necessary to authorize the President to direct a seizure, in the first instance, of every article of every description which might be intended to be used as "the means" for conducting such an expedition. The Committee on Foreign Relations were of opinion that it might be very inconvenient to our citizens to intrust executive officers with such a broad and sweeping authority. Hence, in the bill which had passed the Senate, there was no authority conferred upon these officers to seize any articles except arms and munitions of war, and vessels or vehicles fitted out with apparent hostile intentions against a friendly contiguous power, and which were about to be sent, or to pass across the interior frontiers of the United States.

In the first section of the House bill, now before the Senate, none of these limitations were to be found, either in regard to the articles which might be seized, or the foreign countries to which they might be destined. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or inspector of the customs in all the ports of the United States, every marshal or deputy marshal, and every other person whom the President might empower for the purpose, was authorized and required to seize and detain, not merely arms and munitions of war, but any other "means or materials" provided for such an expedition, no matter whether it was destined for Europe, Asia, Africa, or America. How easily a power so extensive, especially when conferred upon such a host of subordinate officers, might be abused, every Senator could at once perceive. Merchants who had fitted out vessels to trade with foreign countries in a state of war, might be thus harassed and annoyed; and that too without any good reason. The present exigency demanded no such general change in our neutrality laws; perhaps, in this particular, it demanded no change at all. What was that exigency? An insurrection had broken out in Upper and Lower Canada against the British Colonial Government. These two Provinces, together with Texas and Mexico, were contiguous with the United States. The duties of good neighborhood, the preservation of peace and quiet along the borders, required that the rights of our citizens, under the law of nations, should be abridged in furnishing arms and munitions of war to the insurgents. A few plain and simple, but precise provisions had been adopted by the Senate, confined to the particular case in point, and other similar cases which might arise, to prevent our citizens from sending vessels or vehicles, arms or munitions of war across the border, intended to be employed in aiding the insurgents in their hostile attempts.

There was no more fruitful source of error in legislation than to make general and indefinite provisions, when the evil to be remedied was confined to a particular and special case.

Considering the urgent necessity of the present crisis, and the danger that the passage of any bill might be defeated by a collision of opinion between the two Houses, the committee had determined not to move a rejection of the first section of the bill from the House. They had contented themselves with proposing such amendments as would confine its operation within proper limits. According to these amendments, the articles which might be seized were restricted to arms and munitions of war; and their places of destination would not be the world generally, but only conterminous countries.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, considered the amendments offered, such as under all the circumstances ought to be adopted. There were two considerations which, on general principles, recommended the adoption of the amendments. The first was, that the power of the Executive was probably too much extended by the bill, without the changes introduced, and the other, that the right of the citizen to conduct foreign trade and commerce was too much abridged.

Mr. NORVELL said he would like to propound one question to the honorable chairman. It was well known that these patriots, as they were called by some, adopted a mode of operation extremely difficult to detect. They were in the habit of procuring wagons like those used by the tin peddlers, in which were secreted arms and munitions of war; and these were driven over the lines, or hidden in the Maumee swamps, from whence they could be taken at pleasure. He wished to know if there was any clause in the bill which would reach this case?

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, that the bill did make a precise provision in its second section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was read :

Section 2. Strike out the proviso at the end of this section, and insert in its stead the following : " Provided that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with any trade in arms or munitions of war, conducted in vessels by sea with any foreign port or place whatever, which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this act, under the law of nations, and the provisions of the act hereby amended."

Mr. BUCHANAN said that a short explanation of this amendment was necessary. The second section of the bill seemed to be intended as a substitute for the first and second sections of the bill which had passed the Senate. Our bill had been confined to citizens of the United States: the bill of the House embraced all persons. We had believed that if the United States prevented their own citizens from aiding in insurrectionary movements in neighboring provinces or countries, we had performed our duty. Under the law of nations, it was lawful for citizens of the United States to sell arms and munitions of war to foreigners, without regard to the use which was intended to be made of them. If they were captured in proceeding to a foreign country, this was the fate of war, and the foreign purchaser must suffer the loss. We had not intended to abridge this trade: and hence our bill had confined the seizures to arms and munitions of war belonging to citizens of the United States.

The provisions of the House bill might essentially interfere with our foreign commerce in arms and munitions of war, unless they were confined to the particular objects which we all had in view. For example, Mexico was a country conterminous with the United States.

Suppose the existence of a civil war there, and the opponents of the Government to have obtained possession of the port and city of Vera Cruz. Under this bill, neither citizens of the United States nor foreigners could carry cargoes of arms or munitions of war to that city from any of our ports, for the purpose of selling them to the party in the civil war opposed to the Government, because it would be notorious that they were intended to be employed in carrying on military operations within the territory of a friendly power; and yet such a trade had always existed.

The object of the proposed amendment was to preserve this trade to our citizens, by confining the operation of the second section of the bill to the interior frontiers of the United States, leaving the trade by sea in arms and munitions of war to be regulated as it had been heretofore under the act of 1818.

The third amendment was read :

Section three, line twelve, insert after the word "time" the words, "not exceeding ten days."

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, in almost every respect the House had adopted a much stronger measure than the Senate had deemed necessary. We did believe that where a man's property was seized upon suspicion, no matter how strong, if he would give bond and good security, in double its value, that it should not be employed in violating the provisions of the law, that it ought to be immediately restored to his possession. The House had adopted a different opinion. Under the provisions of their bill, at least three months must elapse before arms and munitions of war could be restored to the owner, upon his giving such a bond and security. The proposed amendment was intended to correct what he could not but believe was a mere omission in the House. As the third section now stood, the officer or person who had seized the property, might hold it as long as he himself deemed a reasonable time, without applying to the Judge for a warrant for its detention. The proposed amendment provided that he should make this application to the Judge for a warrant within a reasonable time, not exceeding ten days from the date of the seizure.

The fourth amendment was read and adopted, without debate; and is as follows :

SEC. 7. After the words "reason to believe" in the second line, insert as follows : "that the provisions of this act have been or are likely to be violated."

The fifth amendment was read; and the following as a new section :

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for the period of two years, and no longer.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he was not at all satisfied with the bill; and he believed he might say as much for the Committee on Foreign Relations. But the crisis demanded that we should adopt some measure promptly; and they had deemed it necessary to take this measure, with all its imperfections, rather than do nothing. Such seemed to be the only alternative, under existing circumstances. There was one complaint, at least, which could not justly be made against the bill; and that was, that it did not give sufficient power to the Executive. The committee were opposed to making this a permanent law, and placing it as such upon our statute book, as part of our code to regulate our neutral relations with foreign Governments. He hoped that before two years should elapse, some well considered and carefully drawn bill might be adopted on the subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 6.

Divorce of Bank and State.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported that

The suspension of specie payments by the banks throughout the United States, in May last, compelled the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the constitution and existing laws, to dispense with their agency and the use of their notes, and to employ the officers of Government as the fiscal agents of his Department. The banks refused to pay the large surplus deposited with them in the only medium authorized by law, and the expenditures of Government would have been generally suspended, had not the public creditors consented to receive their dues in drafts upon banks which paid them only in irredeemable notes.

Under such extraordinary circumstances, it became obviously necessary to devise some mode of managing our finances, which would prevent similar embarrassments in future. The President, accordingly, in discharging his constitutional duty, recommended, at the late session, a series of measures, calculated, as your committee believe, to give stability to the operations of the Treasury, and, at the same time, to relieve the trade and banks of the country from a connection mutually disadvantageous to them and to Government.

These recommendations were opposed by the friends of a National Bank, and by others who desired to renew our fiscal relations with the State banks. It was, however, admitted that there was no prospect of the establishment of a national institution for some years to come, if ever; and the explosion of the State bank deposit system was too recent to warrant the expectation of its renewal at an early period, if at all. Notwithstanding, however, the condition of our finances, and the urgent necessity of some regulation to render our Treasury independent of banks, and provide additional guards for the safe-keeping of the public money, the Treasury was left amidst all its embarrassments. The same regulations are again recommended by the President; and nothing has, in the mean time, occurred to induce the committee to change their opinion, that their adoption is not only essential to the safety and independence of the public Treasury, but to the stability of trade and of every sound bank in the Union.

The events of the last three years have produced a general conviction, that the public money should not be employed by banks or any other institutions in commercial discounts, however profitable its use might be to their stockholders. During the speculations of 1835 and 1836, the deposit banks stimulated speculation to excess, and in 1837 suddenly withdrew their accommodations to meet the public demands. The accumulation and distribution of the surplus were among the most powerful causes of that alarm which produced the suspension of specie payments. When banks thus employ the public money, they deal in a fund over which they have no control, and its constant transfers and fluctuations embarrass their commercial operations. Even Government itself cannot regulate its amount, anticipate its fluctuations, or the demands upon the Treasury. Under any system of revenue, the transactions of Government would embarrass trade wherever they are united. But in this country, the connection is particularly disastrous, owing to the extraordinary fluctuations in our revenue. Our income is derived from customs and public lands, and is violently affected by the rapid growth of our wealth, commerce, and population. Under our revenue laws, as they have heretofore existed, we have repeatedly had a large surplus at one moment, and immediately after a bankrupt Treasury. By renewing the connection with banks, we shall make the public revenue again instrumental in exciting speculation, embarrassing trade, and injuring every class of the community.

The proposed separation is essential to the steady and independent action of trade, banks, and Government. The finances of the latter must become embarrassed at every revolution, so long as our revenue consists of bank notes or bank deposits. The convertibility of either into specie is wholly illusive, and has been hitherto sustained by confidence alone. That confidence is now destroyed. If a few banks only had suspended specie payments from bad management, confidence in other institutions might have been continued. Or if, as in war, Government had deemed it expedient to borrow their credit and sanction its abuse, it might have revived with the return of peace, and the restoration of specie payments. But it never has occurred before, that, in time of peace, and amidst general prosperity, the banks of a nation have simultaneously suspended specie payments; and, what is far more important, as it regards the future, the wishes of the trading community anticipated the action of the banks, the suspension was hailed as a measure of commercial relief, our Legislatures sanctioned it, and the public were compelled to acquiesce. The effects of the suspension were little understood by those who deemed it a measure of relief. The trade of no country can be relieved by a sudden reduction of its currency. We had been for twelve months under the harsh operation of a diminution of commercial and bank credits. They had nearly, if not quite, reached that minimum from which, after a temporary stagnation of trade, they would naturally have risen again, when the suspension (for all commercial purposes at home) suddenly converted eighty millions of currency into merchandise, and it was withdrawn from circulation. The compound standard of specie and paper, by which the property of the Union had been measured, was abruptly reduced from about one hundred and ninety millions to one hundred and ten millions of a variously depreciated currency; or, if we consider specie as the only common standard, from a hundred and ninety to eighty millions. Foreign exchanges rose, notwithstanding this extraordinary reduction, and all the sanguine anticipations of a revival of confidence and credit were disappointed. Our reduced currency was still further diminished, the term of our commercial embarrassments was prolonged, and the revival of trade postponed to an uncertain period. These were the consequences of that measure which it was supposed would relieve the country.

But however we may suffer by the recent suspension, we must anticipate a similar event at every revulsion. It cannot be avoided in this age of speculation, and with our system of banking. In periods of alarm, those who are threatened with bankruptcy will seek relief in any measure, regardless of consequences. The banks will certainly yield to the demands of trade in some parts of the Union, and the recollections of the run upon them in 1837 will produce a panic, which must compel most, if not all, other banks to follow their example. Some portions of the Union may possibly escape; but we may certainly anticipate embarrassment in some sections, and we should accordingly prepare for it. The banking system of this country must be thoroughly reformed before confidence in the convertibility of bank notes can be permanently revived. No such reform can, at this time, be anticipated. A few more disastrous revulsions may compel us, at some future period, to correct the vices of our system; but, for the present, it is evident that our local currencies are to be still further vitiated by State legislation. With our recent experience, and with such a prospect before us, a just and patriotic regard for the public interest urgently requires that the Treasury of the United States should not be hereafter exposed to embarrassment or bankruptcy by being connected with a system liable at all times to explosion, and that it should never again be made dependent upon every vicissitude in the commercial system of the world.

The public mind is satisfied that some plan should be adopted to relieve trade from any connection with our revenues, and to render our Treasury independent of all explosions. Numerous plans have been proposed for making a partial use of banks, for the mere purpose of keeping the public money, under some special deposit system, with an obligation not to employ it in loans to trade. No such deposit can be effectual but one which secures to the Treasury the control over the money specially deposited, and leaves the daily receipts and payments to be made by public officers. Such a system would merely secure the use of the vaults of the banks as places of safety, and would be unnecessary where our public offices are supplied, as they all must be, with vaults or safes, or both, for the preservation of the public archives and treasure. If the banks have control over the public money deposited with them, all the stipulations and obligations which can be contrived will never prevent them from discounting upon it, directly or indirectly; and all the guards we can provide will not secure to the Treasury its specie fund in case of a suspension. The various regulations which have been proposed would be, in practice, mere nullities. The obligation to credit the revenue collected, as specie, has always existed, and would be more binding hereafter than it has been heretofore; and a special deposit, exclusively controlled by the bank, would be as unavailable in case of a suspension as any other, which it would be equally bound in law to pay in specie. A stipulation that the bank should pay the Treasury warrant in specie would be abortive, as that must be determined by the Government creditor. Whether the deposits are in specie or in bank notes, it will pay out its own notes, and increase its discounts accordingly. Periodical settlements with banks having control over the deposits, before and after the settlement, would be a mere formality. Banks might be employed under a system of joint management and control. Special collections, deposits, and disbursements might be made under the care of two sets of officers, one to be appointed by Government, the other by the banks; but such a plan would require a much greater number of officers than is now proposed; and would, at the same time, enable the banks employed by the Treasury to substitute their notes for the coin collected, and enlarge their issues and their discounts, which is one of the principal evils designed to be avoided by the separation.

The Treasury cannot, with safety to itself or to trade, part with its control over the public money, from its collection to its disbursement. After examining the subject in all its bearings, and with every desire to unite public sentiment in some measure, the committee are more than ever convinced that the simplest, most economical, and best plan, for all interests, as a permanent system, is to employ officers of Government, appointed by the President with the approbation of the Senate, to collect, keep, and disburse the public money, under such regulations, guards, and restrictions as Congress may from time to time deem expedient.

A bill for the divorce of Bank and State, and for the establishment of an Independent Treasury for the United States, was then reported.

Independent Treasury—Reply of Mr. Calhoun to Mr. Clay.

Having now established by the record that I have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, nor deserted any party, the charge of the Senator, with all the aspersions with which he accompanied it, falls prostrate to the earth. Here I might leave the subject, and close my vindication. But I choose not. I shall follow the Senator up, step by step, in his unprovoked, and, I may now add, groundless attack, with blows not less decisive and victorious.

The Senator next proceeded to state, that in a certain document (if he named it I did not hear him) I assign as the reason why I could not join in the attack on the Administration, that the benefit of the victory would not enure to myself or my party; or, as he explained himself, because it would not place myself and them in power. I presume he referred to a letter, in answer to an invitation to a public dinner, offered me by my old and faithful friends and constituents of Edgefield, in approbation of my course at the extra session.

[Mr. CLAY. I do.]

The pressure of domestic engagements would not permit me to accept their invitation, and, in declining it, I deemed it due to them and myself to explain my course, in its political and party bearing, more fully than I had done in debate. They had a right to know my reasons, and I expressed myself with the frankness due to the long and uninterrupted confidence that had ever existed between us. Having made these explanatory remarks, I now proceeded to meet the assertion of the Senator, and I again take issue on the fact. I assigned no such reason as the Senator attributes to me. I never dreamed or thought of such a one; nor can any force of construction extort it from what I said. No: my object was not power or place, either for myself or party. It was far more humble and honest. It was to save ourselves and our principles from being absorbed and lost in a party more numerous and powerful, but differing from us on almost every principle and question of policy.

When the suspension of specie payments took place in May last, (not unexpected to me,) I immediately turned my attention to the event earnestly, considering it as an event pregnant with great and lasting consequences. Reviewing the whole ground, I saw nothing to change in the opinions and principles I had avowed in 1834, and I determined to carry them out, as far as circumstances and my ability would enable me. But I saw that my course must be influenced by the position which the two great contending parties might take in reference to the question. I did not doubt that the Opposition would rally either on a National Bank, or a combination of State banks, with Mr. Biddle's at the head; but I was wholly uncertain what course the Administration would adopt, and remained so till the Message of the President was received and read by the Secretary at his table. When I saw he went for a divorce, I never hesitated a moment. Not only my opinions and principles long entertained, and, as I have shown, fully expressed years ago, but the highest political motives, left me no alternative. I perceived, at once, that the object, to accomplish which we had acted in concert with the Opposition, had ceased; Executive usurpations had come to an end for the present; and that the struggle with the Administration was no longer for power, but to save themselves. I also clearly saw if we should unite with the Opposition in their attack on the Administration, the victory over them in the position they occupied, would be a victory over us and our principles. It required no sagacity to see that such would be the result. It was as plain as day. The Administration had taken position, as I have shown, on the very ground I occupied in 1834, and which the whole State Rights party had taken at the same time in the other House, as its journals will prove. The Opposition, under the banner of the bank, were moving against them for the very reason that they had taken the ground they did.

Now, I ask, what would have been the result if we had joined in the attack? No one can now doubt that the victory over those in power would have been certain and decisive, nor would the consequences have been the least doubtful. The first fruit would have been a National Bank. The principles of the Opposition, and the very object of the attack, would have necessarily led to that. We would have been not only too feeble to resist, but would have been committed by joining in the attack with its avowed object to go for one, while those who support the Administration would have been scattered in the winds. We should then have had a bank—that is clear; nor is it less certain, that in its train there would have followed all the consequences which have and ever will follow, when tried—high duties, overflowing revenue, extravagant expenditures, large surpluses; in a word, all those disastrous consequences which have well nigh overthrown our institutions, and involved the country in its present difficulties. The influence of the institution, the known principles and policy of the Opposition, and the utter prostration of the Administration party, and the absorption of ours, would have led to these results as certainly as we exist.

I now appeal, Senators, to your candor and justice, and ask, could I, having all these consequences before me, with my known opinions and that of the party to which I belong, and to which only I owe fidelity, have acted differently from what I did? Would not any other course have justly exposed me to the charge of having abandoned my principles and party, with which I am now accused so unjustly? Nay, would it not have been worse than folly—been madness in me, to have taken any other? And yet, the grounds which I have assumed in this exposition are the very reasons assigned in my letter, and which the Senator has perverted most unfairly and unjustly into the pitiful, personal, and selfish reason, which he has attributed to me. Confirmative of what I say, I again appeal to the record. The Secretary will read the paragraph marked in my Edgefield letter, to which, I presume, the Senator alluded.

"As soon as I saw this state of things, I clearly perceived that a very important question was presented for our determination, which we were compelled to decide forthwith—shall we continue our joint attack with the Nationals on those in power, in the new position which they have been compelled to occupy? It was clear, with our joint forces, we could utterly overthrow and demolish them, but it was not less clear that the victory would enure, not to us, but exclusively to the benefit of our allies and their cause. They were the most numerous and powerful, and the point of assault on the position which the party to be assaulted had taken in relation to the banks, would have greatly strengthened the settled principles and policy of the National party, and weakened, in the same degree, ours. They are, and ever have been, the decided advocates of a National Bank, and are now in favor of one with a capital so ample as to be sufficient to control the State institutions, and to regulate the currency and exchanges of the country. To join them with their avowed object in the attack to overthrow those in power, on the ground they occupied against a bank, would, of course, not only have placed the Government and country in their hands without opposition, but would have committed us, beyond the possibility of extrication, for a bank, and absorbed our party in the ranks of the National Republicans. The first fruits of the victory would have been an overshadowing National Bank, with an immense capital, not less than from fifty to a hundred millions, which would have centralized the currency and exchanges, and with them the commerce and capital of the country, in whatever section the head of the institution might be placed. The next would be the indissoluble union of the political opponents, whose principles and policy are so opposite to ours, and so dangerous to our institutions, as well as so oppressive to us."

I now ask, is there any thing in this extract which will warrant the construction that the Senator has attempted to force on it? Is it not manifest that the expression on which he fixes, that the victory would enure, not to us, but exclusively to the benefit of the Opposition, alludes not to power or place, but to principle and policy? Can words be more plain? What then becomes of all the aspersions of the Senator, his reflections about selfishness and the want of patriotism, and his allusions and illustrations to give them force and effect? They fall to the ground without deserving a notice, with his groundless accusation. But, in so premeditated and indiscriminate an attack, it could not be expected that my motives would entirely escape, and we accordingly find the Senator very charitably leaving it to time to disclose my motive for going over. Leave it to time to disclose my motive for going over! I, who have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, deserted no party; I, who have stood still, and maintained my ground against every difficulty, to be told that it is left to time to disclose my motive! The imputation sinks to the earth with the groundless charge on which it rests. I stamp it with scorn in the dust. I pick up the dart, which fell harmless at my feet. I hurl it back. What the Senator charges on me unjustly, he has actually done. He went over on a memorable occasion, and did not leave it to time to disclose his motive.

The Senator next tells us that I bore a character for stern fidelity, which he accompanied with remarks implying that I had forfeited it by my course on the present occasion. If he means by stern fidelity a devoted attachment to duty and principle, which nothing can overcome, the character is, indeed, a high one, and, I trust, not entirely unmerited. I have, at least, the authority of the Senator himself for saying that it belonged to me before the present occasion, and it is, of course, incumbent on him to show that I have since forfeited it. He will find the task a Herculean one. It would be by far more easy to show the opposite; that, instead of forfeiting, I have strengthened my title to the character; instead of abandoning any principles, I have firmly adhered to them, and that, too, under the most appalling difficulties. If I were to select an instance in the whole course of my life on which, above all others, to rest my claim to the character which the Senator attributed to me, it would be this very one, which he has selected to prove that I have forfeited it. I acted with the full knowledge of the difficulties I had to encounter, and the responsibility I had to incur. I saw a great and powerful party, probably the most powerful in the country, eagerly seizing on the catastrophe which had befallen the currency, and the consequent embarrassments that followed, to displace those in power, against whom they had been long contending. I saw that, to stand between them and their object, I must necessarily incur their deep and lasting displeasure. I also saw that, to maintain the Administration in the position they had taken, to separate the Government from the banks, I would draw down on me, with the exception of some of the Southern banks, the whole weight of that extensive, concentrated, and powerful interest—the most powerful by far of any in the whole community; and thus I would unite against me a combination of political and moneyed influence almost irresistible. Nor was this all. I could not but see that, however pure and disinterested my motives, and however consistent my course with all I had ever said or done, I would be exposed to the very charges and aspersions which I am now repelling. The ease with which they could be made, and the temptation to make them, I saw were too great to be resisted by the party morality of the day, as groundless as I have demonstrated them. But there was another consequence that I could not but foresee, far more painful to me than all others. I but too clearly saw that, in so sudden and complex a juncture, called on as I was to decide on my course instantly, as it were, on the field of battle, without consultation, or explaining my reasons, I would estrange for a time many of my political friends, who had passed through with me so many trials and difficulties, and for whom I feel a brother's love. But I saw before me the path of duty, and, though rugged, and hedged on all sides with these and many other difficulties, I did not hesitate a moment to take it. After I had made up my mind as to my course, in a conversation with a friend about the responsibility I would assume, he remarked that my own State might desert me. I replied that it was not impossible; but the result has proved that I underestimated the intelligence and patriotism of my virtuous and noble State. I ask her pardon for the distrust implied in my answer; but I ask with assurance it will be granted, on the grounds I shall put it—that in being prepared to sacrifice her confidence, as dear to me as light and life, rather than disobey, on this great question, the dictates of my judgment and conscience, I proved myself worthy of being her representative.

But if the Senator, in attributing to me stern fidelity, meant, not devotion to principle, but to party, and especially the party of which he is so prominent a member, my answer is, that I never belonged to his party, nor owed it any fidelity; and, of course, could forfeit, in reference to it, no character for fidelity. It is true, we acted in concert against what we believe to be the usurpations of the Executive; and it is true, that, during the time, I saw much to esteem in those with whom I acted, and contracted friendly relations with many which I shall not be the first to forget. It is also true that a common party designation was applied to the Opposition in the aggregate, not, however, with my approbation; but it is no less true that it was universally known that it consisted of two distinct parties, dissimilar in principle and policy, except in relation to the object for which they had united: the National Republican party, and the portion of the State Rights party which had separated from the Administration, on the ground that it had departed from the true principles of the original party. That I belonged exclusively to that detached portion, and to neither the Opposition nor Administration party, I prove by my explicit declaration, contained in one of the extracts read from my speech on the currency in 1834. That the party generally, and the State which I represent in part, stood aloof from both of the parties, may be established from the fact that they refused to mingle in the party and political contests of the day. My State withheld her electoral vote in two successive Presidential elections; and, rather than to bestow it on either the Senator from Kentucky, or the distinguished citizen whom he opposed, in the first of those elections, she threw her vote on a patriotic citizen of Virginia, since deceased, of her own politics, but who was not a candidate; and, in the last, she refused to give it to the worthy Senator from Tennessee near me, (Judge WARR.) though his principles and views of policy approached so much nearer to hers than that of the party to which the Senator from Kentucky belongs. But, suppose the fact was otherwise, and that the two parties had blended so as to form one, and that I owed to the united party as much fidelity as I do to that to which I exclusively belonged; even on that supposition, no conception of party fidelity could have controlled my course on the present occasion.

I am not among those who pay no regard to party obligations; on the contrary, I place fidelity to party among the political virtues, but I assign to it a limited sphere. I confine it to matters of detail and arrangement, and to minor questions of policy. Beyond that, on all questions involving principles, or measures calculated to affect materially the permanent interests of the country, I look only to God and country.

And here, Mr. President, I avail myself of the opportunity to declare my present political position, so that there may be no mistake hereafter. I belong to the old Republican State Rights party of '98. To that, and that alone, I owe fidelity, and by that I shall stand through every change, and in spite of every difficulty. Its creed is to be found in the Kentucky resolutions, and Virginia resolutions and report; and its policy is to confine the action of this Government within the narrowest limits compatible with the peace and security of these States, and the object for which the Union was expressly formed. I, as one of that party, shall support all who support its principles and policy, and oppose all who oppose them. I have given, and shall continue to give, the Administration a hearty and sincere support on the great question now under discussion, because I regard it as in strict conformity to our creed and policy, and shall do every thing in my power to sustain them under the great responsibility which they have assumed. But let me tell those who are more interested in sustaining them than myself, that the danger which threatens them lies not here, but in another quarter. This measure will tend to uphold them if they stand fast, and adhere to it with fidelity. But, if they wish to know where the danger is, let them look to the fiscal department of the Government. I said, years ago, that we were committing an error the reverse of the great and dangerous one that was committed in 1828, and to which we owe our present difficulties, and all we have since experienced. Then we raised the revenue greatly, when the expenditures were about to be reduced by the discharge of the public debt; and now we have doubled the disbursements, when the revenue is rapidly decreasing; an error, which, although probably not so fatal to the country, will prove, if immediate and vigorous measures be not adopted, far more so to those in power. The country will not, and ought not, to bear the creation of a new debt, beyond what may be temporarily necessary to meet the present embarrassment; and any attempt to increase the duties must, and ought to prove fatal to those who may make it, so long as the expenditures may, by economy and accountability, be brought within the limits of the revenue.

But the Senator did not confine his attacks to my conduct and motives in reference to the present question. In his eagerness to weaken the cause I support, by destroying confidence in me, he made an indiscriminate attack on my intellectual faculties, which he characterized as metaphysical, eccentric, too much of genius, and too little common sense, and of course wanting a sound and practical judgment.

Mr. President, according to my opinion, there is nothing of which those who are endowed with superior mental faculties ought to be more cautious, than to reproach those with their deficiency to whom Providence has been less liberal. The faculties of our mind are the immediate gift of our Creator, for which we are no farther responsible than for their proper cultivation, according to our opportunities, and their proper application to control and regulate our actions. Thus thinking, I trust I shall be the last to assume superiority on my part, or reproach any one with inferiority on his; but those who do not regard the rule, when applied to others, cannot expect it to be observed when applied to themselves. The critic must expect to be criticized, and he who points out the faults of others, to have his own pointed out.

I cannot retort on the Senator the charge of being metaphysical. I cannot accuse him of possessing the powers of analysis and generalization, those higher faculties of the mind, (called metaphysical by those who do not possess them,) which decompose and resolve into their elements the complex masses of ideas that exist in the world of mind, as chemistry does the bodies that surround us in the material world; and without which those deep and hidden causes which are in constant action, and producing such mighty changes in the condition of society, would operate unseen and undetected. The absence of these higher qualities of the mind is conspicuous throughout the whole course of the Senator's public life. To this it may be traced that he prefers the specious to the solid, and the plausible to the true. To the same cause, combined with an ardent temperament, it is owing that we ever find him mounted on some popular and favorite measure which he whips along, cheered by the shouts of the multitude, and never dismounts till he has rode it down. Thus, at one time, we find him mounted on the protective system, which he rode down; at another, on internal improvement; and now he is mounted on a bank, which will surely share the same fate, unless those who are immediately interested shall stop him in his headlong career. It is the fault of his mind to seize on a few prominent and striking advantages, and to pursue them eagerly without looking to consequences. Thus, in the case of the protective system, he was struck with the advantages of manufactures; and, believing that high duties was the proper mode of protecting them, he pushed forward the system without seeing that he was enriching one portion of the country at the expense of the other; corrupting the one and alienating the other; and, finally, dividing the community into two great hostile interests, which terminated in the overthrow of the system itself. So, now, he looks only to a uniform currency, and a bank as the means of securing it, without once reflecting how far the banking system has progressed, and the difficulties that impede its farther progress; that banking and politics are running together to their mutual destruction; and that the only possible mode of saving his favorite system is to separate it from the Government.

To the defects of understanding, which the Senator attributes to me, I make no reply. It is for others, and not me, to determine the portion of understanding which it has pleased the Author of my being to bestow on me. It is, however, fortunate for me, that the standard by which I shall be judged is not the false, prejudiced, and, as I have shown, unfounded opinion which the Senator has expressed, but my acts. They furnish materials, neither few nor scant, to form a just estimate of my mental faculties. I have now been more than twenty-six years continuously in the service of this Government, in various stations, and have taken part in almost all the great questions which have agitated this country during this long and important period. Throughout the whole I have never followed events, but have taken my stand in advance, openly and freely avowing my opinions on all questions, and leaving it to time and experience to condemn or approve my course. Thus acting, I have often, and on great questions, separated from those with whom I usually acted, and if I am really so defective in sound and practical judgment as the Senator represents, the proof, if to be found anywhere, must be found in such instances, or where I have acted on my sole responsibility. Now, I ask, in which of the many instances of the kind is such proof to be found? It is not my intention to call to the recollection of the Senate all such; but that you, Senators, may judge for yourselves, it is due in justice to myself, that I should suggest a few of the most prominent, which at the time were regarded as the Senator now considers the present; and then, as now, because where duty is involved, I would not submit to party trammels.

I go back to the commencement of my public life, the war session, as it was usually called, of 1812, when I first took my seat in the other House, a young man, without experience to guide me; and I shall select, as the first instance, the Navy. At that time the Administration and the party to which I was strongly attached, were decidedly opposed to this important arm of service. It was considered anti-republican to support it; but acting with my then distinguished colleague, Mr. Cheves, who led the way, I did not hesitate to give it my hearty support, regardless of party ties. Does this instance sustain the charge of the Senator?

The next I shall select is the restrictive system of that day, the embargo, the non-importation and non-intercourse acts. This, too, was a party measure, which had been long and warmly contested, and of course the lines of party well drawn. Young and inexperienced as I was, I saw its defects, and resolutely opposed it, almost alone of my party. The second or third speech I made, after I took my seat, was in open denunciation of the system; and I may refer to the grounds I then assumed, the truth of which have been confirmed by time and experience, with pride and confidence. This will scarcely be selected by the Senator to make good his charge.

I pass over other instances, and come to Mr. Dallas's bank of 1814-'15. That, too, was a party measure. Banking was then comparatively but little understood, and it may seem astonishing, at this time, that such a project should ever have received any countenance or support. It proposed to create a bank of $50,000,000, to consist almost entirely of what was called then the war stocks; that is, the public debt created in carrying on the then war. It was provided that the bank should not pay specie during the war, and for three years after its termination, for carrying on which it was to lend the Government the funds. In plain language, the Government was to borrow back its own credit for the bank, and pay to the institution six per cent. for its use. I had scarcely ever before seriously thought of banks or banking, but I clearly saw through the operation, and the danger to the Government and country, and, regardless of party ties or denunciations, I opposed and defeated it in the manner I explained at the extra session. I then subjected myself to the very charge which the Senator now makes, but time has done me justice, as it will in the present instance.

Passing the intervening instances, I come down to my administration of the War Department, where I acted on my own judgment and responsibility. It is known to all, that the department, at the time, was perfectly disorganized, with not much less than $50,000,000 of outstanding and unsettled accounts, and the greatest confusion in every branch of service. Though without experience, I prepared, shortly after I went in, the bill for its organization, and on its passage I drew up the body of rules for carrying the act into execution; both of which remain substantially unchanged to this day. After reducing the outstanding accounts to a few millions, and introducing order and accountability in every branch of service, and bringing down the expenditure of the army from four to two and a half millions annually, without subtracting a single comfort from either officer or soldier, I left the Department in a condition that might well be compared to the best in any country. If I am deficient in the qualities which the Senator attributes to me, here in this mass of details and business it ought to be discovered. Will he look to this to make good his charge?

From the War Department I was transferred to the Chair which you now occupy. How I acquitted myself in the discharge of its duties, I leave it to the body to decide, without adding a word. The station, from its leisure, gave me a good opportunity to study the genius of the prominent measure of the day, called then the American system, of which I profited. I soon perceived where its errors lay, and how it would operate. I clearly saw its desolating effects in one section, and corrupting influence in the other; and when I saw that it could not be arrested here, I fell back on my own State, and a blow was given to a system destined to destroy our institutions, if not overthrown, which brought it to the ground. This brings me down to the present times, and where passions and prejudices are yet too strong to make an appeal, with any prospect of a fair and impartial verdict. I then transfer this, and all my subsequent acts, including the present, to the tribunal of posterity, with a perfect confidence that nothing can be found, in what I have said or done, to impeach my integrity or understanding.

I have now, Senators, repelled the attacks on me. I have settled the account and cancelled the debt between me and my accuser. I have not sought this controversy, nor have I shunned it when forced on me. I have acted on the defensive, and if it is to continue, which rests with the Senator, I shall throughout continue so to act. I know too well the advantage of my position to surrender it. The Senator commenced the controversy, and it is but right that he should be responsible for the direction it shall hereafter take. Be his determination what it may, I stand prepared too meet him.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 14.

Civil List Bill.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, said that, in consequence of being placed upon the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State, it became his duty to make some inquiries upon the subject appertaining to those expenditures. One portion of his inquiry related to the appropriations and contingent expenditures for a few years past, and he had received a statement embracing the amount from the year 1829 to 1837, inclusive, of the appropriations for incidental and contingent expenses of the Department of State and for payments. It is as follows:

Years.	Appropriations.	Payments.
1829 -	$22,850	$24,691 44
1830	27,100	21,040 99
1831	20,000 -	20,213 92
1832	25,000	31,542 39
1833	25,000	28,354 14
1834 -	31,500	29,582 13
1835	25,000	23,437 82
1836 -	25,000	23,665 78
1847	25,000	23,414 05

Making a difference in this length of time, in the aggregate, between the appropriations and the payments, of a little more than five hundred dollars. He understood that the amount of payments made in a year does not necessarily show the amount of the expenditures of that year, as there are accounts outstanding from year to year, and sometimes for several years, which, when paid, are included in the amount for the year in which the payment is made.

He had nothing further to add, but to submit his amendment to reduce the contingent expenses for missions abroad from thirty to twenty thousand dollars, which he did with a strong conviction of its propriety.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that he had made application to the department in relation to this appropriation, and has ascertained that there was a balance of only $18,000 on hand on the 1st of January, 1838, and $15,000 of that sum would be needed for the expenditure of the year 1837, not yet paid.

The amendment was disagreed to.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 14.

Independent Treasury.

Mr. BENTON said: Mr. President, I have opinions upon this subject—opinions not of recent adoption, or hasty formation. Their origin dates far back—a full quarter of a century; and they have been receiving confirmation ever since. I was in the public service during the late war—witnessed the failure of the State banks, and saw the calamities of a Government, and of a people, destitute of specie. The first Bank of the United States had expelled specie—it had done what Mr. Madison said it would do, in that masterly speech of 1791, which never has been, and never can be, answered. In that speech he placed at the head of the list of the disadvantages of such a bank, these prophetic words: "First: Banishing the precious metals, by substituting another medium to perform their office." At the expiration of its charter, in 1811, it had completely effected this work. It had banished the precious metals. There was but ten millions of specie left in the country! Two great errors were then committed: first, in not replenishing the country with specie, and especially with gold; secondly, in falling back upon the paper of local banks for a national currency. In this condition, destitute of specie, and relying upon the notes of local banks, we went into the war. The result was inevitable—the explosion of our whole monetary system—the bankruptcy of the Treasury—the ruinous use of depreciated paper—a resort to Treasury notes, on which the creditor often lost 33½ per cent.—loans on oppressive terms—and the Government forced to make common cause with broken banks for the mutual support of each other's credit. All this I saw. I saw the calamities, the humiliation, and the sufferings of the country; and I heard the loud and insolent triumph of the Federal party—that part of it which opposed the war—exulting over an empty Treasury, an impaired public credit, a depreciated paper currency, and the national degradation for want of solid money. I saw all this; and my head, and my heart, both told me that the country ought never to be subjected to such a fate again.

This was my war experience; and now for the experience of peace. After three years of war, peace came, and with it came revival of business, and a multitude of local banks, and at their head, that immense charlatan of the monetary system—a National Bank! Off went the whole together; specie payments resumed; confidence restored; the credit system in all its glory, and every branch of business distended to the bursting point. To judge of every thing by a single instance, it is sufficient to name the public lands, of which the amount of twenty-eight millions of dollars was sold in a single year! and nearly all on credit, payable in safe and solid specie-paying bank notes. In two years the whole of these banks, the charlatan among the rest, were swamped. Then we had a repetition of the scenes of seven years before. No specie; no notes equivalent to specie; no credit; no revenues; no price for property! Tender laws—property laws—replevin laws—stay laws, the order of the day! An entire stagnation of business followed, not fictitious, but real; and such was the fall in the price of all produce, all property, and the wages of all labor, owing to the failure of the banks, and the absence of specie, that all debtors were placed in the jaws of ruin, and most of them entirely ruined. There was no Treasury order then; no removal of deposits; no veto; no Jackson administration to ruin the country; yet the distress and suffering was actually then, what it is falsely said to be, and wickedly attempted to be made, at present. There is no comparison between the state of things then and now.

At this epoch, this second explosion of the paper system, I came into the Senate of the United States. I came here in the autumn of 1820. I travelled from the Mississippi to the Potomac amidst the crash of falling banks, the wrecks of a paper currency, and the lamentations of a suffering nation. I arrived here to see a Government without a dollar, and borrowing money to pay its daily expenses, which, the year before, boasted a revenue of forty-seven millions, and tormented itself with schemes to get rid of surpluses! I commenced my Senatorial career under these circumstances—circumstances to make me meditate, and to make me feel. Happily, my associations were with the fathers of the Republic—with Macon and Randolph, whose intimacy I enjoyed, and whose friendship I possessed. My reading was that of the early history of the Government—the Revolution, the Confederation, the formation of the Constitution of '89, and the workings of the machinery of the Federal Government under the administrations of the earlier Presidents—Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. The result of this association, and of this reading, was a thorough conviction, 1. That the Federal Constitution was formed by hard-money men, and was intended to be a hard-money Government; 2. That it had been converted into a paper-money Government, contrary to the genius and intention of the constitution; 3. That this departure from the constitution was the cause of the moneyed calamities during the war, and again at that time; 4. That the remedy for these calamities was to return to the plain meaning of the constitution, as expressed in the revenue act of 1789, and to confine the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government to gold and silver coin only. These were my convictions; and as soon as circumstances were auspicious for action, I commenced a series of measures, all tending to carry back the fiscal action of the Government to the intention of the constitution; fully believing, that if the Federal Government would require gold and silver for its own Treasury, it would cause enough to be brought into the country, and to remain in the country, to supply the whole body of the people with hard money for all their common and ordinary dealings and transactions. It was not until General Jackson's administration that I was able to take any strong and direct measures towards the accomplishment of the great object which presented itself to my view. The sagacious Mr. Macon often said to me, that it was in vain to attempt any reform, unless the Administration is with you. The election of General Jackson gave such an administration. From that time there was a President, not only to favor, but to take the lead in the great business of restoring the constitutional currency, and my part became subordinate and easy. I had only to explain and defend the great measures which his sagacity and patriotism conceived and recommended.

It is not necessary to dwell on these measures, much less to enter now into any defence of them. A brief enumeration will suffice: 1. No more National Banks. They had been found to be the great exporters of specie; and their chartered right to pay the Federal revenues in their own notes, was in itself a clear breach of the constitution, and banished gold and silver from the Treasury, and, by diminishing the demand for it, expelled it from the country. 2. To restore the gold currency, by correcting the erroneous standard of gold. 3. The repeal of the act of 1819, rendering uncurrent, with a few exceptions, the gold and silver coins of all foreign countries. 4. The multiplication of the mints, both for the purpose of coining money in different parts of the Union, and for becoming places of deposit and safe-keeping of the public moneys. 5. The suppression of all local bank notes under twenty dollars. Having no direct power over the banks of the States, the only mode of accomplishing this object was by the revenue regulations of the Federal Government, and by operating on public opinion in the different States. My own limit was one hundred dollars, but I did not attempt to establish it, because I knew that I could not succeed. My conviction is now clear that there ought to be no bank note under one hundred dollars.

Such were our measures for restoring the currency of the constitution to the coffers of the Federal Treasury, and supplying the country with gold and silver for all the common and ordinary transactions and dealings. The success, notwithstanding a powerful combined political and moneyed opposition, was astonishingly great. The recharter of a National Bank sunk under the veto, sustained by public opinion. The act for the correction of the gold standard hit the point of correction with such perfect accuracy, that the two coins, gold and silver, issuing from our mint, have precisely the same value in the money market. Under the auspicious operation of that act, our gold coin has risen, in little more than three years, from nothing to fifteen millions, and will probably rise to twenty-five millions before the termination of Mr. Van Buren's present term. The act for repealing the act of 1819, and for restoring foreign coins to circulation, has sent Mexican dollars into every part of the Union, and has enabled other foreign coins, both gold and silver, to make some progress in penetrating our country. Silver has increased three-fold since 1832, and silver and gold together, four-fold. Our specie was twenty millions then; it is eighty now, with the prospect of exceeding a hundred millions before the present term of Mr. Van Buren is out. Our currency in existence is more abundant and more solid than it ever was before; but the specie part of it is suppressed by the power and policy of the Bank of the United States, combined with the politicians and that part of the banks which follow its lead. Acts of Congress had passed to operate upon small notes, and to exclude those under twenty dollars from revenue payments altogether, and to exclude all others which were not convertible into gold and silver "upon the spot," at the will of the holder, and without loss or delay to him. Public opinion had been awakened on the subject of small notes; and the Republicans everywhere were moving towards the suppression of all under twenty dollars. Such was the progress, and such the success, of our measures in May last, when eight hundred banks stopped payment at once, shut down close upon all the specie in their vaults, denying a ninepence, a picayune, a five-cent piece, even, to the Government whose thirty millions of deposits they held, or to the community who held a hundred and twenty millions of their notes! In the midst of profound peace, general prosperity, under a Government without taxes and without a public debt, with four times as much specie as was in it five years before, came this crash of the banks. It came like a clap of thunder in a cloudless sky. In one moment, as it were, a Government, with thirty millions of revenue on hand, was left without a shilling: in one moment, a nation of fifteen millions of souls was deprived of ninetences for the market or the post-office. As if to proclaim their design to banish all specie from the land, a simultaneous and universal deluge of small notes and shin-plasters was poured upon the people; and the significant cry was set up, that specie payments could never be restored until a National Bank was established. This cry explained the main cause of the general stoppage, and the sole cause of the shin-plaster and small note issue.

All this took place in May 1837. It was a repetition, without the excuse of war, of the bank explosions of the war in 1814; it was the second explosion of the banks since the war, and in profound peace. It was expected to astound, terrify, subdue, distress, and coerce the country into a submission to the re-establishment of the National Bank! a result that would have been inevitable, had it not been for the eighty millions of gold and silver which Jackson's administration brought into the country, and which has so well kept up the value of bank notes that those which are in good credit are now no more than one or two per cent. below par. This third explosion in twenty-five years—this second explosion in time of peace—this loss of national revenues, as if by enchantment—this disappearance of specie, as if touched by a magic wand—roused and electrified the continent. The public mind came at a bound to the conviction that the Federal Government ought to be disconnected from the banks, and from their paper currency. The conviction was general, almost unanimous, among the Republicans; a few only among them were for trying the local banks and their paper once more, as if three failures in twenty-five years were not sufficient; as if another failure was not inevitable, and as if another failure must not end in the restoration of a National Bank, with the restoration of the political party, with all their principles and measures, who go with that bank. The Federal party, of course, with some honorable exceptions, oppose the disconnection. They oppose whatever the Republicans propose, no matter what. They were opposed to the junction of the Government with the State banks three years ago, when those banks were doing well; they were for compelling the Government to stick to them now that they have done ill. This is the state of parties: the Republicans almost universally for the divorce of Bank and State; the Federalists almost universally for the conjunction of Bank and State. In this division and subdivision, I find myself with the mass of my own party, and with the Administration itself. I find them now where I was many years ago. I believe them to be right, and shall stand by them, and abide their fate. If they sink in this contest with the banks and the Federalists, I shall go down with them.

I stand upon the two principles of the bill—1. The United States to use the money of the constitution in the receipts and disbursements of the Federal Treasury; 2. The United States to receive their own money, to keep their own money, and pay out their own money. I stand upon these two principles; I cannot surrender them; though I consent to take them one at a time. The details of the bill are open to compromise. There I am ready to give and to take—to surrender and concede—to do every thing, consistent with the preservation of the principles, to conciliate the support, or to purchase the forbearance of friends. In some particulars I would prefer a change of details; I would prefer additional branch mints in place of the Receivers General—mints that would answer the double purpose of keeping the money of the Government, and coining money for the people.

The principles of the bill I hold to be founded in the clearest reasons of propriety, and constitutionality, and sustained by the fullest voice of trial and experience. Every Government should be, at all times, the master of its own property,—money and every thing else. A Government should not be put to the delays and contingencies of asking for its own, much less of suing for it, and above all, of having to sue where State laws may interpose to delay, or to defeat the recovery. The revenue of a Government is its daily support,—it is like the daily support of a family—it cannot be stopped or withheld, without affecting the existence of the Government itself. Every Government upon earth, our own excepted, puts its money where it can go and take it. All other Governments put their money where they can command it, where they can seize it, if necessary, and punish a delinquent holder. We do the same with all our property, except money. Our ships and forts, our military and naval stores, our public lands, and public edifices, are all in our own custody. We do not have to beg, or bring suits at law, to recover their possession. We keep them subject to our own order, because the existence, and the operations, of Government, which holds civil society together, and prevents mankind from relapsing into anarchy and violence, will not admit of interruptions and delays. If this is true of property, how much more true is it of money—that daily pabulum, without which Government cannot exist a day? This fundamental axiom, true of every Government, is pre-eminently so of ours. Our Government is complex—State and Federal—and each should have its own Independent Treasury. The present constitution grew out of the Independent Treasury question. Other causes helped on to the formation of the constitution; but a revenue of its own—a revenue independent of the States, and of course independent of corporations—was the exciting and controlling cause which led to its adoption. The whole history of the confederation, from the close of the Revolution to the year 1789, proves this. Yet where is the Independent Treasury, where is the Federal Treasury, if corporations are to hold our money, may refuse to pay it when they please, and shall be backed by their State Legislatures when they refuse to pay? To commit our money to the custody of such corporations, is to forego the end for which the Federal Government was formed; to commit it to such corporations again, after the experience which we have had, and during the experience which we now have, is to repeat a folly for which we have been three times punished, and to exhibit a fatuity which announces a doom to destruction. Upon the clearest principles of reason, of constitutional obligation, and of experience, the Federal Government is bound to take into its own hands the keeping of its own money. This is one principle of the bill; the other is the use of hard money in the receipts and disbursements of the Federal Government. This principle is the ally of the other. They go together, and can hardly live separately. To receive the promissory notes of the banks, is to receive nothing but their promises to pay money. If they break that promise, the only resource is to take what they choose to give; that is to say, more broken promises to pay money, or to sue them; and, if suit is brought, State laws may interpose to protect the bank, and to compel the Government to take its pay in more broken promises to pay. Far better to take the promissory notes of the citizens. They would not refuse payment, as the banks have done; and if they did, the State Legislatures would not interpose to shield them.

The Federal Government ought to use the money of the Federal Constitution. Its duty to the constitution requires it to do so; its duty to the country equally requires it. By using that money, two great advantages would always result: 1. The Government would always have in its coffers real money; 2. The country would always possess an abundant supply of the precious metals. Certainly the Federal Government owes great duties to itself and to the country, in relation to the currency. It should not abdicate those duties, nor delegate them. It should not expel specie from the country by abandoning the use of it. The experience of forty years shows that a cessation of demand for specie, on the part of the Federal Government, banishes gold and silver from the country. This was the result, both under the first and second banks of the United States. On the other hand, the experience of five years shows that a demand for specie by the Federal Government attracts it to the country; that we have increased our supply from twenty to eighty millions in five years, under that demand; and that a continuation of the demand will continue the increase until the country is adequately and fully supplied. This is the way to regulate the currency. A hundred and twenty or thirty millions in gold and silver will regulate the banks and the exchanges; and that amount can be attained, and ought to be attained, in six or seven years, by a continuation of General Jackson's policy.

An adequate supply of specie for the country, is one of the highest duties of the Federal Government. By the constitution, it is made the conservator of specie; by abdicating its duties, it had banished from the land that which it was bound to preserve. The States delivered to this Government in 1789, an adequate currency of gold and silver. The first revenue law ever passed by Congress, enacted that the revenue should be paid "in gold and silver coin only." There was then no complaint of scarcity. General Hamilton's order for evading that law, did not turn upon the ground of scarcity of the precious metals, but on the plea of convenience in handling bank paper, and upon the policy of increasing the quantity of bank circulation. There was no complaint of the inadequacy of specie until the first Bank of the United States had banished it from the country, as Mr. Madison and others predicted that it would do.

Large mercantile payments always have been, and forever will be, made in bits of paper, representing masses of property. He is a ninny, or believes others to be ninnies, who talks about merchants spending their time in counting piles of dollars, one by one. If masses of specie are to be paid, it is done in bulk, in kegs, or bags, or by weighing, or by a transfer of credit on the books of a bank. Bills of exchange, receipts, or certificates, representing masses of cotton, tobacco, rice, grain, flour, beef, pork, lead, cattle, &c., make the great payments. So far as large mercantile operations are concerned, specie is but an inferior part of the means of payments. With the body of the community, it is different. Specie is, or should be, the main part of their payments, and with every Government, it should be the sole instrument of payments. As to banks, it is in vain for them to expect to live upon confidence. Those that attempt it will share the fate of the Irishman's mare, which her master undertook to make live upon a straw a day. One-third in specie, for all its liabilities in circulation and deposits, is the rule of the Bank of England. With less than that proportion the bank holds herself to be unsafe; with that proportion in hand, she expects to make up the other two-thirds, if ran upon, out of the debts due her, her credit to borrow, and Government aid in exchequer bills. Scarcely a bank in the United States undertakes to come up to the Bank of England standard of safety. The Legislature of Louisiana is the only one that I have seen attempting to establish that standard.

There is a concerted attempt at this time in the United States to decry specie; to ridicule it, to vilify it, to suppress it, and to banish it. Gold, especially, is the object of the vilification of this party—that gold which stands first named in the Constitution of the United States, and which, from the earliest records of the human race, has been the chosen money of the world. I do not envy that party their assiduous labors in the defamation of the precious metals. I do not fear the success of their exertions. I do not fear even that they will ever succeed in making themselves turn their backs upon the smallest piece of gold or silver which is offered for their acceptance. The necessity of an adequate supply of the precious metals is known and felt by the whole human race. It is the only money which it is safe for the body of the people to handle. It is the main basis for the operations of a bank; and it is the only standard or measure of values. One of the highest functions of money is to measure values. That is a function which paper cannot perform. The measure of values must itself possess intrinsic value, and must itself be free from sudden or material variations of value. It must have a uniform and a universal value. As well might you attempt to make a measure of lengths out of that which has no length, a measure of weights out of that which has no weight, a measure of quantities out of that which has no capacity to hold any quantity, as to endeavor to make a measure of values out of that which has no intrinsic value. The precious metals alone can constitute a measure of values; paper money can measure the value of nothing, not even of itself; its own value is eternally measured by its relation—by its convertibility—into specie. Its want of intrinsic value, its liability to be made in any quantity, or to be diminished in any quantity, and its liability to total destruction, entirely disqualifies it for the high function of a measure of values.

The Constitution of the United States has vested Congress with authority to prescribe a uniform standard of weights and measures for the whole Union. Congress has not exercised that power; but the common feeling of the people has supplied the defect of Federal legislation. In all parts of the Union, they use the same weights and measures. A pound is a pound, a bushel is a bushel, a yard is a yard, from one end of the country to the other. The constitution has also vested Congress with authority to regulate the value—not of currency, for there is no such word in the constitution, nor any word which can be made to include paper currency—but to regulate the value of the coin of our own mint, and also of foreign coin. This power for forty-five years, that is to say, from 1789 to 1834, was so erroneously exercised as to undervalue gold six and two-thirds per cent. The consequence was the total exclusion of gold from our circulation. In 1834 this error was corrected; and the consequence is, that gold is in the full process of restoration to its constitutional place in our currency. With respect to foreign coins, instead of making them current, as the constitution intended, they were nearly all excluded from circulation by the act of 1819. This false legislation was also corrected in 1834; and foreign coins now enter largely into our circulation. The year 1834—the second year of General Jackson's second Presidential term—will be an era, a proud and glorious era, in the history of our constitutional currency. It will be the era of the reformation of the metallic currency. The year 1836, the last year of General Jackson's second term, will be another glorious epoch in our financial history. It was in that year that the promissory notes of a corporation ceased to be a lawful tender to the United States in discharge of all taxes, debts, and duties due to her. The year 1836 is the epoch of this deliverance of the Federal Treasury from the dominion of a corporation; but that year 1832 divides the honor with it; for in that year was the blow struck—the heroic veto applied—which effected the deliverance. Three noble acts have been performed; but a fourth remains to be achieved to consummate the duties of the Federal Government in relation to the currency. The error of Mr. Madison's administration, at the expiration of the existence of the first Bank of the United States, must not be repeated. The notes of the local banks must not be made a national currency! That error ruined the country in 1814 and in 1819, and the repetition of it again ruined it in 1837. Three times, in twenty-five years, has that error deprived the Treasury of its revenues, the country of a measure of values, and rendered nugatory the uniformity of weights and measures, in which the whole Union had agreed. The effect upon the community has been the same as if every seller had possessed the privilege, and had exercised it, of altering his weights and measures at his pleasure; lengthening or shortening his yard-stick; enlarging or reducing his bushel; diminishing or increasing his pound-weight with every sale, and precisely as it suited his own interests in every instance. This is an enormous and a crying evil, the parent of unnumbered impositions upon the whole community; and especially upon the weaker part. In paying double for the necessities of life, the effect has been precisely the same as if the purchaser had received but half a pound, half a yard, and half a bushel, when he paid for a full pound, a full yard, and a full bushel. But, sir, I drop this disquisition. The pursuit of it would carry me too far, at the present moment, into the workings of the paper system. I drop it with remarking, that the arbitrary debasement of the current coin, formerly practised by some European Kings, and latterly by some Turkish Sultans, was innocent and harmless, compared to the mischief done in our own country by the loss of a measure of values, and the consequent, or equivalent, destruction of all the measures of quantities. The thoughtless and inconsiderate man, invested with no legislative character, may say, that paper money is lighter than gold and silver; that paper will buy any thing that gold and silver will buy; that he does not care what his money is made of, provided it will pay his debts. The unreflecting man may talk in this way ; but the statesman must look at money in its exalted character of a measure of values ; and if that measure is lost or destroyed by his management, he commits a great error, and inflicts a great injury upon the entire community. We have lost that measure. The Federal Government has occasioned its loss. The use of paper at the Federal Treasury has banished coin—has set an example which has been followed by all the States, and by every individual—until paper has banished coin, and made itself a forced tender in every payment. Paper money is now the actual currency of the land. It is the medium of all payments ; and, being no measure of values, there is no stability of prices. Every thing fluctuates. Trade is subjected to the hazards of gambling. The remedy for this evil—the means for the re-establishment of the measure of values—is for the Federal Government to use the true measure itself. In supplying itself with the true measure, it will cause the whole country to be supplied. No nation can saturate itself with gold and silver more easily than the United States. The hundred millions of exportable products, annually sent abroad—to say nothing of domestic mines and the supplies brought in by emigrants—will bring back an annual supply of 12 or 15 millions. We have but to invite its presence, by creating a demand for it, and 8 or 10 millions of this amount will annually remain with us until the national supply is full and complete.

THURSDAY, March 15.

Death of the Hon. Timothy Jarvis Carter.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, addressed the Chair :

Mr. SPEAKER : These badges of mourning which we still wear, denote that Death has lately been in the midst of us. Again his arrow has flown ; and again has the fatal shaft been sent, with unerring aim, into a small, and already broken, rank. It is my melancholy office to announce that, since the last adjournment of the House of Representatives, TIMOTHY JARVIS CARTER, then one of its members, from the State of Maine, has surrendered up to the Being who gave it a life upon which many anxious hopes depended, and for whose preservation many an ardent prayer had gone up to the Father of all spirits. He died last evening, at ten o'clock, at his lodgings in this city, after a sickness of not very protracted duration, but of great and excruciating intensity of suffering and agony. The ways of a righteous Providence are inscrutable, and while we bow in submission, we are yet oppressed with deep and solemn awe.

Our deceased friend and colleague was a native of the State and the district which, so lately, he represented in this branch of Congress ; and he, therefore, brought with him the confidence, largely bestowed, of those who had known him from his earliest years. Well did he deserve it. His character for probity, integrity, uprightness, morality, was free from spot or blemish. His principles were well founded. Loving the country of his birth, and its institutions, with all his heart, he pursued with fidelity such measures as his judgment deemed best calculated to promote the welfare of the one and the durability of the other. He was a lawyer by profession—faithful, just, discriminating, attentive, humane, in its practice.

Of manners mild, courteous, affable ; and a temper kind, conciliating, patient, he won respect and attachment, even from those who differed with him in matters of opinion ; and probably there lives not a human being who has a single resentment, or one unkind recollection, to bury in his grave. He has gone, in the strength of his manhood, and the maturity of his intellect, the road that all must once pass :

“—calcanda, semel, via lethi.”

The ties that bound him to life are severed forever, as all human ties must be severed.

“*Linquenda tellus, et domus, et amans
Uxor ; neque harum, quas solis, arborum
Te, præter invisas cupressos
Ulla, brevem dominum sequetur.*”

Although, when his eyes opened for the last time upon the earth and the sky, they fell not upon his own native hills ; though the sod which shall cover him will not freshen in the same influences which clothe them in verdure and beauty ; though he died far from his home, the companions and the brothers of his childhood were with him—the sharer of his joys, the solace of his griefs, stood by him ; and the hand which could best do it assuaged the bitter pains of parting life. The last earthly sounds which fell upon his ear were tones of sympathy, and kindness, and affection, and support—tones which ceased not, even when they vainly strove to pierce the cold and leaden ear of death. Tears shall flow copiously, and deep sighs be heaved over his lifeless form ; tears not more scalding, sighs not deeper drawn, because not mingled with any bitter recollections—any unavailing regrets.

If human means could have availed—if devoted fraternal sympathy and care—if constant, abiding, self-sacrificing affection, triumphing over exhausted nature, and bearing up a feeble frame, unconscious of weariness, through long and painful vigils, could have saved his life, he would long have been spared to the friends who now deplore his death, and to the State and to the country which he served. To that stricken bosom we proffer—alas ! how little will it avail !—our sincere sympathy and condolence. He has gone from this place of earthly honors and human distinctions, to a seat in that “house which is not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens.”

As a token of our respect for his many virtues, and of our respect for his memory, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I now submit:

Resolved, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of TIMOTHY J. CARTER, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Maine, at 12 o'clock on Saturday.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of TIMOTHY J. CARTER, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of TIMOTHY J. CARTER, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and then the House adjourned till Saturday.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 15.

Death of the Hon. T. J. Carter.

MR. RUGGLES addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: The message from the House of Representatives, just read, communicating the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Hon. TIMOTHY J. CARTER, a Representative from the State of Maine, imposes on me the duty, which I cannot perform without the deepest emotion, of moving the customary resolutions of respect for the memory of the deceased. He died last evening at the hour of ten, at his lodgings in this city, after much severe but patient suffering—at peace with all, at variance with none.

I know that occasions of this kind have usually been improved to pronounce eulogies on the characters of deceased members; but the painful emotions which have been awakened by the last sad adieu of an esteemed friend and colleague, but poorly qualifies me to speak at this time, and in this place, of his manly virtues, his purity of heart, the engaging mildness of his disposition, the unusual excellence of the character he maintained in all his domestic and social relations. It is but to say, what all who knew him as I have known him would say, that his whole life afforded constant exemplification of the strictest moral rectitude, in the upright, faithful, conscientious performance of every duty connected with his station in society.

Though yet scarcely past the morning of life, he had received many gratifying proofs of the estimation in which his talents and probity were held by the people and the councils of his State.

As a representative, he has been devotedly faithful to his trust, and fully justified the confidence reposed in his virtue and patriotism. He sought not high political distinction. He was unambitious of renown, but guided his footsteps by that calm and steady light which shines all along the pathway of duty and usefulness.

He inherited his virtue from a highly respectable parentage, and has left a wide circle of attached relatives and friends to mourn his exit; three of whom, under the ready impulses of fraternal affection, obeyed the earliest summons to his sick bed. Alas! it was but to witness, with poignant grief, the closing scene in the brief drama of human existence.

He was a husband and a father; but how can I presume here to speak of the agonized feelings of her, who, whilst she caught his latest sigh, felt that, as in life, so almost in death, his destinies were her own!

With the deceased, life's fleeting shadow has passed by, and eternity has opened its broad portals. Nothing now remains but the tears of relatives, the regrets and sympathies of friends, and the moral influence of his example for all.

The usual resolutions were then adopted, that the Senate would attend the funeral of the late MR. CARTER, and go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The Senate adjourned over to Saturday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 17.

General GEORGE M. KEIM, a member elected from the State of Pennsylvania, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. MUHLENBERG, took his seat.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 21.

Independent Treasury.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, when Mr. SOUTHARD resumed his argument, in opposition to the bill.

The question was then taken on Mr. RIVES's amendment:

YEAS.—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

MR. PRESTON, after the result of the vote was announced, came into the Senate Chamber, and asked permission to record his vote in favor of the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT said, if there was no objection made, he would direct the Secretary to record the name.

MR. BENTON objected. He had been there eighteen years, and had uniformly opposed every motion of that kind. He thought it established a bad precedent to permit Senators to record their names after the vote had been taken, and the result made known.

Mr. GRUNDY wished the Senator would forego his objections, and instanced a case during the present session, where he had his name recorded by one of the reporters as voting against a measure, when, in fact, he had not voted at all. On the next morning he stated the matter to the Senate, and asked permission to have his name recorded in the affirmative, which was granted.

Mr. KING was desirous that courtesy should be extended to the Senator, and that he be permitted to record his vote; and the course was the less objectionable, as the result could not be varied by granting the permission.

Mr. BENTON was inflexible; he had (as he before observed) for the last eighteen years, pursued the same policy, and could not consent to yield the point now. He would so far yield, however, as to move to reconsider the vote, by which means the same object could be more safely attained.

On Mr. BENTON's motion, the reconsideration of the vote on Mr. RIVES's amendment was ordered; and the question was again taken on Mr. RIVES's substitute, and it was rejected—

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

MONDAY, April 2.

Decease of the Hon. Isaac McKim.

Mr. HOWARD addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to perform a duty, the painful extent of which I did not fully appreciate until the present moment. It is from the effort required to control the feelings which are struggling for the mastery, that I am made sensible of the difficulty of the task. Sir, my friend and colleague, who lightened the toils and shared the responsibilities of our joint representation, is no more. After a brief but severe illness, ISAAO MCKIM expired yesterday morning, meeting his fate with exemplary resignation and composure. Conscious of his approaching end for many days previous to its occurrence, he looked steadily at death as he drew near, step by step, with that unflinching courage which a quiet conscience only can give. Feeling and knowing, as I now feel and know, that he had tried to do his duty, he looked forward without alarm, because he looked backward without self-reproach. His course through life had been the same as his conduct in this House, where, I am sure, he has not left an unkind feeling in the breast of a single member. Engaged in the active pursuits of commerce from an unusually early period of life, he was one, and perhaps the last, of that enterprising class of merchants, whose hazardous, but successful industry, some thirty years ago, built up, at the same time, their own fortunes and the prosperity of the city which we partly represented upon this floor; but the liberality with which he dispensed his gains around him, was equal to the sagacity which he manifested in their acquisition. Two public schools, one founded by his father and the other by himself, have long made his name blessed by the destitute widow, to whose children the rich gift of education was thus benevolently and wisely imparted. The two hundred orphan boys who have habitually attended the school of ISAAC MCKIM, may perhaps be unconscious of the loss which they have sustained, but the tears of their widowed mothers, shed in secret sorrow, will attest their mingled gratitude and regret. Sir, to rescue from the temptations and dangers of idleness and ignorance, any portion of the youth of our country, is to effect a work in which patriotism and philanthropy eminently unite. But it was not in this instance alone that the kindheartedness of my deceased friend was manifested. I cannot call to mind a single individual in our extensive population whose loss will be more felt or deplored. He has passed through life with such an unstained character, that all men of integrity knew him to be their proper associate. Mild and courteous in his deportment towards others, he followed, as a guide in his own conduct, that sincerity and honesty of purpose, upon which his friends never counted in vain.

Next to his family, Mr. Speaker, his loss falls most heavily upon myself. Elected by the same constituency, we have been, for some years, in the habit of the most unreserved communication with each other upon every topic relating to our public duties, and upon his strong sagacity I have been accustomed greatly to rely. His untiring attention to business has long been conspicuous in this House. No care, no time, no labor seemed to him too great to be devoted to the public service. In this House, amongst his constituents, in his State, and by his country, his absence will be felt. It only remains for us to pay such respect to his memory as is due to it, and, for that purpose, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That the members and officers of this House will attend the funeral of ISAAC MCKIM, deceased, late a member of this House, from the State of Maryland, at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Resolved unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of ISAAC MCKIM, deceased.

Resolved unanimously, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of ISAAC MCKIM, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved unanimously, That when the House adjourn to-day, it will adjourn to meet again on Wednesday next.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted. The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 2.

Death of the Hon. Isaac McKim.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. ISAAC MCKIM, a member of that House from the State of Maryland, and that his funeral would take place from their hall at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GRUNDY addressed the Senate:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In the absence of both the Senators from Maryland, I have been requested by the delegation in the other House from that State to move a concurrence with the resolutions of the House of Representatives, in honor of the memory of the deceased.

A few days since he was amongst us, in all the vigor of health. Within a few hours only before his death, he was actually engaged in the faithful discharge of the arduous duties assigned him by his country. He is now gone; and those who esteemed him and loved him, will see him no more.

Mr. MCKIM was emphatically the author of his own fortunes. He commenced life in very moderate circumstances, without the patronage of influential friends. His industry and energy, under the guidance of a clear and discriminating intellect, enabled him to amass a fortune, not only ample, but magnificent.

He not only knew how to acquire property, but he knew how to use it. The accumulation of wealth in him did not beget the passion of avarice. Go to the city of his residence, and the inhabitants can point out innumerable instances of his noble charities, and monuments of his munificence and liberality.

He had reached a good old age. He had been honored by his fellow-citizens with a seat in the Senate of his State, and he had often been elected to fill the station he lately occupied. We, his associates, knew that, although he was unassuming and unpretending, he brought into our councils a stock of useful and practical knowledge possessed by few men.

The reflection that he lived worthily, and died probably without a single enemy, will comfort, and in some degree alleviate the sorrows, of her who was the partner of his bosom and sharer of his joys and griefs, and those relatives and friends who now deplore his loss.

Mr. GRUNDY then submitted the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously:

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. ISAAC MCKIM, late a member of the House of Representatives from Maryland, at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and, as a testimony of respect for the deceased, they will go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Duelling in the District of Columbia.

[APRIL, 1838.]

THURSDAY, April 5.

Anti-Duelling Bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving or accepting a challenge, &c.

FRIDAY, April 6.

Duelling in the District of Columbia.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving or accepting a challenge to fight a duel in the District of Columbia, and for the punishment thereof. The question being on the amendment of Mr. CLAYTON to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, punishing the offence by fine not exceeding $2,000, and by imprisonment in the common jail for a term not less than two years.

Mr. LINN observed, that when he yesterday proposed passing the bill over, it was that he might have an opportunity of consulting with the gentleman who introduced the bill, and the Senator from Delaware, who offered the amendment, as to the propriety of introducing some provisions which would enable the prosecutor under this act to obtain witnesses. He was of opinion that no punishment should be inflicted on the seconds and surgeons, and by this means witnesses might be procured. What would be considered as a challenge would be a question for the jury to settle, as it would be impossible to define it in the act. Gentlemen who intended to fight might evade the law in the easiest way in the world. They might send an invitation to take tea at some given spot, or make an appointment for any trivial and fictitious purpose, taking care that the true one should be understood. He thought it would be the most difficult thing in the world to get testimony.

Mr. CLAYTON said they could get rid of the difficulty by providing that the seconds, or any other persons aiding or assisting in the challenge, shall be competent witnesses, exempting them in such case from punishment.

Mr. HUBBARD expressed the hope that they would at once proceed to take the question on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. If he understood the amendment, it was to make the offence punishable by fine and imprisonment in the common jail, which he opposed at some length, on the ground that it was too lenient, and behind the legislation of all the States who had noticed the subject at all. The State of Delaware, he said, from which the gentleman who proposed this amendment came, and all the New England States, together with several others, had made this offence felony, and punished it by imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Mr. LINN drew his conclusions directly different from the Senator from New Hampshire. If the gentleman would show him a case in any of the States where a man concerned in a duel had been pronounced a murderer, or sent to the penitentiary, then his remarks would apply. As he remarked the other day, he wanted to see a law passed that would produce some practical effects, not such a law that a jury could not be found to carry into execution. He had seen the effects of such laws in his own State. There the punishment for fighting a duel, where death ensued, was death, and yet men fought duels as if no law existed at all. But they had now a law in his State which was more effectual for the prevention of duelling than any law that had ever been passed. In cases as assault, all abusive words and defamatory language went to the jury in mitigation of the offence—

Mr. BENTON. As a justification.

Mr. LINN. Yes, sir, as a justification; and if that abusive member, the tongue, was permitted to have too free a license, the same license was permitted to the injured individual to redress his grievance. He thought if the same law was applied to the Senate of the United States, there would be a little more decorum than he had sometimes witnessed.

Mr. HUBBARD thought their legislation should be governed by the wisdom and propriety of the measure, leaving the execution of the laws to those who had them in charge.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, concurred entirely with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary (Mr. GRUNDY) in the impropriety of dragging into the debate the recent unfortunate affair between members of the other branch of Congress; and he regretted that a single Senator had thought proper to recur in debate to that lamentable conflict. If you examine particular cases, this debate cannot be confined to the recent one: it will extend to many other similar ones that have occurred at different periods of our national existence. The time of the Senate will be occupied in worse than a mere unprofitable debate.

The recent unfortunate affair, he regretted to see, had been seized upon to feed the flames of party. It had been placed on party grounds, as if one party were duellists, and the other not. This was an unjust and unwise ground on which to place that or any other similar occurrence. On this subject there were two parties, but they were not the political parties that divide the people of this nation. He was bound, in truth, to admit the fact, however much he might feel disposed to throw the mantle of oblivion over that part of the past history of the country, that neither of the great political parties can say, we are all exempt from all participation in that mode of deciding personal difficulties, and yet all parties speaking were opposed to this barbarous custom.

The Senate had been told that it was useless to legislate; that public opinion would not carry out their enactments; that the law would remain a dead letter on the statute books; that the freedom of debate would degenerate into licentious personal abuse; that it was necessary to hold in terrorem over members of Congress this code of honor, as it was termed, to restrain them in the exercise of their duties here; that the common law, that punishes the homicide with death, is sufficient for the protection of society; these, so far as he had heard, were the principal objections to the proposed measure; and, while he admitted that they had been urged with much zeal, he could not yield to the correctness of the principles nor to the reasons by which they had been sustained. The position had been assumed, and maintained with much force, that public opinion would not bear Congress out in this measure. He believed that the truth was directly the reverse. Public opinion was, at that moment, at the doors of the Capitol, in a voice of thunder requesting, nay, more, demanding of Congress to arrest this bloody code, to stay this desolating and inhuman custom.

The bill does not contemplate interfering with the common law offence, or the common law punishment. It meets the offender at the threshold, and says to him, stop in your mad, in your unlawful, your unholy career. You are treading on ground covered with ignominy and penalties. You must surrender your code of honor, and submit to the laws of that society under which you enjoy all the blessings that surround you. Take not vengeance into your own hands. You shall not assail the life of a fellow-being. Nor shall you wantonly put your own life at hazard. All the States had laws similar to the bill before the Senate. The people had demanded these laws. The District of Columbia alone remained unprotected. And shall this District be left the only spot in the nation in which this work of destruction, this waste of human life, this violation of the laws of God and man, shall be tolerated, and suffered to be carried on with impunity? It was already said that this was an asylum for all manner of wickedness and crime; that members of Congress, when here, were removed from those legal restraints under which they act in the States from which they came.

It has been contended that if we pass this law, the freedom of debate will degenerate into licentiousness and personal abuse; that if Senators and Representatives in Congress are not to be held personally responsible to the injured party for words spoken here of a personal character, the debates will become personal, vindictive, and insufferable. Mr. S. could not come to that conclusion. He thought the passage of the bill would have a salutary effect on the debates.

Mr. SEVIER said, that although he was no friend to duelling, yet he disliked this bill from one end of it to the other. He believed it was a bill wholly for the protection of members of Congress, who, not satisfied with the protection afforded them by the constitution, of exemption from arrest and from being sued for words used in debate, wanted the additional protection of this bill. A man is vilified and abused in one of the Houses of Congress, and he, of course, will expect the offender to give him satisfaction in some way or other, and this bill says he shall not have it. What then will be the consequence? Why, something like the affair of Houston and Stansbury; the injured man will take the law into his own hands, chastise the traducer, and then he will be brought up to the bar of the House, from whence, after five or six weeks are unprofitably consumed in the examination, he will be dismissed with a reprimand. If the object was solely to suppress duelling, and not for the protection of the members, why not pass a law to prevent it in our other Territories as well as in the District of Columbia? Why not include Wisconsin and Florida, and our forts and arsenals? He thought this District was already sufficiently disfranchised, and he would not add any more to its disabilities. Members of Congress might talk of Tom, Dick, or Harry, as they pleased, and could not be sued for slander; and now they would take away from the injured individual the only remedy left him. I am opposed to passing laws for our own protection, because if you pass one, the same reasons will operate in passing another; and the next time Mr. Stansbury, or Mr. anybody-else, is whipped by Houston, every member of Congress must have a corporal's guard to protect him in passing from his boarding house to the Capitol. Now he would ask if the people of the United States would be willing to be taxed for any such purpose, for it would take at least three thousand men to furnish a corporal's guard to each member, and they must therefore have an additional army, or leave the frontiers exposed. He was satisfied that more importance was attached to this subject than it deserved, and he believed out of one thousand duels, nine out of every ten of them were fought for causes that could not be got over any other way. He knew that duels were frequently fought for trivial causes, but he was convinced that it was otherwise in a vast majority of cases. He held himself responsible for every thing he said on that floor, and he would not give a vote to take away that responsibility.

Mr. CLAYTON's amendment was lost—

YEAS.—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Strange, Trotter, Walker, and White—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Williams, and Wright—20.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill, by providing that the persons offending under this act shall be forever incapable of holding any office or appointment under the authority of the United States.

Mr. NORVELL thought they had carried the matter far enough. They subjected the man guilty of duelling to a punishment of not less than five, nor more than ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, and now the gentleman wanted to add disqualification from office. Was it likely that a man who shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary will ever be appointed to an office under the Government of the United States?

Mr. NILES spoke in defence of his amendment, contending that, as the punishment had been lessened by the amendment just passed, an additional penalty was necessary, and that the penalty he proposed would most probably be inflicted, even if the other was not. Mr. N. could not agree with his friend from Arkansas, (Mr. SEVIER,) that this bill was for the protection of members of Congress only. It had a much higher object in view—that of suppressing an odious and criminal practice, and of securing the perfect independence of the representatives of the people.

Mr. NILES's amendment was lost—

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Trotter, Walker, Williams, and Wright—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, and White—17.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, offered an amendment, authorizing magistrates when they have sufficient reason to believe that a duel is about to be fought, to issue their warrants to bring the parties before them, when they are further authorized to compel them to give bond and security to keep the peace for one year, and in default thereof, to commit them to jail.

Mr. CLAYTON opposed this amendment, as contrary to one of the fundamental principles of law, and contrary also to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting a substitute, providing that every person who shall hereafter be appointed to office shall, in addition to the usual qualification, take an oath that he has not, since the passage of this act, been directly or indirectly concerned in a duel.

Mr. PRENTISS asked for the yeas and nays on the question; which resulted—

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and White—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Trotter, Williams, Wright, and Young—19.

The question was taken on concurring with the third amendment; and it was lost—

YEAS.—Messrs. Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Williams, Wright, and Young—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Trotter, Walker, and White—16.

The other amendments were concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 10.

South Sea Exploring Expedition.

The House then resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1838."

Mr. BRONSON entered into a defence of the late and present Administrations in relation to this subject, and, though he disclaimed being opposed to the Exploring Expedition, either the late projected one or another, he was in favor of having the bill recommitted, because he thought it proper that the estimates should be furnished, and the sum necessary for carrying it on made distinct and separate from the appropriations necessary for the general service of the Navy. This was due to the country, for there had been upwards of $700,000 already expended, and the only result was that there was no longer an Exploring Squadron in existence, and the question was, should they order a new one to be fitted out? He thought not, especially in the present embarrassed condition of the Treasury, and he also doubted whether, in the present state of feeling towards the scheme, both throughout the country and in the navy, any of those great results anticipated by its friends would be produced.

He also doubted the propriety of the appointment of Lieutenant Wilkes, not from his want of skill or experience, but from his being a junior officer, the effect of which would increase the present dissatisfaction, and lead to dissensions.

Mr. WISE suggested to some one in favor of the expedition, for he would not move it himself, to move the insertion of a provision in the bill, as the House had determined upon the continuance of the expedition, limiting the time within which it shall sail. Fix any reasonable time, say three months, or six, or twelve, or two years, or even three; but in the name of sense, in the name of economy, he did hope the House would limit the period.

Mr. MALLORY then moved—

"Provided, That, in officering the exploring squadron, for which appropriations are herein made, the law of the 25th of February, 1799, be not violated in any of its provisions."

The amendment was rejected, and

The bill ordered to be read a third time tomorrow.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 11.

Relations with Mexico.

Mr. WALKER called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Mr. BUCHANAN) to the state of our relations with Mexico. It would be recollected, he said, that this subject was recommended to the consideration of the Senate by a special Message from the President of the United States on the 7th of February, 1837.

This Message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and on the 18th February following, Mr. BUCHANAN, the chairman of that committee, reported the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government; the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have recurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

On the 27th of February, 1837, this resolution was unanimously adopted by the Senate. Now we all know that this demand has been again made, and that it has been ineffectual; that new insults and injuries have been superadded by Mexico since this period; that her departing Minister had grossly insulted this Government and country, and his conduct had been approved by Mexico; that her Secretary of Foreign Affairs had recently published a report most insulting to our national honor; and to close the long list of Mexican outrages, her vessels of war had recently, in our own seas, fired upon an American steamboat, carrying the American flag, and prosecuting a lawful commerce with a neighboring and friendly power. This vessel had not only been fired upon and an attempt made to capture her, but the balls had been fired through the American flag, as if in derision of the idea that this flag constituted any protection against Mexican outrages. The flag of our country had ceased then to be any protection to the American citizen, in our own vessels, and upon our own seas, as indeed the name of an American had long ceased to protect our citizens within the limits of Mexico. Not only had it ceased to be any protection there, but it constituted an invitation to insult, imprisonment, and spoliation. More than a year had elapsed since the adoption of the resolution above referred to. No redress has been, it is clear, none will be, granted by Mexico; but every day's delay on our part only witnesses new outrages and new insults. Four months and upwards had now elapsed since the commencement of this session, and no report had been made by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and no intimation given when, if ever, any report might be expected.

Mr. BUCHANAN (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations) said that he had no objections whatever to answer the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator had given day and date, and circumstance, and all connected with the resolution which the committee had reported at the last regular session of Congress on the subject of our claims against Mexico, evidently for the purpose of showing that our present apparent listlessness was inconsistent with our former energy. This was not the case. There was no indisposition on the part of the committee to make a report on this subject whenever it might be proper.

The committee had held a number of informal consultations on the subject, and had come to the conclusion that it was proper to await the action of the House of Representatives. The next step we take, said Mr. B., in regard to Mexico, must be some measure that may directly lead to war, or war itself; because he thought every honorable means of conciliation had been exhausted. Now, where ought such a measure to be introduced? We have, said he, examined the public archives, and find that from the origin of the Government to the present day, no such measure has originated in the Senate. Coercive measures had always originated with the immediate representatives of the people.

He had made it his business to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of the House, and had been informed by that gentleman, that the committee had then the subject under their most serious consideration, and might be expected to come to some conclusion upon it within a few days. Under these circumstances, the committee of the Senate were of opinion that they ought, at the very least, to wait a reasonable time, for the purpose of affording the popular branch of the Legislature an opportunity of expressing their opinion.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, felt it due to himself, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and due to the Senate and to the country, to say, that while there was strong ground of complaint against Mexico, if we looked to the correspondence that had taken place on this subject, we would find that on our part there was much cause for deep and serious regret. What were the facts in the case? A Mr. Greenhow, a clerk in one of the public offices, was despatched to Mexico with a large mass of documents, containing the claims of our citizens, which were to be examined and reported on within ten days, or Mr. Greenhow was to return. Now those at all acquainted with the manner of doing business in the public offices, must know that it would have been impossible to have carefully examined them in so many weeks. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mexico proceeded to take up these documents, and examine them one by one, admitting the justice of some, and rejecting others; and while these matters were still in progress, suddenly the whole subject is thrown upon Congress, the President telling that body he had no further negotiations to make with Mexico.

Whenever a clear case was made out, he (Mr. C.) was ready to enforce on Mexico what was due to law and justice. While he would go thus far, he could not help saying, and all who looked to the correspondence must admit the truth, that the want of dignity and the want of temper that had been manifested by persons connected with the Government in relation to this whole matter, was greatly to be deplored.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that our complaints against Mexico were of a twofold character. The Government of that country had not only refused to pay the just claims of our injured citizens, but, in several instances, had assailed our national honor and insulted our national flag. For assaults and injuries of this description, pecuniary redress had never been demanded, and could never be accepted. No suitable explanation of these insults had ever been given, and no satisfaction had ever been rendered, although often demanded. The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky had not touched this part of the case. A gross insult had recently been offered to the American flag, of a character requiring the most prompt and effectual redress, if we were to credit the statements published in the New Orleans papers which had lately reached this city. It appeared that a steamboat, under the American flag, pursuing her lawful commerce in our own seas, had been repeatedly fired upon and brought to by two Mexican vessels of war.

Mr. WALKER gave notice that, if no report were made, in regard to our relations with Mexico, within a short period, either in the Senate or the House of Representatives, he would move a resolution to test the sense of the Senate upon this subject.

THURSDAY, April 12.

Graduation of the Price of the Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the following: And all lands which shall have been so offered for fifteen years, shall be subject to entry at one dollar per acre for the space of twelve months; and after that time, the same shall be subject to entry at seventy-five cents per acre, for the space of twelve months, and after that time the same shall be subject to entry at fifty cents per acre. The effect of which is to leave the minimum at one dollar per acre for the space of one year for lands which shall have been in the market ten years prior to the 30th September, 1838; and after that time the minimum is to be 75 cents per acre.

Mr. TIPTON hoped the amendment would not prevail. If it did, he should care very little about the bill, as the State in which he lived was interested in the provision proposed to be stricken out more than any other.

Mr. HUBBARD suggested to the Senator from Indiana, that the provision which he wished to have stricken out, would have no operative effect for two years.

Mr. HUBBARD's motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the engrossment of the bill, Messrs. WALKER and BENTON severally addressed the Senate in its favor.

Mr. TIPTON offered an amendment, providing that no person shall enter more than one quarter section of land under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the amendment, by striking out "one quarter section," and inserting "one section;" by inserting as follows:

Provided also, That no one shall be prohibited from entering any quantity, as heretofore, of lands embraced in this act, at the price of one dollar and a quarter per acre."

The amendment as amended, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 14.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—

Treasury Notes.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to the act authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes.

He stated, for the information of the House, that almost the whole revenue was unavailable, as it was now paid in the Treasury notes authorized by the act of October last. As the appropriation bills created at this time heavy drafts upon the Treasury, it was obviously necessary to authorize the Secretary to replace the notes so paid in and cancelled, by others to an equal amount.

Protection to Indians, and a Delegate to Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN said, as the bill was now on its passage, he was desirous of stating, in a few words, the reasons which would govern him.

The bill was certainly liable but to little objection as to the details; but he could not give it his support. He felt satisfied that we had arrived at the period, when one of two courses of policy ought to be pursued in relation to the public lands—either to adhere rigidly to the laws, as they now stand, without making any material change, or to make a cession of them to the new States within whose limits they are respectively situated, on terms mutually satisfactory. It cannot be disguised, that the extent of interests involved in the public domain is too great, and the parties interested too powerful and influential, to permit the laws which regulate and dispose of the public lands to be the subject of frequent changes. Numerous and populous as those States have now become, (at which he rejoiced,) it was impossible to prevent this mighty stake from being thrown into the party struggles of the day, and from having a most pernicious effect on our politics, so long as they are under our control, unless we should abstain altogether from touching them, which he found was impossible.

It was well known that, under this impression, he was in favor of ceding them to the States, as the only practicable remedy against the evil he apprehended, and that under it he had introduced a bill to cede them. He hoped that the Committee on Public Lands would call up the bill at an early day. He was prepared to give it his best aid; and he did hope it would receive the sanction of the Senate. In the mean time, he should feel it to be his duty to vote against all measures which provided for any material change in the land laws, as they now stood.

Texas.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the following joint preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee:

Whereas we have been anxious and attentive observers of the progress of events in Texas, and have not been unmoved spectators of her late gallant and glorious struggle for freedom, and have seen that freedom achieved by those near and dear to us by the ties of kindred and common ancestry; and whereas we have seen, by a vote of the people of that Republic, an anxious desire manifested to become citizens of these United States; and whereas we believe that the gallant and chivalrous bravery of Texans in their struggle for liberty and free Government, is an assurance of their worth, and sufficient evidence of their qualification, to entitle them to brotherhood and citizenship with us; and whereas, also, we believe that the annexation of Texas to these United States is a consummation devoutly to be wished, and an end worthy our best exertions to attain, if it can be done without an infraction of the law of nations, or a departure from the policy or principles of this Government:

Now, therefore, Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That we desire most anxiously that Texas be acquired by these United States; and,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be informed of our desire to acquire the territory of Texas, and to annex it to the United States by treaty or purchase, and at such time as they may deem most expedient.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and these resolutions be forwarded by the Governor of this State to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request that they introduce them to the consideration of both branches of Congress.

Relations with Mexico.

The following Message from the President of the United States, received yesterday, was taken up:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In partial compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ult. calling for further information on the relations between the United States and the Mexican Republic, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

(Signed) M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 26th April, 1838.

[The Message was accompanied by a report from the Secretary of State, and a mass of correspondence. The report set forth the reasons why the whole had not been sent in, substantially that all that was most material was furnished; that the whole was very voluminous, and had been received at so late a period that there has been insufficient time for translation, &c.]

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the whole was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

FRIDAY, April 27.

Protection to Indians, and a Delegate to Congress.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, was taken up.

Mr. NORVELL objected to that part of the bill (the 8th section) which provides for allowing the confederated tribes to elect a delegate to represent them at the seat of Government during the sessions of Congress; and he objected particularly to the reasons assigned in the preamble to that section for allowing them to elect a delegate, as the same argument might be used hereafter in favor of a negro delegate. He never wished to see the day in this country in which an Indian or a negro would have a seat on the floor of either House of Congress.

Mr. LINN said the gentleman from Michigan was mistaken in supposing that it was intended that the Indian delegate should have a seat on the floor of the House of Representatives. The delegate was to reside at the seat of government during the sessions of Congress, to attend to the affairs of his people generally, and to give such information to Congress as would enable it to be better acquainted with their condition, and to legislate with more certainty and effect with regard to them. One of the objects of the bill was to elevate the Indian character, and to give them respect for, and confidence in, themselves; and the most effectual way of doing so would be to give them the incentive of honorable office; and the committee thought it important that such incentives should be held out to the ambitious and enterprising of this people, instead of the ambition they now have to become warlike chiefs. The bill was, in his opinion, the most effectual measure that could be devised for the security of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, on the borders of which such numbers of these Indians had been thrown, and also the only feasible plan of saving these unfortunates from utter destruction. They had been crowded back by the white population until they could go no further west, and now was the accepted time for the philanthropist to step forward and preserve them.

Mr. LUMPKIN urged the Senate to proceed at once to the consideration of the measure, which he looked upon to be the best that could be devised, not only for the protection and security of the frontier States of Missouri and Arkansas, but of the Indians themselves, and as eminently calculated to elevate and improve their condition. The objects embraced in this bill were not new. The subject had been before Congress from the days of General Washington to the present time; and by a reference to the public documents it would be seen that Mr. Jefferson, and all of his successors, had viewed it as worthy of the most favorable consideration of Congress. He adverted to the two able reports made on the subject by Mr. Monroe and by Mr. Calhoun, and said that the subject had been discussed until it would seem that it was not only familiar to every member of Congress, but to the whole reading portion of the community. If this, he said, were not enough, the information presented during this session, and the able speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, (Mr. TIPPOIN,) so replete with information and detail, would be sufficient to call the special attention of every Senator to the subject.

Mr. NORVELL modified his amendment by striking out the provision for a delegate of Indian descent to reside at the seat of government during the sessions of Congress, and to insert agent instead.

The object was to allow the tribes an "agent," instead of a "delegate," as in the bill, and to leave the compensation to be settled hereafter.

Mr. WHITE said that, provided he could get the benefit of having an agent to be sent here by this confederation, he did not care about the name that was to be given him.

Mr. NORVELL's amendment was rejected.

Message from the President—The Mexican Brig of War Iturbide, and an American Steamboat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Message from the President:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The report of the Secretary of War, transmitted by me to the House of Representatives, in compliance with their resolution of the 16th ult. respecting an attack alleged to have been made by a Mexican armed vessel upon an American steamboat, having stated that no information on the subject had at that time reached the Department, I now transmit another report from the same officer, communicating a copy of a note from the Mexican Minister, with an accompanying document, in reference to the act alluded to, which have been received at the Department since the date of the former report.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 2d May, 1838.

The following are the papers transmitted:—

Mr. Martinez to Mr. Forsyth.

MEXICAN LEGATION.

New Orleans, April 20, 1838.

SIR: Whilst the notices of an insult pretended to have been committed against the flag of the United States, in the waters of Texas, by the Mexican brig of war Iturbide, were confined to the public newspapers, and I had no documents by means of which I could repel this calumny, I abstained from addressing you on the subject. But as, according to the papers, the attention of the honorable chamber of Senators of the Congress of the Union has been directed towards the charges published against Mexico, by the passengers of the steamboat Columbia, and I am in possession of an official statement from the commander of the said brig relating to the occurrence with the said boat, I have the honor to send you, sir, the annexed extract from that document, with the hope that you will submit it to the notice of his excellency the President. The captain of the Columbia, and not the captain of the Iturbide, as will be here seen, provoked the attack to which this note refers, and the former should, therefore, be responsible for the result, whatever it may be.

To the Commandant General of the Mexican squadron:

BRIG ITURBIDE, under sail, in latitude 29° 6', longitude 88° 48', west of Cadiz, five o'clock in the afternoon of this day, March 24, 1838.

At the moment when you, sir, announced, by your signals, that you saw sails in the third quarter, I made out the vessel to be a steamboat, coming from the north, and I discovered that she was not the same to which we had given chase this morning, and which was apparently on her way to Brazoria, as this boat has two chimneys, and the other only one. As soon as you gave the signal for chase with all speed, and without our closing, (sir subjecion á famacion.) I endeavored by a press of sail to cut her off, steering south-east, clearing away to be ready for action, and taking the other precautions; but on seeing that she was bearing down on my starboard bow, I ordered all my men to take their proper fire and cutting arms, to be ready for an attempt to board. While we were thus sailing towards each other, as you saw, our distance was necessarily becoming less, and seeing that her stern flag was that of the United States, I hoisted mine with a pendant, and fired a gun without ball. I clewed up my mainsail in order that she should stop her engine for me to examine her; but this was not done; and as, on the contrary, her movements towards me were very suspicious, I ordered another gun to be fired, with ball, in a direction very wide of the steamboat, which was done as a notice for her to stop. Instead of doing so, however, she continued on her course, as if with a view of getting past me to the leeward. When I got within speaking distance, I hailed her three times with a trumpet, and she did not deign to give any reply to either call. On the fourth call, an individual answered, loading me with abuse, and telling me if I wanted to see his papers, I should come on board his boat. All this was spoken without the speaking trumpet; and although he was called on to stop, in order that his papers and his boat should be visited, he did not do so, but, on the other hand, continued to insult my political insignia by the grossest obscenities and language.

In consequence of the proceedings, I fired two cannon and three muskets, not aimed at the steamer, for the purpose of intimidating her, that she should do as required. She, however, took no notice of it, but continued on her way, letting off her steam, which was very high, so near me, that the ashes and some warm water fell on board of my vessel.

"God and Liberty!"

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

TUESDAY, May 8.

Death of the Hon. Joab Lawler.

MR. LYON, of Alabama, addressed the House:

MR. SPEAKER: I have the melancholy duty to perform of announcing to this House the death of one of its members.

My friend and colleague, the Hon. JOAB LAWLER, expired this morning at his lodgings in this city, after a brief and painful illness, which he bore with unusual fortitude and resignation.

Less than a week ago, and he was present in his place in this hall, in the performance of his part in the laborious duty assigned by the people to their representatives. He was yet in the prime of life, and has been cut off in the midst of his usefulness.

By his death, his immediate constituents and his State have lost an attentive, intelligent, and faithful representative; his family have been deprived of a husband and father; and society has lost a member, whose conduct, in every relation of life, was worthy of all imitation.

2D SESS.]

Message from the President—Condition of the Treasury.

[MAY, 1838.]

The deceased enjoyed the confidence and esteem of those who knew him well, to an extent which nothing but a course of life the most exemplary, and a character the most irreproachable, could have secured.

In his State he had filled several offices of much importance, and under the General Government he held for several years a trust of great responsibility. In all his official conduct in the various public stations held by him, he acquired a high character for integrity and capacity, which no act of his life forfeited or impaired.

His conduct as a member of this House has been in character with his whole life. While he was firm and unwavering in the discharge of what he considered his duty as a Representative, he was mild and unobtrusive in his deportment, and respectful towards his associates. He had lived the life of a Christian, and died without apprehension as to the future.

To testify our regret for his loss, and respect for his memory, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will attend the funeral of JOAB LAWLER, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Alabama, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of JOAB LAWLER, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of JOAB LAWLER, by wearing crape on their left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That when this House adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify that body of the death of JOAB LAWLER, late a Representative from the State of Alabama, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 8.

Death of Hon. Joab Lawler.

Mr. KING addressed the Senate: Mr. PRESIDENT: Another of the members of this Congress has passed from time to eternity. This unexpected event is well calculated to produce the most serious reflections. "Be ye also ready," should be impressed upon every heart. The Hon. JOAB LAWLER, a Representative from the State of Alabama, breathed his last at his boarding-house in this city, about 9 o'clock this morning. His sickness was of short duration; but a life devoted to piety and virtue enabled him to look with calm and Christian resignation on the dread change that awaited him.

Mr. LAWLER was of humble origin. He was destitute of the advantages of a liberal education; but a vigorous intellect, combined with sterling integrity, early recommended him to the favorable notice of his fellow-citizens, and they placed him in the Legislature of his State. For years he continued to discharge his duties in that situation in a manner so creditable to himself, so satisfactory to those he represented, that they demanded his services in a more exalted station. He yielded to their wishes, and twice has he been chosen to represent their interests in the Congress of the United States. Mr. President, his mortal career has closed. His country has lost the services of one of her most virtuous citizens; his bereaved wife an affectionate husband; and his orphan children the fostering care and protection of an indulgent father. To that desolate, heart-stricken family, I would say, "mourn not as one without hope." The husband—the father—was a Christian. He died, as the Christian dieth, in the full hope of a blessed immortality. Keep, then, before your eyes the purity and holiness of his life: live as he lived, and you may go to him; to you he can never return.

Mr. K. then submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the honorable JOAB LAWLER, deceased, which will take place from the Hall of the House of Representatives; and, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of that body will go into the usual mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 10.

Message from the President—Twenty-eight Millions in Deposit with Banks, and Fifteen Millions due from Individuals, and the Treasury in Danger of Stopping Payment.

The following Message was received from the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit to the consideration of Congress a statement prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, by which it appears that the United States, with over twenty-eight millions in deposit with the States, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, are, from the situation in which those funds are placed, in immediate danger of being rendered unable to discharge, with good faith and promptitude, the various pecuniary obligations of the Government.

The occurrence of this result has for some time been apprehended, and efforts made to avert it. As the principal difficulty arises from a prohibition in the present law to reissue such Treasury notes as might be paid in before they fall due, and may be effectually obviated by giving the Treasury during the whole year the benefit of the full amount originally authorized; the remedy would seem to be obvious and easy.

The serious embarrassments likely to arise from a longer continuance of the present state of things, induces me respectfully to invite the earliest action of Congress to the subject which may be consistent to a due regard for other public interests.

M. VAN BUREN.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked, that two or three days ago, he made a motion on the subject referred to in these documents, but which failed from its requiring a majority of two-thirds. He should not, at this moment, renew the motion, but he gave notice that he should do so in the course of the day, unless the privileged question (the duelling report) was sooner disposed of. He then moved to refer the foregoing papers to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they be printed; agreed to.

FRIDAY, May 11.

Treasury Notes.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up the bill to carry into effect an act approved the twelfth day of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, "to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

Mr. CAMBRELENG congratulated the committee on the resumption of its labors after so long an interval. The delay was unfortunate. It had been not only embarrassing to the Treasury, but highly injurious to the public creditors, and to all in any manner connected with the public service. It is an extraordinary occurrence, that a Government, whose actual resources, in proportion to its annual receipts and expenditures, were more ample than those of any other Government, should, by mere delay in legislation, be unable to discharge its obligations for current expenditures.

All that the Treasury requires is the full benefit of the act of the 12th October, as is proposed by the bill under consideration. That act authorized an issue of ten millions of Treasury notes, redeemable in twelve months from the date when issued, for the purpose of enabling the Government to collect, in the mean time, an equal amount which was receivable in 1838 from our banks and merchants. Had these Treasury notes been redeemed after the expiration of the twelve months, that is, between October 1838, and June 1839, the Treasury would have been able to meet all its engagements without any other financial measure.

We have heard much here and elsewhere about a bankrupt Treasury, loans and a public debt. Such statements and anticipations are without foundation. Were it otherwise, I trust the bankruptcy of our Treasury, and the prospect of a public debt, would not be subjects of rejoicing. The country was in the midst of a commercial revulsion, and Congress assembled for the purpose of exercising all its constitutional powers, through its financial measures, to relieve trade as far as it was practicable. There was no bankruptcy of the Treasury. The resources of the Government were ample, but the public creditors were unable to meet their engagements. We had extended the credit to the Bank of the United States to one, two, and three years, and were about to postpone the payment of our custom-house bonds to twelve and fifteen months, and the debt of the deposit banks still longer. Thus twenty millions of dollars of the revenue of 1837, and previous years, were postponed to 1838, '39, and '40. To grant this indulgence, it was necessary to make a temporary use of our credit for one-half the amount of our existing resources. Such was the origin of the Treasury note act of October.

The present embarrassment of the Treasury does not arise from any deficiency of resources, but from the mode of executing the act of October. The rate of interest on the notes was discretionary with the President, not exceeding six per cent. per annum. Had he directed none to be issued under six per cent., most of them would have been taken up by capitalists or remitted abroad, the Treasury would have been protected, and no supplementary act would have been necessary. But there existed a suspension of specie payments, a derangement of exchanges, and severe commercial embarrassment. The immediate interest of the Treasury was deemed subordinate to the general interests of the country. These interests were consulted by furnishing the public debtors with an additional medium of payment, and different sections of the Union with facilities of exchange. Nearly two millions were issued at a nominal rate of interest, nearly three at two per cent., and over four millions at five per cent. They were consequently paid into the Treasury nine months before they were due; and this is the origin of its temporary embarrassment.

WEDNESDAY, May 16.

Treasury Notes.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House took up the "bill to carry into effect an act approved the 12th of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," reported last evening, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOFFMAN inquired whether it was intended by this bill, that the Treasury notes issued, and paid back into the Treasury, should be cancelled as they came in? And will the power to issue expire on the 31st of December, 1838, as in the act of the 12th of October?

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that, as the bill originally stood, according to his construction of it, it carried with it all the provisions of that act; but some doubts having been expressed by various gentlemen, to obviate them, he had extended the clause by inserting the words, "subject to all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions" of that act. Consequently, this bill would expire at the time indicated in the antecedent one.

Mr. HOFFMAN admitted that he had not paid strict attention to the amendment at the time it was offered. He expressed his dissent from the mode of relief proposed. Treasury notes were objectionable, because they were unproductive, and always would be depreciated; and quoted, in proof of this, the testimony of Mr. Gallatin. He adverted to the free banking scheme, which was, as yet, an untried experiment, and stated his objections to some of its features. In reference to any mode of relief, he expressed himself in favor of a direct loan.

Mr. WISE said it was extraordinary that the financiers of the Government should say that they had abundant means, and yet should be compelled to use their credit to raise money; and he made statements to show that the distress and embarrassment which had fallen upon the Government and the merchants, had also reached the mass of the community, and was most oppressive in the valley of the Mississippi. When the issue of Treasury notes was first proposed, the same story of abundant means and temporary expedients was held out, and it was said that time was wanted for the merchants to pay their bonds, for the deposit banks to pay what they owed, and the issue of Treasury notes would accomplish all that was desired. All this had been granted, and now, in the same way, more time was asked, and the issuing of more Treasury notes. He referred to the objection that there was not time to negotiate a loan, and said he thought, though he was not authorized to say so, that Nicholas Biddle would take the loan, and pay the ten millions in specie. That monster, he said, had withstood the colossal power of the Government when it was colossal; and had maintained the credit of his bank at home and abroad; and now that the Government was weak, and was brought into contempt everywhere, Nicholas Biddle was able to loan the ten millions which the Government required to sustain their fiscal operations.

He compared the present issue with that of continental money under the Confederation, and called this the least valuable promise, because it was not presenti, but presenti solvendum in futuro; and, after describing a note of the old emission, he showed and described a caricature of the Treasury notes, and inferred that the people held such expedients of the Government in derision. He would aid the Government with all needful funds, but he preferred the direct, open manner of a loan.

Mr. BYNUM replied to some of the attacks made upon the Administration, and contended that the proposed mode of obtaining funds was adopted in order to prevent a pressure upon the merchants, who had asked for extension, and to prevent a sudden and oppressive call upon the States for the moneys deposited with them. It was a measure intended to aid and relieve the country. Since the light of knowledge had burst upon the world, and the wickedness of the rulers had been exposed, there was little danger that the people could be long enslaved; and it was in consequence of the enlightened condition of the age that the dominance of the bank had been resisted and crushed.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, commented upon the extraordinary character of the President's Message, and the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, and continued at length an investigation of various questions connected with the state of the currency, insisting that a loan was preferable to the issue of Treasury notes, and that a loan could be readily and speedily negotiated in this country; and defending the conduct of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, in the purchase of cotton, for the purpose of aiding Southern planters, and paying the foreign debt of the country. He maintained that it was better to resort to a loan in Europe, rather than to this measure, and supported that ground by reference to the practice of the Government in past times, and especially to the times of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, who had all been in favor of that mode of obtaining necessary supplies.

Mr. CUSHMAN remarked that the subject had been fully discussed, and the hour was late, so he moved the previous question, which call was sustained, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. GRENNELL asked for the yeas and nays thereon, which was the engrossment of the bill; and they were—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to report a bill to authorize the sale of the bonds of the Bank of the United States, and in the event that they could not be sold in time, then to authorize the issue of two millions of Treasury notes for the immediate wants of the Government; and also to authorize a loan of such sum as might be necessary for the actual wants of the Government, until such sale can be made.

This motion was cut off by the previous question, and the bill was passed.

The question being on adopting the title,

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the words, "to carry into effect the act approved the 12th day of October, 1837;" which was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER, of Massachusetts, moved to insert the following: "to meet the current expenses of the Government;" which was agreed to.

The title, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN said, for the purpose of placing himself and his friends in a correct attitude before this nation, he would give notice that he should move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed. He preferred the amendments proposing to provide means partly by loan, and partly by Treasury notes, to meet the immediate wants of the Government, though he should still vote for the bill if that proposition should be rejected.

Bank Notes for Government Dues.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the joint resolution submitted by Mr. CLAY, proposing to make bank notes receivable and payable in the receipts and expenditures of the Government, made a detailed report.

Mr. BENTON moved that the report be printed; which motion was carried.

Mr. ALLEN would only observe that this was a very important paper, embracing a subject all interesting to the whole people of this country. It was also very long and elaborate—too much so to undergo a very extensive publication by the ordinary public journals of the country. To supply its absence from these journals would require a very large number of copies to be printed by order of the Senate. In looking into the journals of the Senate to see what had been the practice of the Senate on the subject, he found that the report made by the post office committee in 1834, was ordered to be printed with an extra number of copies, amounting to 30,000. He also found that the numerous documents appended to this report were ordered to be printed to the number of 30,000. The order for this printing passed the Senate by a vote of 26 to 14. Mr. A. here, at the request of several gentlemen, read the yeas and nays on the occasion referred to. Believing this document to be much more important than the post office report of 1834, and that it was essential that the people should have the fullest information on the interesting subject involved, he was for printing the largest number of copies that had ever been ordered in that body—which was 30,000.

Mr. CLAY expressed himself willing to vote for the printing, and he only wished gentlemen to agree among themselves what number they wanted, and he would vote for it. He was surprised, however, that the chairman of the committee had not thought fit to move some disposition of the resolution upon which this report was made. It had been a sufficient time before the committee, and from the importance of the subject, the public would expect some action on it.

Mr. MORRIS entirely concurred with his colleague as to the importance of the document just read. He thought it was just such a paper as ought to be extensively circulated to disabuse the public mind on this important subject. If he could call back the money which had been expended in printing this session, he would willingly go to the expense of printing half a million of copies; but as that could not be done, he was willing to go to the extent moved by his colleague.

The question on printing 30,000 copies, was decided in the affirmative.

Treasury Note Bill.

The motion of Mr. RARIDEN to reconsider the vote on the passage of this bill was announced by the CHAIR.

Mr. RARIDEN explained that he was in favor of voting all necessary supplies to the Government, but differed with the majority of the House as to the proper mode. He preferred a partial issue of Treasury notes, and the remainder to be raised by a direct loan. He added, that time was of far more importance at this period of the session than the mode of raising means; and, so far from desiring to bring on a protracted debate, he would himself, should such spring up, vote for the previous question. He only wanted an opportunity for himself and his friends to place their names on the record, so that they could not be misunderstood.

Mr. BOON thought this measure had already been debated long enough; and he, therefore, moved the previous question. The House seconded the demand, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. BRONSON asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 18.

Treasury Notes.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, observed that this bill came to the Senate yesterday after 12 o'clock, referred to the Committee of Finance, and reported back by them in the course of the afternoon. He wanted to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether they had authority from the Senate to meet while the Senate was in session.

Mr. WRIGHT would answer the Senator by saying, that no authority was given by the Senate to the committee to meet during the session of that day, nor did any member of the committee leave the chamber, to his knowledge. The bill was submitted to each member of the committee in his place, three of whom concurred with him in favor of, and in reporting, the bill without amendment; the others, authorizing the report, though dissenting from the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER said he did not expect to be called on to vote for the engrossment of this bill at so early a period after its reception from the other branch. Scarcely twenty-four hours had elapsed, and yet the question on ordering the bill to its third reading was called for. Before he gave his vote, he proposed to say a few words in relation to the subject. He begged leave to disclaim any disposition to thwart the measures necessary to carry on the Government, and desired that it might be distinctly understood that he wished the Government aided in carrying on all the great works of internal improvement, such as roads, harbors, etc., in which it was engaged. He was of opinion, however, that there were other modes of raising means that might be resorted to, less objectionable than that proposed by the bill before them. At the last extra session he had voted for the issue of ten millions in Treasury notes, and he did not regret it, because, at that time, he considered it necessary to provide present relief. Congress had been called together by the President in a case of great and extraordinary emergency; and yet some of the most distinguished friends of the Administration had avowed their determination never to vote for another issue of these notes. One great objection he had to this money was, that it was continually falling below par, and the Government, therefore, instead of paying its agents, and public servants in the constitutional currency of the country, would be paying them in depreciated paper. Another objection presented itself to his mind; which was, that it was bad policy to get into the habit of raising money by such means. There was now no exigency, no very particular emergency; at all events, it had not been made to appear that there was an emergency to justify such a step. Congress had already been in session five good months, and yet we had heard nothing of such a crisis in the affairs of the Treasury. In fact, there could be no crisis now which a vigilant, systematic, and prudent officer would not have earlier foreseen. Mr. W. contended that the bill was defective, inasmuch as it did not renew the penalties, and neither did it impose the same duties on collectors, &c., as in the former bill; and he contended that if the money were so much wanted, the proper mode to raise it would be by loan.

Mr. W. moved to amend the bill by limiting the issue to two millions of dollars, to meet such bills as might be immediately due.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that he should endeavor, so far as was in his power, to discharge what was his duty in regard to this bill, without protracting debate.

Still some portion of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts seemed entitled to attention. One was his commendation of the sound and valuable principle of paying the public creditor in what was equivalent to specie, and he was gratified to find that the Senator would go with him in favor of the principle that was not less valuable, that of preserving the faith of the Government. The report of his (Mr. W.) to which the Senator alluded, was an argument to show that it was highly improper for this Government to make tender in payment of its debts of the paper of local corporations; and he confessed that to some extent that argument might be applied to paper issued upon the authority, faith, and credit of the Government itself. Then the gentleman would ask him, why did he urge this bill? He answered, because he believed the necessity existed for it. We are told by the Head of the Treasury Department, that even in means of this character the Treasury is so limited, that it is in danger from day to day of being compelled to turn its creditors from the door.

The gentleman had contended that there was no imminent necessity for passing this bill. Would the gentleman tell him why there was not? He says the Senate, so far as it is concerned, has given authority to sell the bonds of the Bank of the United States. He, (Mr. W.) remembered that the only voice raised against that measure was that of the Senator himself, on the ground that we could not sell these bonds upon the terms prescribed, in this country, and that there was not time to send them abroad for sale. He, (Mr. W.) felt the force of that suggestion, and submitted to the Senator that it would be necessary for Congress to provide sufficient means for the wants of the Government, by authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, or by a loan, and added that, if the bonds did sell, it would supersede the issue of Treasury notes to the amount they might sell for.

We have been told that the bill before us is not broad enough to accomplish its object. He (Mr. W.) did not apprehend any difficulty on that score. But he spoke with great distrust of his own judgment, as to construction of law, when the distinguished authority of the Senator was against him. He found, however, the bill to read:

Be it enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions contained in, and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions of an act, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be issued under the authority of the act, aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the Treasury and cancelled.

Now, as far as his comprehension extended, the clause just read brings the whole of the act of the extra session forward, and makes it applicable to this bill. Would it be pretended that under this law a note could be issued bearing more than six per cent. interest?

Mr. WEBSTER. No.

Mr. WRIGHT. Would it be pretended that they could issue more than ten millions?

Mr. WEBSTER. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT here read from the bill, to show that notes can only be issued in place of those that came in. Again: the notes issued under the authority of this law are made receivable in payment of all dues to this Government. Was there any doubt of this?

Mr. WEBSTER. No.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then it appears that, with one exception, all the substantive provisions of the law of the extra session are made applicable to this, except the penal enactments. As a lawyer, he should as confidently say that these enactments were brought forward as the others. But this was not material. I find, said he, that, as far as the action of the Senate is concerned, the case is already provided for, independently, by a bill just passed to punish the counterfeiting of these notes, and by a general law of Congress in relation to the punishment of crimes, passed in 1825, enumerating the counterfeiting of Treasury notes as one of the crimes to be punished. Again: at the present session the Judiciary Committee have provided for a supposed casus omissus found in both laws, which was, that there was no provision made to punish persons who should have in their possession counterfeit Treasury notes with intent to pass them. The Senate had passed this bill and sent it to the other House.

But the Senator suggests that there are no statements, and that, therefore, we do not know that the Treasury needs this supply. His memory told him that the wants of the Treasury were so imperative as to require a special communication from the President of the United States; that that communication was made to both Houses, and was accompanied by one from the Secretary of the Treasury; that that message recommended this mode of providing for the exigency, and it seemed to him emphatically to be the correct one. His information, as late as yesterday morning, was, that there were but $50,000 of Treasury notes, authorized by the act of October, that remained to be issued; and that there were but some $200,000 in the Treasury scattered over the whole country. Why are we brought to this state of things? The Senator told us that, after passing the law of October, it was understood that one of this character would not be called for again. But the Senator did not recollect the change that was given to that act in the House of Representatives. It passed this House without any provision as to a reissue of the notes, but it came back from the House with an interdiction on such reissue; and he (Mr. W.) remembered well, in moving for a concurrence with this amendment, that he said that the bill thus amended would answer till the next session of Congress, when further provision could be made, if necessary. By making these notes receivable for the dues of the Government, nearly six of the ten millions had been redeemed, and all our revenue coming in comes in that paper. The revenue is as large as was anticipated, but there was no money coming in; and, though they had issued ten millions of paper within $50,000, they were now but four millions in debt, the balance of the notes having been already redeemed and cancelled. It was not by this bill that they were incurring one dollar more of debt than was authorized by the act of October last. We have been told of the depreciated character of this paper. He believed that some of the prices current had put it below bank paper, though that was at one single point of the Union only, New York; but it was now quoted there and at Philadelphia, three or four per cent. higher than that paper (United States Bank notes) which is held in such high estimation by the gentleman and his friends. His information told him that Treasury notes were higher at the South than any bank paper. In Philadelphia it was also higher, though in New York it might be quoted a trifle lower. That, however, was not the point. The question was, what were they to do? We cannot, by our fiat here, place money in the Treasury at a moment's warning. Then can we do any thing better than to give to the creditors of the Government the best paper in our power—that issued upon the faith and credit of the Government itself? The limitation proposed by the Senator's amendment would not answer. Who could tell how soon it would come back again? and how long would two millions last, when in the single port of New York it comes in at the rate of $300,000 per week?

Mr. WEBSTER said the candor of the honorable gentleman has put this bill on the ground which expresses the different opinions between him and myself exactly; and I am desirous that it should be understood that what he says in favor of Government paper money goes to make it, on the whole, but little better than the bad money of broken banks. The Senator says it is at least as good as theirs, which is twenty or twenty-five per cent. below par. Have we contracted with our army, our navy, and the judges of our courts, to pay them in something but a little better than the depreciated paper of the banks?

We have heard much said about the paper party, the advocates of a paper system, and a paper Government. Let us see who they are. I insist that the mouth of the Administration is shut on this subject; for all they propose to pay out is not gold and silver; and if we cannot pay our own debts in specie, or its equivalent, how can we demand it of others? What is the argument of the honorable chairman of the committee, but an acknowledgment that we cannot pay our debts? He asks what can be done? Sir, I will tell him. If Treasury notes are issued, all bearing an interest of five or six per cent., and sold to supply us with the means of paying what is due from the Government, our credit and punctuality will be sustained. He proposes that they shall not be payable under a year. Let us issue them so, bearing an interest of five or six per cent., and sell them in the market, and in two hours the Government will be able to meet the demands upon it. Why should this not be done? Sir, I put the question to Congress and to the country. They may not sell at par, but why not sell them notwithstanding? If it is not done, the Government cannot properly pay its debts; and who, in that case, is to bear the misfortune—the Government itself, or its individual creditors? The Senator is averse to this method, because there is an exigency in the condition of the Government, and it cannot pay its debts without a sacrifice. Is this the language of individuals? If there must be a loss in the payment of a debt, on whom is it to fall? Does an individual say he would have to sell his property cheap, and, therefore, he cannot pay? Sir, there is no difficulty in the way to prevent the Government from doing as I have proposed, to maintain the credit and good faith of the country; there is nothing to prevent our selling our own notes, and thus raising the money, and paying according to contract.

This bill, I am of the opinion, will not have the effect to revive all the act of October last. All that relates to the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury is duly provided for; but this bill does not revive the third section of the law of October, relating to the collector, his deposits, and receipts, and all that; and I say that it does not revive the penal part of that law. The Senator speaks of the law of 1825 as supplying this deficiency, but in the bill of the last session he thought the penal provision necessary, and I had supposed that the law of 1825 did not cover exchequer bills subsequent to that period. If the Senator means to say that this bill does not revive those provisions, then I say that it does not accomplish its object in that respect.

The four or five millions of dollars of Treasury notes are now outstanding. The gentleman says that they are all received for the customs and at the land offices, and therefore the Government gets no money. Is it not the reason of the distribution of these Treasury notes that they are to serve the same purpose as to get the money? These reports show that we have a Government currency, and have not any thing in the Treasury but this depreciated paper, and that is a state of things which I will not agree to encourage. I am opposed now, and always have been, to all introduction of paper money as a depreciated currency for the Treasury, and I ask again, if we cannot pay our own dues at par, who can?

MR. CALHOUN said that he had not heard, during the whole session, a stronger argument in favor of the policy, that the Government should keep its own funds, and collect them in the legal and constitutional currency of the country, than that just delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts, (MR. WEBSTER.) He entirely concurred with him that it is bound to pay its creditors in the legal currency, and the importance of preserving the public faith from the slightest blot. But to accomplish this, the Government must always be kept in a condition to meet its engagements, and how could this be done, but by collecting its dues in the legal currency, and keeping it in its own custody?

But while he tells us that the Government is bound to pay in gold and silver, and that nothing short of that can preserve the public faith immaculate, he is the strenuous advocate of collecting its dues in bank notes or their equivalent. The fallacy consists in supposing that such notes are equivalent to specie. There is nothing equivalent to gold and silver but themselves. Nothing else can legally pay debts, or release the debtor from his obligation to his creditor. This the Senator asserts, and insists on most correctly. How then can bank notes be equivalent, unless they can always command, without the possibility of failure, the amount of gold or silver that they call for? Is such the fact? On the contrary, is it not notorious that the Government has millions of bank notes collected, when the banks that issued them were specie-paying banks, but which cannot now command a cent in specie? And is it not now compelled to dishonor its credit, and violate its faith, because it collected its dues in bank notes, and confided the safe-keeping of its funds to the banks? And yet while the Senator denounces this want of ability on the part of the Government, he is the strenuous advocate to renew its connection with the banks, under the fallacious idea that bank notes and bank credit are equivalent to specie; doing, in a word, the very thing again which has subjected the Government to the necessity which he so strongly condemns! Worse than this: he proposes to repeat the process, when it is admitted by his colleague, (MR. DAVIS,) and his distinguished friend behind him, (MR. CLAY,) that the renewal of the connection must again be followed in a short time by another explosion, when again the Government would be compelled to do what the Senator so justly and strongly condemns!

The Senator, in his zeal to preserve the public faith, recommended that the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by this bill, should be made to bear an interest of 6 per cent., and be sold for money instead of being paid to the public creditors. He did not explain what he meant by money. If he means gold and silver, does he not see how greatly it would impede and embarrass the resumption of specie payments for the Government to go into the market, and draw out at once eight or ten millions of specie? Would he recommend that at this critical moment, when the banks were about to resume? If he means bank notes, then it was neither more nor less than to advise the Government to exchange its credit for the credit of the banks of New York and Boston, (the only specie payments at this moment,) and give them 6 per cent. to boot, when it was notorious that Treasury notes were at par in both those places, and would be better over the whole South and West than the very notes for which he proposes to exchange them! This would certainly be a very good operation for those banks, but would be a very bad one for the Government and people. The Senator has spoken of Treasury notes as being depreciated. Such was not the fact. They had been above par everywhere, habitually, compared with the local bank notes, except during short intervals at New York; but that did not show that they were actually depreciated. We all know that the currency of New York has been in a highly artificial state, from the necessity its banks were under to resume specie payments by a certain day, or forfeit their charters. The rate of her exchanges with London clearly proves the unnatural condition of her currency. The difference in her favor was far greater than could be explained by any operation of commerce, and if he did not mistake, was greater than the depreciation of the Treasury notes compared with her local currency, which demonstrates that they have not been depreciated at any time, compared with London, which may fairly be considered the standard of the currency of the commercial world. Though he regretted, with the Senator, that the Government had not at all times been in the condition to meet its engagements in gold and silver, it was some consolation to reflect that substantial justice had been done to its creditors, as far as it had used its own credit throughout this embarrassing and painful crisis.

The question before them was very simple. The Government was out of money, and there were but two ways of supplying the deficiency—to borrow it, or to use its own credit; and the question was, which should be done? The Senator objected strongly to the latter, but he could not possibly be more opposed to it than he (MR. C.) was to the former. It is useless to attempt disguise. Those who advocate a loan, mean to force the Government to exchange its credit for that of the banks. To give a clear conception how the blending of the credit of the Government with the banks operated, both in relation to individuals, and the Government, he would illustrate his conception by a statement of a case. Take three individuals, near neighbors, and of equal wealth and credit: say three planters, each worth a hundred thousand dollars, free of debt, and of equal character for fidelity in meeting their engagements, and call them A, B, and C. It is manifest that, each being of equal credit, neither would think of exchanging his credit for either of the others, much less of paying a difference in the exchange. But let Government interfere and take up C, and confer banking privileges upon him—that is, authorize his promissory notes to be received in its dues and the purchase of its domain, and give him the use of its funds between the periods of collection and disbursements, and this equality will be destroyed. A and B would now call it an accommodation to obtain C's notes in exchange for theirs; nay, C would disdain to exchange, unless the one should endorse for the other, and pay him six per cent. difference; and to this exaction they would be compelled to submit. A, for instance, wishes to settle a son in the West; and for the purpose of purchasing land from the Government, desires to raise ten thousand dollars. Neither his note nor B's can buy land; and to obtain the means, he is obliged to go to B, get his endorsement, which, from his perfect confidence in his neighbor, he gives for nothing, and gives his note, with the joint credit of both, in exchange for C's note, deducting nearly seven dollars in the hundred, or nearly seven hundred on the whole. His son puts the note in his pocket-book, and goes off to the West, where, through the magic of banking privileges, it is converted into solid and fertile acres. Presently the Government gets out of money; and all the friends of C (a numerous host) zealously insist that, instead of using its own notes, it should sell them to C in exchange for his, and pay the same difference; and this they call a loan—borrowing money! The thing is monstrous.

Thus regarding it, he has long considered public loans amongst the greatest impositions; and he was accordingly mortally opposed to a public debt. When there was a deficit, it was better by far for the Government to use its own credit directly, nor did he believe it to be impossible, if the laws which govern credit and circulation were fully understood, to supersede a resort to any other resource, without burdening the public with the heavy and pernicious load of debt, contracted for the most part by the exchange of its own credit for that of the banks, in the form of bank notes.

If Treasury notes were really below par, as asserted by the Senator, it would not be at all surprising, and might be easily explained. Their value mainly depends on their receivability in the public dues, and it might be anticipated that the liberal indulgence given to the public debtors at the extra session would tend to depress them in the market; and it is a proof of the high estimate placed on them by the public, that they have been so little affected. Their depreciation during the late war, when they sunk below the value of bank notes even, during the period of the suspension of specie payments, has often been urged against their use. Nothing was more easy of explanation. The Government had the weakness and folly to permit it, by its own voluntary acts, by putting bank notes of every description on a level with Treasury notes in all its transactions, while the banks on their part refused to put them on a level with theirs in their transactions. The result was, that bank notes could perform all the functions of circulation, public and private, while Treasury notes could perform only a part. Their depreciation followed as a matter of course, under the known laws that regulate circulation. The use of bank credit by Government had been, in his opinion, the source of great mischief, both in this country and England. It was the parent of the enormous debt that has pressed so heavily on the energies of the latter, as great as they are. He had barely touched on a range of questions little explored as yet, but intimately connected with the progress and prosperity of the country. Whenever the elements of a true and stable currency were ascertained, he felt assured that it would be found to consist partly of gold and silver, and of paper, resting not on the credit and authority of banks, but of the Government itself.

Mr. WEBSTER said: I am not at all surprised to hear the Senator from South Carolina say that he has found my argument against Treasury notes a very good one in favor of separating bank and State, for the present state of the gentleman's mind is such that he would find such an argument anywhere, on any subject, and on any occasion. So deeply is he immersed in this, his favorite subject, that I verily believe, if he should hear a discourse on theology, or a philosophical dissertation, he would start up and say it contained fine doctrines for divorce. But what did I say touching the doctrine of divorce? I insisted that the Government should fulfil its contracts; but what has that to do with divorce? Did I contend that the Government should pay any thing not equivalent to specie? I contend that Treasury notes can never be at par, and by that I mean at the established rates according to law. The gentleman says they are, and have been, at par, because they are equal to par in New York. But he might as well say that broadcloth, or molasses, or any other merchandise, is at par. His proposition is that they are equal to par in New York for the London market. But what of that? I mean that they are not equivalent to gold and silver, in the currency, and according to law.

He speaks of our exchanging credit with the banks, and paying the difference. What does he mean by credit? If he means that the Government can contract loans on as good terms as the banks, that is not denied. But what would you call a check which is given on a bank?

Is that credit? It is not credit; it is a thing entirely different. To make the two cases at all alike, the Government paper must be redeemable in specie, on demand, at the Treasury; and then, I dare say, its paper would be very good. He asks if Mr. Astor would pay a bank for its credit. Mr. Astor, and every man, however large their capital, and credit, borrow money of the banks when they wish to do it, on time, because that money is payable in specie. The gentleman calls that an exchange of credit for credit. But you cannot say that a note on time is equivalent to a bank note commanding the specie; they are entirely different. The gentleman says that the Government credit is the best in the world; but it is not the best in the way that the Government uses it here. If he says bank notes circulate on the credit of the Government, that does not make Government notes of this kind better than bank notes payable and paid in specie. It may do very well to help out of an emergency; but the crisis is in his argument, and the emergency in his proposition. Paper is not equivalent to specie, unless it is payable in specie.

I am asked whether I would go the length of selling these Treasury notes for money, and then whether I would have it in specie. I at once say, sell them, and then everybody will know that there will be a choice only between specie and something that will command specie. I say make your accounts everywhere in specie or its equivalent. The gentleman supposes that we are to withdraw the amount of $10,000,000 from the circulation. If we should grasp the silver and shut it up in the Treasury vaults, that would be altogether injurious, and the gentleman, therefore, uses a very good argument to-day against what he urged six months ago. He now says, if we withdraw so much specie, it would cause embarrassment; but what did he think of demanding it for revenue? He now says that this Treasury note bill is a most necessary step for all the banks. He then saw no inconvenience in demanding payment in specie; it would not embarrass the country, and was the only just mode of collecting the revenue. Let our Secretary of the Treasury be a man of just and liberal policy, addicted to no mere theories, and bound down by no party dogmas, and he will make the disposition of these notes in the market in a few days, disturbing nobody, and giving no occasion for these agitations and alarms; it is the continuing these Treasury notes, and rejecting the practice of twenty years for dreams and theories, that creates all difficulties.

But the gentleman asks, is not the Government to use its own credit? Certainly it should; and it is right that, like individuals, it should get money and pay its own debts. It should use it now; but is it a proper use of Government credit to force it, instead of the money, on its creditors? Is it justice to tell its creditors, though you prefer specie or the notes of specie-paying banks, you shall have our credit only?

And now to go back to his example of the three farmers, A, B, C. The gentleman supposes that the Government authorizes the receipt of the paper of C, so that he may make purchases directly of Government, which A and B cannot do without endorsed notes at interest, and he says that this is just the case with the banks. I say it is not the case, and that every idea of credit involves time and convertibility; and if it does not, it is nothing. The notes of the bank are money in effect, and to say that their paper is on time, and that there is merely an exchange of credit, is what no man can say with propriety. Suppose one of your officers in the city of New York sells a Treasury note, and he gives you a check on one of the banks paying specie, so that you can go across the street, and get it if you choose, is there any change of credit if you receive the notes of the bank, when you can go at once and get the specie? It is not an exchange of credit; it is an exchange of credit for money, if you give your note on time, for specie, or the equivalent of specie. This, Mr. Astor, or any other individual would do, if he wished to use his credit for what would give him an immediate command of specie.

Mr. CALHOUN would not notice the criticism with which the Senator opened his remarks, as he considered that as intended for the gallery. He had long noticed that, when hard pressed in argument, the Senator always resorted to sarcasm or ridicule; and there were few occasions in which he more needed their aid than the present. He never accused the Senator of saying that bank notes should be forced on the public creditor by the Government; on the contrary, he rested his remarks on the ground assumed by him, and which he entirely approved, that it could not, in good faith, discharge its debts in any medium but gold and silver, which he regarded as a conclusive argument why it should collect its dues in the legal currency, and keep its own funds under its own custody, that it might always be in the condition to preserve its credit. On the contrary, the Senator was in favor of receiving the notes of specie-paying banks, on the ground that they were equivalent to gold and silver. Here lies the delusion of the Senator. To be equivalent is to be equal in all respects; and yet, while the Senator confesses that they are not equal in the discharge of the debts due from the Government, he holds them to be equal in the payment of debts to it. The truth is, that it is a pure fiction to consider bank notes as equivalents to specie.

But the Senator has gone a step farther. He says that bank notes are not credit, and do not rest on credit! Not credit! He would not waste his breath in dispelling so wild and strange a delusion, which all around us proclaim to be the merest phantom. So far from being

Treasury Notes.

[MAY, 1838.]

specie, representing specie, or resting on specie, or being necessarily converted into specie on demand, they are nothing but credit, credit, credit, throughout.

Since the days of the deposit bank of Amsterdam, bank notes never have represented specie. The first act of a bank, even when specie was actually paid in, which was rarely the case, was to get clear of it, except a small portion, by lending it out. The real bank capital, on which they mainly did business, was the notes discounted, which rested on the credit of the drawers and endorsers, and on their credit and solvency depended the credit and solvency of the banks. It was, in fact, their credit, converted into bank notes, and backed by the Government credit, on which bank currency rested.

The Senator seems to think that it is impossible to bring and keep Treasury notes at par with gold and silver. In reply, he would refer to the fact already mentioned. It appeared by the Intelligencer, now on his table, that they are now at par with specie at New York. But he had a much stronger fact. The Prussian Government, which he regarded as the best administered at present in Europe, had a permanent issue of Treasury notes of a large amount, which were not only at par with specie, but habitually bore a premium; which completely refutes the assertion of the Senator. The Government, in all civilized countries, is the great money dealer. Its fiscal action pervades the whole community, and affects, more or less, every individual in it, and it must, of course, create a general demand for whatever it receives and disburses as money in the management of its fiscal concerns. To this our Government adds the possession of a boundless and fertile domain, which is in the course of rapid settlement, and that necessarily creates an extensive demand for whatever is received in payment for it. It is these demands which will ever keep Treasury notes at par value, unless the due proportion between demand and supply should be transcended, or bank notes, or some other medium other than gold and silver, be permitted to supply their place.

MR. WEBSTER. I wish it always to be understood that, when I insisted that the Government should pay in specie, I always added, "or the equivalent of specie," because specie-paying bank notes are equivalent to specie. Under the resolution of 1816, every thing was passed to the credit of the United States as cash. And why did we allow the payment of specie-paying bank notes? It was for the sake of convenience. But it was not said that they would not be subject to loss. There was danger of loss, or at least no absolute security; and the same may be said of specie itself, for that may be counterfeited. My argument was this: that the paper of specie-paying banks was received and paid, valuing it as a constant equivalent to specie; and this is founded on the fact that specie-paying bank paper is the representative of specie, having that which it represents always at command.

But I am glad of one thing: that the gentleman does not deny what I said in respect to his being in favor of a Government paper currency; but, on the contrary, has confirmed it. If this is not the tendency of the doctrine of State rights, it is the result of the doctrine of him and his friends; all tends to a Government paper, a Government bank. He is for a Government paper, and I go against it.

I do not see that Government pays in specie any the less because it uses the agency of the banks. For twenty years we have paid in specie, or its equivalent, and have used the banks as our agents, and we use them now. The gentleman says he will have nothing to do with bank paper. But what says the Secretary of the Treasury? Does he not say that he will receive bank notes; and has it not been proclaimed as a great merit in the Administration that they do receive them? Does the gentleman suppose that specie is now paid on goods imported? I understand just the reverse, and that the merchant's check is received for his bond; and this is justly considered as equivalent to specie. Therefore, if these Treasury notes were sold in New York, the merchant would give his check for them.

The gentleman seems to complain that I did not answer his case of A, B, C. It was thus, as I understood it: He supposed three farmers of equal credit, but the Government says it will receive the paper of C. If that were the case, I should say it would be a very foolish and unequal law. But if he had put it in the case of C that his paper was convertible, on demand, to specie, and that the paper of the other two was not, he would then have a parallel case, and it might be an advantage to C to give his paper this respectability. But that is not the object. The great object of the Government is, and ought to be, the accommodation of the public; and, if there is an incidental benefit, that can be no objection, but a recommendation. But the object is to accommodate the public and the Government.

MR. CALHOUN wished to be distinctly understood, that he did not carry his ideas of the Government using its own credit beyond the temporary wants of the Treasury, and the convenient management of its fiscal concerns.

If he did not censure the Administration for receiving the notes of specie-paying banks, it was because he believed that the laws left no discretion; but, with his opinion, if he were the Chief Magistrate, and believed that he had a discretion whether to receive such notes or not, he would not permit a dollar of bank paper to be received. There was a heavy responsibility somewhere. We are renewing our connection with the banks, when it was admitted that a shock must again follow at no distant day, unless some measure was adopted to prevent it. He hoped gentlemen would bring forward their plans for preventing it, so that they might be duly considered.

Mr. PRESTON would give his assent in no shape or form to the establishment of the repudiated and continental system of paper money. He should meet the crisis boldly, and not seek to hide the matter under the garb of a re-issue of Treasury notes. This bankrupt state of the Treasury must have been known, or at least foreseen. The sales of the public lands had almost entirely ceased; the revenue from the customs was dried up. Why, then, were the States not called on for the restoration of the deposits? He would answer, that the people might not have their eyes opened to scrutinize the conduct of the present Administration; that Administration which had promised so much in the way of retrenchment and reform, and done so little! That explained the partiality for Treasury issues, that splendid financial operation, which made money for the Government by the skill of the engraver; the object of which was to conceal from the people the state of embarrassment which misrule had brought upon them. It would appear that when we got out of money, all we had to do was to send to New York; a little steel, and copper, and ink, were the only ingredients necessary for the issue, as the people had already forgotten the Commonwealth paper of the Revolution and the assignats of France. What was the object of all this, but to bring the people by degrees to the adoption of a Treasury Bank. Mr. P. denied the constitutional right of Congress to issue bills of credit, and for so high a right as that he would claim the express power; we had the right to tax, and to borrow, and the enumeration of these powers showed clearly that the right to issue bills of credit was not in the grant.

Mr. CRITTENDEN opposed the bill, on the ground that this mode of raising money led to extravagant issues, and therefore ought to be discouraged. In three years this Administration, with the cry of retrenchment and reform, had spent one hundred millions of dollars, and now gave out an "emergency." If this were to continue, and the people called on for ten millions every few months, the sooner the Administration was in the bills of mortality the better! Nothing could cure it but keeping it from the money.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke of the depreciated condition of Treasury notes, and contrasted them with the notes of the banks, greatly to the advantage of the latter. One of the arguments of that gentleman, predicated on this assumption, was, that Treasury notes should not be offered to the creditors of the Government, but that they should, at all times, have the option of receiving gold and silver, or their equivalents. Another honorable gentleman, distinguished in the ranks of the Opposition, took occasion the other day to say, that the notes of the Government were inferior in value to those of the Bank of the United States. Now he (Mr. B.) happened to have in his possession a statement, which conclusively established the contrary. He saw in the Price Current of New York, dated the 15th of this month, that they had sold at par in the notes of banks which were redeemed in specie; and, therefore, they were equivalent to specie.

At the very time that the gentleman uttered the remark that the Treasury notes were inferior to those of the Bank of the United States, the latter were four or five per cent. below par, when the former were above, or equal to it. He found, also, by the same paper, that in the city of Philadelphia, Treasury notes sold at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. advance. Now there was that difference between the current notes of Philadelphia and specie; and therefore, at that place, the Treasury notes were equal to specie. He took the occasion to say that these errors and misrepresentations were of a piece with many others that daily went out from this body. One of the great objects of a certain political party seemed to be to assault and destroy the credit and character of the Government of the United States; and while they did that, they, in the same breath, sought to elevate the credit and character of the Bank of the United States. Such assaults were not only against the credit and character of the Government of the United States, but they were against the honor and character of the people of the United States; for the people and the Government were identified, both in credit and in character; and their pecuniary and political interests were indissolubly connected together.

No man was more averse to an extravagant expenditure of the public money than he was. He was one of that school, who believed that a rigid and judicious economy, in the management of the public finances, was essential to the preservation of our institutions. But the Government was embarrassed, and that embarrassment was brought about, not by its own acts, but by a great moneyed power, acting in concert with a certain political party, whose only hopes of success rested in destroying the credit of the Government, and drying up the resources and commerce of their country. It was one of a series of actions, put into operation for several years past, to arrest the financial operations of the Government.

Mr. B. said that the journals of both Houses of Congress might be very safely appealed to, as showing that the opposition to President Jackson's administration had almost uniformly favored a profuse and extravagant expenditure of the public money. When he had first taken his seat in that body, which was at the first session of Congress after the late President came into office, he had found the Opposition, which was mainly composed of the old American System party, almost uniformly urging and voting for the most wasteful appropriations of the public money. There was no system of pensioning, however great the charge which it was likely to bring on the Treasury, that did not, in the main, meet their favor and support. There was no object of internal improvement, however improper and unconstitutional, that it did not find from them a warm sympathy and ready advocacy. They were, in the main, as a party, the supporters of the great project for a national road from Buffalo to New Orleans, the cost of which was estimated at from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars. It was this profuse system of extravagance, which at that day found so much favor with the Opposition, that led to the memorable veto of President Jackson, on the occasion of the Maysville road bill; at which time bills were pending before Congress for various projects of internal improvement, the estimated cost of which was largely upwards of one hundred millions, and which were mostly arrested by that memorable decision of the President, and the public Treasury saved from a system of the most wasteful prodigality. It was true, that when some surplus had begun to accumulate in the Treasury, and a plan for distribution among the States had been formed, the language of economy had sometimes been heard from that quarter. It was a much more rapid and expeditious way of operating on public opinion, to act on entire States, than by the slower and more detailed plan of acting on sections, by granting appropriations for roads, rivers, &c. Hence this change, in his opinion, in the plan of the Opposition and American System party. In this point of view he had always regarded the possession of a surplus more as a source of weakness than of patronage to those in power. By the dexterous use which the Opposition had been disposed to make of it, it had been in reality turned against the Administration, and had been a source of patronage to those out of power, to aid their designs in obtaining power.

Treasury Notes.

Mr. B. said, therefore, on a review of the whole course and policy of the two great political parties in this country, that no impartial mind could fail to arrive at the conclusion, that the policy of the late and present Administrations had, by favoring a reduction of duties, and restricting appropriations for internal improvements, greatly promoted economy in the public expenditure, in comparison with the system of extravagance which would have prevailed if the policy of the Opposition had succeeded. It was not for those who had introduced and established an exorbitant system of duties and taxes, by which large and unnecessary sums were brought into the Treasury, to reproach others with extravagance.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was not necessary to take up the time of the Senate by answering all the misrepresentations which had been made. Some of them were well understood, and would be easily corrected. For instance, we have been told, said he, that ten millions of debt were contracted by the bill of the extra session, and that ten millions more were asked for now. Now every gentleman knew that ten millions could not be exceeded, and that not one dollar of Treasury notes could be issued under this bill, except to supply the place of a note that had been redeemed and cancelled. With reference to the amendment proposing to reduce the issue of Treasury notes to two millions, he would observe that there were the expenditures under the General Appropriation and Navy bills to be provided for, and, in addition to that, a bill to meet the expense of the Florida war must soon be expected here; and from information they had, at least two millions had been expended on that object alone, and drafts to a large amount for that service were waiting here for the necessary appropriations to pay them.

Mr. BENTON rose for the purpose of answering the question how the Treasury came to be at present out of money. He should be able to answer that question out of the book, and in such a way that there should not be a man, woman, or child, in the country but would be able to understand it. It was because the Congress of 1836 distributed among the States not only the surplus, but nine millions of appropriated moneys. [Mr. B. here read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing this fact.]

By the act of Congress of 1795, every appropriation made by Congress must remain two years to be applied to the object for which it was appropriated, and then, if not applied for, it was to go into the surplus fund. When the bill of 1836 was passed, this policy of the Government was violated, and it took all the money in the Treasury on a certain day, whether it was appropriated or not. The distribution was peremptory on that head, and divided the money, not that which remained after answering the appropriations, but that which was in the Treasury on the first of January. The stave-off policy was pursued then, as now, and it was midsummer before the appropriation bill was passed, and therefore, as he stated, there was a recapture of the appropriations. He denounced the recapture at the time, and at the ensuing session, when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that $9,646,000 had been recaptured, he called for the objects for which the appropriations thus recaptured had been made, and a detailed statement was made by the Secretary explaining them. These facts were known to every gentleman here, notwithstanding it is represented to the people that the Treasury is destitute in consequence of extravagance. If he had known that these statements would have been made, he would have provided himself with the document, and shown the portion of these appropriations that had been recaptured. These Treasury notes were now wanted to pay for them. He took his stand, (Mr. B. said,) with five or six others, against this Distribution bill, and he now congratulated himself that he had done so. The consequences resulting from this bill had shown that he was right. He said at the time that it was an illusion; that there was no money; that it was all bank credits, that would vanish into nothing as soon as the banks were called upon. He remembered a former occasion, when all this song of a surplus was sung in the same key, and ended very much in the same manner. When he came into Congress, in Mr. Monroe's time, we had an income of forty millions, and a surplus of nine millions, and in the next there was not a dollar—no recapture. In the first year he was here, eight millions were borrowed, and that too within a year after Mr. Monroe had called on Congress to know what to do with the surplus.

Mr. TALLMADGE recollected the word "bamboozled." It had been quoted by the Senator as often in 1836 as to-day, and was a kind of catch phrase used for political effect. Mr. T. contended that if the deposit law had gone into operation as originally intended, all the present disasters would have been avoided. The Senator from Missouri has told us that he was proud he was one of the six that had stood up against that measure, and that he had warned gentlemen at the time that it would destroy the banks. It so happened that two of the cashiers of banks of New York had told him to take the money out of their hands, and deposit it with the States, and that conversation was what induced him to make a proposition to that effect. It was well known the President said he would veto such a bill; and with this threat of the veto over our heads, the bill was not passed as originally drafted. If it had, we should now have had any money that we might have wanted, had it not been for Executive interference. If this act had not been passed, which arrested the eight or nine millions that the Senator spoke of, where would the gentleman now have been if his magnificent schemes of fortifications had been carried out? If the report sent in by Secretary Cass had not had the effect to arrest this extravagant appropriation, instead of now being called on for ten millions, we should be required to give twenty or thirty millions.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he did not understand how this nine millions was recaptured.

Mr. BENTON. Here take the book and read it.

After some remarks from Mr. CRITTENDEN,

Mr. BENTON said he meant to speak out of the book, inasmuch as the Senator from New York (Mr. TALLMADGE) had denied that the distribution act had contributed to the suspension of the banks, and gave as his authority information derived from gentlemen who were directors of two of the New York banks. Now he had a report made by Mr. Albert Gallatin, and others, at a convention of the city of New York banks, and as that report was made for all of them, the two banks alluded to by the Senator must have been of the number. The report was made before a meeting of all the banks of the city, and approved of by the whole of them.

Now here was an enumeration of the causes which produced a stoppage of the New York banks. Four causes were given; and one of them was the simultaneous withdrawal of the public deposits, etc. Now, what caused the withdrawal of the public deposits? It was caused by the distribution act, and not by the Secretary of the Treasury. This is what he asserted; and he was supported in the assertion by all the banks of New York. None of the extravagant appropriations were mentioned in the report of the New York banks. His fortification bill was not mentioned; and even the Specie Circular was not thought of.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the necessity of passing the Deposit act of 1836 was so imperious, and its benefits so manifest, that it required but little to be said in its vindication. Such was the urgency, that it is well known many who were disinclined to the measure, felt compelled to give it their reluctant support, as the only possible means of extricating the country from overwhelming difficulties, and of saving any portion of the immense surplus that had accumulated in the Treasury, and which was still daily augmenting. If there had been no other argument in its favor, the one which is so clearly stated and forcibly urged in the late report of the Finance Committee on the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) was all-sufficient. That document clearly proves, as was urged at the time, that a vicious circle had been formed from the deposit banks to the speculators in land, and from them to the land offices, and thence again to the banks; by which millions of millions of the choicest portions of the public domain were, at every revolution, passed from the people to the speculators for worthless bank notes. Every time the wheel went round the surplus was increased, and the capacity for another and more sweeping revolution augmented in the same proportion. The Deposit act, by withdrawing the funds from the banks, and placing them in the safe-keeping of the States, cut and destroyed this circle, and broke down the speculation; which, if it had continued another year unchecked, would have transferred most of the public lands worth having from the Government to those whom the banks might choose to designate. It did more: it saved the large amount which was withdrawn from the banks, and safely deposited with the States, much of which, without it, must necessarily have been lost.

But we are told that the withdrawal of the funds from the banks was the cause of the suspension of specie payment. That the manner in which it was done accelerated that event, he did not doubt; but it was idle and preposterous to suppose that the suspension would not have taken place without it. The approximate cause of that was the indebtedness of the banks beyond their means of payment; and the withdrawal of the deposits so far from contributing to its increase, was the most effectual measure that could be devised to arrest its further progress.

But we are also told that it is the cause of the present embarrassment of the Treasury, and that if we could command the deposits with the States, we should have ample means. That is true; but he did not regard it an evil. It is, on the contrary, a great good, and one intended by the passage of the act. In the midst of the vast profusion of means, which the now expiring protective tariff poured into the Treasury, the Government had lost all conception of economy and accountability.

He foresaw the evil, and recommended, some years since, in a report on Executive patronage, the measure now complained of, as the only effectual remedy for the great and growing danger. He then saw clearly that nothing could reach the evil, but the withdrawal of the surplus revenue, which could only be effected by placing it in the custody of the States. This the deposit act did, and its operation now begins to tell. The Government can no longer indulge in boundless extravagance. It must economize.

Among those who had resisted extravagant appropriations, he had constantly stood; and he now gave notice, that he would support no party that did not make economy and accountability a leading article in their creed and practice. They were essential to the preservation of free institutions. He regarded fifteen millions annually as ample for the support of the Government, under ordinary circumstances. He believed, indeed, that it might be well administered for three millions less, allowing for the navy five or six millions annually. Mr. Monroe's administration, which was charged with extravagance, did not average more than ten, deducting the payment on the national debt, although the pensions then were nearly as great as at present.

Mr. C. said that his colleague had made an objection against the constitutionality of this bill, which he deemed proper to notice. It was a rule with him, where the constitution is supposed to be involved, to bestow his serious consideration before he acted; and, if he saw reasons to doubt, not to give his assent. He had complied with the rule in this case, and the result was a clear conviction that the bill was constitutional. The right had been exercised from the commencement of the Government, without being before questioned; and, according to his conception, came within the powers expressly granted to Congress to borrow money, which meant neither more nor less than to raise supplies on the public credit. Interest was not essential to borrowing; and it would be ridiculous to suppose that the framers of the constitution intended to authorize the raising of supplies with interest, and to prohibit it without it. He denied that Treasury notes were bills of credit in any proper sense of those terms. They were intended to raise supplies to meet a temporary deficit in the Treasury, and were, in fact, nothing more than means of anticipating the revenue.

His colleague is the strenuous advocate of the joint resolution of 1816, which authorizes the collection of the public dues in the notes of the specie-paying banks, and has no scruples as to the right of collecting in the notes of banks that do not pay specie. Now, no one will deny that to authorize the receipt of bank notes in the dues of the Government, is virtually to endorse on each note that it shall be received in the public dues; or that, if the Government had the right to do the one, it had the right to do the other. Nor will it be denied, that if the Government has the right to write on the back of a bank note, that it will be received in the public dues, it has an equal right to write the same on a blank piece of paper, or, which is the same thing, to make a Treasury note. The truth is, that to authorize bank notes to be received in the public dues, is neither more nor less than to make them, to that extent, Treasury notes, and is, pro tanto, as much the making and issuing such notes as if done on a separate piece of paper.

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

North-east Boundary.

The Message of the President of the United States in relation to the claims of the State of Maine for aggressions, &c., committed on her boundary, was taken up on its reference.

Mr. EVANS said: The Message referred to claims of the State of Maine for the reimbursement of expenses incurred by them in relation to the boundary, but that he considered the least important question for consideration. Maine, he said, was averse to the original proposition, which was made on the 30th of April, 1833; and there had been a controversy between the General and State Governments ever since, and they could never agree, but the original proposition has been coupled with a highly objectionable principle of surveying and exploration. It went to limit and restrict the commission, and instead of allowing them to examine and run the line according to the treaty, they would be compelled to run a line different from that heretofore contended for. They would be allowed to depart from the true north line, and run a line westward, which would be in effect an abandonment of all the claims made on our part. Maine insisted that the commission should not be restricted by any thing but the terms of the treaty, because it was apparent that the restrictions proposed would all operate for the benefit of Great Britain. The Government of Great Britain proposed that the commission should ascertain a point in the highlands, which divide the waters, and it would inevitably give them the whole territory in dispute, for the commissioners would certainly stop at the only point where they could agree, and that would undoubtedly be a point south of Mars Hill, where they had always been willing the line should run. He went into an examination of the terms of the treaty, and referred to various acts of parliament and proclamations, together with the original charters of the provinces of Massachusetts, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, and contended that the original boundary of Massachusetts, (now Maine,) was upon the river St. Lawrence; and after the act of Parliament in 1784, which, he contended, confirmed and recognized the boundary of Nova Scotia, and referred to the north-west angle of that province as the starting point to run the boundary of Maine, and from that time to this, the angle, as mentioned in the treaty, had been fully recognized, and well known. But he objected to the terms of the commission, that they omitted altogether to take that starting point, and proposed to find another and a different one; and all the evidence contained in charters, treaties, acts of Parliament, and maps, was to be left out of their consideration.

Mr. FAIRFIELD referred to and read several papers to show that the proposition of the American Government would be favorable, and that it was agreed in the conditions that the award of the commission should be final and binding upon the parties; and he thought it would lead to a just and satisfactory award.

Mr. CUSHING went into a protest against the terms proposed for the commission, and said that Great Britain had always declared that they would stop south of the boundary claimed, and would never consent to go farther north than Mars Hill. He considered the American proposition was an entire abandonment of the claims of this country. It was yielding to the false assumption that there were no such highlands as were described in the treaty, which were to be reached by a line running due north from the north-east angle of Nova Scotia. This false assumption had been made by Great Britain, and by consenting to the proposition, our Government would yield the point, because, by consenting to run a line in a different direction to other highlands, it would concede that no such highlands existed as were mentioned in the treaty. Another objection was that Great Britain had, in the negotiations of 1783, and in 1814, asserted that the United States held all their lands as a grantee, and could hold no territory to which they could not show a title by deed. This ground he was disposed to resist as fatal and false, involving questions of boundary wherever our frontier met with that of Great Britain.

Representatives from Mississippi.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, said he had to announce to the House that the agreeable duty had been confided to him, and no doubt it was extremely agreeable to a large portion of the members of the House, that the people of Mississippi had re-affirmed the election made by themselves in November last, in sending SERGEANT S. PRENTISS and THOMAS J. WORD, as their representatives in the 25th Congress.

MESSRS. PRENTISS and WORD then presented themselves for qualification, and as the SPEAKER was about to administer the oath—

Mr. PRENTISS said, before taking the oath, he wished to state his objections. Though elected by the people of the State of Mississippi, in the election just taken place, he himself did not believe that election to be constitutional or valid. In taking the oath, sir, said he, I shall take it under the previous election, in November last, and not under the recent one, because, in our consciences, we do not believe the latter to be constitutional or valid.

Rescission of the Treasury Specie Order.

Mr. SHIELDS called for the reading of the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues accruing to the United States may be paid.

Mr. BOON demanded the previous question; which was seconded, the main question ordered, and the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BOON said he would content himself with demanding the previous question.

The House seconded the demand, and the main question, being on the passage of the resolution, having thus been ordered thereon—

FRIDAY, JUNE 1.

Iowa Territory—Motion to make the Tenure of Judges during Good Behavior—Rejected because the Constitution does not apply to Territories.

The Senate took up, as the order of the day, the bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and to establish the Territorial government of Iowa.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved to amend the bill by making the tenure of office of the judges during good behavior, instead of for four years, as in the bill.

Mr. SEVIER opposed the motion, and spoke of the inconvenience of having officers for life, who must be continued in office, no matter how unqualified, unless they could be convicted under an impeachment, which was exceedingly difficult to be done. He thought it the safest practice that the tenure of office for all public servants should be for short periods.

Mr. NORVELL said, that if any defect or inconvenience resulted from the tenure of good behavior, prescribed in this bill as the tenure by which the judges of the territory of Iowa were to hold their offices, the fault was in the Constitution of the United States. The first section of the third article of that instrument provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." The judges of the Territories are the United States judges, appointed by the President and Senate, under the authority of laws of the United States. If they are not United States judges, they must be foreign judges, or no judges at all. In the government of the North-western Territory, the first Territorial government established by the United States, and established in the same year in which the constitution was framed, a provision is found constituting a court of three judges; "and their commissions shall continue in force during good behavior." This may be considered a contemporaneous interpretation of the constitutional provision in relation to the tenure and character of the judicial office in the Territories of the United States. He considered the constitution clear on this subject. While, therefore, he should, if unrestrained by that instrument, be in favor of a term of years, instead of the term for life, he could not consent to vote for the amendment which proposed to limit the tenure of these Iowa judges to four years.

Messrs. ALLEN and MORRIS opposed the motion, contending that the provision in the constitution referred to by the Senator from Michigan, did not apply to the Territories.

The motion of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, was lost, and after amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, JUNE 4.

Books for Members.

Mr. CUSHING asked leave to offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the United States be authorized and directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Senate, forty copies, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, three hundred and sixty copies (in addition to the number he is now authorized to deliver to those officers) of the 1st volume of the 4th series, now published, of the documentary history of the American Revolution, published by Messrs. Clark and Force; and that he deliver a like number of copies to each of those officers, of every succeeding volume of that work, as soon as may be after the same shall have been delivered to him by the publishers.

That the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby directed, of the copies so furnished, to distribute one to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to each Territorial delegate of the 23d, 24th, and 25th Congresses, who are not entitled to receive the same under some former act or resolution of Congress.

Objection being made, Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rules; which prevailed—ayes 104, noes not counted.

The resolution was then read twice, and the question being on its engrossment, Pre-emption Bill.

The Senate "bill to grant pre-emption rights to actual settlers," was taken up.

The CHAIR propounded the question on the first amendment, proposed by the House committee on the public lands, which was to except from the operations of the pre-emption, the Miami reserve in the State of Indiana, acquired by treaty, of which the proclamation was made by the President of the United States on the 22d of December last.

Mr. BOON said the subject under consideration was one of very deep interest to a numerous and most meritorious class of citizens of the new States and Territories.

Mr. GOODE moved to amend the amendment by granting the reserved alternate sections at the price of $2 50 per acre, on the Miami canal line, in that State, to the State of Ohio, except those sections now settled and improved.

The amendment of the House committee was agreed to.

Mr. MAY moved an amendment to extend the law granting pre-emption rights to any persons who may now, or shall hereafter, have lived twelve months upon the public lands.

By general consent, the bill and various amendments pending, were all ordered to be printed.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 7.

Florida Indian War, and Cherokee Treaty of 1835.

On motion of Mr WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to consider the House bill making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for the payment of arrearages in 1837.

Mr. LUMPKIN said: I had indulged the hope, and still indulge it, that the Senate would be permitted to act promptly on this appropriation bill, without bringing into its discussion the exciting topics of the Florida and Cherokee treaties, and the Florida war. The service of the country and the character of the Government are at this time suffering for the want of the passage of this bill. Drafts amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars are at this moment pressed upon the Treasury of the country, and cannot be discharged till we pass this bill. The citizens of the country, who have given full and fair consideration for official and legal drafts on your Treasury, ought not to be delayed in receiving their just dues.

It is, therefore, with extreme reluctance that I feel myself called upon to take some notice of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON.)

The gentleman, with his usual eloquence, has eulogized the savage chief Oseola, apparently forgetful of the many horrid deeds which led to the catastrophe of this extraordinary man. When I hear Oseola eulogized on the floor of this Senate, I can but remember the treachery of this much indulged man to his friend and benefactor, the lamented General Wiley Thompson of Georgia, with whom I was long associated in public life, and who was long a respected member of the other branch of Congress. Yes, this bloodthirsty Oseola, not only murdered General Thompson, but was, and has been, the principal organ of all the horrors of the Florida war, indiscriminately levelled against every age and sex. Sir, if I fail to express my sympathy in strains of equal eloquence with the Senator from South Carolina, for the sufferings of the deserving portion of the native race, I will not yield to the gentleman my claims to feelings as refined, enlarged, and sympathetic for suffering humanity, even when a savage is the victim.

The gentleman has given us a history of his support and defence of the Cherokee treaty of 1835, and has manifested marked zeal in the defence of my State, and a portion of its public functionaries. I thank him kindly for all this voluntary service. But, we find mingled with all this support of the treaty, and zeal to have it faithfully and speedily executed, a spirit and bearing in the remarks of the gentleman, which, to my mind, is calculated to do great injustice to the Administration which made and has sustained this treaty; as well as the friends of the Administration, who have borne the heat and burden of the day, in bringing our Indian relations to their present attitude.

The gentleman reminds me of what I have often seen in the course of a life not now a very short one, that is: persons vociferous in a cause after the victory was achieved, and persons, too, who stood aloof while the battle raged. I will never permit the Senator from South Carolina, uncontested, to step in at this late day, and carry off whatever meed of praise may be due to those who have struggled so long to relieve my beloved State from an Indian population. I truly thank him for all his kind feelings and services to my State, and her citizens, whether private or public men. But all this kindness and zeal for my State and her distinguished citizens, shall not induce me silently to acquiesce in direct or indirect censure, when improperly cast upon me, or the Administration of the Federal Government which I support.

The Cherokee treaty of 1835, after all that has been said to disparage the Government and the Indians who formed it, I repeat, as I have often done before, it is a monument of the magnanimity of the Government on one side, and a standing record of the honesty and pure patriotism of the Cherokees who negotiated it, on the other side.

I was invited, at an early day, to aid as a commissioner in the execution of this treaty, and have been familiar with every important transaction since, up to the present day. The Executive Government has uniformly, and at all times, expressed an unwavering determination to carry out and execute the treaty, without infringement or change of its provisions. It has as uniformly, constantly, and sincerely expressed a desire to discharge this duty in a spirit of the utmost kindness and liberality towards the Cherokee people. In all this I have concurred and co-operated with the Government.

But I have uniformly dissented to that part of the policy of the Government which has permitted John Ross and his followers, while constantly protesting against the validity of the treaty, receiving the countenance and courtesy which they have done from the Government. I have uniformly believed, and still believe, that the best and safest way to have executed this treaty would have been, from the first, kindly, but firmly, to have used the imperative language to Ross and his followers—to have said the argument is exhausted in regard to the treaty—It must be executed. I believe that no propositions from Ross should ever have been entertained, without being accompanied by a pledge to cease from all opposition to the removal of the Cherokees. But I believe this difference of opinion originated from no difference of object. It was the desire of all to execute the treaty in that manner which might be best for all the parties in interest.

On taking my seat in the Senate, I found Ross and his delegation still here, memorializing Congress, and making propositions to the Executive Government. In the month of March, I found, from information derived from different sources, that the Executive Government here was still urged by gentlemen in high official stations, to the policy of conciliating Ross by increased liberality in money. Amongst others, I will read an extract from a letter of Governor Gilmer of Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated March 5, 1838. The Governor says: "The best informed persons residing among the Cherokees express the opinion that Ross can, if he will, remove his people at once. To avoid the great expense to the Government, and to preserve the lives and property of our citizens, and the Indians, which may be sacrificed if the treaty is executed by force, the Government can well afford to pay a very liberal price for the voluntary and immediate removal of the Indians. To enable Ross and the chiefs to effect this object, I believe it to be necessary for them first to return home, see their people, and let them be satisfied that their efforts to change the treaty have been honest, though unavailing. The Cherokees are so suspicious of their chiefs, that even Ross, as entirely as he has their confidence, might lose all power to serve them if he attempted to make a contract with the Government, for their emigration, before they were consulted, and their approval of the measure obtained. If the Government should ascertain upon Ross's return home, that he had the power, and was willing to undertake the removal of his people, the terms of the contract could be agreed upon without difficulty or delay." "If the pertinacity of Ross should create any difficulty, it might be obviated in making no reference in his contract to the treaty."

Very many letters from other persons of high respectability and official standing, to the same purport of Governor Gilmer's, may be found on the files of the War Department. Indeed, I have always myself anticipated mischief growing out of the execution of this treaty, unless the influence of Ross was neutralized by force or purchase. Under this aspect of the subject, and after both branches of Congress had given sufficient evidence of a determination to execute the treaty, regardless of the remonstrances of Ross, and the silly petitions of persons wholly ignorant of the subject upon which they were petitioning, I came to the conclusion that Ross might possibly be in a situation to yield to the true interest of his people, and let them emigrate to the West in peace. And hence my assent was given to the views suggested in the extract of Gov. Gilmer's letter, which I have read. And while I have uniformly protested against any movement which might in the slightest degree retard the removal of the Cherokees, I have, nevertheless, uniformly and freely expressed the opinion, that the moment when all opposition to the treaty by Ross and his party should be yielded up, and a disposition manifested to emigrate with reasonable despatch, from that moment the Indians would be secured from any unreasonable pressure on the part of the people of Georgia.

I am fully apprised of the great excitement which has been produced in my own State, and elsewhere, arising out of the propositions of the Secretary of War to John Ross, lately submitted to Congress. I am not only apprised of the excitement, but of the misapprehension which seems to exist on this subject. I perceive from the newspapers of Georgia and other States, as well as from the letters which I receive from my constituents, that an impression has been made upon the public mind that the Government was desirous, and had proposed, unnecessarily, to delay the emigration of the Cherokees for two years. This I know to be an entire misapprehension. The extension proposed to the States by the Government, and that in the most delicate and respectful manner, was never intended to embrace a longer period than that which might be required by a due regard to the common dictates of humanity, it being expressly stated that the Cherokees were to be removed as speedily as was consistent with health and comfort. General Scott is, moreover, instructed to continue the prosecution of the measures he has adopted to remove the Indians, and whether their removal is to be effected by compulsion, or voluntary emigration under their own agents, so to conduct his operations as to place the proprietors of the lands there in possession of their property with as little delay as possible. I admit that the propositions made to John Ross, by the Secretary of War, might have been put in a form less liable to misapprehension. But I know positively that the exposition given by the Secretary of War, of his letter to Ross, is perfectly consistent with the views which he expressed to me before making his propositions to Ross. The Secretary had ample grounds to believe that Congress entertained the most liberal feelings towards the Cherokees, and would willingly soothe them, as far as that could reasonably be done, by additional appropriations of money to be applied to their comfort.

The position of the Federal Administration of the Government has, upon this Indian subject, for many years past, been most delicate and peculiar. Especially since the commencement of General Jackson's administration, and his manifested determination to relieve the Southern States from the disadvantages of an Indian population. His untiring vigilance and perseverance on this subject is now a part of the history of the Government. But at every step a most formidable and peculiar opposition has embarrassed the Government in the prosecution of its Indian policy. The Administration has not only had to encounter the combined and regularly organized Opposition, which were known as open and avowed opponents, but many of the friends of the Administration, especially amongst the less informed, have been used as opponents to the Indian policy of the Government. Even in the States most deeply interested, we have sometimes seen the strong feelings of self-interest, waived to accommodate party spirit and party interest. At any rate, I have often found the measures of General Jackson and myself, even in Georgia, discountenanced by some of our political opponents, as far as public opinion would tolerate an expression of disapprobation.

I concede to the Governor of Georgia good intentions, in regard to his views and efforts to conciliate John Ross, and have yielded something of my own opinions in order that I might co-operate with his views and wishes, as well as those of the Executive officers of the Federal Government. I shall always do the Chief Magistrate of my State ample justice, whatever political difference of opinion may happen to exist. I do, however, most solemnly protest against the justice of the effort of the Senator from South Carolina to cast censure and blame upon the President and Secretary of War, as well as myself, for yielding something to the plainly expressed wishes of Governor Gilmer and many of his political friends, especially his northern Whig friends. If there be any error in this matter, the sin lies at the door of the opponents of the Administration; and yet the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) as the organ of the Southern wing of the Opposition, upbraids the Administration and its friends with throwing weighty responsibilities upon the Governor of Georgia. I would inquire, what is the great responsibility thrown upon the Governors of the four States interested in this matter, even under the misapprehension indulged that the States had been applied to for two years more time for the emigration of the Cherokees? Why, sir, the only responsibility is, to give an answer in accordance with the known wishes of the whole people over whom they preside. Where is the Governor who need be distressed or embarrassed at such responsibility as this?

Moreover, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) contends and urges that the proposals of the Secretary of War to John Ross amounts to a new treaty, and to an infringement of the treaty of 1835. I am not able myself to put any such construction on the proposals of the Secretary. The Secretary, in his proposals to Ross, in the very first sentence, disclaims all right on the part of the Federal Government to enter into any treaty stipulations which might affect the rights of the States. And we find a reiteration of the same sentiments, and sacred regard to the rights of the States, throughout the document under consideration.

That temporary mischief has grown out of the misapprehensions which have spread over the country in relation to this subject, I am fully aware. But, from the nature of things, I trust that the excitement will soon abate. The constant and daily movements and operations of the Government must surely correct, without delay, any mistaken impressions which may have existed. The Government is moving forward in the discharge of its duty. General Scott's instructions remain unchanged. His character is a sufficient guarantee that his duty will be discharged with fidelity and ability.

In conclusion, I would beg leave to request the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) to be assured of my fidelity to my constituents, especially upon this Indian subject. I can assure the honorable Senator, that he is wholly mistaken, if he supposes that the bearing of his remarks will ever induce the Southern wing of his own party to believe that I have no more self-love than to give a victory to my opponents, which has been achieved by my friends and myself.

Mr. LUMPKIN was followed by Messrs. CLAY, of Alabama, STRANGE, SOUTHWARD, and WHITE, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed by a unanimous vote, and was about to pass by unanimous consent, when Mr. HUBBARD stated that Mr. BENTON had expressed to him a desire to address the Senate on its third reading.

FRIDAY, JUNE 8.

Florida Indian War Bill.

The question being on the third reading of the bill—

2D SESS.]

Border Outrages—Canada and the United States Frontier.

[JUNE, 1838.]

Mr. BENTON said, that so far as the passage of the act was concerned, there was no necessity for him to say a word. The gentlemen who had spoken against it would all vote for it; and it was to answer things said in their speeches, and not to gain votes, that he now felt himself called upon to speak.

A Senator from New Jersey (Mr. SOUTHARD) has expressly charged that a fraud was committed upon the Florida Indians in the treaty negotiated with them for their removal to the West; that the war which has ensued was the consequence of this fraud; and that our Government was responsible to the moral sense of the community, and of the world, for all the blood that has been shed, and for all the money that has been expended, in the prosecution of this war. This is a heavy accusation. At home, it attaches to the party in power, and is calculated to make them odious; abroad, it attaches to the country, and is calculated to blacken the national character.

The Senator from New Jersey first located this imputed fraud in the Payne's Landing treaty, negotiated by General Gadsden, in Florida, in the year 1832; and after being tendered an issue on the fairness and generosity of that treaty by the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. CLAY,) he transferred the charge to the Fort Gibson treaty, made in Arkansas, in the year 1833, by Messrs. Stokes, Ellsworth, and Schermerhorn. This was a considerable change of locality, but no change in the accusation itself; the two treaties being but one, and the last being a literal performance of a stipulation contained in the first. The Seminole Indians in Florida being an emigrant band of the Creeks, and finding game exhausted, subsistence difficult, and white settlers approaching, concluded to follow the mother tribe, the Creeks, to the West of the Mississippi, and to reunite with them. This was conditionally agreed to be done at the Payne's Landing treaty; and in that treaty it was stipulated that a deputation of Seminole chiefs, under the sanction of the Government of the United States, should proceed to the Creek country beyond the Mississippi—there to ascertain first whether a suitable country could be obtained for them there; and secondly, whether the Creeks would receive them back as a part of their confederacy: and if the deputation should be satisfied on these two points, then the conditional obligation to remove, contained in the Payne's Landing treaty, to become binding and obligatory upon the Seminole tribe. The deputation went; the two points were solved in the affirmative; the obligation to remove became absolute on the part of the Indians; and the Government of the United States commenced preparations for effecting their easy, gradual, and comfortable removal. The entire emigration was to be completed in three years, one-third going annually, commencing in the year 1833, and to be finished in the years 1834 and 1835. The deputation sent to the west of the Mississippi, completed their agreement with the Creeks on the 28th of March, 1833; they returned home immediately, and one-third of the tribe was to remove that year. Every thing was got ready on the part of the United States, both to transport the Indians to their new homes, and to subsist them for a year after their arrival there. But, instead of removing, the Indians began to invent excuses and to interpose delays, and to pass off the time without commencing the emigration. The year 1833, in which one-third of the tribe were to remove, passed off without any removal; the year 1834, in which another third was to go, was passed off in the same manner; the year 1835, in which the emigration was to have been completed, passed away, and the emigration was not begun. On the contrary, on the last days of the last month of that year, while the United States was still peaceably urging the removal, an accumulation of treacherous and horrible assassinations and massacres were committed. The United States Agent, General Thompson, Lieutenant Smith, of the artillery, and five others, were assassinated in sight of Fort King; two expresses were murdered; and Major Dade's command was massacred. In their excuses and pretexts for not removing, the Indians never thought of the reasons which have been supplied to them on this floor. They never thought of alleging fraud. Their pretexts were frivolous; as that it was a long distance, and that bad Indians lived in that country, and that the old treaty of Fort Moultrie allowed them twenty years to live in Florida. Their real motive was the desire of blood and pillage on the part of many Indians, and still more on the part of the five hundred runaway negroes mixed up among them.

This is the plain and brief narrative of the causes which led to the Seminole war; it is the brief historical view of the case; and if I was speaking under ordinary circumstances, and in reply to incidental remarks, I should content myself with this narrative, and let the question go to the country upon the strength and credit of this statement. But I do not speak under ordinary circumstances; I am not replying to incidental and casual remarks. I speak in answer to a formal accusation, preferred on this floor; I speak to defend the late and present Administrations from an odious charge, and, in defending them, to vindicate the character of our country from the accusation of the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. SOUTHARD.) Mr. BENTON then proceeded at much length to defend the last and the present Administrations from the charge stated.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 20.

Message from the President—Border Outrages—Canada and the United States Frontier.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Message:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th inst., reports from the Secretary of State, Treasury, and War, and the documents referred to by them respectively. It will be seen that the outrages committed on the steamboat Sir Robert Peel, under the British flag, within the waters of the United States, and upon the steamboat Telegraph, under the American flag, at Rockville, in Upper Canada, have not been followed by any demand of either Government on the other for redress. These acts have been so far treated on each side as criminal offences, committed within the jurisdiction of tribunals competent to inquire into the facts, and to punish the persons concerned in them. Investigations have been made, some of the individuals inculpated have been arrested, and prosecutions are in progress, the result of which cannot be doubted. The excited state of public feeling on the borders of Canada, on both sides of the line, has occasioned the most painful anxiety to this Government. Every effort has been, and will be, made to prevent the success of the design apparently formed, and in course of execution by Canadians who have found a refuge within our territory, aided by a few reckless persons of our own country, to involve the nation in a war with a neighboring and friendly power. Such design cannot succeed when the two Governments appreciate, and confidently rely upon the good faith of each other in the performance of their respective duties. With a fixed determination to use all the means in my power to put a speedy and satisfactory termination to these border troubles, I have the most confident assurances of the cordial co-operation of the British authorities at home and in the North American possessions, in the accomplishment of a purpose so sincerely and earnestly desired by the Governments and people, both of the United States and Great Britain.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1838.

The Message and reports were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 20.

Louisiana Land Claims and Titles.

Mr. MOUTON moved that the bills relating to private and public land claims, be considered on Friday; many of which, he said, it was right should be acted on at once.

Mr. KNIGHT did not know what there was in these bills to entitle them to preference.

Mr. MOUTON would not have asked to have taken them up, were he not convinced that they would not consume the time of the Senate. The most of them were very plain cases, not involving any principle likely to lead to discussion; but, at the same time, were highly interesting to a large portion of the community.

Mr. BENTON would inform the Senate that it was not a private bill which the Senator from Louisiana asked to be considered on Friday, but a whole class of bills, some of which had been before the country for the last thirty-four years in one shape or other; and he desired to have them taken up on that day.

The motion was agreed to.

Abolishment of Imprisonment for Debt.

Mr. GRUNDY said there was a bill laid on the table yesterday, at the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, in relation to the abolishment of imprisonment for debt in certain cases. He was favorable to the bill, and said that if it were to be passed this session it could not be acted on too speedily; and he moved to take it up.

The question was on the amendment, viz: making the matter correspond with those States where the said abolition of imprisonment had in whole or in part been abolished.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill was further amended at the suggestion of Mr. PRENTISS, and passed by—YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, White, Williams, and Wright—36.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Preston, and Roane—4.

North-eastern Boundary.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. WILLIAMS's motion for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the survey and determination of the North-eastern boundary.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that, considering the importance of the question to Maine, and that her Senators and Representatives were requested by her Legislature to urge the passage of the bill, he felt it to be his duty to move its reference to a Select Committee. Mr. W. did this without intending the least disrespect to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the Senator from New York had proposed the reference, and to which, under other circumstances, there would be an obvious propriety in committing the bill. But it could not have escaped the notice of the Senate that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the course of the debate, had stated his opinion, that if the bill should go to that committee it would probably keep it without making a report, or report it back to the Senate with notice that he would move its indefinite postponement.

Messrs. WRIGHT, RIVES, CALHOUN, and BUCHANAN, advocated its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the ground that it involved questions of high import in regard to our foreign relations.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Texas Annexation—Right of Slaves to Petition Congress.

[JUNE, 1838.]

FRIDAY, June 22.

Washington Monument Society.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of the officers and managers of the Washington Monument Association in relation to the receipts and expenditures of that association; and moved that it be printed.

Mr. MORRIS called for the reading of the paper; and the Secretary having read a portion of it,

Mr. KING moved to lay it on the table, there being several expressions in it which he thought disrespectful, and ought not to be read to the Senate.

Mr. NORVELL hoped that his friend from Alabama would, for a moment, withdraw his motion to lay the memorial on the table. This paper proceeded from as respectable a body of gentlemen as any in the country; and he did think that, as they considered themselves to have been injuriously assailed on this floor, they should have an opportunity to be heard. It was true that they had used strong language; but this, under the circumstances, was natural. Let the memorial be read, and then the Senate might take what course they thought proper, as regarded the further disposition of it. By the statement of moneys collected, it appeared that the society had received only between 27,000 and 28,000 dollars, of which they had invested upwards of $27,000, principally, he believed, in Pennsylvania State stocks. Between four and five hundred remained uninvested. Except what had been allowed to collectors in the different States, as commissions for moneys obtained from subscribers by them, very little had been expended, as the statement would show. He was authorized to say, too, that the books, with the names of all the contributors to the monument, are in the hands of the Treasurer of the Association, open to the inspection of all.

Mr. KING did not perceive that the subject of the memorial was a matter with which the Senate had any thing to do, and that no action of the Senate could result from it; and secondly, he objected to the further reading of it, because it contained expressions, applied to the Senators or the Senate, which ought not to be permitted to be read there.

Mr. PRESTON, who just then entered the chamber, remarked, that the memorial was from very respectable persons, who conceived themselves injured by something that transpired on this floor. If it was a question of reception, he must hear the paper read before he could vote on it.

Mr. KING said there was no question of reception raised. The paper was received. His motion was to lay it on the table; and if the honorable gentleman wished to know whether it was respectful or not, he could easily read it at the Secretary's table. He had objected to the reading, because the paper spoke disrespectfully of members of that body.

Mr. SEVIER observed that this day was set apart for the consideration of private land claims; and he hoped it would not be consumed as yesterday was in debate.* The matter complained of by these individuals had been published in the public newspapers, and he presumed the editors would have no objection to insert their reply. It was a matter with which the Senate had nothing to do, and he, therefore, moved to lay it on the table.

This motion was carried.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 23.

Texas Annexation—Right of Slaves to petition Congress—Call to order by the Speaker—Appeal from the Speaker—Speaker sustained by the House.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded in his remarks on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in relation to the annexation of Texas; and was referring to the right of slaves to petition, and the proceedings in the House last Congress upon his tendering a petition of that character, stating that he should have no hesitation in presenting a petition from a slave, if his memorial was properly couched, and on a proper subject, or something to this effect.

The SPEAKER called Mr. A. to order, saying that his remarks were irrelevant to the subject under consideration.

Mr. ADAMS was putting an extreme case, by way of illustration, which was in order.

The SPEAKER again reminded Mr. A. that he was out of order.

Mr. LEGARE said he felt compelled to call the gentleman from Massachusetts to order; and cries of order were heard in various parts of the House.

Mr. ADAMS called upon the SPEAKER to reduce the disorderly words to writing, and appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

The SPEAKER said the CHAIR could not be called upon to reduce remarks made out of order to writing. It had never been known, either by any rule, or by parliamentary usage.

Several members referred to the twenty-third rule of the House, which requires that disorderly words shall be reduced to writing.

The SPEAKER said he was perfectly aware of that rule, and it applied to cases where one member called another to order for disorderly or personal remarks, and not to the SPEAKER, when he called a member to order for irrelevant remarks, for the rule says the SPEAKER shall call members to order, and makes it imperatively his duty.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the rule.

The SPEAKER read the rule requiring that a member "shall confine himself to the question under debate," and said he had called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order for irrelevancy in debate. As he was about to put the question on the appeal from the decision of the Chair,

Mr. ADAMS again insisted upon having the words reduced to writing.

Cries of "order!" "order!"

The SPEAKER directed Mr. ADAMS to take his seat.

Mr. ADAMS continued to hold the floor, and persisted in demanding that the words should be reduced to writing, and said he would then appeal, but he would not appeal from the decision in the form in which the SPEAKER had put it.

The SPEAKER then put the question upon the appeal; and the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 4.

North-eastern Boundary.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented a report, in which they unanimously recommend to the Senate the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That after a careful examination and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain relative to the North-eastern boundary of the former, the Senate does not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of seventeen hundred and eighty-three; and entertain a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two powers.

Resolved, further, That, considering that more than half a century has elapsed since the conclusion of that treaty; considering the extraordinary delay which has hitherto marked the negotiations and proceedings of the Governments of the two countries, in their endeavor amicably to settle the controversy, and considering the danger of mutual irritation and collisions upon the border of kindred and friendly nations from further procrastination, the Senate cannot forbear to express an earnest desire that the pending negotiation should be brought to a close, and the final decision of the dispute be made as early as practicable.

Resolved, That, as it would be inexpedient for the United States to proceed, upon their separate authority, to survey, and mark the North-eastern boundary, until all reasonable means of effecting that object by the consent and concurrence of both parties shall have been exhausted, the "bill to provide for surveying the North-eastern boundary line of the United States according to the treaty of seventeen hundred and eighty-three" ought not to pass; and it is therefore ordered that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, had been very anxious that the report should be read and weighed with all the attention and consideration belonging to so grave and important a subject; the question had been most deliberately and carefully examined in the committee; the report, which was the work of the Chairman, was prepared with very great ability; that much labor had been devoted to it, in the short space that had been allowed, and which was the more creditable to its author, amid his other various and pressing duties; and that it was well calculated to advance his high character before the country.

Mr. TALLMADGE concurred entirely with the Senator from Kentucky as to the talent and ability with which it was drawn up, and the manner in which it presented the great question. If, unhappily, at any time hereafter any collision should arise between the two countries, which he hoped most sincerely would be avoided, it was very important, in his view, that the people of the country should understand the merits of the controversy. They were set forth in that report in a condensed, and, at the same time, sufficiently complete and ample manner to enable them fully to comprehend and understand it. The report ought, therefore, to be widely and extensively circulated. He should, therefore, move for the printing of an extra number of copies, the largest that should be thought proper; and he therefore moved for the printing of 10,000 extra copies; which, afterwards, at the suggestion of Mr. WILLIAMS, supported by other gentlemen, he increased to 20,000.

[This session of Congress was concluded by joint resolution on Monday, July 9, 1838.]

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.—THIRD SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN THE

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 3, 1838.

At 12 o'clock, the Senate was called to order by the Hon. W. R. KING, of Alabama, President pro tempore.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of the Hon. EPHRAIM H. FOSTER, appointed by the Governor of the State of Tennessee a Senator from that State, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. FELIX GRUNDY.

The usual oath was then administered to Mr. FOSTER by the President, and he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. MORRIS,

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive any communications he might make; whereupon,

Messrs. WRIGHT and ALLEN were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate by the President.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 3.

This being the day set apart by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the Speaker, Mr. POLK, called the House to order at 12 o'clock, M.

VOL. XIII.—44

The following gentlemen appeared, were qualified, and took their seats:

MESSRS. BEERS and PUTNAM of New York, GIDDINGS and SWEARINGEN of Ohio, and CRABB of Alabama.

Wisconsin Election.

Mr. CRARY, of Michigan, announced to the Chair that the Hon. J. W. DORY was in attendance as a delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, and moved that he be qualified.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, then rose and protested against the right of Mr. DORY to take his seat in violation of Mr. J.'s rights as the sitting member, no vacancy having occurred, and he having never resigned.

The CHAIR said that it was a question for the House to take its order upon.

Mr. CRARY produced the certificate of Mr. DORY's election from Governor Dodge; which was read.

Mr. McKEIM moved to lay Mr. CRARY's motion on the table, but,

On motion of Mr. MERCER, the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Thursday next.

Election of Clerk.

The CHAIR laid before the House a letter from the Chief Clerk, notifying the House of the death of Col. WALTER S. FRANKLIN, late Clerk to the House of Representatives, which was read.

Mr. PETRIKIN then submitted a resolution, authorizing the present Assistant Clerk to act as Clerk of the House until the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. FRANKLIN should be filled.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to amend by substituting a resolution for the House to proceed forthwith to elect a Clerk.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved an amendment so as to provide that the election should be viva voce.

Mr. MILLIGAN inquired if this motion was in order.

The CHAIR ruled it to be so.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 119, nays 91.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the question recurring on the latter as amended.

So the House determined to proceed with the election of a Clerk forthwith, viva voce, and HUGH A. GARLAND, of Virginia, having received, on the third ballot, a majority of all the votes, was declared duly elected for the remainder of the present Congress.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 4.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, appeared in his place.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, stating that the House was organized and ready to proceed to business.

President's Message.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that quorums of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them.

A Message was then received from the President of the United States by MARTIN VAN BUREN, jr., his Private Secretary, as follows :

Fellow-citizens of the Senate

and House of Representatives :

I congratulate you on the favorable circumstances in the condition of our country, under which you reassemble for the performance of your official duties. Though the anticipations of an abundant harvest have not everywhere been realized, yet, on the whole, the labors of the husbandman are rewarded with a bountiful return; industry prospers in its various channels of business and enterprise; general health again prevails through our vast diversity of climate; nothing threatens, from abroad, the continuance of external peace; nor has any thing at home impaired the strength of those fraternal and domestic ties which constitute the only guarantee to the success and permanency of our happy Union, and which, formed in the hour of peril, have hitherto been honorably sustained through every vicissitude in our national affairs. These blessings, which evince the care and beneficence of Providence, call for our devout and fervent gratitude.

We have not less reason to be grateful for other bounties bestowed by the same munificent hand, and more exclusively our own.

The present year closes the first half century of our Federal institutions; and our system—differing from all others in the acknowledged, practical, and unlimited operation which it has for so long a period given to the sovereignty of the people—has now been fully tested by experience.

The constitution devised by our forefathers as the framework and bond of that system, then untried, has become a settled form of Government; not only preserving and protecting the great principles upon which it was founded, but wonderfully promoting individual happiness and private interests. Though subject to change and entire revocation, whenever deemed inadequate to all these purposes, yet such is the wisdom of its construction, and so stable has been the public sentiment, that it remains unaltered, except in matters of detail, comparatively unimportant. It has proved amply sufficient for the various emergencies incident to our condition as a nation. A formidable foreign war; agitating collisions between domestic, and, in some respects, rival sovereignties; temptations to interfere in the intestine commotions of neighboring countries; the dangerous influences that arise in periods of excessive prosperity; and the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth—these, with other trials not less formidable, have all been encountered, and thus far successfully resisted.

It was reserved for the American Union to test the advantages of a Government entirely dependent on the continual exercise of the popular will; and our experience has shown that it is as beneficent in practice as it is just in theory. Each successive change made in our local institutions has contributed to extend the right of suffrage, has increased the direct influence of the mass of the community, given greater freedom to individual exertion, and restricted, more and more, the powers of Government; yet the intelligence, prudence, and patriotism of the people have kept pace with this augmented responsibility. In no country has education been so widely diffused. Domestic peace has nowhere so largely reigned. The close bonds of social intercourse have in no instance prevailed with such harmony over a space so vast. All forms of religion have united, for the first time, to diffuse charity and piety, because, for the first time in the history of nations, all have been totally untrammelled, and absolutely free. The deepest recesses of the wilderness have been penetrated; yet, instead of the rudeness in the social condition consequent upon such adventures elsewhere, numerous communities have sprung up, already unrivalled in prosperity, general intelligence, internal tranquility, and the wisdom of their political institutions. Internal improvement, the fruit of individual enterprise, fostered by the protection of the States, has added new links to the confederation, and fresh rewards to provident industry. Doubtful questions of domestic policy have been quietly settled by mutual forbearance; and agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, minister to each other. Taxation and public debt, the burdens which bear so heavily upon all other countries, have pressed with comparative lightness upon us. Without one entangling alliance, our friendship is prized by every nation; and the rights of our citizens are everywhere respected, because they are known to be guarded by a united, sensitive, and watchful people.

To this practical operation of our institutions, so evident and successful, we owe that increased attachment to them which is among the most cheering exhibitions of popular sentiment, and will prove their best security, in time to come, against foreign or domestic assault.

The President's Message.

This review of the results of our institutions, for half a century, without exciting a spirit of vain exultation, should serve to impress upon us the great principles from which they have sprung; constant and direct supervision by the people over every public measure; strict forbearance on the part of the Government from exercising any doubtful or disputed powers; and a cautious abstinence from all interference with concerns which properly belong, and are best left to State regulations and individual enterprise.

Full information of the state of our foreign affairs having been recently, on different occasions, submitted to Congress, I deem it necessary now to bring to your notice only such events as have subsequently occurred, or are of such importance as to require particular attention.

The most amicable dispositions continue to be exhibited by all the nations with whom the Government and citizens of the United States have an habitual intercourse. At the date of my last annual message, Mexico was the only nation which could not be included in so gratifying a reference to our foreign relations.

I am happy to be now able to inform you that an advance has been made towards the adjustment of our difficulties with that Republic, and the restoration of the customary good feeling between the two nations. This important change has been effected by conciliatory negotiations, that have resulted in the conclusion of a treaty between the two Governments, which, when ratified, will refer to the arbitrament of a friendly power all the subjects of controversy between us growing out of injuries to individuals. There is, at present, also, reason to believe that an equitable settlement of all disputed points will be attained without further difficulty or unnecessary delay, and thus authorize the free resumption of diplomatic intercourse with our sister Republic.

With respect to the north-eastern boundary of the United States, no official correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain has passed since that communicated to Congress towards the close of their last session. The offer to negotiate a convention for the appointment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, I am, however, assured will be met by her Majesty's Government in a conciliatory and friendly spirit, and instructions to enable the British Minister here to conclude such an arrangement will be transmitted to him without needless delay. It is hoped and expected that these instructions will be of a liberal character, and that this negotiation, if successful, will prove to be an important step towards the satisfactory and final adjustment of the controversy.

I had hoped that the respect for the laws and regard for the peace and honor of their own country, which has ever characterized the citizens of the United States, would have prevented any portion of them from using any means to promote insurrection in the territory of a power with which we are at peace, and with which the United States are desirous of maintaining the most friendly relations. I regret deeply, however, to be obliged to inform you that this has not been the case. Information has been given to me, derived from official and other sources, that many citizens of the United States have associated together to make hostile incursions from our territory into Canada, and to aid and abet insurrection there, in violation of the obligations and laws of the United States, and in open disregard of their own duties as citizens. This information has been in part confirmed, by a hostile invasion actually made by citizens of the United States, in conjunction with Canadians and others, and accompanied by a forcible seizure of the property of our citizens, and an application thereof to the prosecution of military operations against the authorities and people of Canada.

The results of these criminal assaults upon the peace and order of a neighboring country, have been, as was to be expected, fatally destructive to the misguided or deluded persons engaged in them, and highly injurious to those in whose behalf they are professed to have been undertaken. The authorities in Canada, from intelligence received of such intended movements among our citizens, have felt themselves obliged to take precautionary measures against them; have actually embodied the militia, and assumed an attitude to repel the invasion to which they believed the colonies were exposed from the United States. A state of feeling on both sides of the frontier has thus been produced, which called for prompt and vigorous interference. If an insurrection existed in Canada, the amicable dispositions of the United States towards Great Britain, as well as their duty to themselves, would lead them to maintain a strict neutrality, and to restrain their citizens from all violations of the laws which have been passed for its enforcement. But this Government recognizes a still higher obligation to repress all attempts on the part of its citizens to disturb the peace of a country where order prevails, or has been re-established. Depredations by our citizens upon nations at peace with the United States, or combinations for committing them, have at all times been regarded by the American Government and people with the greatest abhorrence. Military incursions by our citizens into countries so situated, and the commission of acts of violence on the members thereof, in order to effect a change in its government, or under any pretext whatever, have, from the commencement of our Government, been held equally criminal on the part of those engaged in them, and as much deserving of punishment, as would be the disturbance of the public peace by the perpetration of similar acts within our own territory.

By no country or persons have these invaluable principles of international law—principles, the strict observance of which is so indispensable to the preservation of social order in the world—been more earnestly cherished or sacredly respected than by those great and good men who first declared, and finally established, the independence of our own country. They promulgated and maintained them at an early and critical period in our history; they were subsequently embodied in legislative enactments of a highly penal character, the faithful enforcement of which has hitherto been, and will, I trust, always continue to be, regarded as a duty inseparably associated with the maintenance of our national honor. That the people of the United States should feel an interest in the spread of political institutions as free as they regard their own to be, is natural; nor can a sincere solicitude for the success of all those who are, at any time, in good faith struggling for their acquisition, be imputed to our citizens as a crime. With the entire freedom of opinion, and an undisguised expression thereof, on their part, the Government has neither the right, nor, I trust, the disposition to interfere. But whether the interest or the honor of the United States require that they should be made a party to any such struggle, and, by inevitable consequence, to the war which is waged in its support, is a question which, by our constitution, is wisely left to Congress alone to decide. It is, by the laws, already made criminal in our citizens to embarrass or anticipate that decision, by unauthorized military operations on their part. Offences of this character, in addition to their criminality as violations of the laws of our country, have a direct tendency to draw down upon our own citizens at large the multiplied evils of a foreign war, and expose to injurious imputations the good faith and honor of the country. As such they deserve to be put down with promptitude and decision. I cannot be mistaken. I am confident, in counting on the cordial and general concurrence of our fellow-citizens in this sentiment. A copy of the proclamation which I have felt it my duty to issue, is herewith communicated. I cannot but hope that the good sense and patriotism, the regard for the honor and reputation of their country, the respect for the laws which they have themselves enacted for their own government, and the love of order for which the mass of our people have been so long and so justly distinguished, will deter the comparatively few who are engaged in them from a further prosecution of such desperate enterprises. In the mean time, the existing laws have been, and will continue to be, faithfully executed; and every effort will be made to carry them out in their full extent. Whether they are sufficient or not, to meet the actual state of things on the Canadian frontier, it is for Congress to decide.

It will appear from the correspondence herewith submitted, that the Government of Russia declines a renewal of the fourth article of the convention of April, 1824, between the United States and his Imperial Majesty, by the third article of which it is agreed that "hereafter there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of the said States, any establishment upon the north-west coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent, to the north of 54° 40' of north latitude; and that in the same manner there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, south of the same parallel;" and by the fourth article, "that, during a term of ten years, counting from the signature of the present convention, the ships of both powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects respectively, may reciprocally frequent, without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the coast mentioned in the preceding article, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country." The reasons assigned for declining to renew the provisions of this article, are, briefly, that the only use made by our citizens of the privilege it secures to them, has been to supply the Indians with spirituous liquors, ammunition, and fire-arms; that this traffic has been excluded from the Russian trade; and as the supplies furnished from the United States are injurious to the Russian establishments on the north-west coast, and calculated to produce complaints between the two Governments, his Imperial Majesty thinks it for the interest of both countries not to accede to the proposition made by the American Government for the renewal of the article last referred to.

The correspondence herewith communicated will show the grounds upon which we contend that the citizens of the United States have, independent of the provisions of the convention of 1824, a right to trade with the natives upon the coast in question, at unoccupied places, liable, however, it is admitted, to be at any time extinguished by the creation of Russian establishments at such points. This right is denied by the Russian Government, which asserts that, by the operation of the treaty of 1824, each party agreed to waive the general right to land on the vacant coasts on the respective sides of the degree of latitude referred to, and accepted, in lieu thereof, the mutual privileges mentioned in the fourth article. The capital and tonnage employed by our citizens in their trade with the north-west coast of America will, perhaps, on adverting to the official statements of the commerce and navigation of the United States for the last few years, be deemed too inconsiderable in amount to attract much attention; yet the subject may, in other respects, deserve the careful consideration of Congress.

I regret to state that the blockade of the principal ports on the eastern coast of Mexico, which, in consequence of differences between that Republic and France, was instituted in May last, unfortunately still continues, enforced by a competent French naval force, and is necessarily embarrassing to our own trade in the gulf, in common with that of other nations. Every disposition, however, is believed to exist on the part of the French Government, to render this measure as little onerous as practicable to the interests of the citizens of the United States, and to those of neutral commerce; and it is to be hoped that an early settlement of the difficulties between France and Mexico, will soon re-establish the harmonious relations formerly subsisting between them, and again open the ports of that Republic to the vessels of all friendly nations.

A convention for marking that part of the boundary between the United States and the Republic of Texas, which extends from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red River, was concluded and signed at this city on the 25th of April last. It has since been ratified by both Governments; and reasonable measures will be taken to carry it into effect on the part of the United States.

The application of that Republic for admission into this Union, made in August, 1837, and which was declined for reasons already made known to you, had been formally withdrawn, as will appear from the accompanying copy of the note of the Minister Plenipotentiary of Texas, which was presented to the Secretary of State on the occasion of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention above mentioned.

Copies of the convention with Texas, of a commercial treaty concluded with the King of Greece, and of a similar treaty with the Peru-Bolivian Confederation, the ratifications of which have been recently exchanged, accompany this message for the information of Congress, and for such legislative enactments as may be found necessary or expedient, in relation to either of them.

ness, or pleasure, or other motives, may tempt into distant climes, and at the same time to cultivate those sentiments of mutual respect and good will which experience has proved so beneficial in international intercourse, the Government of the United States has deemed it expedient, from time to time, to establish diplomatic connections with different foreign States, by the appointment of representatives to reside within their respective territories. I am gratified to be enabled to announce to you that, since the close of your last session, these relations have been opened under the happiest auspices with Austria and the Two Sicilies; that new nominations have been made in the respective missions of Russia, Brazil, Belgium, and Sweden and Norway, in this country; and that a Minister Extraordinary has been received, accredited to this Government from the Argentine Confederation.

* An exposition of the fiscal affairs of the Government, and of their condition for the past year, will be made to you by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The available balance in the Treasury, on the 1st of January next, is estimated at $2,765,342. The receipts of the year, from customs and lands, will probably amount to $20,615,598. These usual sources of revenue have been increased by an issue of Treasury notes—of which less than eight millions of dollars, including interest and principal, will be outstanding at the end of the year—and by the sale of one of the bonds of the Bank of the United States, for $2,254,871. The aggregate of means from these and other sources, with the balance on hand on the 1st of January last, has been applied to the payment of appropriations by Congress. The whole expenditure for the year on their account, including the redemption of more than eight millions of Treasury notes, constitutes an aggregate of about forty millions of dollars, and will still leave in the Treasury the balance before stated.

Nearly eight millions of dollars of Treasury notes are to be paid during the coming year, in addition to the ordinary appropriations for the support of Government. For both these purposes, the resources of the Treasury will undoubtedly be sufficient, if the charges upon it are not increased beyond the annual estimates. No excess, however, is likely to exist; nor can the postponed instalment of the surplus revenue be deposited with the States, nor any considerable appropriations beyond the estimates be made, without causing a deficiency in the Treasury. The great caution advisable at all times, of limiting appropriations to the wants of the public service, is rendered necessary at present by the prospective and rapid reduction of the tariff; while the vigilant jealousy, evidently excited among the people by the occurrences of the last few years, assures us that they expect from their representatives, and will sustain them in the exercise of, the most rigid economy. Much can be effected by postponing appropriations, not immediately required for the ordinary public service, or for any pressing emergency; and much by reducing the expenditures where the entire and immediate accomplishment of the objects in view is not indispensable.

When we call to mind the recent and extreme embarrassments produced by excessive issues of bank paper, aggravated by the unforeseen withdrawal of much foreign capital, and the inevitable derangement arising from the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States as required by Congress; and consider the heavy expenses incurred by the removal of Indian tribes; by the military operations in Florida; and on account of the unusually large appropriations made at the last two annual sessions of Congress for other objects, we have striking evidence, in the present efficient state of our finances, of the abundant resources of the country to fulfil all its obligations. Nor is it less gratifying to find that the general business of the community, deeply affected as it has been, is reviving with additional vigor, chastened by the lessons of the past, and animated by the hopes of the future. By the curtailment of paper issues; by curbing the sanguine and adventurous spirit of speculation; and by the honorable application of all available means to the fulfilment of obligations, confidence has been restored both at home and abroad, and ease and facility secured to all the operations of trade.

The agency of the Government in producing these results has been as efficient as its powers and means permitted. By withholding from the States the deposit of the fourth instalment, and leaving several millions at long credits with the banks, principally in one section of the country, and more immediately beneficial to it; and, at the same time, aiding the banks and commercial communities in other sections, by postponing the payment of bonds for duties to the amount of between four and five millions of dollars; by an issue of Treasury notes as a means to enable the Government to meet the consequences of their indulgence; but affording, at the same time, facilities for remittance and exchange; and by steadily declining to employ as general depositories of the public revenues, or receive the notes of all banks which refused to redeem them with specie: by these measures, aided by the favorable action of some of the banks, and by the support and co-operation of a large portion of the community, we have witnessed an early resumption of specie payments in our great commercial capital, promptly followed in almost every part of the United States. This result has been alike salutary to the true interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; to public morals, respect for the laws, and that confidence between man and man which is so essential in all our social relations.

The contrast between the suspension of 1814 and that of 1837 is most striking. The short duration of the latter; the prompt restoration of business; the evident benefits resulting from an adherence by the Government to the constitutional standard of value, instead of sanctioning the suspension by the receipt of irredeemable paper; and the advantages derived from the large amount of specie introduced into the country previous to 1837, afford a valuable illustration of the true policy of the Government in such a crisis; nor can the comparison fail to remove the impression that a national bank is necessary in such emergencies. Not only were specie payments resumed without its aid, but exchanges have also been more rapidly restored than when it existed; thereby showing that private capital, enterprise, and prudence are fully adequate to these ends. On all these points experience seems to have confirmed the views heretofore submitted to Congress. We have been saved the mortification of seeing the distress of the community for the third time seized on to fasten upon the country so dangerous an institution; and we may also hope that the business of individuals will hereafter be relieved from the injurious effects of a continued agitation of that disturbing subject. The limited influence of a national bank in averting derangement in the exchanges of the country, or in compelling the resumption of specie payments, is now not less apparent than its tendency to increase inordinate speculation by sudden expansions and contractions; its disposition to create panic and embarrassment for the promotion of its own designs; its interference with politics; and its far greater power for evil than for good, either in regard to the local institutions or the operations of Government itself. What was, in these respects, but apprehension or opinion when a national bank was first established, now stands confirmed by humiliating experience. The scenes through which we have passed conclusively prove how little our commerce, agriculture, manufactures, or finances, require such an institution, and what dangers are attendant on its power—a power, I trust, never to be conferred by the American people upon their Government, and still less upon individuals not responsible to them for its unavoidable abuses.

My conviction of the necessity of further legislative provisions for the safekeeping and disbursement of the public moneys, and my opinion in regard to the measures best adapted to the accomplishment of those objects, have been already submitted to you. These have been strengthened by recent events; and, in the full conviction that time and experience must still further demonstrate their propriety, I feel it my duty, with respectful deference to the conflicting views of others, again to invite your attention to them.

With the exception of limited sums deposited in the few banks still employed under the act of 1836, the amounts received for duties, and, with very inconsiderable exceptions, those accruing from lands also, have, since the general suspension of specie payments by the deposit banks, been kept and disbursed by the Treasurer, under his general legal powers, subject to the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury. The propriety of defining more specifically, and of regulating by law, the exercise of this wide scope of Executive discretion, has been already submitted to Congress.

A change in the office of collector at one of our principal ports, has brought to light a defalcation of the gravest character, the particulars of which will be laid before you in a special report from the Secretary of the Treasury. By his report and the accompanying documents, it will be seen that the weekly returns of the defaulting officer apparently exhibited, throughout, a faithful administration of the affairs intrusted to his management. It, however, now appears, that he commenced abstracting the public moneys shortly after his appointment, and continued to do so, progressively increasing the amount, for the term of more than seven years, embracing a portion of the period during which the public moneys were deposited in the Bank of the United States, the whole of that of the State bank deposit system, and concluding only on his retirement from office after that system had substantially failed, in consequence of the suspension of specie payments.

The way in which this defalcation was so long concealed, and the steps taken to indemnify the United States, as far as practicable, against loss, will also be presented to you. The case is one which imperatively claims the attention of Congress, and furnishes the strongest motive for the establishment of a more severe and secure system for the safekeeping and disbursement of the public moneys than any that has heretofore existed.

It seems proper, at all events, that, by an early enactment, similar to that of other countries, the application of public money by an officer of Government to private uses, should be made a felony, and visited with severe and ignominious punishment. This is already, in effect, the law in respect to the mint, and has been productive of the most salutary results. Whatever system is adopted, such an enactment would be wise as an independent measure, since much of the public moneys must, in their collection and ultimate disbursement, pass twice through the hands of public officers, in whatever manner they are intermediately kept. The Government, it must be admitted, has been from its commencement comparatively fortunate in this respect. But the appointing power cannot always be well advised in its selections, and the experience of every country has shown that public officers are not at all times proof against temptation. It is a duty, therefore, which the Government owes, as well to the interests committed to its care as to the officers themselves, to provide every guard against transgressions of this character that is consistent with reason and humanity. Congress cannot be too jealous of the conduct of those who are intrusted with the public money; and I shall at all times be disposed to encourage a watchful discharge of this duty. If a more direct co-operation on the part of Congress, in the supervision of the conduct of the officers intrusted with the custody and application of the public money is deemed desirable, it will give me pleasure to assist in the establishment of any judicious and constitutional plan by which that object may be accomplished. You will, in your wisdom, determine upon the propriety of adopting such a plan, and upon the measure necessary to its effectual execution. When the late Bank of the United States was incorporated, and made the depository of the public moneys, a right was reserved to Congress to inspect, at its pleasure, by a committee of that body, the books and the proceedings of the bank.

In one of the States whose banking institutions are supposed to rank among the first in point of stability, they are subjected to constant examination by commissioners appointed for that purpose, and much of the success of its banking system is attributed to this watchful supervision. The same course has also, in view of its beneficial operation, been adopted by an adjoining State, favorably known for the care it has always bestowed upon whatever relates to its financial concerns. I submit to your consideration whether a committee of Congress might not be profitably employed in inspecting, at such intervals as might be deemed proper, the affairs and accounts of officers intrusted with the custody of the public moneys. The frequent performance of this duty might be made obligatory on the committee in respect to those officers who have large sums in their possession, and left discretionary in respect to others. They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to a prompt removal from office unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for; and report, also, to Congress, at the commencement of each session, the result of their examinations and proceedings. It does appear to me that, with a subjection of this class of public officers to the general supervision of the Executive, to examinations by a committee of Congress at periods of which they should have no previous notice, and to prosecution and punishment as for felony for every breach of trust, the safekeeping of the public moneys, under the system proposed, might be placed on a surer foundation than it has ever occupied since the establishment of the Government.

The Secretary of the Treasury will lay before you additional information containing new details on this interesting subject. To these I ask your early attention. That it should have given rise to great diversity of opinion cannot be a subject of surprise. After the collection and custody of the public moneys had been for so many years connected with, and made subsidiary to, the advancement of private interests, a return to the simple and self-denying ordinances of the constitution could not but be difficult. But time and free discussion eliciting the sentiments of the people, and aided by that conciliatory spirit which has ever characterized their course on great emergencies, were relied upon for a satisfactory settlement of the question. Already has this anticipation on one important point at least—the impropriety of diverting public money to private purposes—been fully realized. There is no reason to suppose that legislation upon that branch of the subject would now be embarrassed by a difference of opinion, or fail to receive the cordial support of a large majority of our constituents. The connection which formerly existed between the Government and banks, was in reality injurious to both, as well as to the general interests of the community at large. It aggravated the disasters of trade and the derangements of commercial intercourse, and administered new excitement and additional means to wild and reckless speculations, the disappointments of which threw the country into convulsions of panic, and all but produced violence and bloodshed. The imprudent expansion of bank credits, which was the natural result of the command of the revenues of the State, furnished the resources for unbounded license in every species of adventure, seduced industry from its regular and salutary occupations by the hope of abundance without labor, and deranged the social state by tempting all trades and professions into the vortex of speculation on remote contingencies.

The same wide-spreading influence impeded also the resources of the Government, curtailed its useful operations, embarrassed the fulfilment of its obligations, and seriously interfered with the execution of the laws. Large appropriations and oppressive taxes are the natural consequences of such a connection, since they increase the profits of those who are allowed to use the public funds, and make it their interest that money should be accumulated and expenditures multiplied. It is thus that a concentrated money power is tempted to become an active agent in political affairs, and all past experience has shown on which side that influence will be arrayed. We deceive ourselves if we suppose that it will ever be found asserting and supporting the rights of the community at large, in opposition to the claims of the few.

In a Government whose distinguishing characteristic should be a diffusion and equalization of its benefits and burdens, the advantage of individuals will be augmented at the expense of the mass of the people. Nor is it the nature of combinations for the acquisition of legislative influence to confine their interference to the single object for which they were originally formed. The temptation to extend it to other matters, is, on the contrary, not unfrequently too strong to be resisted. The influence in the direction of public affairs, of the community at large, is, therefore, in no slight danger of being sensibly and injuriously affected by giving to a comparatively small, but very efficient class, a direct and exclusive personal interest in so important a portion of the legislation of Congress as that which relates to the custody of the public moneys. If laws acting upon private interests cannot always be avoided, they should be confined within the narrowest limits, and left, wherever possible, to the Legislatures of the States. When not thus restricted, they lead to combinations of powerful associations, foster an influence necessarily selfish, and turn the fair course of legislation to sinister ends, rather than to objects that advance public liberty, and promote the general good.

The whole subject now rests with you, and I cannot but express a hope that some definite measure will be adopted at the present session.

It will not, I am sure, be deemed out of place for me here to remark, that the declaration of my views in opposition to the policy of employing banks as depositories of the Government funds, cannot justly be construed as indicative of hostility, official or personal, to those institutions; or to repeat, in this form, and in connection with this subject, opinions which I have uniformly entertained, and on all proper occasions expressed. Though always opposed to their creation in the form of exclusive privileges, and as a State magistrate aiming by appropriate legislation to secure the community against the consequences of their occasional mismanagement, I have yet ever wished to see them protected in the exercise of rights conferred by law, and have never doubted their utility, when properly managed, in promoting the interests of trade, and, through that channel, the other interests of the community. To the General Government they present themselves merely as State institutions, having no necessary connection with its legislation or its administration. Like other State establishments, they may be used or not in conducting the affairs of the Government, as public policy and the general interests of the Union may seem to require. The only safe or proper principal upon which their intercourse with the Government can be regulated, is that which regulates their intercourse with the private citizen—the conferring of mutual benefits. When the Government can accomplish a financial operation better with the aid of the banks than without, it should be at liberty to seek that aid as it would the services of a private banker, or other capitalists or agents, giving the preference to those who will serve it on the best terms. Nor can there ever exist an interest in the officers of the General Government, as such, inducing them to embarrass or annoy the State banks, any more than to incur the hostility of any other class of State institutions, or of private citizens. It is not in the nature of things that hostility to those institutions can spring from this source, or any opposition to their course of business, except when they themselves depart from the objects of their creation, and attempt to usurp powers not conferred upon them, or to subvert the standard of value established by the constitution. While opposition to their regular operations cannot exist in this quarter, resistance to any attempt to make the Government dependent upon them for the successful administration of public affairs, is a matter of duty, as I trust it ever will be of inclination, no matter from what motive or consideration the attempt may originate.

It is no more than just to the banks to say, that, in the late emergency, most of them firmly resisted the strongest temptation to extend their paper issues, when apparently sustained in a suspension of specie payments by public opinion, even though in some cases invited by legislative enactments. To this honorable course, aided by the resistance of the General Government, acting in obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, to the introduction of an irredeemable paper medium, may be attributed, in a great degree, the speedy restoration of our currency to a sound state, and the business of the country to its wonted prosperity. The banks have but to continue in the same safe course, and be content in their appropriate sphere, to avoid all interference from the General Government, and to derive from it all the protection and benefits which it bestows on other State establishments, on the people of the States, and on the States themselves. In this, their true position, they cannot but secure the confidence and good will of the people and the Government, which they can only lose when, leaping from their legitimate sphere, they attempt to control the operations of the Government to their own purposes.

Our experience under the act passed at the last session, to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, has as yet been too limited to enable us to pronounce with safety upon the efficacy of its provisions to carry out the wise and liberal policy of the Government in that respect. There is, however, the best reason to anticipate favorable results from its operation. The recommendations formerly submitted to you, in respect to a graduation of the price of the public lands, remain to be finally acted upon. Having found no reason to change the views then expressed, your attention to them is again respectfully requested.

Every proper exertion has been made, and will be continued, to carry out the wishes of Congress in relation to the tobacco trade, as indicated in the several resolutions of the House of Representatives, and the legislation of the two branches. A favorable impression has, I trust, been made in the different foreign countries to which particular attention has been directed, and although we cannot hope for an early change in their policy, as in many of them a convenient and large revenue is derived from monopolies in the fabrication and sale of this article, yet, as these monopolies are really injurious to the people where they are established, and the revenue derived from them may be less injuriously and with equal facility obtained from another and a liberal system of administration, we cannot doubt that our efforts will be eventually crowned with success, if persisted in with temperate firmness, and sustained by prudent legislation.

In recommending to Congress the adoption of the necessary provisions at this session for taking the next census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, the suggestion presents itself whether the scope of the measure might not be usefully extended, by causing it to embrace authentic statistical returns of the great interests specially intrusted to, or necessarily affected by the legislation of Congress.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of War presents a satisfactory account of the state of the army, and of the several branches of the public service confided to the superintendence of that officer.

The law increasing and organizing the military establishment of the United States has been nearly carried into effect, and the army has been extensively and usefully employed during the past season.

I would again call to your notice the subjects connected with and essential to the military defences of the country, which were submitted to you at the last session; but which were not acted upon, as is supposed, for want of time. The most important of them is the organization of the militia on the maritime and inland frontiers. This measure is deemed important, as it is believed that it will furnish an effective volunteer force in aid of the regular army, and may form the basis for a general system of organization for the entire militia of the United States. The erection of a national foundry and gunpowder manufactory, and one for making small arms, the latter to be situated at some point west of the Alleghany Mountains, all appear to be of sufficient importance to be again urged upon your attention.

The plan proposed by the Secretary of War for the distribution of the forces of the United States in time of peace, is well calculated to promote regularity and economy in the fiscal administration of the service, to preserve the discipline of the troops, and to render them available for the maintenance of the peace and tranquillity of the country. With this view, likewise, I recommend the adoption of the plan presented by that officer for the defence of the western frontier. The preservation of the lives and property of our fellow-citizens who are settled upon that border country, as well as the existence of the Indian population, which might be tempted by our want of preparation to rush on their own destruction, and attack the white settlements, all seem to require that this subject should be acted upon without delay, and the War Department authorized to place that country in a state of complete defence against any assault from the numerous and warlike tribes which are congregated on that border.

It affords me sincere pleasure to be able to apprise you of the entire removal of the Cherokee nation of Indians to their new home west of the Mississippi. The measures authorized by Congress at its last session with a view to the long-standing controversy with them, have had the happiest effect. By an agreement concluded with them, by the commanding general in that country, who has performed the duties assigned to him on the occasion with commendable energy and humanity, their removal has been principally under the conduct of their own chiefs, and they have emigrated without any apparent reluctance.

The successful accomplishment of this important object; the removal also, of the entire Creek nation, with the exception of a small number of fugitives amongst the Seminoles in Florida; the progress already made towards a speedy completion of the removal of the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, the Pottawatamies, the Ottawas, and the Chippewas, with the extensive purchases of Indian lands during the present year, have rendered the speedy and successful result of the long-established policy of the Government upon the subject of Indian affairs entirely certain. The occasion is, therefore, deemed a proper one to place this policy in such a point of view, as will exonerate the Government of the United States from the undeserved reproach which has been cast upon it through several successive Administrations. That a mixed occupancy of the same territory, by the white and red man, is incompatible with the safety or happiness of either, is a position in respect to which there has long since ceased to be room for a difference of opinion. Reason and experience have alike demonstrated its impracticability. The bitter fruits of every attempt heretofore to overcome the barriers interposed by nature, have only been destruction, both physical and moral, to the Indian; dangerous conflicts of authority between the Federal and State Governments; and detriment to the individual prosperity of the citizen, as well as to the general improvement of the country. The remedial policy, the principles of which were settled more than thirty years ago, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, consists in an extinction, for a fair consideration, of the title to all lands still occupied by the Indians within the States and Territories of the United States; their removal to a country west of the Mississippi, much more extensive, and better adapted to their condition, than that on which they then resided; the guarantee to them, by the United States, of their exclusive possession of that country forever, exempt from all intrusions by white men, with ample provisions for their security against external violence and internal dissensions, and the extension to them of suitable facilities for their advancement in civilization. This has not been the policy of particular administrations only, but of each in succession since the first attempt to carry it out under that of Mr. Monroe. All have labored for its accomplishment, only with different degrees of success. The manner of its execution has, it is true, from time to time, given rise to conflicts of opinion and unjust imputations; but in respect to the wisdom and necessity of the policy itself, there has not, from the beginning, existed a doubt in the mind of any calm, judicious, disinterested friend of the Indian race, accustomed to reflection and enlightened by experience.

The President's Message.

Occupying the double character of contractor on its own account, and guardian for the parties contracted with, it was hardly to be expected that the dealings of the Federal Government with the Indian tribes would escape misrepresentation. That there occurred in the early settlement of this country, as in all others where the civilized race has succeeded to the possessions of the savage, instances of oppression and fraud on the part of the former, there is too much reason to believe. No such offences can, however, be justly charged upon this Government since it became free to pursue its own course. Its dealings with the Indian tribes have been just and friendly throughout; its efforts for their civilization constant, and directed by the best feelings of humanity; its watchfulness in protecting them from individual frauds unremitting; its forbearance under the keenest provocations, the deepest injuries, and the most flagrant outrages, may challenge at least a comparison with any nation, ancient or modern, in similar circumstances; and if in future times a powerful, civilized, and happy nation of Indians shall be found to exist within the limits of this northern continent, it will be owing to the consummation of that policy which has been so unjustly assailed. Only a very brief reference to facts in confirmation of this assertion can in this form be given, and you are, therefore, necessarily referred to the report of the Secretary of War for further details. To the Cherokees, whose case has perhaps excited the greatest share of attention and sympathy, the United States have granted in fee, with a perpetual guarantee of exclusive and peaceable possession, 13,554,135 acres of land, on the west side of the Mississippi, eligibly situated, in a healthy climate, and in all respects better suited to their condition than the country they have left, in exchange for only 9,492,160 acres on the east side of the same river. The United States have in addition stipulated to pay them five million six hundred thousand dollars for their interest in, and improvements on, the lands thus relinquished, and one million one hundred and sixty thousand dollars for subsistence and other beneficial purposes; thereby putting it in their power to become one of the most wealthy and independent separate communities, of the same extent, in the world.

By the treaties made and ratified with the Miamies, the Chippewas, the Sioux, the Sacs and Foxes, and the Winnebagoes, during the last year, the Indian title to eighteen million four hundred and fifty-eight thousand acres has been extinguished. These purchases have been much more extensive than those of any previous year, and have, with other Indian expenses, borne very heavily upon the Treasury. They leave, however, but a small quantity of unbought Indian lands within the States and Territories; and the Legislature and Executive were equally sensible of the propriety of a final and more speedy extinction of Indian titles within those limits. The treaties which were, with a single exception, made in pursuance of previous appropriations for defraying the expenses, have subsequently been ratified by the Senate, and received the sanction of Congress by the appropriations necessary to carry them into effect. Of the terms upon which these important negotiations were concluded, I can speak from direct knowledge; and I feel no difficulty in affirming that the interest of the Indians in the extensive territory embraced by them, is to be paid for at its fair value, and that no more favorable terms have been granted to the United States than would have been reasonably expected in a negotiation with civilized men, fully capable of appreciating and protecting their own rights. For the Indian title to 116,349,897 acres acquired since the 4th of March, 1829, the United States have paid $72,560,056, in permanent annuities, lands, reservations for Indians, expenses of removal and subsistence, merchandise, mechanical and agricultural establishments, and implements. When the heavy expenses incurred by the United States, and the circumstance that so large a portion of the entire territory will be forever unsalable, are considered, and this price is compared with that for which the United States sell their own lands, no one can doubt that justice has been done to the Indians in these purchases also. Certain it is, that the transactions of the Federal Government with the Indians have been uniformly characterized by a sincere and paramount desire to promote their welfare; and it must be a source of the highest gratification to every friend to justice and humanity to learn that, notwithstanding the obstructions from time to time thrown in its way, and the difficulties which have arisen from the peculiar and impracticable nature of the Indian character, the wise, humane, and undeviating policy of the Government in this, the most difficult of all our relations, foreign or domestic, has at length been justified to the world in its near approach to a happy and certain consummation.

The condition of the tribes which occupy the country set apart for them in the West, is highly prosperous, and encourages the hope of their early civilization. They have, for the most part, abandoned the hunter state, and turned their attention to agricultural pursuits. All those who have been established for any length of time in that fertile region, maintain themselves by their own industry. There are among them traders of no inconsiderable capital, and planters exporting cotton to some extent; but the greater number are small agriculturists, living in comfort upon the produce of their farms. The recent emigrants, although they have in some instances removed reluctantly, have readily acquiesced in their unavoidable destiny. They have found at once a recompense for past sufferings, and an incentive to industrious habits, in the abundance and comforts around them. There is reason to believe that all these tribes are friendly in their feelings towards the United States; and it is to be hoped that the acquisition of individual wealth, the pursuits of agriculture, and habits of industry, will gradually subdue their warlike propensities and incline them to maintain peace among themselves. To effect this desirable object, the attention of Congress is solicited to the measures recommended by the Secretary of War for their future government and protection, as well from each other as from the hostility of the warlike tribes around them, and the intrusions of the whites. The policy of the Government has given them a permanent home, and guaranteed to them its peaceful and undisturbed possession. It only remains to give them a government and laws which will encourage industry, and secure to them the reward of their exertions. The importance of some form of government cannot be too much insisted upon. The earliest effects will be to diminish the causes of occasions for hostilities among the tribes, to inspire an interest in the observance of laws to which they will have themselves assented, and to multiply the securities of property, and the motives for self-improvement. Intimately connected with this subject, is the establishment of the military defences recommended by the Secretary of War, which have been already referred to. Without them, the Government will be powerless to redeem its pledges of protection to the emigrating Indians against the numerous warlike tribes that surround them, and to provide for the safety of the frontier settlers of the bordering States.

The case of the Seminoles constitutes at present the only exception to the successful efforts of the Government to remove the Indians to the homes assigned them west of the Mississippi. Four hundred of this tribe emigrated in 1836, and fifteen hundred in 1837 and 1838, leaving in the country, it is supposed, about 2,000 Indians. The continued treacherous conduct of these people; the savage and unprovoked murders they have lately committed, butchering whole families of the settlers of the Territory, without distinction of age or sex, and making their way into the very centre and heart of the country, so that no part of it is free from their ravages; their frequent attacks on the light-houses along that dangerous coast; and the barbarity with which they have murdered the passengers and crews of such vessels as have been wrecked upon the reefs and keys which border the Gulf, leave the Government no alternative but to continue the military operations against them until they are totally expelled from Florida.

There are other motives which would urge the Government to pursue this course towards the Seminoles. The United States have fulfilled in good faith all their treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and have, in every other instance, insisted upon a like performance of their obligations. To relax from this salutary rule because the Seminoles have maintained themselves so long in the territory they had relinquished, and, in defiance of their frequent and solemn engagements, still continue to wage a ruthless war against the United States, would not only evince a want of constancy on our part, but be of evil example in our intercourse with other tribes. Experience has shown that but little is to be gained by the march of armies through a country so intersected with inaccessible swamps and marshes, and which, from the fatal character of the climate, must be abandoned at the end of the winter. I recommend, therefore, to your attention, the plan submitted by the Secretary of War in the accompanying report, for the permanent occupation of the portion of the Territory freed from the Indians, and the more efficient protection of the people of Florida from their inhuman warfare.

From the report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith transmitted, it will appear that a large portion of the disposable naval force is either actively employed, or in a state of preparation for the purposes of experience and discipline, and the protection of our commerce. So effectual has been this protection, that, so far as the information of Government extends, not a single outrage has been attempted on a vessel carrying the flag of the United States, within the present year, in any quarter, however distant or exposed.

The exploring expedition sailed from Norfolk on the 19th of August last; and information has been received of its safe arrival at the island of Madeira. The best spirit animates the officers and crews, and there is every reason to anticipate, from its efforts, results beneficial to commerce and honorable to the nation.

It will also be seen that no reduction of the force now in commission is contemplated. The unsettled state of a portion of South America renders it indispensable that our commerce should receive protection in that quarter; the vast and increasing interests embarked in the trade of the Indian and China Seas, in the whale fisheries of the Pacific Ocean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, require equal attention to their safety; and a small squadron may be employed to great advantage on our Atlantic coast, in meeting sudden demands for the reinforcement of other stations, in aiding merchant vessels in distress, in affording active service to an additional number of officers, and in visiting the different ports of the United States, an accurate knowledge of which is obviously of the highest importance.

The attention of Congress is respectfully called to that portion of the report recommending an increase in the number of smaller vessels, and to other suggestions contained in that document. The rapid increase and wide expansion of our commerce, which is every day seeking new avenues of profitable adventure; the absolute necessity of a naval force for its protection precisely in the degree of its extension; a due regard to the national rights and honor; the recollection of its former exploits, and the anticipation of its future triumphs whenever opportunity presents itself, which we may rightfully indulge from the experience of the past, all seem to point to the navy as a most efficient arm of our national defence, and a proper object of legislative encouragement.

The progress and condition of the Post Office Department will be seen by reference to the report of the Postmaster General. The extent of post roads, covered by mail contracts, is stated to be 134,818 miles, and the annual transportation upon them 34,580,202. The number of post offices in the United States is 12,553, and rapidly increasing. The gross revenue for the year ending on the 30th day of June last, was $4,262,145. The accruing expenditures, $4,680,068; excess of expenditures, $417,923. This has been made up out of the surplus previously on hand. The cash on hand on the first instant, was $314,068. The revenue for the year ending June 1838, was $161,540 more than that for the year ending June 30, 1837. The expenditures of the department had been graduated upon the anticipation of a largely increased revenue. A moderate curtailment of mail service consequently became necessary, and has been effected, to shield the department against the danger of embarrassment. Its revenue is now improving, and it will soon resume its onward course in the march of improvement.

Your particular attention is requested to so much of the Postmaster General's report as relates to the transportation of the mails upon the railroads. The laws on that subject do not seem adequate to secure that service, now become almost essential to the public interests, and at the same time protect the department from combinations and unreasonable demands.

Nor can I too earnestly request your attention to the necessity of providing a more secure building for this department. The danger of destruction to which its important books and papers are continually exposed, as well from the highly combustible character of the building occupied, as from that of others in the vicinity, calls loudly for prompt action.

Your attention is again earnestly invited to the suggestions and recommendation submitted at the last session in respect to the District of Columbia.

I feel it my duty, also, to bring to your notice certain proceedings at law which have recently been prosecuted in this District, in the name of the United States, on the relation of Messrs. Stockton and Stokes, of the State of Maryland, against the Postmaster General, and which have resulted in the payment of money out of the National Treasury, for the first time since the establishment of the Government, by judicial compulsion exercised by the common law writ of mandamus, issued by the circuit court of this District.

The facts of the case, and the grounds of the proceedings, will be found fully stated in the report of the decision; and any additional information which you may desire will be supplied by the proper department. No interference in the particular case is contemplated. The money has been paid; the claims of the prosecutors have been satisfied; and the whole subject, so far as they are concerned, is finally disposed of; but it is on the supposition that the case may be regarded as an authoritative exposition of the law as it now stands, that I have thought it necessary to present it to your consideration.

The object of the application to the circuit court was to compel the Postmaster General to carry into effect an award made by the Solicitor of the Treasury, under a special act of Congress for the settlement of certain claims of their relations on the Post Office Department, which award the Postmaster General declined to execute in full, until he should receive further legislative direction on the subject. If the duty imposed on the Postmaster General, by that law, was to be regarded as one of an official nature, belonging to his office as a branch of the Executive, then it is obvious, that the constitutional competency of the Judiciary to direct and control him in its discharge, was necessarily drawn in question. And if the duty so imposed on the Postmaster General was to be considered as merely ministerial, and not executive, it yet remained to be shown that the circuit court of this District had authority to interfere by mandamus—such a power having never before been asserted or claimed by that court. With a view to the settlement of these important questions, the judgment of the circuit court was carried, by a writ of error, to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the opinion of that tribunal, the duty imposed on the Postmaster General was not an official, executive duty, but one of a merely ministerial nature. The grave constitutional questions which had been discussed were, therefore, excluded from the decision of the case; the court, indeed, expressly admitting that, with powers and duties properly belonging to the Executive, no other department can interfere by the writ of mandamus; and the question, therefore, resolved itself into this: Has Congress conferred upon the circuit court of this District the power to issue such a writ to an officer of the General Government, commanding him to perform a ministerial act? A majority of the court have decided that it has, but have founded their decision upon a process of reasoning which, in my judgment, renders further legislative provision indispensable to the public interests and the equal administration of justice.

It has long since been decided by the Supreme Court, that neither that tribunal nor the circuit courts of the United States held within the respective States, possess the power in question; but it is now held that this power, denied to both of these high tribunals, (to the former by the constitution, and to the latter by Congress,) has been, by its legislation, vested in the circuit court of this District. No such direct grant of power to the circuit court of this District is claimed; but it has been held to result, by necessary implication, from several sections of the law establishing the court. One of these sections declares, that the laws of Maryland, as they existed at the time of the cession, should be in force in that part of the District ceded by that State; and, by this provision, the common law, in civil and criminal cases, as it prevailed in Maryland in 1801, was established in that part of the District.

In England, the Court of King's Bench—because the sovereign, who, according to the theory of the constitution, is the fountain of justice, originally sat there in person, and is still deemed to be present, in construction of law—alone possesses the high power of issuing the writ of mandamus, not only to inferior jurisdictions and corporations, but also to magistrates and others, commanding them, in the King's name, to do what their duty requires, in cases where there is a vested right, and no other specific remedy. It has been held, in the case referred to, that, as the Supreme Court of the United States is, by the constitution, rendered incompetent to exercise this power, and as the circuit court of this District is a court of general jurisdiction in cases at common law, and the highest court of original jurisdiction in the District, the right to issue the writ of mandamus is incident to its common law powers. Another ground relied upon to maintain the power in question, is, that it was included, by fair construction, in the power it granted to the circuit courts of the United States, by the act "to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," passed 13th of February, 1801; that the act establishing the circuit court of this District, passed the 27th day of February, 1801, conferred upon that court and the judges thereof the same powers as were by law vested in the circuit courts of the United States and in the judges of the said courts; that the repeal of the first-mentioned act, which took place in the next year, did not divest the circuit court of this District of the authority in dispute, but left it still clothed with the powers over the subject which, it is conceded, were taken away from the circuit courts of the United States by the repeal of the act of 13th of February, 1801.

Admitting that the adoption of the laws of Maryland for a portion of this District confers on the circuit court thereof, in that portion, the transcendent extra-judicial prerogative powers of the Court of King's Bench, in England, or that either of the acts of Congress, by necessary implication, authorize the former court to issue a writ of mandamus to an officer of the United States, to compel him to perform a ministerial duty, the consequences are, in one respect, the same. The result in either case is, that the officers of the United States, stationed in different parts of the United States, are, in respect to the performance of their official duties, subject to different laws and a different supervision: those in the States to one rule, and those in the District of Columbia to another and a very different one. In the District their official conduct is subject to a judicial control, from which in the States they are exempt.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the expediency of vesting such a power in the judiciary, in a system of Government constituted like that of the United States, all must agree that these disparaging discrepancies in the law and in the administration of justice ought not to be permitted to continue; and as Congress alone can provide the remedy, the subject is unavoidably presented to your consideration.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 4.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the joint Committee on the part of the House appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that they had discharged that duty, and the President had informed them, in reply, that he would transmit to the two Houses a Message to-day.

The President's annual Message was then brought in by his private Secretary, and, being laid before the House by the Speaker, was read at length by the Clerk.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the Message and accompanying documents be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that 15,000 copies with the documents, and 5,000 without the documents, be printed for the use of the House.

After some further conversation between Messrs. WISE, J. GARLAND, and HAYNES, the motion was agreed to without a division.

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

The Hon. L. SALTONSTALL, member elect from the State of Massachusetts, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Death of the Hon. Wm. Patterson.

Mr. FILLMORE then rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The painful and melancholy duty has devolved upon me of announcing to this House the death of my lamented friend and colleague, WM. PATTERSON. He died at his residence, in Warsaw, on the 14th day of August last.

The last time I saw him was in this Hall at the close of the late session. He was then in the prime of life, and apparently in the full enjoyment of health. Blessed by his Creator with a constitution that never felt disease—enviored by a temperance and regularity of habit that ordinarily bids defiance to its approach—no man left this House with fairer prospects of returning to it again. But the untiring assiduity with which he devoted himself to the discharge of his duties here during that long and arduous session, doubtless sowed the seeds of that disease which so soon terminated his earthly existence. Beneath the external glow of health that then mantled his cheek, was insidiously preying the canker-worm of death. He was barely enabled to return to the bosom of his family, when his strength gave way, his reason wandered, and, in a few short days, all that was mortal of William Patterson “slept beneath the clods of the valley.” Would that his melancholy tale ended here. But it does not. The partner of his earthly joys and sorrows, worn down with the watchings and anxieties of his last illness, with a constitution too feeble to support the accumulated distress of a sensitive mind, sunk beneath the weight of her sorrows, and, in a few days after his interment, she, too, “slept the sleep of death” by his side. What an appalling bereavement to his infant children! They are now orphans in this wide world, exhibiting in their changed condition an awful reality of the uncertainty of life and of all earthly enjoyments.

But, sir, though gone, he has left behind him a name and reputation dear to them that knew him. Modest and unassuming in his character, kind and generous in his disposition, honest and inflexible in his purpose—to know him was to respect and esteem him. His heart was without guile; and, though he made no professions, yet he habitually practised all the virtues that adorn the life of a most exemplary Christian.

He made no pretensions to literary acquirements or statesmanlike qualifications, and his native modesty naturally induced him to seek the quiet retirement of private life. But, blessed with good sense and a strong and retentive memory, he found leisure, amid the daily toils of a laborious occupation, to cultivate a taste for reading, which stored his mind with useful facts. At the unsolicited request of his fellow-citizens, he reluctantly yielded his assent to occupy a seat on this floor. How he discharged that important trust during the short time he participated in our deliberations, is known to you all. During a protracted and uncommonly arduous session, when many fainted by the wayside, he was always at his post. During a time of uncommon excitement and political acrimony, he was firm in the support of what he deemed to be right, yet tolerant to the opinions of others with whom he differed. In one word, he was constant and patient in the discharge of all his official duties, and untiring in the more humble, but useful labors of his station. Naturally frank, honest, and confiding, he drew around him a circle of friends, and, by the unadulterated goodness of his heart, disarmed even political opposition of its rancor. Finally, in all the relations of life, as a father, husband, brother, friend, citizen, and legislator, he was blameless. That no testimony of respect for his many virtues should be wanting, I offer for the adoption of the House the resolutions which I send to the Chair :

Resolved, unanimously, That this House has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PATTERSON, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Death of Hon. A. W. Bruyn.

Mr. GRAY then rose, and addressed the House as follows :

Mr. SPEAKER : I sincerely join in the expression of sorrow at the decease of our late lamented friend and colleague, whose death we have just heard announced, and sympathize with his relatives, and especially his children, who have suffered a double bereavement ; and regret, yes, sir, deeply regret, that there is still yet to be announced another instance of mortality, which occurred during the recess of Congress, among the delegation from that State, and that, too, from the District which I have the honor in part to represent. I allude to the late Hon. ANDREW DE WITT BRUYN, who, for a considerable period prior to, and during all the time he served his constituents, in this body, suffered under a combination of diseases that impaired his usefulness here, and finally terminated his life on the 27th day of July last, at his residence in Ithaca. Aside from the irreparable loss which his family have sustained, the death of Judge Bruyn is regarded as no ordinary calamity to the community to whom he was intimately known, and by whom his salutary influence, both in public and private life, was felt and appreciated. In all situations in life, he was amiable and unpretending ; deliberate in forming his opinions, and inflexible in maintaining them. He was, in all respects, an honorable man ; justly, and in a very high degree, enjoying the esteem of all who knew him ; and those who knew him best respected him most. He was a lawyer of eminence, distinguished for the clear and comprehensive view he took of all subjects presented for his consideration, possessing talents peculiarly fitting for a judicial station ; and after a successful practice in his profession for many years, he received the appointment of first Judge of the county court in the county where he resided, the duties of which he discharged for several years, and until he was elected to a seat in this body, with distinguished ability ; and when he resigned to enter upon his duties here, he received the unanimous and cordial approbation of the bar of his county, and those whose peculiar province it was to join in an expression of his valuable services in that capacity. Of his course here it is only necessary to remark, that he acquired a reputation here which he maintained elsewhere, of a pure, upright, and honest man.

I beg leave to send to the Chair the following resolution, and move its adoption :

Resolved, That the members of this House tender to the relations of the deceased its sympathy on this mournful event, and will testify their respect for the memory of ANDREW DE WITT BRUYN, deceased, late member of this House from the State of New York, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

The following Messages from the President of the United States were laid before the House :

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6, 1838.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

The act of the 1st July, 1836, to enable the Executive to assert and prosecute with effect the claim of the United States to the legacy bequeathed to them by James Smithson, late of London, having received its entire execution, and the amount recovered and paid into the Treasury, having agreeably to an act of the last session, been invested in State stocks, I deem it proper to invite the attention of Congress to the obligation now devolving upon the United States to fulfil the object of the bequest. In order to obtain such information as might seem to facilitate its attainment, the Secretary of State was directed in July last to apply to persons versed in science, and familiar with the subject of public education, for their views as to the mode of disposing of the fund best calculated to meet the intentions of the testator, and prove most beneficial to mankind. Copies of the circular letter, written in compliance with these directions, and of

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, referred to a Select Committee of nine.

To the House of Representatives.

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives reports from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying documents, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 9th of July last. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7, 1838.

Defalcation of Sam. Swartwout, late Collector of the Port of New York.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit a special report, made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, for your consideration, in relation to the recently discovered default of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs at the port of New York.

I would respectfully invite the early attention of Congress to the adoption of the legal provisions therein suggested, or such other measures as may appear more expedient for increasing the public security against similar defalcations hereafter.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7 1838.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that so much of this document as related to the defalcation of the late collector of New York be referred to a Select Committee, and so much as related to the revenue laws to that on Ways and Means.

Mr. C. remarked, that in making the first motion, which he regarded as one demanding the exclusive consideration of a committee, it was proper for him to state that he did it with no design of acting upon the committee himself in any capacity. On the contrary, charged as he was with the laborious duties on another committee, he could scarcely devote the requisite time; and, independent of that consideration, it would be much more satisfactory to him that the members should come from a different quarter of the Union than Mr. C. did.

Mr. MERCER applauded the spirit and candor of the gentleman from New York, but he would suggest to the gentleman, as this was an important matter, to postpone it till to-morrow, and order it to be printed.

Mr. C. assenting, the subject took that temporary direction.*

* Among the papers communicated by the President were the following from HENRY D. GILPIN, Esq., Solicitor of the Treasury:

Mr. Underwood completed, on Thursday evening, the examination of the books and documents at the customhouse, so far as to enable him, with the addition of the information already possessed at the Treasury, to state the account of Mr. Swartwout so as to exhibit truly the amount due to the United States. He then proceeded to Washington for the purpose of having the account finally adjusted and passed by the accounting officers, as the act of Congress requires, and expected to return it to me, at this place, duly certified, by the 12th instant. When it is received, we shall be able to adopt the summary proceedings by distress warrant, authorized by the act of May 15, 1820, should the

TUESDAY, December 11.

Rights of the South.

When New Hampshire was called on, Mr. ATHERTON rose and asked leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this Government is a Government of limited powers, and that, by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the institution of slavery in the several States of the Confederacy.

Resolved, That petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are a part of a plan of operations set on foot to affect the institution of slavery in the several States, and thus indirectly to destroy that institution within their limits.

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly; and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, as a means, and with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the interests of the United States make that course most advisable.

It appeared proper, however, without waiting for this, to take whatever measures were possible for the immediate security of the United States. On examining the letter of attorney from Mr. Swartwout to Mr. Ogden, I found that it conferred on the latter the fullest agency. He was entirely impressed with the propriety of adopting under it such measures for the security of the United States as were in his power. He has paid over to me the sum of $30,000 in cash, being the deposit in bank referred to in the last report. This sum I have placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, on special deposit, in the Bank of America; and herewith enclose you duplicate receipts of the cashier therefor. Mr. Ogden has also executed, as the attorney of Mr. Swartwout, three mortgages of all his property in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Maryland. The specific portions of property belonging to Mr. Swartwout in those States were not all known to Mr. Ogden, but they are described as fully as his information permitted; and the mortgages embrace, generally, all Mr. Swartwout's estate. Neither Mr. Price nor myself have been able to learn that there is any other property, real or personal, unless it be the household furniture. The mortgages have been placed for record in the register's office of this city, and of Bergen county, New Jersey, and I have forwarded that embracing the property in Maryland, to the district attorney there, with a request to have it recorded in the proper office without delay. These mortgages include the house and lots in this city; the large and valuable meadow property at Hoboken; and the interest in the coal lands at Cumberland. As to their value, I have no means of forming an opinion, but it is rated by Mr. Ogden at a very large amount.—[Extract, Nov. 10, 1838.

Yesterday I received a duly certified transcript of the account of Mr. Swartwout, as finally stated by the accounting officers, showing a balance due from him, as late collector of the revenue for the port of New York, of $1,344,119 65.

In pursuance of the provisions of the act of 15th May, 1820, I forthwith issued a warrant of distress against the said Samuel Swartwout, and Benjamin Birdsall, Charles L. Livingston, and Mangle L. Quackenboss, the sureties in the official bond of Mr. Swartwout, which was forwarded from the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. The warrant of distress, with a copy of the account, was delivered to the marshal, and he proceeded without delay to make a levy on the estate of Mr. Swartwout and his sureties in this district.

In order to perfect the lien in the manner the act requires, the marshal has already caused the levies he has made, with the dates, to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the district court for this district, and will continue so to do as additional property may be ascertained.—[Extract, Nov. 13, 1838.

public faith upon which they entered into the Confederacy.

Resolved, That the constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy, and that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other.

Resolved, therefore, That all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the constitution, destructive of the fundamental principle on which the Union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress; and that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery, as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

Mr. CUSHING objected to their introduction at this time.

Mr. ATHERTON thereupon moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. CUSHING simultaneously demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 137, nays 66.

So the rules were suspended.

The resolutions being before the House,

Mr. ATHERTON addressed the Chair as follows:

In addressing the House at this time my object is, very briefly, to explain the purport of the resolutions just offered, and the reasons which have induced me to present them.

The first resolution declares "that this Government is a Government of limited powers, and that by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the institution of slavery in the several States of the Confederacy."

To suppose that this resolution would not meet very general assent, would be to suppose that the most ultra Federal notions are entertained as to the powers of the General Government, and that those powers are considered as entirely absolute and unlimited.

The second resolution declares that petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States, and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are a part of a plan of operations set on foot to affect the institution of slavery in the several States, and thus indirectly to destroy that institution within their limits.

Legally and morally, Mr. Speaker, men are held responsible for the consequences which their acts have a manifest tendency to produce. This resolution contains an expression of our opinion as to the ultimate object and tendency of these petitions and memorials. Can any one who does not shut his eyes to what is going on around him, doubt as to the effect, and as to the intention of these petitions? I cannot doubt it, sir, without disbelieving the open avowals of these petitioners themselves. In saying this, I refer, however, not to many honest persons who have signed them without a sufficient examination of the important bearing of the question; nor to others, such for instance as females and children, who have had, in affixing their signatures, too frequently no definite intention or object; but to those who call loudly for the presentation of these petitions, who get them up, who circulate them for signature, and whose business it seems to be to agitate the community on this subject.

The third resolution declares that Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly, and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, as a means, or with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith, upon which they entered into this Confederacy.

The fourth resolution declares "that the constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy, and that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other."

I am not aware that any code of political construction or political morality ought to find favor in this House, by which the justice of these two resolutions shall not be fully admitted. Indeed, sir, I must say that all the resolutions to which I have adverted seem very like truisms, about which no dispute can be entertained; and it also seems to me, that from these the principles contained in the fifth and last resolution follow by necessary consequence.

The fifth resolution declares that, therefore, "all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the constitution, destructive of the fundamental principles on which the union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress."

These are the principles laid down in the fifth resolution, and as I have said, they seem to me to follow by necessary consequence from the preceding resolutions. But the fifth resolution proceeds still further, and provides for the mode of action of the House upon petitions, memorials, &c., on this subject; and from the principles embodied in the first part of the resolution, the propriety of the mode of action prescribed, becomes at once apparent.

The latter part of the resolution provides that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition or paper, tending or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

This provision is, in effect, similar to the resolution of the 24th of December, 1837, on the same subject. It is within the knowledge of all, that the resolution of the 24th December was also nearly similar to a resolution adopted by the House several years since, after full examination of the subject by a committee. The representatives of the State which I, in part, represent, voted for that resolution, and one of them was of the committee who reported it. Their course met the decided approbation of a majority of their constituents, as I believe has the course of those who supported the similar resolutions of the 24th December. At any rate, I may be pardoned for saying of that constituency, that they are too intelligent to be misled by the idle and utterly unfounded pretence, that the adoption of such a resolution is a denial of any right of petition. Still, sir, as in some portions of the country, from not sufficiently attending to the reasons inducing it, this may have been considered a measure bordering on harshness, I have thought proper in submitting that part of the last resolution, prescribing the mode of action by the House, which is similar in effect to the resolution reported by Mr. PINCKNEY, and to the resolution of the 24th December, 1837, to preface it with the matter preceding, embodying the reasons which not only render the propriety of this course evident, but show the impropriety of any other. I would treat these petitions precisely as I would any other involving similar considerations. These subjects have excited anxious attention and reflection here and elsewhere. It would be doing injustice to the intelligence of the members of this House, to suppose that any one of them had not made up his mind on the question, whether we have a right to grant the prayer of these petitions or not. The Abolitionists themselves evince their own conviction that the minds of members, even before they enter this Hall, are made up on these subjects, by requiring them explicitly to state their opinions and the vote they intend to give. The matter has been once referred to a committee, who fully examined it, and reported such arguments as conclusively show our want of jurisdiction. Is it pretended that every petition must be referred, and a report be made in full upon it, and that the whole time of Congress should be spent upon the subject? The House, and each member of the House, has fully considered the subjects involved in these petitions. If, then, the House is decidedly of opinion that it has no right to act on these subjects as the petitioners desire, it is, as I conceive, our duty to dispose of the petitions with as little delay as possible, unless indeed our object be to waste our own time and the money of the people in discussion interminable and unavailing, or worse than unavailing, because intended to manufacture public sentiment for our constituents rather than to acquire light for our own guidance, and thus indicating the assumption that we are the masters instead of the servants of the people. By the mode of action here prescribed, the petitions are to be presented like any other petitions; from the statement of their contents, required by the rules of the House, it is perceived that they relate to subjects which have been fully considered by the House, and on which a majority of the House have definitely formed an opinion that the House has no legitimate jurisdiction; and they are at once laid upon the table.

Believing, sir, as I do, that "the relation of master and slave is a matter exclusively within the regulation of the States where it exists, and that any interference by the inhabitants of other States in regard to it, is not only unauthorized and intrusive, but faithless and dishonorable, as being against the letter and spirit of the sacred compact which binds us together"—believing that the agitation now practised on the subject of the abolition of slavery, whether carried on under the pretext of maintaining the right of petition, or any other pretext, results, either from a total misconception of the nature and rights of the General and State Governments, or, as there is reason to fear in some instances, from hostility to our established Republican institutions—that it tends to alienate the friendly regards of different parts of our country, and introduce sectional differences and divisions—to waste and consume the time of Congress, and enormously to increase the expenditure of the money of the people—that it is dangerous, not only to the rights of the citizens of the slave-holding States, but also, in the highest degree, to the integrity of the Union—that, if persisted in, it threatens to involve the whole country in the most alarming evils—and that it ought to be discountenanced by every friend of the Union and of Republican Government, I cannot but trust these resolutions will meet the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. A. then demanded the previous question.

Mr. WISE. I ask the gentlemen of the North, as the North has been heard, that the South shall be heard also. These are not Southern resolutions, and I repudiate them as such. I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIR said it was not in order.

Mr. CUSHING called for a division of the question, so as to take it on each resolution.

Mr. WISE. I ask leave of this House that the South may be heard upon this question.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that he must be aware debate could not be entertained after the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. WISE. Then I ask that my resolution may be read.

8D SESS.]

Abolition of Slavery.

[DECEMBER, 1838.]

The CHAIR said it could only be done by unanimous consent. [Cries of No! no! from various parts of the Hall.]

Mr. WISE. It is a plot sprung upon the South.

Mr. TILLINGHAST would ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, if, after following up a speech and an argument by the previous question, he would not withdraw it for at least the same length of time, for a reply, that his argument had consumed. [Cries of Order! order!]

Mr. STANLY said, to use the words of a gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) on another occasion, he wanted to see every man, both North and South, toe the mark; and therefore he moved a call of the House; which was ordered.

When the name of Mr. WISE was called, that gentleman rose in his place and said, as a representative of Southern people and Southern interests, I am not here on the subject of Abolition.

The call was proceeded in, and 223 members having responded,

Mr. TITUS moved to dispense with its further proceedings.

So all further proceedings on the call were dispensed with, and the question recurring on the second for the previous question,

Mr. WISE again asked that a resolution he had drawn up as an amendment be read.

Mr. CUSHMAN objected.

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rules; but the Chair ruled the motion to be out of order.

The previous question was seconded by the House, 103 to 102, and ordering the main question.

Mr. GREENNELL demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BELL then rose and said he would make a motion, which he hoped would be assented to on all sides. It was to move that the House adjourn, and to order the resolutions to be printed and laid on their tables to-morrow, when they would vote understandingly upon them.

The CHAIR said the motion to print would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BELL hoped no gentleman would object to a proposition that seemed to him so reasonable.

Objections were made, however, in several quarters, and Mr. BELL then made the motion to adjourn, on which

Mr. CUSHMAN demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 102, nays 113.

So the House refusing to adjourn, the question recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, then raised the question of order, whether, as the 116th rule of the House provided that no standing rule should be changed without one day's notice, and as the 48th rule prescribed the mode of receiving petitions, and the 5th pending resolution proposed a change of that rule so far as a certain class of petitions were concerned, one day's notice should not have been given.

The CHAIR said, clearly not, and it had been so decided on a former occasion.

The vote was then taken, and the main question ordered—yeas 114, nays 107.

Mr. PETRIKEN called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, said he wished to be excused from voting on these resolutions, unless he could have an opportunity of explaining his views upon them. They came in a questionable shape, and he could not vote for them without further examination. He therefore asked the House to be excused; but before the question was propounded—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said he had voted against adjourning before, because he could not persuade himself that the previous question would have been sustained, but seeing it had, he now renewed the motion.

Mr. PARKER called for the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 108, nays 113.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The House also refused to excuse Mr. WILLIAMS from voting.

Mr. WISE gave his reasons, in part, for refusing to vote for or against the resolutions, but he was called to order for travelling out of the limits prescribed by the 30th rule. Mr. W. stated that he should not vote.

Mr. STANLY also did the same, as did Mr. JENIFER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved the House to excuse him, for he could neither vote affirmatively nor negatively, without placing himself in a false position; but they refused.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and it was adopted—yeas 198, nays 6.

On motion of Mr. COFFIN,
The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

Abolition of Slavery.

The first business in order was the consideration of the resolutions introduced yesterday by Mr. ATHERTON.

As soon, however, as the journal was read, Mr. WISE rose and remarked that he did not perceive entered on the record the fact that he had refused to vote yesterday, and as he wanted his constituents to see that he had not entertained the subject of abolition of slavery in the States, he moved that the journal be corrected accordingly.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. W. inquired if this motion would not go on the journal of to-day.

The CHAIR replied that it would.

Mr. WISE's object was attained then.

The second resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved, That petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are a part of a plan of operations set on foot to affect the institution of slavery in the several States, and thus indirectly to destroy that institution within their limits.

MR. BIDDLE asked permission to decline voting on the second proposition, as wantonly stigmatizing a mass of men. Whilst he could not vote for it, he knew the reckless audacity with which a vote against it might be used to create a false impression. Mr. B. referred to the stand he had taken in his own district on this subject, and the manner in which he had been sustained. His Van Buren opponent had refused to answer the interrogatories propounded. Mr. B. thought that a body of honorable men ought not to place him in this false light for the mere transient purposes of party, with a view to influence the elections at the South, now that those at the North had been got through with it. Mr. B. was proceeding further, but

The CHAIR interposed, on the ground that the gentleman was transgressing the rules.

The House refused to excuse Mr. BIDDLE.

The question on the second resolution was then taken, and it was adopted—yeas 136, nays 65.

When the name of Mr. WISE was called, that gentleman rose in his place, and said: I refuse to vote.

MR. CUSHING raised the question of order, that the gentleman was bound to vote unless excused, and that, as the names must be called alphabetically, the Clerk could not proceed to the next name and pass over that of Mr. WISE.

The CHAIR said the point had been decided before; the roll must be proceeded with, after being once commenced.

MR. CUSHING gave notice that he should raise the question again.

MR. BRONSON, who stated that he was momentarily absent from his seat when his name was called, asked leave to record his name in the affirmative; but leave was not granted.

As soon as the roll was gone through, and before the vote was announced, Mr. CUSHING again raised the above question, but it was ruled to be out of order.

The third resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved. That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly; and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, as a means, and with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith upon which they entered into the Confederacy.

MR. BOND called for a division of the question, so as to take the vote first on the following branch only:

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly.

The vote being so taken resulted in the affirmative—yeas 173, nays 30.

So the first branch of the third resolution was adopted.

The second branch being read,

The question was then taken, and resulted also in the affirmative—yeas 164, nays 40.

So the third resolution was adopted, and the fourth was taken up as follows:

Resolved, That the constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy, and that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other.

MR. LINCOLN called for a division of the question on this resolution, so as to take it first on the following branch:

Resolved, That the constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy."

Such a division being accordingly ordered, the vote thereon resulted affirmatively—yeas 180, nays 26.

The second branch of this resolution was also agreed to—yeas 174, nays 24.

[When Mr. KENNEDY's name was called, that gentleman said he wished to inquire, before he voted, whether a clerical error could be first corrected in this part of the resolution.

The CHAIR said it could not.

MR. KENNEDY rejoined that he should vote for it, but he did so protesting against its bad grammar.]

The fifth and last resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, therefore, That all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the constitution, destructive of the fundamental principle on which the Union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress; and that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition or paper, touching or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

MR. RANDOLPH called for a division at the word "Congress" in the 9th line; which was ordered.

MR. WISE then said, I now, if it be in order, and in order to test the sense of the House upon all the resolutions, move a suspension of the rules, with a view of offering an amendment to this proposition, so as to strike out the words,

3d SESS.]

Fourth Instalment of Deposit.

[DECEMBER, 1838.]

"with the views aforesaid;" and that gentlemen may not have an excuse of apprehending a debate on Abolition, I pledge myself not to say a word upon it. I will vote for the resolution if they will strike out these words.

The CHAIR could not entertain the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WISE. Well, then, I will remark that these are the words that sold the South.

The first branch of the proposition was adopted—yeas 146, nays 52.

[When the name of Mr. DAWSON, of Georgia, was called, that gentleman rose in his place and said,

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote in the affirmative, omitting or expunging, so far as my vote goes, the words "with the views aforesaid." Congress has no constitutional power, for any "views" or for any purposes whatever to interfere with the question.]

Mr. PORTS moved to lay the second branch on the table, on which motion

Mr. CRAIG demanded the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 85, nays 129.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. JENIFER inquired if the affirmation of this last proposition would not be identical with a virtual reception of all petitions on the abolition of slavery by the House?

The CHAIR replied that that was a question which each gentleman must interpret for himself.

Mr. POPE said he wished to be excused from voting upon this proposition, (he had voted for all the others,) on the ground that he did not wish to affirm the reception of abolition petitions, and further, that it was inconsistent with the propositions already adopted. Any vote he could give would be misconstrued.

The House refused to excuse Mr. P.

Mr. CHAMBERS also moved to be excused on similar grounds to those of his colleague; but the House again refused.

The second branch of the last proposition was then agreed to, as follows:

White, Joseph L. Williams, Word, and Yorke—73.

[When Mr. WISE's name was called, that gentleman rose and said that, as that proposition admits the right of petition on this subject, he should refuse to vote upon it.]

The resolutions being all severally adopted, The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY December 13.

Mr. WALKER presented the credentials of the Hon. THOMAS H. WILLIAMS, appointed by the Governor of the State of Mississippi, a Senator from that State, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. JAMES TROTTER.

Mr. WILLIAMS appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Fourth Instalment of Deposit.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, reported a bill further to postpone the fourth instalment of the deposits with the States, under the act of June, 1836; which was read.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that he should like really to see, if this instalment was again to be postponed, so contrary to what they all expected at the last session, that it was not postponed indefinitely. He had hoped that there would, at least, have been some prolongation of the promise to the States, that they might look forward to some time when they might reasonably hope to receive this money, which they all expected, and which many of them had made arrangements to appropriate to useful and important purposes. He should like to know if one year's further postponement would not be sufficient; and without saying whether he should vote for the bill in any event, he hoped that it would be so amended as to postpone the payment to some day certain, say the 1st of January, 1840, instead of being postponed, as provided for by the bill, until the further pleasure of Congress was expressed on the subject.

Mr. C. then moved to amend the bill by making the postponement till the 1st of January, 1840.

Mr. CALHOUN said he should vote for the postponement moved by the Senator from Kentucky, though he had not the slightest anticipation that there would be any surplus in the Treasury, either in this or in the coming year. The question would then naturally occur, why he gave such a vote. The answer was, in the first place, that it could do no harm, and in the next place it would have the effect to check this House in its expenditures. If the expenditures had not been so profuse last year, there might then have been a payment of this instalment. But this and the other House took different views from what he did, and their expenditures were more profuse than they ever had been since he was connected with the Government. He had hoped at the last session that the postponement of this instalment would have had some effect to check their extravagant expenditures, but though he was disappointed, he would again vote for the postponement with the same views. He would, however, take this occasion to say, that he never would consent to vote a dollar for this instalment, which he never regarded in the light of a debt, while they had to borrow money. The Senator from Kentucky was entirely mistaken in regarding the deposit act in the light of a promise to the States. There was no pledge, no obligation whatever; the act was one of expediency merely, and it had fulfilled its object. He repeated again that he would never consent to give his vote to borrow money to pay that instalment.

Mr. NILES said he did not purpose to enter into an extended discussion of this subject, but assertions had been made, and principles advanced which were of an importance not to be overlooked. It is now, sir, for the first time, proposed to raise a revenue for the purpose of a distribution among the States:—to raise money from the people in their individual capacity, to be distributed among the States in their corporate capacity, to enure to the benefit of chartered monopolies. He (Mr. N.) knew this was not intended, nor thought of, when the deposit bill was passed by the Senate. The object was to get rid of an enormous surplus which had accumulated, and was distributed among ninety banks, expanding our already overgrown paper system, corrupting the legislation of Congress, and embarrassing to public and private affairs. On this ground he voted for that bill, as did a majority of those who voted with him. But he contended that the object for which the bill had been passed was accomplished; the surplus had been deposited. He asked if it was pretended by the Senator from Kentucky that there is a surplus in the Treasury now, or would there be a surplus at the period proposed in the amendment. Did not the gentleman know that by the operation of his own law, (the compromise act,) the biennial reduction of the duties on imports would occur during the coming year, thus lessening, by that amount, the fiscal resources of the Government? Under these circumstances, to hold out the hope, as would be done by the proposed amendment, that the fourth instalment would be paid in January, 1840, when there would be no surplus in the Treasury, would be to sanction the idea that the money would be raised by taxation. This is the essential question, and the only question before the Senate. But it is said that the Government should redeem its pledge; that the good faith of the Government is pledged for the payment of the fourth instalment of deposit. Sir, if it is a debt due by the Government to the States, it should be discharged. But, instead of having any just claim for this money, the States are under obligations to Congress for not reclaiming the three instalments already deposited. If it was not for the interposition of Congress, good faith would have required the Secretary of the Treasury to recall the money deposited with the States, for the necessities of the Government; such were the spirit and requisitions of the act. He, and the friends who were with him, had supported the bill in good faith as a deposit act, not a distribution among the States. It was to be a deposit of a surplus. This had been accomplished, and the bill had fulfilled its functions. If it was intended as any more than a deposit act—for a distribution of money among the States—then was our legislation a fraud upon the country.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the natural progress of this thing had been distinctly pointed out by him when he had the honor, in connection with half a dozen other gentlemen, to oppose the deposit act. He knew that it was a distribution among the States. He knew that it was the commencement of a system of levying money from the people, for those who would get it out of the hands of the people. He treated this act then as a distribution, and scouted the idea of its being a deposit. He knew there was no surplus in the Treasury, and said so, and that, in a few years, we should be left without money. He stated these facts on this floor, in such strong language, that a member came to him, and begged him not to publish his remarks. He stated then that the effect of this act would be, either to break the deposit banks or to compel them to crush their debtors. Every thing he then said had been verified to the letter. We have seen, said Mr. B., a committee of the directors of the banks of New York, men of the highest intelligence, and well versed in financial affairs, placing at the head of the reasons which compelled them to suspend specie payments, the effect of this distribution act. He (Mr. B.) knew then as well as now, that one of the effects of this act would be either to compel these deposit banks to choose between stopping themselves, or

Fourth Instalment of Deposit.

crushing those indebted to them. He knew then that in the short space of two years we should be without money, and it was now seen that he was right; for instead of calling back from the States any of the money already distributed to them, as provided for in the many cautious words inserted in the act to make it appear like a deposit, the Government was driven to the expedient of raising money by a forced loan, for Treasury notes were nothing but a forced loan from those to whom they were paid. Instead of calling on the States for a return of a part of this money deposited with them, this body was now reproached with a breach of faith to the States for not going on to deposit the remainder, which was also claimed as a debt. That which in the first instance was declared to be a deposit only, and treated on that floor as a deposit, was now in the same place declared to be a debt, and the Federal Government was taunted with a breach of faith for not paying it. Now, what was the effect of the motion under consideration? It was a direct proposition, to be carried on hereafter, of raising money by indirection for the purpose of distribution. It was a case in which the powerful and strong would be arrayed against the weak. It was a direct proposition to commit this Government to the system of depositing money with the States. The effect would be, that all that party who are in favor of raising money of the whole to divide among the few, would throw every vote to diminish just and necessary appropriations, and to keep up the taxes. The price of the public lands would be kept up; and by the time the tariff act shall have worked out its object in January, 1840, there would be enough interested to band together for the purpose of raising from the Asiatic section of the Union, the cotton growing States, a sufficient sum for distribution. Your cotton crop, said Mr. B., amounting to some hundred millions, will hold out strong temptations to the friends of this system of distribution. Mr. B. said he had voted here for the last ten years against this system of collecting money for distribution. He opposed it when it was proposed by a Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON,) for the purpose of keeping up the tariff. He opposed it with the same zeal when a subsequent proposition was made to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and again when it returned in the insidious shape of a deposit act. In all this he found himself sustained by the young State of Missouri; for, young as she was, and destitute of resources, she despised the whole policy of distribution. Both branches of her Legislature adopted a resolution condemning the whole thing, and instructing her Senators and Representatives to oppose it forever. In obedience then to her instructions, as well as in accordance with the dictates of his own judgment, he solemnly protested against the odious principle. It was two hundred years since the Lord Chancellor Burleigh put into the mouth of Queen Elizabeth the noble sentiment, that the best treasury of a Government was 'the pockets of the people. This sentiment was, even at that time, received with rapture by a British Parliament; but it was still older than the time of Chancellor Burleigh, for it was that prince of orators and statesmen in the Republic of Athens, (Demosthenes,) when a vile scheme was proposed to raise money for a similar object, who indignantly trampled the whole under foot, and then uttered the memorable sentiment that has since been so often quoted. The author said, "No! Leave this money in the pockets of the people. When the country needs it for her defence, call for it, and the people will cheerfully give it." These, said Mr. B., are my sentiments. A proposition was made, the effect of which was to commit the Senate to this system of distribution; and it has been said on that floor that no harm could ensue from it. It was like the old woman's medicine of milk and water: if it did no good, it could do no harm. Such language did not belong to statesmen, nor to the elevated theatre of an American Senate. The whole proposition was wrong, to hold out to the American people a scheme for future distribution, which, it was evident, could not be carried into effect, without resorting to taxation. What prospect was there, he would ask, of its being realized? Look at the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it would be found that so far from there being any surplus to divide, the reverse was the case; that there was a falling off of the revenue derived from the land sales, and a falling off of that derived from the tariff; and the prospect was that by the year 1840, there would be a still greater diminution. At this very time we were hardly able to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, though we had been forced to the raising of money by extraordinary means, such as selling bonds, and issuing Treasury notes which were nothing more than forced loans, yet we had been called on for this fourth instalment, and charged with breach of faith for not making it. Are we, said Mr. B., under such circumstances, (to say nothing of the principle of raising money for distribution,) are we to excite expectations in the States, that this Government is to raise eight or nine millions by taxation, to be divided among them? The effect of the vote taken on this proposition, if unhappily it should be carried, would be to make such States as were willing to accept this money, to look upon it as a pledge that this nine millions was turned over to them; and being so, it would become the bounden duty of this Government to provide the surplus, by arresting necessary appropriations, by raising new taxes, by the issue of Treasury notes, and by a resort to the old tariff; and when this much was done, then all was done that was wanted. The example would be set which would be followed up, of raising money from the weaker portions of the Union to divide among the stronger and more populous parts of it. Our revenues were derived principally from the weaker parts of the Union—from cotton, which, being carried to Europe, the proceeds are brought back in merchandise which pays duties. The agriculture of the West also contributes its share in the same way. Then, said Mr. B., adopt this proposition—only establish the principle—and the South and West must prepare themselves in future for a heavy course of taxation, until the falsity and enormity of the system shall eventually prostrate it. Mr. B. said he was opposed to a postponement to the next year, or to the year after that. He was for a postponement not only indefinitely, but in the strongest and clearest language that could be used. He was for an eternal, perpetual, and everlasting postponement.

Mr. PRESTON concurred with the Senator from Missouri, in the impropriety of holding out the idea that this instalment would be paid in 1840. He did not think it proper that the Senate should take such a course as would hold out a fallacious hope, to deceive the States and the people of the United States. In accordance with these sentiments, he thought the proper course would be to repeal at once the first section of the deposit act, and if any Senator would make such a motion he would support it. He concurred in the sentiment, that the raising of money for distribution was unconstitutional, and admitted that he was mistaken in the operations of the deposit act. There was a necessity for the passage of the law, from the frightful surplus we had accumulated. But, sir, our part of the law has been completed; the surplus has been distributed, and the Treasury is compelled to an unconstitutional issue of Treasury notes to sustain itself. We have appealed to the vigilance of the States, and how have they responded? Instead of vigilance and economy, the States have gone on in schemes of unparalleled extravagance. Why appeal longer to the vigilance of the States to control us in our expenditures? He thought if he had known that, instead of reclaiming the money deposited with the States, when the Treasury was exhausted, the Secretary would have borrowed money by a forced loan, he would have opposed, with the Senator from Missouri, the passage of this law. He thought that it had been mischievous in its operations in some respects, and accelerated the fiscal calamities under which we have so lately suffered. But it was not the sole cause. There was an antagonist system for getting rid of the surplus by enormous appropriations for extravagant and useless objects; and though our system prevailed, we increased our expenditures, even after our surplus was deposited with the States. We had bounded rapidly from a surplus of sixty millions and an appropriation of forty millions, to an insolvent Treasury. But the deposit act had failed in the great object proposed by its enactment, and, having failed, is it correct to continue it upon the statute book? Is there any probability of any portion of the money being hereafter reclaimed from the States: why then continue it? He had acted in good faith when voting for that bill: he had voted for it as a deposit act; a deposit which would be called for, and ought to be called for when needed for the exigencies of the Government. He was deceived. He concurred with the Senator from Missouri, that the act had a squinting towards raising a revenue for distribution, and on that ground was for obliterating it.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he should vote for the amendment, as he was about to rise to offer a similar one, when he was anticipated by his friend from Kentucky. His object having thus been accomplished, he designed to sit still and give a silent vote on the question; but some gentlemen had seen fit to go into the merits of the deposit act, which they pleased to term a distribution bill. He had said on a former occasion, that whenever gentlemen thought proper to discuss the merits of that bill, he would not sit still a silent listener. He took an active part in the passage of that act, believing that he was right then, and he believed so now. Gentlemen talked of a deception when that bill was passed. Sir, (said Mr. T.,) there was no deception and no misconception. The matter was perfectly understood, and this body put the bill in a shape to obviate all difficulties. The bill as it was originally introduced was not a distribution act, but one for a mere deposit with the States. But gentlemen say that the effect of it was a distribution. Why, General Jackson himself recommended an absolute distribution three times over! Twice in his annual Messages, and again in his veto Message on the land bill; and when he heard that objections had been raised in Congress as to the unconstitutionality of the measure, he recommended that the constitution should be so amended as to remove any doubts on the subject. At that time no objections were heard from his friends; no, sir, it was their party doctrine; but when the time arrived that we had a surplus revenue far beyond what had been anticipated, and the proposition was made, not for an absolute distribution, but for a deposit with the States, the whole matter was changed—the President changed his opinions, and his friends changed theirs. That bill, however, passed the Senate, with only six dissenting voices. How was it, Mr. T. asked, that it had been received with so much dissatisfaction in different parts of the country? It was because it had offended a party. The official organ here denounced it, and denounced every man who voted for it—though every member of that body but six voted for it, and it was the very measure previously recommended by the President. Now, how did that bill pass? When gentlemen talked about giving money to the States, let us look and see how it was. Sir, said Mr. T., we adopted an amendment, by which this money was kept within the control of Congress. It was provided that it should be distributed among the States in the ratio of their representation, who should give their certificates for the amounts received by them, and that whenever it should be wanted for the purposes of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury should sell the certificates in the market, which should, from the time of sale, bear an interest of five per cent. That amendment placed the money entirely under the control of the Government; it was placed in the hands of the States, who could use it for valuable objects, without interest, until the Government wanted it. The State of New York, for instance, invested her quota in her school fund, which was laying a firmer foundation for national defence than if it had been expended in brick and mortar in a new system of fortifications, as the gentleman from Missouri wanted to expend it; and if this system of fortifications had been carried out, it must in the end have bankrupted the Treasury, for these fortifications would either have gone into dilapidation, or they must have appropriated millions annually to keep them up. Had the deposit act passed both Houses as it passed here, there never would have been a necessity to call on the States for this money, or to issue Treasury notes. The Secretary of the Treasury would have had the power to sell these certificates in the market, which would have been a good financial operation, and the money could have been obtained for the wants of the Government without putting the States to the slightest inconvenience. The bill, however, was amended in the other House on the suggestion of the President, and by that amendment this invaluable feature was stricken out, and in lieu of it, it was provided that the Secretary might draw on the States for small instalments, by giving a short previous notice. Why, then, did not the Secretary draw for this money in accordance with the provisions of the act? Perhaps he thought the notice was too long, and the instalments too small, and perhaps he did not care to incur the responsibility of this mode of proceeding. With this view of the case, was it right for gentlemen to complain of this act as a distribution? Why, there was no such principle advocated or adopted here. The principle contended for was a deposit with the States, where the Government could command it when wanted. Had the measure been carried out as advocated and adopted in the Senate, we should have had no difficulties, and the States would not have been embarrassed by a call for money which they had laid out in useful objects. Gentlemen said that the Government was about to be committed to the system of distribution by the adoption of this motion. This was not so. The Government would be no more committed than it was on a former occasion, when the same postponement of the fourth instalment was made in the terms now proposed. There would be no committal at all; and he was for having the postponement placed in the situation which this amendment contemplated, so that it should require the action of Congress to postpone it again; and, if there should be a surplus, it would not be in the power of one House, or of the veto of the Executive to prevent its being paid over to the States. When gentlemen talked of committing the Government, they were committed already. They say (continued Mr. T.) that we are to have no more surpluses. That might be so; but in some of the elections lately held in his State, he heard it argued that in case we had another surplus we ought to have a sub-Treasury, in order that the banks might not get it to expand their issues on. He, for one, would not consent to put it out of the power of Congress to pay this fourth instalment, if both Houses thought it right to do so; nor would he agree to put it in the power of the Executive veto to prevent the States from receiving this money.

Fourth Instalment of Deposit.

Mr. RIVES was in favor of the amendment. He said that an attempt had been made to show that the proposition before the Senate was very different from the deposit act; he could not see the difference. He was not surprised at the course the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BEN-TON,) and the Senator from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT,) had taken on this question; they had opposed it from the first, and were consistent on this point. But for his own part, whatever might be the course of others who had supported the bill, he would never do any thing that would look like a condemnation—an ex post facto condemnation—of that act of high legislation. He thought that there never had an act of more beneficial influence emanated from Congressional legislation. He was not prepared to say that the fourth instalment would not be paid. He thought there was a greater probability of its being paid than at the last session, when a measure similar to the one proposed was adopted by Congress. In voting for it, he did not consider that we were pledged to pay the instalment at the time specified in the amendment: his idea was that it should be paid whenever the Government was in funds. He thought that so long as this idea of a payment of the fourth instalment deposit—for it was strictly a deposit—was held up, the Executive would not require extravagant appropriations, because they will not furnish means to enlarge Executive power, or promote Executive views. He said that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his late report on the finances, had been reading a lecture to Congress on bringing the revenue down to the wants of the Government; but the responsibility of extravagant expenditures must be shared by the Executive with Congress. He deemed it a consideration of public morality to postpone the payment of the deposit rather than obliterate the law from the statute book.

Mr. BROWN did not rise to discuss the question, already so amply debated, whether the payment of the fourth instalment to the States, under the deposit act of 1836, should be postponed, as proposed by the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, or whether the amendment offered to it should be adopted. One or two other questions of great importance, connected with our financial affairs, had been touched on, and it was his purpose to say a few words in reference to them.

He would take leave to correct a very gross error which had been fallen into by two or three gentlemen in the course of the debate, in which the advocacy of the principle of distribution among the several States had been attributed to President Jackson in some of his early messages to Congress. So far from having sanctioned it, he had expressly questioned the constitutional power of the Government to raise money for any such object. He recommended it under two contingencies: first, if there should happen to be an unavoidable accumulation of surplus money in the Treasury, as one of the means of getting rid of it; secondly, if an amendment to the constitution should be first procured authorizing it. Nor was it recommended, subject even to these two contingencies alone, without, at that time, there should be a failure on the part of Congress to bring down the revenue to a proper standard of expenditure, which was strongly enjoined by him in several of his annual messages, and, as he should presently show, made one of the leading measures of his administration.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) had, in the course of his remarks, paid a tribute to the economy alleged to have been practised in the administration of Mr. Adams, and which he endeavored to contrast to the disadvantage of his successors. It would be recollected that the tariff act of 1828, one of the most outrageous acts of oppression ever practised on a free people, and which extorted from the pockets of the people the means of extravagance, and consequently created an uncontrollable necessity to get rid of them in some way, was one of the fruits of that most just and economical Administration. It will be recollected, also, that the magnificent and unconstitutional schemes for using these means, ay, and which, to have effected them, would have required millions more of taxes, were, for the first time in this country, hatched under that Administration. The basis of a mighty system of internal improvement was laid by it, by innumerable surveys for railroads and canals, and the commencement of innumerable plans. Who, therefore, in all truth and justice, is responsible for the extravagant direction, thus forced on this Government? Undoubtedly the administration of Mr. Adams, by whose act, and by whose sanction, this enormous amount of money was raised, which the Government was compelled to get rid of in some way. Is it now to be said that the political party who mainly contributed to that disastrous state of things, and whose efforts to run the Government expenditures up to their highest point, and whose progress towards that favorite result in their policy, was powerfully restrained by the constitutional negative of the late President, are the economical party? This cannot be done until the voice of truth is silenced, and the public documents forgotten. At the session of Congress in 1831, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report on the finances, carrying out the principle assumed by President Jackson, that the revenue of the Government should be brought down to a proper standard of expenditure, after presenting a variety of views in support of that proposition, comes to the conclusion that "an annual revenue of fifteen millions will be fully adequate."

By this measure, proposed as an administration measure, and viewed as an administration measure at the time, and for which it was severely denounced by many of the modern economists, the administration of President Jackson attempted an annual reduction of about fifteen millions of dollars, as the revenue then accruing under the measure sanctioned by Mr. Adams, amounted to at least thirty millions of dollars annually, and often afterwards exceeded that amount. Where then were the lecturers on economy? Opposed to the reduction, and in favor of keeping up the enormous income of the Government! At the head of that party stood the Senator from Kentucky, combating for his favorite system. If it could then have been reduced, if the policy of the Administration had then prevailed, the country would not only have been relieved from an oppressive burden, but the means for extravagance would have been withheld, and the Government expenditures, as a matter of course, kept in their true limits. It is not, therefore, for those to complain who are the true authors of the evils, which were inevitable from their own course of action.

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. PRES-TON) has also, said Mr. B., favored us with a lecture on economy. Mr. B. expressed his solemn conviction, that if the yeas and nays on the journals of the two branches of Congress were examined for the last nine years, the political party with whom that gentleman is now associated, as a body, would be found to be the perpetrators of the offence which he now denounces. He would cite a very few examples as illustrative of the truth of what he said. On the question of passing the bill giving five millions of dollars for indemnifying certain merchants for spoliations committed by the French prior to 1801, and which, in his opinion, was without the shadow of claim on the justice of Congress, the vote by which it passed the Senate was almost entirely given by the political party opposed to the Administration, while only two or three Senators friendly to the Administration voted for it. The House of Representatives fortunately arrested it. At the last session, in the other branch of Congress, an additional sum of two millions, beyond that given in the treaty, was proposed to be voted to the Cherokee Indians, by a gentleman in Opposition.

Abolition of Slavery.

Nor was the Senator from South Carolina, now so strongly smitten with a passionate love of economy, altogether free from the sin which he rebukes. Some two sessions since, if he did not err in his recollection, that gentleman proposed an appropriation of forty thousand dollars for purchasing a collection of old paintings, supposed by better connoisseurs than himself to have come to this country from Europe, on a voyage of discovery for a better market, where they, in all probability, were a kind of refuse among those skilled in the fine arts. The same gentleman, he believed, also moved an appropriation of a large sum to purchase the library of the Italian Count Bourtellini; and, indeed, from a knowledge of that gentleman's votes in regard to such objects, and in regard to the numerous claims presented at every session to draw money from the Treasury, he thought it would be difficult to make an appeal to his feelings which would not meet with success from the magnificence and profusion of his generosity. What he complained of was, that those who had been the greatest offenders themselves, were now not very candidly endeavoring to impute the offence to others. He could not, so far as these repeated imputations of extravagance tended to identify him with them, hear them with patience or composure. He had, for the last nine years, steadily voted against appropriations for objects of internal improvement. He had almost in every instance, if not in every one, voted against harbor bills, which have been one of the largest items of expense, because they had almost invariably contained some appropriations that he believed unconstitutional. He had voted against the act in 1832, by which the militia of the Revolution were pensioned, which had run the item of pensions up to a sum of more than four millions annually, and which was at that time, viewed by him as one of the means by which the tariff party sought to keep up a high tariff, by increasing expenditure. Yet many of the individuals who voted for that most extravagant measure, now talk about an increase of the public expenditures, as if they themselves had not been the chief agents of doing it! He had not only voted against extravagant expenditures, but he had made it a cardinal rule of his action to vote against creating any addition to the number of officers under the Federal Government, unless indispensable to the execution of some new law, required, as he thought, by the good of the country.

He was gratified to hear gentlemen speak of economy who had practised so little of it. It had uniformly been his doctrine in every situation of his public life. He hoped that they would, in good faith, unite in carrying it out into practice, and not "keep the promise to the ear, and break it to the hope."

The Senator from Kentucky, in his remarks of to-day, repudiates the doctrine attributed to him by gentlemen in debate, of wishing to raise money for purposes other than the wants of the Government, but at the same time again enforces upon our attention the merits of his bill for the distribution of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands among the several States. What is this but substantially a proposition to increase the tariff? It is now very clear, under the operation of the gradual decrease of the duties, that the money accruing from all sources, the public lands included, will not be more than sufficient to meet a reasonable system of public expenditure, under the General Government. It therefore follows, as a most undeniable and conclusive consequence, if the money arising from the public lands is taken from the public Treasury and given to the States, that just so much more must be raised from the people of the States to supply the deficiency, which can be done only in one of two ways, either by a system of direct taxation, or an increase of the tariff. The bill of the Senator, therefore, is emphatically a tariff measure in its end and effect. It should be entitled "a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, to raise the duties on imports, and for other purposes," &c. The South never can consent to revive a system, either directly or indirectly, which had annihilated her prosperity for years, and converted her planters into mere stewards of their own estates for the benefit of others—a system, the ruin of which, to her best interests, is most palpably demonstrated, from the fact that, in proportion as it goes down, her prosperity is rapidly recovering. He repeated, that the South never could consent to see it revived, openly or otherwise, unless she was prepared for self-destruction and self-immolation.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON the subject was postponed until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 13.

Futility of Constitutional Resolutions.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That the powers of Congress, being conferred by the Constitution of the United States, no resolution of this House can add to or deduct from them.

Abolition of Slavery.

Mr. WISE then asked leave to submit the following resolutions, as propositions containing his sentiments, and what he believed to be the real sentiments of the whole South:

1. Resolved, That Congress has no power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories of the United States; whether such power in the said District or Territories be exercised "as a means, or with the view, of disturbing and overthrowing slavery in the States" or not.

DECEMBER, 1838.]

Fourth Instalment.

[25TH CONG.]

2. Resolved, That Congress has no power to abolish the slave-trade, or prohibit the removal of slaves between the States, or between the States and the District of Columbia or Territories of the United States.

3. Resolved, That Congress cannot receive or consider petitions for the exercise of any powers whatever over the subject of slavery, which Congress does not possess.

4. Resolved, That the laws of Congress alone govern in prescribing and regulating the mode and manner in which fugitive slaves shall be apprehended, and their rights to freedom held in the non-slaveholding States, District of Columbia and Territories, and the mode and manner in which they shall be restored or delivered to their owners in the slave States.

5. Resolved, That Congress has no power to impose upon any State the abolition of slavery in its limits, as a condition of admission into this Union.

6. Resolved, That the citizens of the slaveholding States of this Union have the constitutional right voluntarily to take their slaves to or through a non-slaveholding State, and to sojourn or remain temporarily with such slaves in the same, and the slaves are not thereby ipso facto emancipated; and the General Government is constitutionally bound to protect the rights of slaveholding States; and that laws of non-slaveholding States in conflict with the laws of Congress providing for such protection, are null and void.

MR. CALHOON, of Kentucky, asked the gentleman to accept some he held in his hand as a modification of his own.

MR. WISE hoped his friend would not embarrass him. He had consulted one of his colleagues; and, in asking leave to introduce these propositions, he would not only pledge himself not to debate them, but he would move, what he deprecated, the previous question.

MR. RIVES inquired if they did not fall within the scope of the last resolution adopted yesterday? (ordering all papers on the subject of slavery to be laid on the table.)

THE CHAIR replied that the resolutions were not yet before the House, the motion being for leave to introduce them.

Several members said, "object to them."

MR. RIVES did so, and MR. WISE moved a suspension of the rules, calling for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 113, nays 96.

So the motion to suspend was decided in the negative, there not being two-thirds voting for the motion.

MR. SLADE asked leave to submit the following:

Whereas there exists, and is carried on between the ports in the District of Columbia and other ports of the United States, and under the sanction of the laws thereof, a trade in human beings, whereby thousands of them are annually sold and transported from said District to distant parts of the country, in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States; and whereas, such trade involves an outrageous violation of human rights, is a disgrace to the country by whose laws it is sanctioned, and calls for the immediate interposition of legislative authority for its suppression: therefore, to the end that all obstacles to the consideration of this subject may be removed, and a remedy for the evil speedily provided,

Resolved, That so much of the fifth of the resolutions on the subject of slavery, passed by this House on the 11th and 12th of the present month, as relates to the "removal of slaves from State to State," and prohibits the action of this House on "every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper touching" the same, be, and hereby is rescinded.

Objections being made, MR. S. moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 55, nays 157.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Election of Chaplain.

On motion of MR. GREENELL,

The House proceeded to the execution of the order of Monday, for the election of a Chaplain on its part, when the Rev. MR. REESE was declared duly elected.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 17.

Fourth Instalment.

The bill to postpone the fourth instalment of the deposit act was taken up as the order of the day; when

MR. PRESTON said his object in rising, when this subject was last before the Senate, was to refute and correct a misrepresentation respecting his position in regard to it. He had given his support originally to the measure, but it was as a deposit bill, not as one for distribution. Although aware of the necessity of getting rid of the accumulated surplus, had he known its practical effect, he could not, except as an extreme necessity, have voted for it. What he had said the other day was applicable to the bill as it was practically and in effect—a bill for distribution instead of deposit. As a deposit act, it provided that the Secretary of the Treasury might reclaim the moneys from the States whenever the exigencies of the Government rendered it necessary; but at a subsequent session it was so amended, at the instance of an honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, (MR. BUCHANAN,) as to take this discretion from the Secretary. When it was proposed to create a national debt, he was willing to have moved for the recall of this money. The honorable Senator from Virginia (MR. RIVES) said that to have recalled it at the last session, during the fiscal embarrassments, would have been ruinous to the States, and that nothing but a foreign war would be a justifiable cause for so doing; but I think that the States could, by their credit, have easily raised means to pay off this debt. Under that state of affairs, Congress decided in favor of a national debt, in preference to reclaiming the deposit with the States. One great benefit expected from the operation of this act was, that whenever the Government was disposed to a prodigality of expenditure, the States would be induced to interpose and arrest the evil. Did they do so? It was expected that whenever the wants of the Government required more than their immediate means, these deposits would be a source for us to draw on to supply the deficiency. Did we do so? No, sir; we have a national debt existing, on which we are paying interest, while the money is still in deposit with the States. Congress has, by its legislation, declared its most unequivocal condemnation of the deposit act. I do not reprobate the bill as passed, but think that, as no human being entertains the idea that this money will be ever paid, the most honest plan will be to strike it from the statute book altogether.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY'S amendment to postpone the instalment to the 1st of January, 1840, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Rivers, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, and Tipton—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Walker, Wall, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—26.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 20.

Anti-Slavery and Anti-Texas Annexation Petitions; and Petitions for Diplomatic Inter-course with Hayti.

Mr. ADAMS presented a large number of petitions from various States, (including one or two from Ohio county, Virginia,) praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade, remonstrating against the admission of any new slaveholding State, against the annexation of Texas, for international relations with Hayti, &c. The Abolition petitions were laid on the table under Mr. ATHERTON'S resolution, and the others were disposed of as stated above.

Mr. CUSHING, for the purpose, he said, of economizing the time of the House, would present, to-day, but one of the many Abolition petitions intrusted to his charge, and would postpone the others to a future day.

Mr. C. availed himself of that opportunity to pronounce the resolution ordering those petitions on the table, to be unconstitutional, to protest against it, and asked that his protest might be entered on the journal.

The CHAIR ruled it to be out of order.

WEDNESDAY, December 26.

The SPEAKER communicated a letter from the Honorable JOHN FAIRFIELD a member from the State of Maine, resigning his seat in the present Congress; which, on motion of Mr. ANDERSON, was laid on the table, and the SPEAKER directed to notify the Executive of Maine of the fact.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 31.

Financial Policy.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolutions, which lay over:

Resolved, That the financial policy established at the origin of this Government by the first acts of its legislation, and especially by the 30th section of the "Act to regulate the collection of duties, &c.," approved by President Washington July 31st, 1789, and by the 4th section of the "Act to establish the Treasury Department, &c.," approved by President Washington September 2d, 1789, was in strict conformity to the plain and frugal genius of a Republic, and to the fundamental principles of the constitution.

Resolved, That that policy has, by a long series of subsequent acts, been departed from, and ought to be restored in the future administration of the Government. And, therefore,

Resolved, That the Government ought to collect no more taxes from the people, either directly or indirectly, than are absolutely necessary to an economical administration of its affairs.

Resolved, That the taxes paid by the people ought not to be loaned out, by the Government, to individuals or to corporations.

Resolved, That the taxes so paid by the people, ought not to be placed by the Government in the custody of agents, who are not made by the constitution and the laws responsible to the people.

Resolved, That those legal provisions by which the Government was originally required, in the transaction of its own affairs, to receive and to tender, in payment, as money, nothing but that which is made a legal tender by the constitution, ought to be revived, with those modifications only, as to time and proportion, suggested by the present condition of the country.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 31.

British outrage at Schlosser, on the Caroline.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to this House—

1. The correspondence, if any, which has been had between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, or the military or civil authorities of either, in relation to the troubles in the British Provinces of Upper or Lower Canada, and to alleged violations of neutrality on the part, whether of Great Britain, or of the United States, or any of the officers, subjects, or citizens of each.

2. The correspondence had, or measures taken by the Executive, if any, regarding citizens of the United States made prisoners of war at any time in any of the insurrectionary movements of Upper or Lower Canada.

3. Whether the Government of Great Britain has made reparation for the seizure and destruction of the steamboat Caroline, within the waters of the United States, and the murder of American citizens on board the same by a band of armed invaders from the province of Upper Canada, acting under the orders and authority of the Colonial Government of said province.

4. Whether the Government of the United States has entered into negotiations with that of Great Britain, for the purpose of arresting and preventing the further distribution of presents and payment of war subsidies by the latter Government to the Indian tribes, within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the United States; and, if so, what has been the result of the said negotiations.

5. Whether the Government of the United States have given to that of Great Britain the stipulated notice to annul and abrogate the convention of the 6th of September, 1827, under cover of which, and of the convention of the 20th October, 1818, the Hudson's Bay Company has proceeded, with permission, or by connivance of the Government of Great Britain, to establish military posts in the territories of the United States beyond the Rocky Mountains.

6. Whether the Government of the United States has taken any measures, and if any, what, to adjust, settle, and mark the boundaries between the United States and the British Provinces in North America, from St. Mary's Falls, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior; and so northwardly and westwardly along the frontier of the State of Michigan and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, to the Rocky Mountains.

7. What correspondence, if any, the Government of the United States has had with that of Great Britain, or any of its authorities or officers, or with the Government of the State of Maine, in regard to the late survey or investigation of the North-eastern boundary line of the United States by the Government of said State.

8. Whether any correspondence has recently passed between the British and American Governments relative to the free navigation of the navigable rivers conterminous to the United States and the British possessions in North America, or of navigable rivers running in part or in whole through the territories of both Governments: and if so, the results of the same.

The resolutions were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. CUSHING then said the discharge of his particular duties as a member of the House, had called his attention to another subject of inquiry, perfectly unexceptionable in itself, and of the deepest immediate interest to the whole Union, and more especially to the States of the South-west. He asked that the resolution of inquiry should be read, in order that the House might judge whether they would permit him to offer it at this time; which he would not ask if the subject were not one of pressing, immediate importance.

The House assenting, Mr. C. offered the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to be printed, and lies over one day, under the rules.

Whereas, in the Message of the President of the United States at the opening of the eighteenth Congress, it was, among other things, avowed and proclaimed as the settled national policy of the United States, that "in the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do;" that "with the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected;" that "we owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety;" that "with the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power, we have not interfered, and shall not interfere; but with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States;" and that "it is impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference."

Resolved, therefore, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if the same be not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, what explanations the King of the French has rendered to the United States in relation to the recent blockade of a part of the coast of the Mexican Republic by France; the treatment of vessels of the United States, public or private, by the blockading squadron; the reduction of the castle of San Juan de Ulloa; and the ulterior views and designs of the French Government respecting the Mexican Republic. Also, to inform the House whether he has proffered to either of the contending parties the mediation of the United States in the premises; and to communicate any correspondence on the subjects aforesaid which may have passed between the Government of the United States and that of France.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, ordered to be printed.

Wisconsin Election Case.

At one o'clock, the special order of the day, being the consideration of the contested election for a delegate from Wisconsin Territory, came up.

The question was on the adoption of the following resolution of the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, That James Duane Doty is entitled to a seat in this House as a delegate from Wisconsin Territory, and that George W. Jones is not so entitled.

Public Lands.

[JANUARY, 1839.]

Mr. THOMAS moved to amend the resolution by transposing the names, so as to declare Mr. Jones entitled to the seat, and proceeded at length to oppose the conclusions of the report.

Mr. CUSHING was understood to argue in favor of vacating the seat of the sitting delegate, upon the ground of the irregularity and illegality of the tenure by which he held it, and in favor of the amendment of Mr. THOMAS; and intimated that he would, at the proper time, move a division of the question.

The question was further argued by Messrs. RANDOLPH, CRARY, FLETCHER, and TILLINGHAST, in favor of the resolution as reported by the committee.

Mr. DEGRAFF having obtained the floor, moved the previous question; which motion was sustained, and the main question was ordered.

The question being upon concurring with the resolution as reported by the committee—

The House then adopted the resolution of the committee by the following vote:—yeas 165, nays 25.

FRIDAY, January 4.

Public Lands.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted the following preamble and resolutions, which were referred to the Select Committee on the Public Lands.

Whereas the Continental Congress for the then confederacy of the United States, did, by resolution, in the year 1780, recommend to the several States of the confederacy, or Federal Union, having claims to Western lands, a liberal surrender thereof, as a common fund, in aid of establishing the public credit, and to discharge the debt incurred by the then existing war with Great Britain.

And, whereas, the State of Virginia, responding to the said recommendation of Congress, did, on the second day of January, by an act of her Legislative Assembly, adopt and submit to Congress, for their consideration and acceptance, the terms and conditions on which that State would surrender to the United States, for the purpose aforesaid, all the lands within the chartered boundaries of Virginia, north and west of the river Ohio.

And, whereas, Congress having the said terms and conditions of cession, proposed by the State of Virginia, under consideration, resolved on the day of September, 1783, to accept the same, with the exception only of a stipulation in said terms of cession, requiring the United States to guarantee to Virginia the residue of her Western territory, lying south and east of the river Ohio.

And, whereas, the State of Virginia, assenting to the proposed exclusion from her terms of cession, did, by an act of her Legislative Assembly, authorize her then delegates in Congress, to execute the contemplated deed of cession; whereupon, and in virtue of the full powers vested in them, the said delegates, then present, did, on the first day of March, 1784, execute a conveyance to the United States, of all the lands to which Virginia had claim, north and west of the river Ohio, according to the original terms and conditions proposed by Virginia to Congress, for the cession thereof, with the exception only of the guarantee aforesaid, proposed by Congress, to be excluded therefrom, and assented to by Virginia, as aforesaid.

And, whereas, the original terms and conditions proposed by Virginia, and assented to by Congress, for the cession by that State of all her lands north and west of the Ohio, impose the following obligations on Congress:

1. That, provided the State of Virginia had not reserved a sufficient quantity of good land on the south-east side of the river Ohio to satisfy the land bounty promised by Virginia to her officers and soldiers who served in the continental line of the army, and who served in her own State establishment, that Congress should make up such deficiency, and of good lands lying between the Scioto and Miami Rivers.

2. The aforesaid terms and conditions of cession provide, and it is so expressed in the deed, "that all the lands in the territory hereby ceded to the United States, and not reserved or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered a common fund for the sole use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

Resolved, That the Select Committee to whom that part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the public lands was referred, be instructed to inquire and report whether the conveyance of the lands above referred to by Virginia to the United States, is not a conveyance in trust for the specific objects expressly enumerated in the deed of cession.

2. Whether those objects have been satisfied, and, especially, whether Congress, out of the ceded territory, has made provision for the deficit of good lands on the south-east side of the Ohio River, to satisfy the land bounty promised by the State of Virginia to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on continental establishment; if not, ought to be promptly made for that purpose.

3. What quantity of the ceded territory has been, or the proceeds thereof, devoted and applied towards the specific objects enumerated in the deed of cession; and what quantity of the said territory has been devoted to uses and purposes, not comprehended in the terms and conditions of cession; finally, if it shall appear, that there will be a surplus of land in the ceded territory beyond what is required to satisfy the objects and purposes specially enumerated in the original terms and conditions, in pursuance of which the deed of cession was executed; whether Congress is not bound by the manifest intention of that deed, to provide for a prompt and "bona fide" distribution of the proceeds of the remaining lands, including the value of so much of these lands, if any, as may have been devoted to purposes not warranted by the deed, amongst the States of the Union, according to the ratio of distribution specified in the deed of cession, for the sole use and benefit of the said States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill.

Question of Pay to Geo. W. Jones, Esq., late Sitting Delegate from Wisconsin.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, asked leave to present a resolution; which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. J. W. JONES, late delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, is not entitled to his mileage and per diem allowance for his attendance at the present session.

Mr. WISE objected; whereupon

Mr. MASON said as it was a matter of some importance, he would move that the rules be suspended; and upon which motion, he called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER stated that he had received a communication upon the subject from Mr. Jones, and would prefer that the House would come to some decision upon it. He then laid before the House the following letters, which were read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 4, 1839.

SIR: I take this mode of informing you that a resolution will, at the earliest opportunity, be introduced to this House, denying your right to receive any compensation as delegate to the present session of Congress.

I am, sir, with respect,

Your obedient servant,

J. R. GIDDINGS.

HON. GEORGE W. JONES, Washington City.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C.

January 5, 1839.

SIR: Considering myself entitled, under the usage of the House, and the laws of the United States, to receive my mileage and per diem compensation as the sitting delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, I received from the Sergeant-at-arms, on the 20th ultimo, a check on the Bank of Washington for my mileage and per diem allowance up to that date.

Having received last evening the accompanying communication from a member of the House, Hon. J. R. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, and not feeling willing to retain in my hands the compensation alluded to, unless most clearly so entitled, I respectfully return to the House, through you, the original check, to be cancelled by the House, if in their judgment I am not entitled to it.

I came here under the solemn conviction that I was the rightful delegate of the people of Wisconsin, to serve them here as such until the 4th of March next. This opinion was strengthened by the advice of able counsel, before and since my arrival here. I entertain the same opinion still, but will submit to the decision of the House in both cases without a murmur.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

GEO. W. JONES.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER, with the permission of the House, made a brief explanation of the course of the Sergeant-at-arms and the presiding officer of the House.

By the journal of the extra session, at the opening of the present Congress in September, 1837, it appeared that "George Wallace Jones appeared as the delegate from the Territory of Wisconsin, was sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and took a seat in the House." No certificates of election of members or delegates were presented at the time of qualification, and the Speaker could not know under what authority they took their seats. Mr. Jones was sworn, and took a seat.

At the commencement of the present session Mr. Jones appeared in his seat, claiming to be the rightful sitting delegate from Wisconsin. When the claim of Mr. Doty was presented, Mr. Jones rose in his place and asserted his right. The House, by its acquiescence, recognized him as the sitting delegate, and took order in the case, by referring the claim to a seat, as the delegate from Wisconsin to the Committee of Elections. Mr. Jones continued in his seat as the sitting delegate. He, at various times, as the journal shows, presented petitions and resolutions, and participated in the business of the House, as the sitting delegate. This was permitted by the acquiescence of the House, until the right to the seat was decided by the House. Whilst Mr. Jones was thus the sitting delegate, in his seat, in discharge of his duties as such, the Sergeant-at-arms or the presiding officer had no right or power to inquire whether he was rightfully there. That was a question which the House alone could decide. The law regulating the pay of members and delegates, for aught that appeared of record, entitled him to his compensation until the time he was ousted by a vote of the House. He called for his compensation, and neither the Sergeant-at-arms nor the Speaker had any discretion to refuse it under the law. The check for his compensation was made out in the usual way, by the Sergeant-at-arms, and signed under the law. Since taking the chair this morning, the letter from Mr. Jones had been laid on his table. And now the question of compensation, under the resolution before the House, was an open one. The House alone can by its order refuse the compensation. Under the law, the Sergeant and Speaker cannot. The Speaker expressed the hope that the House would decide the question, and thus relieve the subject from all doubt and embarrassment.

A long debate then ensued, in which the resolution was advocated by Messrs. MASON of Ohio, and GIDDINGS, and opposed by Messrs. WISE, BOULDIN, THOMAS, POPE, CALHOON of Kentucky, BRONSON, and BIDDLE. The latter, at the conclusion of his remarks, moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution, Mr. GRIFFIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS inquired of the Speaker whether, in case the resolution should be rejected, he would consider it as authority to pay Mr. Jones his per diem and mileage.

•The Speaker said he should so consider it.

Transfer of Canal Stock to the State of Maryland.

Mr. WALKER, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the transfer, on certain conditions, to the State of Maryland, of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

Mr. W. on asking leave, said that on the 9th of April last, the Senate, upon his motion, had adopted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the dividends received, and present market value of the stock held by the United States in various canal companies. To this call the Secretary of the Treasury had responded in a statement, showing that the Government had never received any dividend from its stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, that this stock is much below par, and that it is doubtful whether it can be converted into money at any price. Mr. W. said, as this stock was yielding nothing to the Government, and could not be sold for money, he was willing to transfer it for a reasonable equivalent to the State of Maryland. This equivalent was, that the State of Maryland should cause, within a specified period, this canal to be completed to the Ohio River; and that when completed, the canal, throughout its entire distance, should be forever free for the transportation of any property, troops, or seamen of the United States, without the payment of any toll or charge whatever. This bill then involved the exercise of no doubtful nor disputed constitutional power, but simply provided for the sale for a reasonable equivalent of this stock to the State of Maryland.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Money received for Customs.

Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, asked leave of the House to present and have printed the following resolution :

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill which shall provide :

1. That all money hereafter to be received by the United States for customs, shall be paid on four certain days fixed, at intervals of three months, the duties required by the existing laws to be paid in cash, to be secured by bonds with approved security, bearing interest at the rate of six per centum per annum from its date until paid, and payable at the next fixed quarterly day, unless it bears date within twenty days of that period, in which case it is to be payable on the next succeeding day fixed for payments to the United States. But if the importer be entitled to credit under the existing laws, the sum due is to be diminished by a discount at the rate of six per centum for the time through which the said credit extends, and the sum thus ascertained to be secured by bond as aforesaid under the limitations above prescribed.

2. That all debts due from the United States shall be made payable, so far as practicable, on four certain days, occurring at intervals of three months, and fixed at twenty days respectively after the days fixed as aforesaid for payment to the United States. These debts, in all cases when practicable, to be made payable at the next day of disbursement, unless incurred within twenty days of that time; in which case to be payable at the second succeeding day fixed for that purpose. But if the public creditor should fail to present his claim at the place at which it is payable when due, or within ——— days of that time, then the United States to be absolved from all responsibility for any failure in the disbursing agent at that place to pay the said creditor: Provided, however, That the said agent and his sureties shall be liable, in their individual capacity, to pay to the said creditor any sums received for his use, upon demand, and without interest.

3. That all requisitions on the Treasury Department by other Departments of this Government for sums to be disbursed at the next day fixed for that purpose, shall be made at least twenty days before the day fixed for public receipts, and next succeeding that of the requisition.

4. That the Secretary of the Treasury after a comparison of the liabilities to and from the Government, at the next succeeding days of receipt and disbursement, shall ascertain the probable surplus which will be due to the United States upon the next quarterly day of receipt, after collecting what will be sufficient to discharge the debts due from the Government at the next disbursing day, together with whatever sum may be needful as a cash surplus for emergencies of the Department not otherwise provided for. The debtors of the United States to be entitled to an extended credit upon the surplus thus ascertained, upon their giving bonds, with approved sureties, bearing interest as aforesaid, up to the quarterly day of the receipts next succeeding that at which the original bond was due. Each public debtor offering security as aforesaid, to be entitled to this further credit upon an equal proportion of his debt; which proportion is to be specified by public advertisement of the Secretary of the Treasury, at least twenty days before the next succeeding day of receipt. But all bonds given for the surplus as aforesaid, to be wholly collected at the next quarter when due, before any portion is demanded of their bonds given, when the debt for duties was increased.

The resolution was then laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

Anti-Slavery and Anti-Texas Annexation Petitions.

Mr. PRENTISS presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their efforts to prevent the passage of any law for the annexation of Texas to the Union, and to procure the passage of a law for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia, and the Territories of the Union—and of the slave-trade between the several States; and also protesting against certain resolutions (ATHERTON'S) adopted by the House of Representatives, as unconstitutional; which Mr. P. moved should be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The question was, on motion of Mr. FOSTER, divided, and the first division was agreed to.

The question coming up on the second division, viz: to print the resolution,

Mr. PRENTISS said he had made the motion to print these resolutions, because he supposed it would be an act of proper courtesy to the Legislature from whom they come. When he presented them, he had not the slightest idea that any serious objections would be made to them, or that they would excite any debate, and he would say to gentlemen of the South, that the course which they were pursuing was precisely the course to increase the number, and augment the strength of the Abolitionists; and he thought it in other respects impolitic and injurious, as well as wrong and unreasonable in itself.

The virtual rejection of petitions here was regarded as an infraction of the right of petition, and this was connected with the great subject of abolition, and had given to it a power not properly its own, so that those who were opposed to extreme and premature measures, and who wished to prevent useless excitement and agitation, found themselves powerless in consequence of this connection; and if this course were persisted in, they would be obliged to give way entirely. Mr. P. trusted these resolutions would be printed as an act of common courtesy, and he called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN confessed that he was amazed when he saw a gentleman of the calmness and correct judgment of the Senator from Vermont, pursuing the course that he did. That there should be any man of any intelligence whatever, who did not see that this question strikes at the very foundation of the Union, alienating one portion of it from the other, and that it tended to the overthrow of the best hopes of mankind, indeed surprised him. Nor was it less wonderful to him, that any gentleman of that description should pretend to say that the best course of Southern gentlemen was to permit the Abolitionists to come here and urge the question whenever they pleased. They tell us, said Mr. C., that we have no right to our own estates; that a large part of our property is held without law; and that they have the right to come here week after week, year after year, questioning our right to it, and calumniating our character, while the best mode for us to pursue is to be quiet. Sir, said Mr. C., I would not have made these observations if the remarks that called them forth had not come from a respectable quarter. The course of the gentleman from Vermont was a striking proof that on all questions of deep excitement the strongest minds may be carried away. Mr. C. would say to the Senator from Vermont, that this thing must be arrested at home, by strong measures, or the South would take care of itself.

Mr. PRENTISS said that he had simply asked that these resolutions might be printed, as a mark of the courtesy usually evinced to States of this Union. He did not enter into any argument on the question of abolition. Neither he nor any other Senator from the North had, on any occasion, been found to agitate that question. The fault, if it was one, lay in another quarter. He wished merely to discharge an obvious duty. If he found it certain that he could not carry out his own opinions on the subject of slavery, which he trusted were well known, he thought it best to defer the attempt to a more favorable opportunity. These resolutions were passed by the Legislature of Vermont in consequence of petitions requiring their passage. They were resolutions of instruction, and so far as he was concerned, he wished to discharge the duty imposed upon him.

Mr. KING found no fault with the Senator from Vermont for discharging his duty to his State, in presenting such resolutions as they thought proper to charge him with. He waived, therefore, under these considerations, any objections to receiving these resolutions. They came from a sovereign State; but whether that State was true to the principles which should govern every member of the Confederacy, was another question. With regard to the prayer of these resolutions, every man of common intelligence knew that if it were granted, this Union would not last twenty-four hours. He knew that he and every man from that section of the Union which would be so grossly outraged by such a measure, would instantly, on the adoption of it, retire from their seats. He would, in such an event, return to his constituents, and tell them that the compact was broken, the constitution violated, and their property taken away from them, and that he, as their representative, could render them no further service by remaining where he was. Believing that such would be the inevitable consequences of carrying out the doctrines contained in these resolutions, he could not consent to give them any circulation. What was the object of the Senator from Vermont, in wishing to have these resolutions printed? The Senator himself declared that he did not expect any such thing as action on those resolutions; and yet he wished to have them printed: for what? To give encouragement to these people, to send out more memorials to act on their Legislature, inducing them to interfere with matters which do not belong to them. If that was the object of the gentleman, and he trusted and believed it was not, he might have some reason for urging the printing of these papers; but as he had a great respect for the gentleman, and believed that he had no such object in view, he was at a loss to conceive why he persisted in the motion. He thanked the gentleman for warning the South of what became their duty, under the present state of excitement on this subject. Sir, said Mr. K., we will discharge our duty to ourselves and our constituents, without asking advice from the gentleman from Vermont, or from his Legislature, or the Legislature of any other State. He had hoped that they would have been spared, in this body, the agitating of this exciting subject. He knew that it had taken place elsewhere in a manner highly disgraceful, but he had confidently expected that this body would escape it, and that the Senator from Vermont would be the last man to bring it up. He regretted the necessity of making these few observations, but he was compelled to do so, because he thought the Senator from Vermont was forcing this matter beyond what was necessary.

Mr. LUMPKIN said his object in rising was to move that the motion to print be laid upon the table. But before he submitted that motion, he would remark that he fully concurred in the remarks of the Senators from South Carolina and Alabama, (Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. KING.) And that he felt no disposition to countenance or respect attempts to agitate the question of slavery, the more, because it was brought before the Senate by the proceedings of a sovereign State. No, sir, said Mr. L., the agitation of this question, by obscure and ignorant individuals, is harmless and innocent, when compared with the proceedings of the Legislature of Vermont. Yet the Senator from Vermont (Mr. PRENTISS) admonishes the South to be cool and quiet, to disregard the efforts of those who are constantly warring against their rights and interests. Sir, said Mr. L., this advice reminds me of a robber, who, while he has his hand in my pocket, takes from me that to which he has no just claim, ceases not to admonish me to be quiet, be easy—he will do me no harm. Every lover of this Union should cease to agitate this question. The interference of the Abolitionists and their supporters with the domestic concerns of the South is daily becoming more offensive. These proceedings are rapidly alienating the affections of one portion of the Union from the other. We should circulate nothing from this Senate calculated to increase excitement and prejudice. Under this view of the subject, I move to lay the motion to print on the table.

The question was then taken on Mr. LUMPKIN's motion to lay the motion to print on the table, and carried—yeas 29, nays 8.

MONDAY, January 14.

North Carolina Resolutions against the Independent Treasury.

Mr. BROWN said he rose to present to the Senate certain resolutions which had been adopted by the General Assembly of the State of

VOL. XIII.—46

North Carolina, at their late session, expressive of their views and opinions in regard to some of the important measures and questions of public policy, which have been, and now are, pending before the country. However uncourtous some of the language was in reference to a late act of this body, which it had performed in the exercise of its high constitutional powers, and profoundly as he regretted that expressions derogating from the respect due to this body were embraced in the resolutions, yet he could not hesitate, in obedience to a proper sense of respect to the Legislature of his State, to offer them, in compliance with the request contained in one of the resolutions.

It was alike due to himself, to his constituents, and to the importance of the occasion itself, to state very explicitly the view he took of the resolutions, and the course which high considerations of public duty required that he should pursue in regard to them. He felt the deep responsibility under which he acted, and had given to the subject that anxious deliberation which its public importance and the great questions of public interest involved in it demanded.

In regard to most of the resolutions, it would readily be perceived that the opinions expressed in them directly conflict with the course which he had heretofore pursued on the measures of public policy to which they refer, and that a principle is asserted in one of them, in regard to a question of constitutional power, entirely at variance with his vote on the resolution ordering the expunction of the condemnatory resolution passed against President Jackson, for removing the public deposits from the late Bank of the United States. In relation to extravagant expenditure, and Executive patronage, referred to by two others of the resolutions, his votes would most abundantly prove that his whole course had been, since honored with a seat in that body, to diminish both as far as it was practicable for him to do so.

Having very briefly adverted to the political character of the resolutions, the next inquiry which presents itself for consideration is, whether they are to be viewed by my honorable colleague and myself as instructions, or as the mere expressions of the opinions of the Legislature, leaving us to a discretionary power in exercising our judgments on the subjects to which they relate. That they are not to be considered as instructions, the proofs, to his mind, were clear and irresistible. They do not, on their face, profess to instruct, but, on the contrary, that word, or any other of mandatory import, is omitted with the most guarded caution; omitted no doubt not by accident, but by design. What could have been the intention for omitting it? The motive clearly was, not to commit the party passing these resolutions to the doctrine of instructions. Whenever, said Mr. B., the General Assembly of North Carolina has thought proper, on former occasions, to resort to the great Republican principle of instruction, it has spoken out in bold, frank, and unequivocal language. It has, by directly instructing the Senators representing the State, taken the responsibility on itself of the vote which it commanded them to give. A positive command, by instructions, from the Legislature of a State to its Senators to give a particular vote, places the vote under the control of the Legislature, and is, in effect, the vote of the power commanding it; thereby taking from the Senator all discretion, and consequently, relieving him from all responsibility to the people of the State. The Legislature, therefore, does not take on itself the responsibility of the Senator's vote unless it instructs him. On the contrary, if it declines to instruct him, it declines taking the responsibility of his vote, and, therefore, has no right to expect him to express their opinions when they refuse to take on themselves the consequences of his vote to the people of the State. The Legislature of North Carolina has long since established the principle that they had the right to instruct, and so essential has the employment of that word been considered to the efficacy of resolutions of instruction, that the Republicans of that State have invariably employed it on all great occasions when they intended to command the votes of their Senators.

Mr. B. said in referring to the journals of the Senate, he perceived that the late venerable Mr. Macon, then a member of this body, had presented resolutions, passed by the Legislature of North Carolina at their session of 1816, instructing their Senators to endeavor to procure certain amendments to the constitution in relation to the mode of electing President and Vice President of the United States. The Legislature which adopted them resolved, in one of the resolutions, "that our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to endeavor to obtain the said amendment to the Constitution of the United States." At the succeeding session of the Legislature of North Carolina the same resolutions were again adopted, and again asserted, in the same language, the right of instruction. That the General Assembly then considered mandatory language as essential to instructions is most strikingly obvious, from the marked distinction between the terms employed by them in the resolutions to the Senators and the Representatives in Congress. The former are expressly "instructed," the latter are merely "requested," to perform their will. It is, therefore, perfectly clear, from the use of the latter term to the Representatives in Congress, over whose vote the Legislature never professed to have any control, that a mere expression of opinion, unaccompanied by instructions, never was viewed by them as obligatory on those to whom they were addressed. This great right had been repeatedly since asserted, and exercised in the same language of command, to their Senators, by successive Legislatures of North Carolina, from the period just referred to down to its session of 1834, when they reasserted and exercised, in positive and unequivocal language, the right of instruction on the question of expunging from the journals of the Senate of the United States the resolutions condemnatory of President Jackson. The long-continued practice, therefore, of the Legislature of that State, in regard to instructions, shows very conclusively, that whenever they have intended to take all discretion from their Senators in regard to any particular vote, that they have expressly, and in plain language, instructed.

Mr. B. said, he held, when resolutions directly instructing had passed a legislative body, that it was not competent to go beyond the instructions themselves to ascertain the meaning of the Legislature; but when instructions were not given, on the face of the resolutions, that it was competent to look beyond them to arrive at the intentions of those passing them. He adverted to an amendment offered in both branches of the Legislature, when the resolutions were before them, proposing to insert the word "instruct," and which was rejected by the unanimous vote of the friends of the resolutions, in both instances. This act, in his opinion, was decisive of the question, and proved that those who passed them did not intend to commit themselves, by their acts, to the doctrine of instruction.

The resolutions did not merely omit to instruct, but they contained, on their face, expressions which constituted a direct attack on that great fundamental principle of the Republican creed. They declare that act of the Senate of the United States, expunging from its journals the condemnatory resolution against President Jackson, to have been "an act of party servility, calculated to degrade the Senate."

Mr. B. said, so far as his own vote had had any agency in carrying into effect that just sentence, vindictory of the constitution and the liberties of the people, both of which had been wantonly assailed in the unauthorized and unjust sentence against the Chief Magistrate of the nation, that he had acted under resolutions passed by the Legislature of his State, commanding it to be done. He believed a majority of the State Legislatures of the Union had also passed similar instructions to their Senators. If, therefore, the doctrine of instruction be correct, what power is there that can rightfully arraign the motives of those who have only acted in obedience to it, and carried out the will of those under whose commands they have performed the act required to be done? To impeach, therefore, the motives of those, thus acting under instructions, is a direct attack on the principle of instruction, and, in effect, a denial of the right to instruct.

But in order to have all doubt removed as to the intention of those who passed them, his honorable colleague and himself had addressed a respectful communication to the Legislature of their State, asking to be informed if the resolutions were to be taken as instructions. We had publicly declared that we would obey or resign, if instructed. We considered, that to have done either under resolutions not containing instructions, was not required by our pledge, and would have been a manifest dereliction of public duty, under all the circumstances. We desired, then, proper ground to stand on. If we resigned, we wished to do so under the great principle of instruction, and not under resolutions in which it was not recognized. The Legislature, thus candidly and respectfully appealed to, have refused, in terms not very courteous, to give any further information as to the question of instruction.

North Carolina Resolutions against the Independent Treasury.

When the issue was thus fairly presented, we had a right to expect, on every principle of candor, an emphatic expression of opinion one way or the other, in regard to the intentions of the Legislature on the question of instruction. If they had asserted their intention to instruct, I was prepared, as is known to many of my friends, instantly to have surrendered to them the public trust which I hold. They, however, again decline to assert the principle of instruction, in the resolution passed by them, and thus afford clear and unquestionable proof that they do not intend to commit themselves to the doctrine. Which of the parties had acted in good faith—those addressing the communication, and soliciting an expression of opinion on a plain question, to which an answer was easy, and which they deemed important to the public liberty, as well as to the regulation of their own conduct—or those who had declined to answer it? He would appeal to the honest and intelligent judgment of his constituents to decide.

When, therefore, he took into view the circumstances which formed a part of the history of the resolutions, the guarded caution with which the party passing them avoided committing themselves on the record to the right of instruction, and the open and avowed hostility of some of those voting for the resolutions to the doctrine of instruction, the direct attack on that great principle itself, on the face of the resolutions, and the refusal of the Legislature, on a candid appeal made to them, to assert the right—the most irresistible proof is afforded, by positive acts, that they (the Legislature) did not intend to recognize the right of instruction; and if not, on what principle of honor, or by what right, either moral or political, can it be expected that they will be considered and acted on by others as instructions?

The resolutions profess to speak the will of the people. If they were instructions, he admitted that they would be obligatory in the fullest sense of the term; but they were not, and did not profess to be, and therefore the question as respects public opinion, as well as every other in relation to them, is open to the freest inquiry. He did not, himself, believe that they expressed public opinion, as to many of the important topics under which they undertake to declare it. He believed the people of the State had heard with utter surprise, that the subject of the expunging resolutions had been introduced. It was a topic that had not been brought before them at the elections, and therefore could not have been anticipated. Again, he did not believe they expressed public opinion, as no question had ever been brought more directly and immediately before the people of North Carolina than was that, at the elections in 1834, involving the course of President Jackson in regard to the Bank of the United States, and the justice of expunging the sentence pronounced against him from the journals of the Senate.

The Legislature, at its session of 1834, in obedience to that public will, commanded their Senators, by express instructions, to vote for it. The people elected two successive Legislatures, which ratified and re-affirmed, in effect, that decision, as the resolutions remained unrevoked by them. It would, therefore, be in derogation of the well-known political consistency of the people of North Carolina, to suppose that a decision so well considered, and so deliberately made, had been reversed by them. No President had ever been more strongly sustained than was President Jackson, at three successive elections, by the people of that State, whose well-earned fame the resolutions which the Legislature had passed, aimed so strong a blow at. He could not, therefore, admit that his constituents had abandoned their long-cherished political attachments, and were prepared to aid in sacrificing the public character of the honest soldier and patriot statesman. He could not consent, therefore, to record, by his vote, a sentence so derogatory to the people, and to the Legislature of 1834, to whose favor he was indebted for his re-election. To resign, would, in his opinion, be a tacit admission, on his part, that the people had changed their opinion on this question, and his acquiescence in the charge of inconsistency against them, which it involved, which he should consider it a departure from his duty to do, unless acting under instructions that left him no other alternative.

He had declared, in his speech on the Constitutional Treasury, and on other occasions, that if instructed by his Legislature, he would obey or resign. He had used the word in that sense which conveys a meaning universally acted on and understood by the Republican party of this country, and had likewise asserted it in his speeches, to be a duty, in the absence of instructions, to pursue the dictates of his own judgment. In the absence of instructions, therefore, his decision as to the present resolutions, which did not recognize, in any part of them, that right, was entirely consistent with his often repeated declarations on that subject.

The course which his colleague and himself felt bound to take, from a high sense of public duty, on this occasion, involved not simply the question of what was due to themselves and their own principles—not simply a question of mere party ascendancy, but it involved questions of far more transcendent importance. It involved a great principle of popular liberty. If they resigned their seats, they indirectly aided in attacking the great fundamental right of instruction, which the resolutions, on their face, not only attacked, as he had already shown, but, by their unquestionable tendency, went to overthrow. They in effect, as he had shown, contained a denial of that doctrine. For us, therefore, to acquiesce in them, by obedience or resignation, would aid in subverting a principle long consecrated in the Republican creed. If they suffered themselves, by indirection, to be driven from the post which the public had assigned them, he could not permit himself to doubt that the very party that had passed the resolutions, would point to them to prove that their political friends had never admitted the doctrine of instruction. We should thus be accessory to the establishment of the doctrine that the people, through their Legislature, had no right to instruct. We should thus contribute to establish the doctrine that Senators of the Federal party, if hereafter elected from the State, would be licensed to disobey instructions, and should be irresponsible to the people, as they would no doubt quote these very resolutions to prove that instructions were no part of their political creed. It would, therefore, (repeated Mr. B.,) be, in effect, an attack on the doctrine of instruction, if we acquiesced in them either by obedience or resignation, and would be a surrender of a great question of public liberty. Thus we should be placing in the hands of a political party, already denying the right of instruction, and asserting other dangerous doctrines in regard to popular rights, an immense engine to beat down those rights. It was placing in their hands an instrument which would serve as a sword to use against their political adversaries, and would at the same time be used as a shield to shelter and protect themselves, when in power, from instructions. He, therefore, should consider the abandonment of his post, under such circumstances, as an abandonment of his duty to the people whom he represented, and as betraying a want of firmness to meet the crisis. He could not respect himself if he were to do it, and he sincerely trusted that his high-minded and intelligent constituents would appreciate his motives and the delicacy of his situation. He had been sustained by them with a firmness and fixedness of purpose, for a period of more than nine years, through many trying and difficult events in public affairs, that impressed him with an indelible sense of gratitude.

He had never sought office nor desired it for himself; nor had any of those connected with him ever, through his means, enjoyed office under this or the past Administration. He therefore appealed to his constituents to decide how far the charge of "party servility" applied to him, or to his public course. In order to remove all doubts as to the motives which actuated him, and to show that he desired his public course should be tested by the popular will of his State, at the first State elections which intervened, he had come to the determination to resign his seat in the Senate of the United States to the next Legislature of his State, when they should assemble, for the residue of his term then remaining.

Mr. B. said that he felt deeply, and to its full extent, the great responsibility of his present situation. But at a great crisis in our public affairs, when the very existence of free government was at stake, when an evident effort was making to strip the people of their political sovereignty, and, in effect, to transfer it to the banking corporations of the country, he should dare to do his duty. To falter under such circumstances, and in such a crisis, and to shrink from a just responsibility from a fear of consequences, would, while it betrayed an unbecoming timidity, be treachery to those who had committed to them their dearest rights and interests. His course, therefore, was taken, and it was for his constituents to decide on it; and to that decision he was prepared to yield with entire deference.

Mr. STRANGE said: It is with great reluctance, Mr. President, that I occupy the public time and attention of the Senate, upon matters which seem properly to rest between our constituents and my colleague and myself. Two considerations, however, prompt me to occupy a portion of both. The one is, the established practice, so far as I am able to judge, prevailing in this body, on like occasions; and the other, its being, in my judgment, the most convenient and respectful mode of throwing immediately before our constituents our purposes, with a short statement of the reasons which govern us. I find myself in one of the most responsible positions I have ever occupied, and my anxious wish has been so to act as to ensure, at least, the unwavering approbation of my own conscience. From my political adversaries, I have learned to know, by sad experience, that I have no favor to hope for, and not even justice to expect. Act as I may, my conduct will be misrepresented and my motives impeached. Even from my political friends, I have reason to apprehend division in their judgment of my course, while I know they will do justice to my motives.

The resolutions just read come from a source entitled to my highest respect and most deferential consideration. They are from the Legislature of a State to which I am deeply indebted, ways without number. Though but an adopted son of that State, she has heaped upon me kindnesses far, very far, beyond my deserts, and I have enjoyed golden opinions far beyond my merits from all sorts of people. Though not a native of the State, there has my heart found the objects of its tenderest affections, and thither does it turn instinctively, when the magic word "home" stirs within it those holy associations which no other word has power to awaken.

North Carolina Resolutions against the Independent Treasury.

[JANUARY, 1839.]

Coming, then, from such a source, how gladly would I have found myself able to follow in any direction to which they might point! how cheerfully have reposed upon such a counsellor, and thrown off the responsibility of acting upon my own fallible judgment! Had these resolutions been couched in terms of command, no alternative would have been left me but obedience or resignation. Coming as they do, merely in the language of counsel or advice, I should unhesitatingly follow that counsel could I do so consistently with my sense of duty and my own self-respect. But the two first of these resolutions counsel me to that which not all the terrors of an auto de fe could induce me to perform. Gracious Heaven! to place upon the everlasting records of my country, my own declaration, that I had violated her constitution, upon the infamous motive of party servility! No! sooner would I bite off my tongue, and spit it back in the faces of those who had counselled such infamy, however high and dignified the stations they might fill. No! conscious as I am of having been actuated in what I did, by motives of the highest, the purest, the most patriotic, I am proud to have my name associated with the act, and am content that posterity may judge of me by it alone. Mistaken I may have been, but never was corruption farther from my heart. If those were corrupt who did the deed, what were the Legislatures of the noble States who commanded it to be done? I myself, in the part I acted, but conformed to the express instructions of the Legislature of North Carolina. A Legislature elected when that question was distinctly before the people; and notwithstanding those instructions were given, a Legislature, a majority of which was favorable to those instructions, was again elected. I could not, therefore, with proper respect to the Legislature and people of North Carolina, by whose command the act was done, censure it in the manner proposed, if there was nothing else to restrain me.

Far be it from me, in thus remarking upon the resolutions, to impeach the motives or impugn the conduct of those who passed them. My own opinion is, that family quarrels should never be carried beyond the paternal domain, and, if I have any thing to complain of in the temper, language, or substance of these resolutions, on a different theatre will that complaint be made. Here, at least, it is my wish and my purpose always to speak respectfully of those whom the people of North Carolina shall see fit to elevate to high places.

The terms of the resolution having placed conformity to them entirely out of the question, it remains to be considered what is my alternative course. Were I at liberty to consult the suggestions of impassioned personal pride, I should certainly resign. It is always easier to retreat from a difficulty or danger than to encounter it, and abide the issue. When a man gets into a political difficulty, the shades of private life have many attractive charms, and upon them he is apt to cast a wishful eye. For my part, I acknowledge that I feel myself in a political difficulty, from which I would willingly retreat, if I might do so with propriety. But the question is one of duty simply, and not of choice. If it is not my duty to resign, it is my duty to remain here. One or the other is clearly obligatory upon me; and which, is the question? As I said before, had these resolutions been couched in the language of command, obedience or resignation would have been my duty. I accepted the trust I now hold, under the full knowledge that those who sent me here expected me to obey instructions when received, or resign. Such is the creed of the political party that elected me, and I should disappoint their expectations if I refused to act upon that principle; but, on the other hand, I should be guilty of treachery to them if, upon any other ground than a high sense of duty, I surrendered the post to which they have assigned me. If the Legislative elections in North Carolina were shortly to occur, my position would be clear of all difficulty. I would at once, at the close of this session, return back to the people the trust I hold, to be conferred by them according to their pleasure. But in the long interval to ensue before another election in that State, very calamitous results might, in my apprehension, attend an immediate resignation. Every man knows that a most important political struggle is now going on in the land, pregnant, as all admit, with the most interesting consequences. Each party is full of hope, and expects victory in the issue. A feather may turn the scale. The diminution of force on one side, or a slight accession on the other, may decide the controversy. And shall I cast in a feather into the scale of my adversaries? It is my duty to stand here, and do my utmost in advancement of those principles which I hold sacred. It is my duty, if for no other reason but to keep those out who would certainly be sent in my place. I know there are many men of both parties in North Carolina who are better qualified than myself to fill this station. But of the many able sons of North Carolina who differ with me in political opinion, and for whom I have the highest personal respect, I should reluctantly see any one here at the present moment. Those who sent me here, therefore, have a right to expect that I will maintain my post, unless driven from it by some paramount principle, and that I do not abandon it in a cowardly manner, upon the occurrence of the first difficulty. There is but one great and paramount principle which can be for a moment supposed to demand my resignation; and that is the doctrine of instruction. Upon that doctrine my colleague has fully and ably enlarged. Am I, then, by any creed upon that subject, placed in a situation to render my resignation a duty? Of the political party of which a majority of those who voted for these resolutions constitute a part, it is a principle that there is no right in the Legislature to instruct, and, consequently, no obligation on the part of the Senator either to obey or resign. No complaint, therefore, can be made by them of any course which we may think proper to adopt. Of the political party to which I have been attached, the creed is to be found in Mr. Leigh's celebrated report in the Virginia Legislature, and in the uniform practice of all those Legislatures who have attempted any efficient action in Federal affairs. In the document before mentioned it is said, "Senators are instructed, and Representatives requested;" and it goes on to give the reason for this difference of language, that over the one a right to command is claimed, and towards the other the mere tender of advice. In the one case, they may assume to declare the popular will in the language proper to the expression of will—command; and when so expressed, it must stand for that will, whether really so or not. In the other, their command does not stand for the popular will, and the responsibility still rests upon the Representative to find out what it is. This difference of language has been uniformly used, so far as I am able to learn, in all resolutions adopted by Legislatures of the different States, whenever they have attempted any direct action in Federal affairs. They have assumed that the Legislature is recognized as embodying the popular will of the State, so far as Senators are concerned, whenever they think proper to use language appropriate to the utterance of will. But whenever they adopt only such language as they may with propriety use to a Representative, in addressing their Senators, it is not intended to be more operative upon the one than the other. In the one case, they themselves assume the responsibility, and stand between the Senator and the people of the State. In the other they do not undertake to utter the public will; but while they suggest, leave the public servant to judge of that will upon his own responsibility. Such has been the obvious understanding of all the preceding Legislatures of North Carolina, who have undertaken to address their agents in this body. From their earliest action, down to 1834, when the resolutions were passed commanding the act now denounced as unconstitutional, and dictated by party servility, they used this peculiar phraseology. Language consists merely of the signs, which, by common consent, have been received as representing particular ideas. Technical language frequently differs from common language. By common consent, the word instructions has received a technical signification, when used in an address by the Legislature of a State to its Senators in Congress. These facts were all known to the Legislature of North Carolina, which passed the resolutions under consideration. Was, then, the omission of the word uniformly used by the Legislatures heretofore, when they designed direct action upon their Senators, an accidental or whimsical omission merely; and was it intended or believed that those used would be coefficient? I have not the slightest idea that it was. In the first place the known belief of many who voted for these resolutions, that the Legislature has no right to instruct Senators, and consequently that there is no obligation on Senators to obey, forbids the idea. They could not have intended what they believed they had no right to do. Such a suspicion would, I am persuaded, do them great injustice. The just conclusion is, that they meant to do just what they have done—the expression of their belief that public opinion is what they set forth in those resolutions to be their own opinions, believing, most justly, that while they had no right to command, their opinions would be most respectfully considered by their Senators. The omission of the word instruction was designed. And why? Because it was well known that a peculiar force and signification was attached to it, and an operation given to it which they did not approve, and therefore did not wish to sanction by its use. That the omission was designed, is further proven by the fact, which is a matter of history, that in both Houses a proposed amendment by its insertion was rejected. But to place the matter beyond all doubt, my colleague and myself addressed a joint letter to the Legislature—not inquiring what effect they intended their resolutions to have—not implying a doubt which we did not entertain—but openly declaring what we firmly believed, that we should not hold them as instructions; at the same time declaring our purpose to obey or resign, should we be instructed. This letter was written in the most perfect sincerity and good faith. I care not who may think proper to question it. I can appeal to God and my own conscience for my truth. But it is also known to friends here, to whom I declared my determination to resign if my construction of the resolutions was pronounced erroneous. It was not so pronounced. We received no answer to our communication. The vindication of my sincerity in addressing that letter, therefore, presents a strong consideration against resignation. If I resign now, it may be justly said that when I wrote my letter to the Legislature I considered these resolutions as instructions, in the face of my declaration to the contrary, and am now borne down by the weight of my conviction. I still think, as I thought then, that they are not instructions, either in fact or according to the intention of most of those who voted for them; and so believing, the alternative of obedience or resignation is not presented to me. Is there, then, any obligation upon me to resign? Does any human being perceive any? Who can point it out? Perfect obedience is out of the question. It follows, then, in my judgment, that for the present it is my duty to remain here, and, while I do not treat the resolutions as instructions, I will show them all due respect, and give to them such influence over my conduct as my judgment may approve. I have said that had the Legislature met during

North Carolina Resolutions against the Independent Treasury.

[JANUARY, 1839.]

the ensuing year, I would resign at the close of this session; but it is still my purpose to afford the sovereign people of North Carolina the earliest opportunity of deciding the important question, by what class of politicians they choose to be represented in this body. The Legislature, at its first biennial session, shall have an opportunity of selecting for the seat I fill a Democrat or a Federalist; one who thinks it right to wipe off the foul and unjust stigma cast upon the fame of Andrew Jackson, or one who is for perpetuating it through all generations. This they will have an opportunity of doing, under a fair expression of popular sentiment, and to the people of North Carolina will I cheerfully submit the issue.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, contended that these resolutions were neither indecorous nor disrespectful. [Mr. STRANGE said he made no allusion to disrespectful language.] Mr. C. said he understood at least one of the Senators to say that one of the resolutions was disrespectful to the Senate. [Mr. BROWN said he spoke of one of the resolutions; but, emanating, as they did, from the Legislature of his State, in no possible contingency could he have refused to present them.] Mr. C. said, if there was indecorum, it was his duty, under the rules of the Senate, not to present the resolutions. [Mr. BROWN said there was a very marked difference between the Legislature of a sovereign State and individuals, on this subject.] Mr. C. said he was not aware there was any such distinction in the rules, and if the Legislature of a State uses disrespectful language, it is no more to be received than if it were from a private citizen. But the Senators gave as a reason for not complying with the resolutions of the Legislature, that they did not contain the word "instruct." He thought it was infinitely more respectful to those receiving the instructions, not to use the word instruct. Sir, suppose I say to my man Charles, please bring me my boots or shoes, and he does it with alacrity; but, if I should say, Charles, I instruct you to bring me my boots, he would think it strange language, and, very probably, would ask me for an explanation. Mr. C. said, while the Senators expressed their disinclination so strongly to obeying these instructions, they seemed altogether to overlook that there was an alternative presented to them—that of resignation.

Mr. STRANGE replied, that he certainly felt much indebted to the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) for the advice he had seen proper to volunteer on the present occasion. But it had been very long since it had been his wont to look for political information from that quarter. On the contrary, he viewed the Senator from Kentucky, with all his talents, rather as a beacon than a guide, and when a course was indicated by him, generally considered it a reason for shunning, rather than pursuing it. It was not, therefore, to be considered at all remarkable, if his suggestions, on the present occasion, should have but little weight. The Senator is pleased to say that he considers my complaint, that I have neither favor nor justice to expect from my political opponents, a little gratuitous. No man knows better where the shoe pinches than he who wears it. The Senator knows nothing of the ground upon which this complaint is made, and has, therefore, no right to say whether it is gratuitous or not. He, Mr. S., had said, that sad experience had warned him not to expect either favor or justice from his political opponents—and he said so truly. And now that the Senator had somewhat forced it upon him, he would remark, that no man had shown more comity or deference to his political opponents than himself; and yet not only the scurrilous partisan newspapers of the country, but even by those with whom he had exchanged the courtesies of life, and from whom he had parted with the grasp of friendship, had his motives been assailed and his conduct impeached. With such facts before him, he might well say that he could expect neither favor nor justice from his political opponents. The Senator from Kentucky, he said, with an unfairness and coarseness which he had not thought altogether becoming, had observed, that in remarking upon the impracticability of obedience, he (Mr. S.) and his colleague seemed to have overlooked another alternative, and that was resignation. Now, unless the Senator's senses were less acute than usual, he must have heard both him and his colleague very distinctly advert to that alternative, and himself to declare that were he at liberty to act in obedience to his own feelings, he would resign; but that, under present circumstances, a high sense of duty to those who sent him here compelled him to remain. The Senator from Kentucky then takes up the doctrine of instruction, and, according to his wont in the absence of argument and reason, attempts to drive us from our position by raillery and jest, and for that purpose parades before us that ever favorite and fertile theme, his man Charles, and entertains the Senate with a dialogue between himself and that distinguished personage. But his illustration has no application to the subject. There is no parity between the relationship subsisting between the sovereignty of a State and its representative upon this floor, and that between the Senator and his slave. He was (said Mr. S.) the servant of the people of North Carolina, but not their slave, or the slave of any other man. He served the people of North Carolina, as far as he was able to discern, in compliance with the public will; and when he could not conscientiously conform to that will, he would resign. Poor Charles had no such alternative. If the Senator's title to him is good, he is his slave, and he must yield obedience in whatever way he may think proper to address him: he cannot resign. Whether the Senator from Kentucky is able to perceive any difference in the signification of certain terms, is a matter with which he (Mr. S.) had nothing to do. When the Legislature of Kentucky spoke, it would be for the Senator from Kentucky to interpret its language; and he (Mr. S.) would be very far from indelicately obtruding his advice. But when the Legislature of North Carolina spoke to his colleague and himself, it belonged to them to interpret; and he recognized the right of no one to interfere in the matter.

As he understood the opinions of the people of North Carolina, they recognized a difference between instructions and other language used by the Legislature. When he was elected to his present position, he came into it with a determination to act conformably, as far as possible, to the popular will, the principle which the Senator from Kentucky had admitted to be correct; and the only question was, what was the popular will? He believed a part of the popular will in North Carolina was, that when the Legislature instructed a Senator to vote for or against a particular measure, such instruction should stand with him for the popular will, whatever, in truth, the popular will might be; but that, when not instructed, it was his duty to exercise his best judgment, and ascertain, from the several sources within his reach, what was, upon the whole, the popular will. He believed, therefore, that he would act in conformity to the public will in North Carolina, whenever instructed by the Legislature either to obey or resign; but to treat every thing else coming from the Legislature as merely advisory, and conform to it or not, as, in his judgment, it either did or did not concur with the popular will. The Senator from Kentucky intimates that our course of reasoning leads to the conclusion that even if the word instruct had been used, we should have been at liberty to look behind this legislative declaration, and ascertain what was, in fact, the popular will. In his (Mr. S.'s) judgment, the reasoning led to no such result, but precisely the contrary. They had expressly stated that they believed it to be the popular will in North Carolina, that whenever the Legislature instructed, such instructions are to be taken as the popular will, and acted upon as such; but in the absence of such instructions, the Senator must, at his own peril, ascertain that will.

The Senator from Kentucky, in conclusion, rather ungenerously, as he thought, chided him and his colleague for not bringing forward these resolutions last week when the land bill was under discussion. If the Senator from Kentucky would tax his recollection, he would find, that at this session of Congress, upon every test question upon the graduation bill, both his colleague and himself had voted against it. As he had said before, he should always vote in conformity to the wishes of his State, so far as he could understand them, when they did not conflict, in his judgment, with any great principle which he had no right to disregard. Last year he voted for the graduation bill, under (as he now thought) a mistaken impression, that public sentiment in North Carolina, if not in favor of it, was at least quiescent. But he hoped never to see a year when he could not look back and say, "I am wiser this year than I was last." He was now inclined to think that the majority of the people of North Carolina was opposed to the bill, and should therefore unhesitatingly vote against it.

Mr. BROWN, in rising to reply to the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) who, with his accustomed delicacy, had, in a very extraordinary manner, presented himself before that body, to arraign the course of his colleague and himself, said: That, in the outset of his remarks, he should protest against, and peremptorily challenge, the right of the Senator to interfere in a question purely between themselves and their constituents. What right had that Senator to assume upon himself the authority thus attempted to be exercised by him? From whom did he derive his authority? Where were his credentials? Who had constituted him their attorney, in fact, thus to arraign the course of members on this floor?

Having felt it to be his duty thus emphatically to except to the assumed power of the Senator, and considering that he had been fairly ousted of the jurisdiction that he had sought to assert, he would now go a step further, and say that he should peremptorily decline, from high considerations of what was due to himself and his own rights, to notice any of the topics introduced by him, or to join issue with him on any one of the questions which he seeks to raise, in reference to the manner of discharging our duties as members of this body. If, however, he had considered it incumbent on himself to refuse to join issue with the Senator on any of the topics raised by him, yet there were some other things which it was his purpose to say to him before he concluded his remarks.

In the first place, his constituents would no doubt feel exceedingly obliged to that gentleman, whose political course had long been distinguished for its peculiar devotion to Southern interests, for having volunteered, on the present occasion, to appear as the champion of their rights. The friends of the great right of instruction will, no doubt, in every part of the country, learn with no little surprise that the Senator has become its advocate and eulogist! What, said Mr. B., the Senator from Kentucky now assuming to pronounce, with oracular certainty and authority, the true doctrines of the right of instruction! How long, he would ask, had it been since that gentleman had entitled himself to become its teacher and expounder? Was it from the eminent services rendered by him to its principles, when instructions were coming from a majority of the States of this Union to their Senators on this floor, directing them to sustain the late Administration in the mighty conflict then waging against it by the Bank of the United States, and the political party acting in concert with it? Who does not remember that gentleman's course on that most important occasion? A majority of the States of this Union, believing that a great crisis in our public affairs had arrived, sent resolutions here to their Senators, instructing them directly and peremptorily—not resolutions so framed as to be in effect fraudulent in regard to that great right, but resolutions commanding their Senators, in terms plain and unequivocal, to carry out their wishes. Did the Senator then stand forth as their defender and vindicator? Did he exhort the large number of his political friends, then boldly violating and defying positive instructions, to respect that great doctrine? No, said Mr. B., his course was far otherwise. We then heard daily anathemas from his political friends against instructions; the popular voice was scouted, although it had been expressed in some instances twice or thrice to some of the gentleman's friends, in the shape of positive commands, and, standing foremost among those who animated them to resist the will of their constituents, and exhorted them to unyielding firmness in that course, was the Senator from Kentucky himself; and yet he now undertakes to become a lecturer to others on the great principle of instruction!

Who did not remember the reception given in this body, during the famous panic session, to the instructions sent by the patriotic State of New Hampshire, to her Senators, the first movement of the kind, directing them to vote for expunging the condemnatory sentence against President Jackson, and to sustain his administration against the war then waged by the Opposition party, and the Bank of the United States? The able Republican Senator, who presented them, was assailed in debate on this floor, his State insulted, and even the common courtesy of printing the resolutions of instruction was refused by the political friends of the Senator, who then held the power in this body. With what propriety, then, he demanded, could a political party, who had trampled on the right of instruction, scorned and contemned the public will, by the most high-handed outrages, whenever and wherever they had possessed power, with what propriety could they reproach others, in regard to their course, when no instructions had been given them?

His constituents would, no doubt, be exceedingly obliged for the advice of a gentleman in their affairs, who had been conspicuously associated as one of the leading members of what was familiarly known, in this country, by the name of the "Coalition Administration." Judging from their past sentiments in regard to it, he did not believe that they possessed, at this time, any very strong desire to witness its restoration to power in any shape. If one member of that bygone administration had a right to interfere in their affairs, by offering advice, the great political high priest himself, who headed it, may, with the same propriety, claim to offer his. And where now is the head of that famous administration, and what are his daily occupations? Fallen from what was due to the dignity of his former station, he is almost daily engaged in the disgusting and wretched pursuit of Abolition agitation!

Where, Mr. B. would ask, were the political friends of the Senator from Kentucky, who resided north of the Potomac, with some honorable exceptions, to be found on that question? The great mass of them were found, in the two Houses of Congress, and in the Legislative halls of their respective States, pursuing a course in direct hostility to the South. There was not a State Legislature north of the Potomac, in which the political friends of that Senator had obtained power, unless in those where slavery existed, that resolutions attacking the rights and interests of the South on the vitally important question of slavery had not passed! And be it said to the immortal honor of the Democratic party of the North, who have been so scandalously calumniated by most of the Federal presses of the South, on that question, that while their Senators and Representatives, in almost an entire body, have sustained our just rights in the two branches of Congress, there is not a single State north of the Potomac, in which the Democratic party have had the power in its Legislature, that they have not, in the noble spirit of justice and union, passed resolutions strongly sustaining the rights of their sister confederate States of the South!

The Senator from Kentucky had, to illustrate his views of the right of instruction, referred to his own servant, and his obligations to obey his commands, when given by him. In alluding to his remarks on this subject, it was no part of his purpose (said Mr. B.) to join issue with him, and to debate that point, as he intended carefully to preserve the ground taken at the outset of his remarks, not to admit, directly or indirectly, his jurisdiction on this subject, by joining issue with him on any question which he had thought proper to raise; but he would answer him somewhat after the Yankee manner, by asking another question. Let us suppose (said Mr. B.) that a servant who desired occupation, had applied three several times to a farmer or planter for employment, and that that farmer or planter had three times, either from a supposed want of honesty or skill in the applicant, in pretty plain and positive language, rejected his importunities to enter his service: what would be the opinion of the world as to the modesty which, under such circumstances, could venture a fourth importunity? He thought this very like the case of a distinguished individual, who had presented himself three times to the American people to be employed in a certain high station, and who had been three times signally rejected; and, if public rumor was now to be credited, was again prepared for a fourth rebuff by the popular voice.

Again, Mr. B. said, his constituents would, no doubt, feel and appreciate a defence, coming from a gentleman whose almost entire public course, for a series of years, had been directly at war with their rights and interests; a Senator whose mis-called American system, until thrown off by determined resistance, had, for a series of years, impoverished and desolated the South, oppressed her citizens, and almost ruined her commerce; a Senator, whose favorite system of policy he declared most solemnly, in his opinion, had aimed a more fatal blow at the constitution, and Union of the States, than any other and all other measures combined. A system which had, at one time, shaken the pillars of our glorious confederacy to their very foundations; and which had created, and, he feared, had established those dangerous sectional prejudices and feelings which were destined to endure too long for the harmony and safety of our country.

Mr. B. had now finished saying what he felt due to himself and to the occasion, and due to the interference which his remarks were intended to repel.

THURSDAY, January 10.

Graduation Bill.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands. The question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, to limit the reduction to lands only that have been in the market fifteen years, and to the quantities of 80, 160, and 320 acres, according to the rate of reduction, and further to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands after 1840 among the several States of the Union.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate in favor of his amendment, after which

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate in opposition to the amendments, and in favor of the bill as at present amended; after which

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's amendments, and they were rejected—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, and Tipton—13.

Mr. BENTON then submitted the fifty cent clause of Mr. CLAY's amendment—to permit actual settlers to enter lands that have been in the market fifteen years, at fifty cents per acre, the quantity being limited to eighty acres for each actual settler.

This amendment was agreed to—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Foster, Ful-

The bill was then ordered to be printed as at present amended, and

The Senate adjourned.

Proceeds of the Public Lands.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

3D Sess.]

Financial Statement—Expenses of the Government.

[JANUARY, 1839.]

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate whether any, and if any, how much, would have been the deficit in the Treasury, if an act entitled "An act to appropriate for a limited time the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain States," which passed both Houses of Congress, had received the approbation of the President, and been acted upon up to the 1st day of January, 1839.

Mr. BENTON observed that his reason for offering this resolution was apparent. A resolution had passed the Senate, calling upon the Secretary for information as to the amount that would have been distributed to each of the States of this Union under the distribution land bill, which was vetoed by President Jackson, had that bill become a law. An answer to that resolution had been received, by which it appeared that the sum that would have been distributed was fifty-seven and a half millions of dollars. Now he wished also to ascertain what now would be the deficit in the Treasury had that distribution taken place.

Mr. NORVELL rose to avail himself of the opportunity presented by the motion of the Senator from Missouri, to correct a mistake into which the Commissioner of the General Land Office had fallen, in the table which he had furnished of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, which were proposed to be distributed among the several States by the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) which received the veto of President Jackson in 1833. The Commissioner had stated that certain sums under the twelve and a half per cent. proposed for the new States in that bill, and certain specified sums under the general distribution proposed by it, would have fallen to the lot of Michigan and Arkansas. If he remembered rightly, not a cent would have been received under that bill by either Michigan or Arkansas. They were at that period Territories of the United States. No participation was allowed to them in that bill. It depended upon the subsequent pleasure of Congress, upon the passage of another law, whether Michigan or Arkansas, would each have received any portion of the moneys which were to be distributed, if that bill had become a law. He had felt it to be his duty to make this statement for the information of his constituents at home.

The resolution was then laid on the table till to-morrow.

Salt Duty.

Mr. BENTON, in pursuance of notice given, asked leave to introduce a bill to abolish the duty on salt, and to repeal the fishing bounties and allowances dependent upon the same.

Mr. B. addressed the Senate at length in explanation and support of the bill; after which, at the request of Mr. DAVIS, it was laid on the table till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24.

Financial Statement—Expenses of the Government, Comparative and Actual—Increase of Expenditure—Causes of it—Difference between Expenses for the Support of the Government and Extraordinaries.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, by leave, stated that the Committee of Ways and Means wished to make a report, containing at large the views of that committee in regard to the state of the finances generally; and said that the committee had come to the conclusion that, should Congress authorize the usual amount of new appropriations, and the three millions proposed for fortifications, harbors, &c., it would be necessary to provide five or six millions for the Treasury, in addition to all resources and receipts existing or contemplated.

[The report having been made, it was read as follows, and afterwards ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.]

Our Federal expenditures have been rapidly, though irregularly, increasing, from 1789 to the present time. The fluctuations appear to have been simultaneous with an increasing or decreasing revenue—an overflowing Treasury uniformly producing a sudden augmentation of our appropriations. Independent, however, of such occasional extravagance, it was natural to anticipate, especially in the first half century of its existence, a steady increase in the civil, military, and naval expenditures of a Government which had no such establishments at its origin; and particularly in a country which has, in so short a period, doubled the number of States in the Confederacy, enlarged its boundary of settlement to near five times its extent in 1790, increased its population from less than four to near seventeen millions, and extended its post routes from 1,875 to near 135,000 miles.

Before noticing the permanent expenditures of the Government, it is proper to advert to those of an occasional or temporary character, which have very largely and unavoidably increased the amount of our annual appropriations for a few years past; these are in the Indian branch of the public service. The expenditures for Indian lands and wars have amounted, within a few years past, to about fifty millions of dollars. The purchase of their lands, and the removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi, were unavoidably connected with the settlement of the country, however it might affect the various tribes. It is satisfactory to know that their condition has been ameliorated by removal. The addition of thirteen new States to the Union, embracing within their boundaries most of these tribes, made it necessary, especially in latter years, to purchase their lands, in order to advance civilization; to remove obvious obstructions to the settlement and cultivation of the country; to prevent collision, and to preserve the lives and property of the inhabitants of our States and Territories from Indian depredations. These purchases have also been founded, almost exclusively, upon compacts formed with some States more than thirty years ago; on our implied obligation to other States; and on resolutions and appropriations by both Houses of Congress, extending through every administration of the Government. They were, moreover, justifiable on mere financial grounds. By referring to the documents annexed, it will be seen that we have acquired by Indian treaties, since the 4th of March, 1829, about one hundred and ten millions of acres. There now remains, of unbought Indian lands, less than thirty-five millions of acres. No extraordinary expenditure can, therefore, be hereafter anticipated for this object, nor is it probable that there will be such extravagant demands upon the Treasury for Indian wars, owing to the removal of almost all the tribes, and to a change in the plan of operations in Florida, but principally to the recent increase of the army. One-half of the amount expended in these wars has undoubtedly arisen from the extraordinary expenses arising from suddenly calling into the field numerous bodies of militia and volunteers, which we were obliged to do in consequence of the inadequate force of the regular army. The increase of that force will enable Government, in some degree, to dispense with these calls in future; and many millions in our annual expenditures will be saved by preventing Indian depredations, and promptly suppressing them when they may occur.

Owing to appropriations of the character referred to, and to others which will be noticed, there is a very considerable apparent increase of the Federal expenditures in the last ten years. The appropriations for 1838, including those under permanent acts, amounted to about thirty-eight millions of dollars. In comparing these with the expenditures in 1829, the following items will be found in the former which were not in the latter, viz :

For preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities,	$1,000,000
The same, and for the Cherokee treaty,	6,740,000
Removal of Indians, annuities, &c.,	$3,060,000

For the protection of the Northern frontier,	625,000
For a nominal item in the navy appropriation bill, being a mere transfer of an unexpended appropriation for the gradual improvement of the navy to the years 1839 and 1840,	1,500,000
	17,065,000

There has been an increase in almost every branch of expenditure, but principally in the following:

The appropriations for pensions in 1838, were	$2,058,500

In Executive, Territorial, judicial and miscellaneous expenditures,	880,000
	$22,320,406

Our naval and military expenses have been greater since 1829; the former owing, in part, to the uncertainty, at one time, of our relations with France, and the latter to Indian wars. But our expenditures have been, since then, increased in every branch by an augmentation of the amount of commercial credit, which adds to the cost of all our supplies.

In examining into our expenditures, there will be found, in many of them, much abuse requiring reform. Two branches do not come annually under the consideration of Congress—the expenditures for the Post Office service, and the expenses of collecting our revenue. The former, not being a charge upon the public Treasury, (except for the expenses of the General Post Office,) are regulated by the income from postages, which are annually increasing the number of our routes and the frequency of the transportation of the mails. Of the immense increase in this branch of the public service, some idea may be formed from the increase in the transportation of the mails. It was not, probably, more than 100,000 miles in 1790; 845,468 in 1793; as late as 1803 it was but 3,504,800; it is now 34,580,202 miles. Though not a charge upon the public Treasury, we are bound, as the trustee of the fund, to see that it is administered with economy, in order that our mail routes may be extended to the remotest quarters of the Union. It has been, accordingly, the subject of investigation; the Department has been reorganized, and is believed now to be well administered. There is charged upon this fund, for the service of the present year, $5,100,000. If it is designed that this important establishment should support itself, there seems to be no reason for discriminating between the expenditures for the offices throughout the Union and of the General Post Office, by charging the former upon the fund of the Department, and the latter upon the Treasury.

The expense of collecting our revenue from customs amounted, in the first ten years after 1789, to about $293,000 annually; for the last ten, ending 31st December, 1837, to $1,232,000; it is now about a million and a half. By referring to the table of tonnage, it will be seen that the amount of tonnage entered from abroad has increased from

Financial Statement—Expenses of the Government.

[JANUARY, 1839.]

605,000 tons in 1790 to 2,065,000 tons in 1837. The expenses of collecting the revenue was in 1829 $1,013,000, and in 1837 $1,492,000. The tonnage entered from abroad was 1,003,000 in 1829, and 2,065,000 tons in 1837. The annual amount of revenue is no criterion of the expense of collection, because, although we have relinquished the duty on more than half of our importations, the great increase in this branch of trade creates a necessity for an increased number of inspectors. We have also, of late years, introduced many very complicated provisions in our tariff laws, and added to the expense of collection. But a part of this increase is owing to the neglect of Congress in not limiting, from time to time, the number of officers to be employed, and in permitting the collectors to pay the whole expense of our custom-houses out of the revenue received, without even transferring it to the public Treasury. Had Congress periodically limited the number of our officers, directed the collectors to pay all the money received by them into the Treasury, required annual estimates, and made specific appropriations for this, as in other branches of the public service, it would have operated as a sensible check on the extravagance of some of our collectors.

Although the subject of tonnage is only indirectly connected with the question of expenditures, the committee cannot dismiss it without calling the attention of the House to the fact disclosed in the table annexed, that while the American tonnage entered from abroad increased from 872,949 in 1829, to 1,299,720 tons in 1837, the foreign tonnage rose from 130,743 to 765,703 tons in the same period—a result owing, among other causes, to our unwise taxes on navigation, and to an abuse of credit at home, which enables foreign nations to build, supply, and man their ships cheaper than we can, and slowly to undermine the basis of our naval power.

The Legislative expenses of the Federal Government for the first ten years were annually, on an average, about $171,000; the appropriations for the year 1838 were $982,000. A part of this has arisen from the increase in the number of members of Congress; but the most extravagant increase has occurred in the contingent expenses of both Houses. In the first ten years these did not amount to more than $10,000 annually; while the appropriations for the past year were $373,960. Although under the immediate observation and exclusive control of Congress, there is no branch of the public service where there has been more abuse and extravagance. Thousands of documents, in many instances of no importance, are annually printed; and the contingent funds of the two Houses have been, for some years past, charged with the expense of furnishing members with books. There has been, and remains to be paid, on two contracts alone of this character, $781,023 37, not only to supply those who are actually in Congress, but others who have not been members for many years past. Should such expenditures be continued, this will very soon become an important item; and in any event, a large amount will still be required to fulfil contracts for books in no manner belonging to the legitimate contingencies of either House of Congress.

• The expenditures of the Executive Departments were, in the ten years after specific appropriations were made, about $195,000 annually; the appropriation for 1838 was $795,000. This item has steadily increased with the growth of our country and its various establishments, requiring Executive agency and superintendence. Something would probably be saved if there were one contingent fund under the control of the Secretary, for all the offices of each Department. Our complicated system of accounts, too, was established many years ago; and a more judicious organization of the Departments might introduce greater simplicity and economy. It is impossible, however, to avoid a uniform increase in this branch of the public expenditure, while we continue to multiply our laws at every session, which must be carried into effect by the Executive Departments; and while we rapidly increase, as we have done of late, the number of resolutions in both Houses, calling for information, and frequently involving great labor and expense.

Connected also with the Executive Departments are various expenditures, which were very inconsiderable, or did not exist at all, at the commencement of the Government—such as those for the Mint, Territorial Governments, the coast survey, arming and equipping militia, the public lands, and public buildings. These, which in early legislation were quite unimportant, now amount to near a million annually.

The expense of the Judiciary in the first ten years after specific appropriations were made, did not amount to more than about $61,000 annually; the appropriation for 1838 was $184,000. The increased expense for the salaries of judges has not been beyond what might have been anticipated. The expense, however, of the courts of the United States has increased from about $30,000 to $342,000, which is the estimate for the present year. In this branch of the public service, reform seems to be required. While the clerks of our courts are appointed by the judges, and the fees of the former amount to a much larger sum annually than the salaries of the latter, the appointing power may be tempted to participate in the profits of the clerkship, and to sanction the most exorbitant charges. The fees of our district clerks and attorneys ought to be more precisely regulated by law, and the clerks ought not to be appointed by the judges.

The expenses of our intercourse with foreign powers amounted in early years to about $50,000 annually; the estimate for the present year is $266,484. This expenditure was considerably augmented by the revolutions in what was formerly denominated Spanish America. The estimate for the present year is not, however, so great as the expenditure for 1829, which was $289,140 07.

The current expenses of the Indian Department were unimportant and irregular in early years, but all the expenditures in this branch for the first ten years amounted to less than $32,000 annually; the estimates for 1839 amount to $866,960, including some appropriations not for current expenses. This increase is owing almost exclusively to annuities and stipulations under treaties with the Indians entered into since 1789.

Having no military establishment worthy of notice at the origin of the Government, the expenditures in this branch of the public service have of course increased. When it is considered that the settled area of the United States has increased, according to the calculations of a scientific engineer, in the ratio of 210,575 in 1790, to 1,013,664 in 1839, some idea may be formed of the vast extent of our present boundaries; and we may well doubt, notwithstanding the recent increase of the army, whether it will ultimately be found adequate to protect all our extensive frontiers.

Although we have been more liberal in our naval appropriations, that establishment still bears an unimportant rank in comparison with that of every other maritime nation. The improvement in steam navigation, however, seems to promise a revolution in the mode of conducting maritime war, which may render this difference of less importance as it regards existing navies, and may require new and considerable expenditures in this branch of the public service, which will be noticed hereafter.

The appropriations for roads in 1838 were $540,000. There was no such Federal expenditures in early years.

In the expenses for light-houses there has been a considerable increase, especially within the last two years. The annual amount expended in the first ten years, including the maintenance of the establishment, was less than $35,000. For many years past it was less than $300,000 annually; but in 1837 it was suddenly increased to $1,220,019, and included $921,964 for new light-houses, &c. In 1838 the appropriations amounted to $663,873. The estimate merely for maintaining the existing light-houses in the year 1839, amounts to $394,000. The appropriations for new works of this kind were authorized without proper examinations, and much money has been wasted in this branch of the service. Two years ago Congress directed such examinations to be made before any new work should be commenced. The officers reported in favor of suspending the appropriations for thirty-one of the number of works authorized by the act of 1837. There is a large amount now remaining unexpended in this branch of the service.

The expenditures for fortifications were irregular in the first years; but from 1789 to 1798 the annual average was $108,000. The appropriations for 1838 amounted to $1,015,000; and the estimates for 1839, $1,269,100. This part of the national defence is still in a very incomplete state. The improvement in steam batteries within a few years past renders it, however, a question worthy of inquiry, whether it will not also produce an entire revolution in the plan of harbor defence; and whether it would not be most judicious for the present to confine our expenditures to the armament of the fortifications we have finished, and await the result of future experiments which will become necessary to ascertain whether floating steam batteries are not superior to stationary fortifications in guarding the entrance into and in defending harbors. There are other reasons for suspending new appropriations for 1839. Those existing were not made until the 7th July last, and the act directed that one-half of the amount should be expended in the present year; and there remained undrawn from the Treasury, on the 1st January, $704,369 56, besides the balances in the hands of our disbursing officers. Under such circumstances, with a deficient revenue, and while there is a probability that a change will be made in the plan of harbor defence, and that the public money may hereafter be more advantageously expended, the committee are of opinion that it is not expedient to add $1,269,100 to the large amount unexpended and in the hands of disbursing officers.

For the first six-and-twenty years the average amount annually paid for pensions was less than $84,000. As late as 1814 it was about $90,000, and in 1815 less than $70,000. The late war added about $200,000 for invalids, and the widows or children of those who had died of wounds received in battle. The whole pension roll of the United States arising from the Revolutionary, Indian, and British wars, did not then exceed $300,000 annually. The appropriations for pensions in the present year amount to $2,500,000; to which are to be added the permanent appropriation of $1,000,000, and unexpended appropriations amounting to $741,000, making an aggregate for pensions in 1839 of $4,241,000; and we have now charged upon the public Treasury 42,500 pensioners. A bill was passed at the last session, without debate, and approved on the last day of the session, which draws from the Treasury in the present year $1,872,000; and there are three general pension bills now pending in the House, which would, if adopted, probably double the annual amount appropriated for pensions.

This result, and in so short a period, could not have been anticipated by the framers of our constitution. The claims of our revolutionary soldiers rested on peculiar grounds. Their services and sufferings were of an extraordinary character, and we had from necessity been compelled to violate our contracts with them. In their case we were warranted in departing from ordinary usage when our means were ample to indemnify them. Pensions to invalids and to the widows or children of those who are killed or who die of wounds received in battle, form a part of the contract, where such laws exist, between the Government and the soldier. But in granting pensions, as we have done, in cases where the soldier was neither killed nor wounded in battle, we violated the pension principle, and charged the public Treasury with half pay to the representatives of all who enlist in the service of Government, whether in peace or in war, in addition to the compensation stipulated for their services. Prior to 1836 there was no departure from the ordinary pension rules, except as to Revolutionary soldiers; but in that year provision was made generally for pensions in ordinary cases of death, while in the service, after the 20th of April, 1818, whether of wounds or not. *The same rule was extended to the navy pension fund, which will be very soon destroyed by such improvident legislation. Prior to 1837, this fund was amply sufficient to provide for our naval invalids, and for the widows or children of those who had been killed in battle. It was invested in stocks, and amounted, on the 1st March, 1837, to $1,115,239 53; it is now reduced, under the operation of recent laws, to $293,363 09. Should we have no reform in this branch of legislation, it will be difficult to anticipate the amount which may be annually required for this expenditure. If we continue to grant pensions in cases of ordinary death, in peace or in war, the representatives of those who are employed in the military service, and to all in the naval service, we shall soon follow the example of some monarchies, and extend our pension roll, and with equal justice, to the representatives of all who die in the civil employments of Government.

* The act of 1836 did not include all who died in the military service, after the 20th April, 1818, but embraced militia, rangers, sen-fencibles, and volunteers, and one or more special acts were passed establishing the same principle as to the regular army.

Petition from the Settlers in Oregon Territory.

[JANUARY, 1839]

The committee feel it to be their duty to bring to the special notice of the House the heavy and rapidly increasing expenditures upon harbors and rivers. This item was unknown in the early legislation of the Federal Government. The first appropriation was made in 1802; but prior to 1816 only $36,449 had been expended upon two works, connected directly and indirectly, with navy yards and light-houses. In 1816 and 1819 two other appropriations were made, amounting to $34,000, both connected with light-houses. A few appropriations were made in 1820, 1821, 1822, and 1823, in the neighborhoods of light-houses and navy yards, amounting altogether to $51,750; and in 1823 two harbor surveys were authorized, at an expense of $350.

After we had adopted the policy of raising more revenue than was required for Federal purposes, and as the period approached for the redemption of the public debt, this was one of the new branches of expenditure resorted to in order to absorb a contemplated surplus. Accordingly, and for the first time in the history of our legislation, an act was passed on the 20th of May, 1826, "for improving certain harbors, and the navigation of certain rivers and creeks; and for authorizing surveys to be made of certain bays, sounds, and rivers, therein mentioned." On the 2d of March, 1827, this was followed by a regular annual bill, "to authorize the improving of certain harbors, the building of piers, and for other purposes." These expenditures immediately increased, in 1827, to $82,500; in 1828, to $121,000; and in 1829, to $505,000. In 1838, the appropriations were more than a million and a half, and the estimates for 1839 amount to $1,713,000.

The aggregate amount already appropriated for these works is $8,919,043 66, besides canal stocks, and the debt assumed for the corporations of this District for investments in the same, amounting to $3,383,490; making an aggregate of $12,302,533 66. The estimates for completing some of these works amount to $4,650,842 21; but, judging by our experience as to former estimates, it will more probably require ten millions, besides the cost of some of the most expensive works, for which there are no estimates at all. In addition to this, a bill is now pending, and would have passed the House at the close of the last session but for want of time, which, with the amendments, embraced appropriations for new works amounting to near a million of dollars, and involving an ultimate expenditure of probably five millions more.

In 1836 this subject was investigated by the Committee of Ways and Means, and a report submitted by one of its members, (Mr. Smith, of Maine,) on the 10th of February. That report states that there was, even at that time, "a real necessity for hesitation, if not of actual reform, in the further prosecution of public works upon the same system which had, of late years, obtained under the Government;" that they were made subservient "to the purposes of the individual wealth and profit of the agents and contractors immediately concerned;" that the appropriation for one year, and for each succeeding year, in many cases exceeded the whole of the original estimate: that many of the works were built over again, and that others were rotten before they were completed. On the 31st of January, 1837, the same gentleman made another report from the Committee of Ways and Means, referring to the former as "explanatory of the unproductive, yet growing expenditures of the Government upon harbors and rivers, and expressive of serious doubts of the policy of following out this branch of the public service, unless some more certain, and efficient, and economical system for conducting it could be devised." The opinion of the committee had not been changed by "the experience of another year;" and the report adds, that, "without some curtailment by Congress of the class of works already projected as recipients of its bounty, and without a decisive limitation of its appropriations to works that may justly be denominated of the first magnitude, and of imperious necessity too, it requires no spirit of prophecy to predict that the operations of the civil engineer department will, in a very few years, rival, in expenditures and numerical strength of agents and operatives, the military and naval service of the Government, and constitute a more alarming branch of public patronage than is to be found elsewhere in the Government. From the peculiar nature of their expenditures, corruption, favoritism, and speculation may be reduced to system more successfully in them than in almost any other branch of the civil administration."

If such was the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means in 1837, it certainly cannot be changed by examining into the present condition of these improvements.

After an experiment of thirteen years on the 103 works for which appropriations have been made, the following is the result:

Never commenced,	-	-	-	3
Abandoned,	-	-	-	1
Suspended,	-	-	-	4
May perhaps be completed with existing appropriations,	-	-	-	14
Completed,	-	-	-	20
Not completed,	-	-	-	61
Total,	-	-	-	103

Some of the works have been built over twice, and the twenty completed cost but $409,178 25, leaving all the expensive works yet to be finished, and at an expense which cannot even be estimated.

Such is the result of this Federal system of improving our harbors, rivers, and creeks, and building piers for our cities, towns, and villages; and such the prospect before us. The time has certainly arrived when it becomes necessary to inquire whether all these expenditures belong to Federal legislation; and to examine a system which, if made permanent, must entirely change the character of our Government.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, JANUARY 28.

Petition from the Settlers in Oregon Territory.

MR. LINN presented the following memorial from citizens of the Oregon Territory:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, settlers south of the Columbia River, beg leave to represent to your honorable body, that our settlement, begun in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-two, has hitherto prospered beyond the most sanguine expectations of its first projectors. The products of our fields have amply justified the most flattering descriptions of the fertility of the soil, while the facilities which it affords for rearing cattle are, perhaps, exceeded by those of no country in North America. The people of the United States, we believe, are not generally apprised of the extent of valuable country west of the Rocky Mountains. A large portion of the territory from the Columbia River south, to the boundary line between the United States and the Mexican republic, and extending from the coast of the Pacific about two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles to the interior, is either well supplied with timber or adapted to pasturage or agriculture. The fertile valleys of the Wallamette and Umpqua are varied with prairies and woodland, and intersected by abundant lateral streams, presenting facilities for machinery. Perhaps no country, of the same latitude, is favored with a climate so mild. The winter rains, it is true, are an objection; but they are generally preferred to the snows and intense cold which prevails in the Northern parts of the United States. The ground is seldom covered with snow, nor does it ever remain but a few hours.

We need hardly allude to the commercial advantages of the Territory. Its happy position for trade with China, India, and the Western coasts of America, will be readily recognized. The growing importance, however, of the islands of the Pacific is not so generally known and appreciated. As these islands progress in civilization, their demand for the produce of more northern climates will increase. Nor can any country supply them with beef, flour, &c., on terms so advantageous as this. A very successful effort has been recently made, at the Sandwich islands, in the cultivation of coffee and the sugar cane. A colony here will, in time, thence easily derive these articles and other tropical products in exchange for the produce of their own labor. We have thus briefly alluded to the natural resources of the country, and to its external relations. They are, in our opinion, strong inducements for the Government of the United States to take formal and speedy possession. We urge this step as promising to the general interests of the nation. But the advantages it may confer upon us, and the evils it may avert from our posterity, are incalculable.

Our social intercourse has thus far been prosecuted with reference to feelings of honor, to the feeling of dependence on the Hudson's Bay Company, and to their moral influence. Under this state of things, we have thus far prospered, but we cannot hope that it will continue. The agricultural and other resources of the country cannot fail to induce emigration and commerce. As our settlement begins to draw its supplies through other channels, the feeling of dependence upon the Hudson's Bay Company, to which we have alluded as one of the safeguards of our social intercourse, will begin to diminish. We are anxious when we imagine what will be, what must be, the condition of so mixed a community, free from all legal restraint, and superior to that moral influence which has hitherto been the pledge of our safety.

Our interests are identified with those of the country of our adoption. We flatter ourselves that we are the germ of a great State, and are anxious to give an early tone to the moral and intellectual character of its citizens. We are fully aware, too, that the destinies of our posterity will be intimately affected by the character of those who emigrate to the country. The territory must populate. The Congress of the United States must say by whom. The natural resources of the country, with a well-judged civil code, will invite a good community. But a good community will hardly emigrate to a country which promises no protection for life or property. Inquiries have already been submitted to some of us for information of the country. In return, we can only speak of a country highly favored of nature. We can boast of no civil code. We can promise no protection but the ulterior resort of self-defence. By whom, then, shall our country be populated? By the reckless and unprincipled adventurer! not by the hardy and enterprising pioneer of the West. By the Botany Bay refugee, by the renegade of civilization from the Rocky Mountains, by the profligate, deserted seamen from Polynesia, and the unprincipled sharpers from Spanish America. Well are we assured that it will cost the Government of the United States more to reduce elements so discordant to social order, than to promote our permanent peace and prosperity by a timely action of Congress. Nor can we suppose that so vicious a population could be relied on in case of a rupture between the United States and any other power.

Our intercourse with the natives among us, guided much by the same influence which has promoted harmony among ourselves, has been generally pacific. But the same causes which will interrupt harmony among ourselves, will also interrupt our friendly relations with the natives. It is, therefore, of primary importance both to them and to us, that the Government should take energetic measures to secure the execution of all laws affecting Indian trade and the intercourse of white men and Indians. We have thus briefly shown that the security of our persons and our property, the hopes and destinies of our children, are involved in the objects of our petition. We do not presume to suggest the manner in which the country should be occupied by the Government, nor the extent to which our settlement should be encouraged. We confide in the wisdom of our national legislators, and leave the subject to their candid deliberation, and your petitioners will ever pray.

(Signed,) J. L. WHITCOMB, and 35 others.

On motion of Mr. LIGN, the memorial was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Salt Duties.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the Senate took up the request made by him for leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the salt duty and the fishing bounties, and allowances dependent thereon.

Mr. DAVIS then addressed the Senate, in reply to the remarks of Mr. BENTON, when presenting the bill on Thursday last.

Mr. BENTON replied to Mr. DAVIS at length, after which,

United States Naturalization Laws in British Courts—Case of Theller.

[JANUARY, 1839.]

THURSDAY, January 31.

United States Naturalization Laws in British Court—Case of Theller.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Dr. E. A. Theller, who stated that he was a native of Ireland, and had been naturalized, and resides in this country; that he had joined in the expedition for the invasion of Canada, and had been taken prisoner; that he had been tried, and convicted of treason—the judge charging the jury on his trial that his act of naturalization in this country was null, and of non-effect, that no subsequent act could expatriate him from his original allegiance. Under these circumstances, Dr. T. asks that Congress should take some action on the subject, which would define the rights of naturalized citizens.

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,

Mr. NORVELL said, that the memorialist was a citizen of Michigan. He was an intelligent man, but an enthusiast in whatever related to human liberty. He had sent to him the counterpart of the memorial just presented. The facts in the memorial were as stated by the Senator from Kentucky. The memorialist was a native of Ireland, but a naturalized citizen of the United States. In the early part of the past year, he embarked in the struggle for Canadian liberty. He was captured in the Upper Province of Canada, and taken to Toronto. There he was tried, condemned, and sentenced to execution, on a charge of high treason against the Queen of Great Britain. The chief justice of the province, who presided at the trial, instructed the jury, that no subject of the kingdom could ever expatriate himself. Birth, and the residence of one hour in the British dominions, created a perpetual allegiance. From this allegiance the subject could never be exonerated, under any plea or pretence. The memorialist owed his present safety from the penalties of treason, to his escape from the citadel of Quebec.

These were the facts which gave rise to this memorial. Upon these facts, the memorialist appeals to Congress to adopt measures for the adjustment of this question of perpetual allegiance claimed by Great Britain from all her native born subjects, and for the protection of all such subjects as have become, or may become, naturalized citizens of the United States. The subject was certainly one of great importance. The doctrine of perpetual allegiance, asserted by Great Britain, was an absurd relic of feudal barbarism. It was incompatible with the constitution and laws of naturalization of the United States. By those, British subjects may and do become American citizens. They are entitled, equally with our native citizens, to protection in all their lawful pursuits, wherever they may happen to be. This Government was thus bound to protect them in peace and in war.

Mr. Madison, in the last war with Great Britain, steadily maintained this principle, resisted the claim of that kingdom to the perpetual allegiance of her subjects after they had become our citizens, and repeatedly intimated his determination to retaliate for every injury inflicted upon our naturalized citizens, captured as prisoners of war, if they were punished on the ground of their being subjects, or if they were treated differently from other prisoners of war. The memorialist was mistaken in supposing that the treaty of peace between this country and Great Britain recognized the right of that kingdom to the perpetual allegiance of her native born subjects. No such expression is to be found in those treaties. Our Revolutionary ancestors were all British subjects at one time. In separating from the mother country, they ceased to be her subjects. And how could they, in the treaty of peace which recognized them as a separate and independent nation, permit Great Britain to assert any claim to the perpetual allegiance of those who were born within the British realms?

No principle is more clear than that the naturalized citizens of the United States possess all the rights and are entitled to all the protection which could be claimed by native citizens. No duty is more imperative upon the Government than that of affording equal protection to the naturalized as to the native citizen; and he had no recollection of any failure on the part of any Republic or any Administration to perform its duty in this respect.

The circumstances which had produced this memorial were peculiar, and had embarrassed any action which the Government might have been disposed to take on the subject. The memorialist had, in his zeal for the liberty of a foreign province not prepared to assert its own freedom, invaded that foreign province; and had, with a number of our native citizens, waged war upon the British authorities, while his own country was at peace and in amity with them, and had been captured. He and his coadjutors had voluntarily, at least for a time, expatriated themselves. They had left their own country to engage in a foreign civil war. Now, in this situation, what right had our Government to exercise its power for their protection, except by way of friendly interposition? If the memorialist had been taken while fighting the battles of his adopted country; if, without committing aggression upon the established Government of a foreign power, he had, while passing through any part of its dominions, been taken on any pretext, and tried for any offence not committed against the peace of that power, and condemned on the claim of a perpetual allegiance from him, then this Government would have been bound to interpose for his protection, and would have protected him. As it was, the Executive acted with regard to him precisely as it did with regard to native citizens captured at the same time with him. It sent an agent to Toronto for the purpose of prevailing with the provincial authorities to release the prisoners. It made no distinction between the naturalized and the native citizen. What more could it do, without involving the nation in a war? It might have made a formal declaration, that it would never recognize the principle of perpetual allegiance, as asserted in the trial and condemnation of the memorialist. It might, as intimated by the Senator from Kentucky, have remonstrated against that barbarous principle. But if it had done so, the danger was, that he would have been forthwith ordered to execution, for the very purpose of showing a determination practically to maintain the British claim to the perpetual allegiance of their subjects. He had no doubt that this consideration had operated upon the execution in this case. He had alluded to these facts to show that this Government had not been inattentive to its duty on this occasion.

THURSDAY, January 31.

Liberation of American Slaves by British Authorities while passing from one U. S. port to another.

Mr. CALHOUN offered the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate whether the Government of Great Britain has made compensation in the cases of the brigs Enterprise, Encomium, and Comet, the first of which was forced by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda Island, and the other two wrecked on the keys of the Bahamas, and the slaves on board forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities; and if no compensation has been made, the reasons why it has not been made, with a copy of the correspondence between the two Governments, which has taken place since the answer to a former call on the same subject by the Senate.

Small Silver Coinage for Change.

Mr. STRANGE presented certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of North Carolina, representing the scarcity of specie change in that State, and asking for the passage of a law authorizing the branch mints to coin silver change.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, wished to make a single observation on the subject, before it was passed. This complaint of the want of silver change was not confined to North Carolina, but existed in other places, and was produced by that disproportionate value between gold and silver coin which originated in the celebrated gold bill. The effect of this bill was this: that when it became necessary to export specie, silver was exported in preference to gold, because the silver was more valuable in foreign countries; and hence, he apprehended, was the scarcity in North Carolina. He had lately received a communication on this subject from one of our commercial Northern cities, which attributed the scarcity of silver change to this cause.

Mr. STRANGE said that when he offered the resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, he had not the slightest expectation that they would have given rise to any debate; but as the Senator from Kentucky had thought proper to notice them, for the purpose of introducing notions on the subject of the currency, he felt it due to himself and his constituents, from whom these resolutions emanated, to make a brief reply. He wholly dissented from the position laid down by the Senator from Kentucky, with regard to the causes which produced the scarcity of silver change. It was not exportation which produced this scarcity, but it arose from the hoarding of silver by the banks, who issued, in lieu of it, their small notes. In fact, he did not believe that silver coins of the lower denominations were ever exported.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, hoped he might be permitted, without offence, to make a few observations on the subject presented by these resolutions, particularly as it was one of importance, to which his attention had been recently directed. He happened to receive, but a few days ago, a communication from an intelligent gentleman, in one of our principal seaports, affirming that the scarcity of silver change was one of the effects of the passage of the gold bill; because, by reducing the standard of the gold coin, it became less valuable as an article of exportation than silver, and, therefore, the latter was always exported. Now this was exactly what was predicted by himself and others, at the time of the passage of the law, for the adjustment of the value of the two coins; and the result has proved the correctness of the prediction. Gold could not be exported under that law, without disadvantage, unless exchange was greatly against us; but silver can profitably be exported, and when exportation becomes necessary, it is of course made in that species of coin in which it can be sent abroad without loss. This was exactly in accordance with the information which he had just received from an intelligent source, in one of our large commercial cities.

Mr. NILES thought that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) was mistaken in the causes to which he had attributed the scarcity of silver change, and that he was mistaken in the fact that a scarcity of change existed in the country at large. He thought there was no such scarcity; he knew, in many places, it was abundant. Within his own experience, banks had refused to receive it. This was a convincing proof that there was abundance of it. It is known to every one who has inquired into this subject, that silver change is never exported, because its nominal value in a foreign market would be lost, and it could only be disposed of as bullion to be recoined, occasioning much loss by the process. There may be a scarcity of change in some States, but that is the result of their paper systems. The hostility of paper to silver is well known; indeed, so hostile is it, that where it has the power, even silver fivepennybits are driven out of circulation. What was the result in Philadelphia, where the mint was located, during the late suspension? In that city, which, previous to the suspension, was thoroughly saturated with silver change, after the barrier was broken down and the emission of shimplasters authorized, no change whatever could be procured. In a single night, the state of things was completely changed. Instead of an abundance of silver change, there was an entire absence of it. And a similar result will always follow a similar cause; and to the extension of our paper system, the circulation of one dollar notes, and notes for a fractional part of a dollar, may we much more appropriately look for the scarcity of silver change, than the operations of the gold bill of 1836.

Mr. STRANGE said, that, upon reflection, he was entirely satisfied that the Senator from Kentucky was grossly mistaken in the positions laid down by him. Every man knew that there had been a great increase of specie in the country, since the passage of the gold bill. Now this increase could not be altogether in gold, but must be partly in silver and partly in gold. He was also satisfied that there could not be the difference in value, between the gold and silver coinage, which the Senator from Kentucky supposed; for he believed that their relative value was as nicely adjusted as it was possible for human ingenuity to do it; indeed, this was shown to be the case by the prices current in foreign countries.

The Senator from Kentucky had attributed the disappearance of silver specie to exportation, and he attributed it to the hoarding of it by the banks, and partly by individuals. Change was a thing that was never exported. The country must be reduced to the lowest ebb, before it would suffer the inconvenience and loss of sending it abroad; because it must go as mere bullion, to be recoined, in the countries to which it is sent. Every man of reason and reflection, could see at once the true cause for this scarcity; and upon the soundest principles of philosophy, when one good cause presents itself it was idle to search for another. He would not have troubled the Senate with these remarks, but for the immediate connection the subject had with his constituents and himself, and but for the false position laid down by the Senator from Kentucky.

That Senator seemed to have taken North Carolina under his especial charge, and to have felt himself called upon to take part in the public struggles within her. When he and his colleague, some time ago, introduced certain resolutions coming from their State, the Senator took the unusual course of appearing as the advocate of one of the political parties of that State, and, in a lengthened address, assigning his views as to the complexion of the document, and the course of the North Carolina Senators on this floor. And what followed? Why, a garbled statement of the debate was immediately sent out, in one of the papers of this city, in advance of the true statement, containing the answers of his colleague and himself; and no doubt the intended effect was produced before the contradiction could overtake the misrepresentation, which was published in every Whig paper in the State. What was the case now? These being North Carolina resolutions, the Senator from Kentucky, who seems to take such an interest in that State, rises in his place, and assumes a position in relation to them, which, if uncontradicted, will have an unfavorable effect on the public mind. We must, said Mr. S., be more fortunate now than usual, if the contradiction accompanies the assertion.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he was unwilling to prolong this discussion, but he would assure the Senator from North Carolina that he had not the least inclination to interfere between him and his constituents. When the resolutions from the Legislature of North Carolina instructing her Senators were presented, he had offered some remarks because they had adverted to matters of general interest, and if an incorrect report of them had gone forth to the world, no one would regret it more than he did. He would have been pleased had the discussion been published just as it occurred in the Senate, but he had no agency or control of the subject. So much for that matter. This morning the Senator presents resolutions on the subject of silver change, and I, having within a few days received communications from different sections of the country on the same subject, think proper to make a few remarks; was this interfering between the Senator and his constituents? He thought not. But the Senator seems to think that I am mistaken in the cause to which I attribute the scarcity of silver change, viz: the unequal valuation of the gold bill. But did not facts bear out the assertion? Look at the importation of specie since the passage of the gold bill. Is it not almost exclusively in gold? and why? Because of the appreciation of that metal and the depreciation of silver by that bill. This affords a greater profit on the importation of gold, and hence there is not a proportionate supply of silver—the metal which furnishes change. So, too, when exchange with foreign nations is against us, and it becomes profitable to export specie, it is found more advantageous to send silver than gold; and hence a cause of the scarcity of change in Philadelphia, New York, and other cities, which are more immediately subject to be drained of their specie by their contiguity to our commerce. He did not consider himself infallible on this subject, but in expressing his views or theories on the matter, he did not think he was doing any thing improper as an American citizen or a member of the Senate.

Mr. STRANGE was very unwilling to prolong this debate, but he had been drawn into it very unexpectedly and unwillingly. He had assumed a position, which he felt bound to maintain the truth and reason of. He said that the Senator from Kentucky was guilty of a petitio principii—that he had assumed a principle not founded on fact. This the Senator had denied, but in the course of his remarks, he had shown a better reason for the disappearance of silver change than he had given in the beginning; and if he was right, there was no reason for its exportation, but a very good reason for its importation.

The Senator could not escape from his position, for whatever relative difference there was between gold and silver, paper was still cheaper than either. He admitted that the number of one dollar notes was greatly reduced. But small bills, even as low as three dollars, were still in circulation, to a great extent, and these, as long as they were permitted to circulate, had the tendency to exclude change from circulation, and cause it to be hoarded. The Senator said that the banks had no interest in hoarding specie. But this argument could not stand, for it was their interest to hold on to all the specie they could get, so as to circulate their own notes, and this was the true cause for the disappearance of change. It was, therefore, perfectly idle to search for any other cause, or to talk about the exportation of the smaller coin which never was resorted to. When the gold bill was passed it was not to elevate gold, but to bring it to its true value, when compared with silver. It was contended that the gold coin was above par, and was, consequently, so valuable for exportation, that it could not remain in the country. The bill was, therefore, passed to remedy that evil, and he had no doubt but it had effected that object.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he did not intend to enter into a discussion of the relative value of gold and silver coins, but to express the opinion that the object of the Legislature of North Carolina, and the object of the people of the Southern Atlantic and South-western States, was to obtain a supply of silver change in place of the odious shipplasters which now infested the interior. With proper legislation it was obvious that that object could be effected greatly to the interest of the people, without any expense to the Government. It was known to all acquainted with mining operations, that where gold was found, there was a proportion of silver found with it. Now, under the existing laws, the branch mints were not allowed to coin silver change, though they had had a sufficiency of silver for that purpose, which, if coined, would not be exported, but go into the circulation of the country, in place of those filthy shipplasters which now usurped their place. That was the object of these resolutions, and it was out of place to go into any foreign causes for the scarcity complained of.

Mr. BENTON applauded the sound and practical views presented by the Senator from Georgia, (Mr. LUMPKIN,) and considered what he said to be entirely conclusive on the point to which he directed his observations. He did not rise to add any thing to those remarks, but to call the attention of the Senate to a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, which had just been printed, and laid on our tables, and which might not yet have been observed by members. It was a report which contained the precise information which this conversational debate required, and which would show how great was the error of supposing that gold coin had been overvalued in the United States, by the act of 1834, and how far that act was from preventing an importation of silver, or causing it to be exported, or banishing silver change.

It would be recollected, Mr. B. said, that the friends of hard money had passed two bills in 1834—a silver bill, as well as a gold bill. The object of the latter was to correct the error of our gold standard; the object of the former was to repeal the law passed by the United States Bank party in 1819 to illegalize the circulation of all silver except Spanish milled dollars, of which, in consequence of the cessation of the Spanish dominion over Mexico and South America, there were no longer any coined. It was, therefore, an act to illegalize the circulation of the only silver which came to us.

At the time of the passage of these bills, continued Mr. B., the most lugubrious vaticinations were indulged in by the paper-money party. They were incessant and vehement in their declarations that the hard-money currency was ruined; that gold was debased; that it would supersede silver, prevent its importation, cause its exportation, and drive it out of the country; and that we should have no hard-money currency but a debased gold coinage. These were the declarations incontinently repeated at that time; and now, after upwards of four years' experience, how stands the fact? Sir, the fact stands thus: that so far from preventing the importation of silver, the actual importation of that coin has exceeded thirty-five millions of dollars since the passage of the gold bill; being the largest importation of that coin which has ever taken place since the establishment of the Federal Government. So much for importation; now for the exportation; and here it is seen that the export, instead of being confined to silver, was, at the only time that a commercial exportation took place, which was in the spring of 1837, when the banks suspended, far larger of gold, in proportion to the quantity of the two metals which were in the country, than it was of silver. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the export of gold was, during that year, $1,828,000, while the export of silver was only $2,756,000. Now, the quantity of silver in the country at that time was at least four times greater than that of gold; and, therefore, the export of silver should have been eight or nine millions to have been in proportion to the gold, while it was not, in fact, so much as one million more. Thus it is proved that our gold bill has neither prevented the importation of silver, nor caused its exportation. There is upwards of seventy millions of silver now in the country, besides the gold; and the only cause of its disappearance from circulation is in the deluge of small notes with which the paper-money party floods the land.

So much for silver: with respect to gold, the same report shows that we have imported about twenty-six millions, either in gold coin or bullion, since the passage of the gold bill; that there has been coined of the former gold of the United States about a million and a quarter; and of native bullion about two millions and a half; making an acquisition of that metal, in about four years, of thirty millions of dollars, without counting what came in by emigrants, and escaped registry at the custom-houses. The whole acquisition of gold and silver since 1832, when the United States Bank charter was vetoed, and when our hard-money policy first commenced, is at least eighty millions; which, added to twenty millions which was in the country at that time, makes at least one hundred millions now in the country.

Besides the view of our acquisition of gold and silver since the two hard-money bills of 1834, the same report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows us the state of the circulation of the Bank of the United States during the whole period of its existence; and this statement shows us that the quantity of gold now in the United States is near three times the average circulation of that Bank, and near one-third more than it ever was at its most expanded period. The average circulation of that Bank was only eleven millions of dollars; its highest annual circulation was only twenty-two millions, while our gold coin is now actually about thirty millions. This being the case, we ought to have a plentiful gold currency; we ought to have three times as much gold in circulation as we formerly had of United States Bank notes. But this is not the case; and why? Because the banks hoard the gold, and will not pay it out in redemption of their notes, and because the Government of the United States encourages and fosters that practice of the banks by dispensing with the use of gold, and using the notes of the banks in the collection and disbursement of its revenue. As long as this is the case—so long as the Federal Government uses bank paper—gold will remain locked up in the banks; and there will be no way to get it out of them but to make them overflow—to gorge them—to bring so much gold into the country that the banks cannot hoard the whole of it.

This is another proof, continued Mr. B., that gold is not debased by our new law. If it was debased—if it was reduced below its relative value to silver—it would be always paid out in preference to silver; but it is not so paid out. On the contrary, it is hugged and hoarded by the banks; they will give silver for their notes, but they make apologies when you want gold.

There is still another proof on this head; it is to be found in every price current. Look to the relative value of American gold and silver in any one of these papers, and you will always find it to be about equal. Spanish milled dollars—those with a Spanish king's head, especially the pillar dollars, the column of Hercules dollars—they bear a premium, because they are wanted for exportation to the East, where their currency, for three centuries and a half, has made them the most acceptable foreign coin which can be carried to the Asiatic or African countries; but American gold coin and silver are even in the market.

No, sir. Gold does not expel silver, but small bank notes and shinplasters do expel it. A political party, and the banks in their interest, do all they can to banish both gold and silver; and it is the bounden duty of the Federal Government to cease to be accessory to another explosion of the banks by continuing to dispense with the use of coin, and continuing to use paper money. Another explosion is coming. It will come as certainly as the revolution of the seasons; and the Federal Government should foresee the event, and provide against it by going back to the act of 1789, and acting upon that act, and receiving nothing but gold and silver in payment of its revenues. This would check bank expansions, and protect the country as well as the Federal Treasury.

At 10½ premium on foreign exchange, exportation of specie begins. The cotton dealing Bank of the United States, can put it up to that point any day that it pleases. It put it up in May of 1837; the exportation of specie immediately began; and over every parcel exported the paper-money party shouted, exulted, and triumphed, as if a great victory had been achieved. And so it will be again. The premium on foreign exchanges is now upwards of 9 per centum; it can be made 10½ at any moment; then for exporting specie, triumphing again, more panics, shutting up banks; and charging the whole upon the Democratic Administration.

To return to the North Carolina resolution; it is a wise, just, and necessary measure which it requires. The branch mints should coin silver change; they will be able to supply it to districts of interior country, which cannot obtain supplies from New Orleans or Philadelphia. This Administration, and that of Gen. Jackson, have begun to furnish a national supply of silver change. They have done much; but it is only the commencement of what ought to be done. The country does not yet feel the supply. Nine-tenths of the Union has no silver change of our coinage. It will take years of close work at all our mints to give us the supply of this change which France and England has, say three dollars ahead to each person of their whole population. It will take us several years to attain that point; and we need it more than the French and English do; for we have to guard against the shinplaster party; we have to guard against another deluge of shinplasters at the next suspension of the banks; we have to guard against this pestilence; and it is our business to provide such an ample supply of silver change that there can be no pretext for another issue of this pestiferous stuff.

Silver change is never exported; and this is another reason for an ample supply of it. Two or three dollars ahead, for our whole population, ought to be coined in 25 cent, 10 cent, and 5 cent pieces.

Mr. BROWN observed that he was not in his seat when his honorable colleague presented the resolutions, but he had heard a part of the debate which had grown out of them. He rose now for the purpose of declining to enter into the discussion on what he considered a mere abstract proposition. The Senate had given the best proof of its conviction of the value of silver circulation, by passing the bill which he introduced at the early part of the session, to authorize the branch mints to coin silver change. He had now nothing further to say than to express the hope that this bill would receive a favorable consideration in another quarter.

On motion by Mr. STRANGE, the resolutions were then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 4.

Vermont Anti-Slavery Resolutions.

This being petition day, the SPEAKER announced, as the first business in order, the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, presented two weeks ago by Mr. EVERETT, on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the slave-trade, &c., which Mr. E. had moved to have read, printed, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIR had decided that these resolutions fell within the operation of Mr. ATHERTON's resolution of the 12th of December, and that they must go on the table, in the words of that order, without being read, printed, debated, or referred.

Mr. EVERETT took an appeal from that decision.

The SPEAKER stated the grounds of his decision substantially as follows: certain joint resolutions were presented from the Legislature of Vermont, embracing, among other things, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, the slave-trade between the States, and the admission of new States into the Union. The CHAIR decided that these portions of the memorials or resolutions, under the order of the House of the 12th of December last, would lie on the table. Any other portion of the resolutions which merely went to protest against that order, would not fall within the operation of it. Upon presenting these resolutions, the gentleman from Vermont moved that they be read, printed, and referred to a committee—

Mr. EVERETT. To a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It is the same thing. The CHAIR then reiterated several former decisions of the House, identical with the one then under consideration. In the first session of the 24th Congress, while the select committee raised under the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY on the subject of slavery was in existence, a gentleman from Virginia, not now a member of this House, (Mr. Patton,) presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of that State on the subject of Abolition, and moved their reference to that committee with certain instructions. There was an existing order then in force for the reference of all papers on this subject to that select committee, under similar prohibitions against being read, debated, &c., and under the general phraseology of that order, the present Speaker decided that resolutions of State Legislatures fell within its order. From that decision Mr. Patton took an appeal, and upon a solemn vote of the House the decision was sustained by a vote of 143 to 40. Upon the point as to reading such resolutions, the same question was decided at the same, and again at the subsequent sessions, viz., that, under the then existing orders, they could not be read. At the same session of that Congress, a memorial on the subject of Abolition, &c., was presented by the same gentleman from Vermont, who asked for its reading. The Speaker decided it must go to the select committee without reading, and the House acquiesced in that decision. At the second session of that Congress, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) after the adoption of an order similar to the one now in force, presented a memorial on the subject of Abolition, and called for its reading. The Speaker decided that it must go on the table without being read, printed, or referred, reciting the words of the order. An appeal was taken from this decision, and the appeal was laid on the table. On the same occasion, Mr. ADAMS presented upwards of twenty other similar petitions, and asked the reading of each. The Speaker made the same decision in each case, the gentleman appealed in every one of them, and the appeals were severally laid on the table by a vote of the House. These questions had been repeatedly settled by the House.

Mr. BRONSON had intended, at first, he said, to demand the previous question, but he now moved to lay the appeal on the table.

3d Sess.] Remonstrance against Interference with Slavery in the District of Columbia. [FEBRUARY, 1839.]

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which, being ordered, were—yeas 122, nays 44.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to refer that portion of the resolutions relating only to the resolution of the 12th of December to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay it on the table, which was agreed to without a division.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 5.

Armed Occupation and Settlement of Florida.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill for the armed occupation and settlement of Florida was taken up, and discussed by Messrs. BENTON, PRESTON, and LINN.

THURSDAY, February 7.

Remonstrance against outside Interference with Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented a memorial, signed by a number of the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the interference of the citizens of other parts of the country in the subject of slavery in the District, and against any action on the part of Congress in compliance with such unauthorized interference.

After giving an abstract of the contents of the memorial, Mr. C. said he would embrace the opportunity of presenting his views on the subject of these Abolition petitions. He said he had been, and was still of the opinion, that the proper course for the disposal of these petitions would have been to receive them, and refer them to an appropriate committee, who might present to the community a strong and argumentative appeal on the subject. A majority of the Senate thought otherwise; and while they had no intention to violate the right of petition, the course which they had adopted had enabled the Abolitionists to represent them as having done so, and thereby greatly to increase their numerical strength. He said that the petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District and in the Territories was but a means of accomplishing the ultimate aim of the Abolitionists—universal emancipation. They were stages, and short stages to a bloody goal—emancipation without compensation, and without moral preparation. For this they were attempting to excite the people of one section of the Union against another section, by exaggerated pictures of the horrors of slavery. Hence their continual agitation of the subject, and their attempt to connect it with the political controversies of the country. He alluded to the distinguished agitator on another sphere, (O'Connell,) who has said that we should be excluded from the respectable society of Europe; a society to which he himself has only a kind of contraband admittance, and was tolerated with a scornful repugnance. He considered his ebullitions as the malignant ravings of the plunderer of his own country, and the libeller of a kindred people. He said that persons of both sections, and of the different political parties of the Union, have endeavored to profit by the Abolition excitement. Previous to the late Presidential election, Mr. Van Buren had been charged with being an Abolitionist. He (Mr. C.) never participated or believed in this charge. No, sir, he is no Abolitionist. He conjured Abolitionists to pause, and look on the dreadful precipice towards which they were hurrying our beloved country. He denied that Congress had any power to legislate upon the subject of slavery. He said that by the Missouri compromise, Florida had a right, when she had the requisite population, to be admitted to the Union with the institution of slavery. He denied the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, so long as slavery did not interfere with the comfortable occupation of the District as a seat of Government for the Union, which was provided by the act of cession. The idea of Congress having power to prohibit the transportation of slaves from one State to another, was preposterous. He said that the ultimate aim of Abolitionists was emancipation, the universal emancipation of three millions of slaves in the United States. These were, on an average, worth at least four hundred dollars each; and thus would result the destruction of property to the amount of twelve hundred millions of dollars, by a single fiat of legislation. It was said there was no right of property in slaves; but that was property which the laws made property. If Abolitionists were sincere, they should begin, as a preliminary step, to raise these twelve hundred millions of dollars, for it would be the height of injustice to ask citizens of slaveholding States to raise money to pay for their own property. He said that the Abolitionists, whatever they might profess, were in favor of amalgamation, and supposed, as the leading white Abolitionists evinced no disposition to commence the work, that they intended that it should be carried out by the poorer class, who were expected to consent to the vile and loathsome association. He said that the two colors could not associate together on terms of equality; the whites must rule the blacks, or the blacks would rule them; that contests for superiority would inevitably take place, and widely extended carnage and desolation would be the result. Our country, with its happy population, its smiling cities, and well-cultivated plantations, would present naught but desolated fields, conflagrated cities, and scenes of butchery and murder. Mr. C. illustrated and defended these and other positions, in an able speech of nearly two hours in length.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that when he turned his eyes back for the last twelve months, and compared what he then heard with what was now said, in the same quarter, he was forcibly struck, and he might say, pleasurably, with the change. I think, said he, that it was just about one year since that the Senate was engaged in the discussion of a series of resolutions relating to the same subject on which we have heard the Senator to-day, and which occupied the time of this body for about two weeks, in the discussion of what many were pleased to call useless abstractions. At that time Abolition was advancing with strides which threatened the Union itself. To meet the approaching danger, he (Mr. C.) turned his eyes to State Rights, as the ark of our safety, and which has, heretofore, carried us safely through every difficulty. The resolutions to which he referred, were put forward as the rallying ground for all who embraced the State Rights creed. How they were received on the Opposition side, he would not say; but on this side he was ably supported by his Republican friends of the North, the grateful recollection of which he should ever retain. That movement gave the first effectual blow to Abolition.

At the close of the session, it was followed up by an address to the people of the United States, which was headed by the Senator from Connecticut on my right, (Mr. NILES.) It took the same elevated ground, that this was not a consolidated Government, but a Federal Republic of confederated sovereignties; and that neither this Government nor any of the States, or their citizens, had a right, either here or elsewhere, to interfere with the domestic institutions of the other States. This address, following the original move, had a powerful effect in consolidating all of the State Rights creed throughout the entire non-slaveholding States against the Abolitionists, which effectually checked their further progress.

At the beginning of this session, another movement on the same principle, made in the other wing of the Capitol, (Mr. ATHERTON's resolutions,) and which was sustained by a strong majority, followed with the most happy effect. The work was done. The spirit of Abolition was overthrown, of which we have a strong confirmation in what we have this day heard. The South was consolidated as one man against it, and a great political party of the North was nearly equally united in opposition; and he hoped, from indications that could scarcely deceive, that the other party there would also soon be found rallied against it.

Sir, (said Mr. C.,) this is a great epoch in our political history. Of all the dangers to which we have ever been exposed, this has been the greatest. We may now consider it as passed. The resolutions to which he referred, with the following movements, gave the fatal blow, to which the position now assumed by the Senator from Kentucky has given the finishing stroke. What has been done, will be followed by a great moral revolution in the tone of feeling and thinking in reference to the domestic institutions of the South. Already the discussion has effected a great change among ourselves. There were many, very many, in the slaveholding States, who, at the commencement of the controversy, believed that slavery, as it existed among us, was an evil to be tolerated, because we could not escape from it, but not to be defended. That has passed away. We now believe it has been a great blessing to both of the races—the European and African, which, by a mysterious Providence, have been brought together in the Southern section of this Union. The one has greatly improved, and the other has not deteriorated; while, in a political point of view, it has been the great stay of the Union and our free institutions, and one of the main sources of the unbounded prosperity of the whole. Now that we have withstood the shock, our institutions would be viewed more fairly than they have hitherto been, and he had no apprehension but that the result would be a great change of feeling towards them, not only in our country, but over the civilized world.

I did not rise, said Mr. C., to enter into a discussion of the subject. I heard the Senator from Kentucky with pleasure. His speech will have a happy effect, and will do much to consummate what had already been so happily begun, and successfully carried on towards a completion.

SATURDAY, February 9. •

Florida Armed Occupation.

MR. BENTON moved to take up the bill for the armed occupation of that part of the Territory of Florida now overrun by bands of marauding Indians; which motion was agreed to, and the bill was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

On taking this question, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Wall, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—24.

MR. BENTON offered several amendments to the details of the bill, which were adopted.

MR. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, offered an amendment requiring the settler to be over eighteen years of age, to be entitled to the grant of land provided in the bill; which was adopted; and,

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the bill was ordered to be printed as amended, and laid on the table till Monday next.

3D SESS.]

Application of Steam to Navigation—Dr. Rumsey.

[FEBRUARY, 1839.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 9.

Application of Steam to Navigation—Dr. Rumsey.

MR. UNDERWOOD called up the following joint resolution, reported by him a day or two ago, from the Select Committee raised on the subject:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to present to James Rumsey, junior, the son and only child of James Rumsey, deceased, a suitable gold medal, commemorative of his father's services and high agency in giving to the world the benefits of the steamboat.

The motion of Mr. U. being agreed to,

MR. RUMSEY, of Kentucky, rose and said:

•James Rumsey was a native of Maryland, from which State he removed, in early manhood, to Shepherdstown, Virginia, where he turned his attention exclusively to engineering and mechanical pursuits—superintending for a time the operations of the Potomac company in improving the navigation of that river—suggesting many novel views in mechanism, and making various improvements in milling and the application of water power. As early as July or August, 1783, as appears by the testimony, he conceived the idea of navigation by steam; and from this time to the hour of his death his whole soul was absorbed in this great subject. It will be recollected that at this early period the mechanic arts, and, more especially, that branch embracing steam machinery, were in their very infancy in America. There was no steam machinery in it. There were no practical artists capable of fabricating any. Even in England, although some progress had been made by Watt, the steam engine, and its great appendage, the boiler or generator, were rude, imperfect, comparatively inefficient. Rumsey had to invent, to originate every thing—to procure from different places, and different workshops, and, though not a practical mechanic, often to fashion and modify with his own hands the various parts of a work even now difficult and complicate. From the inexperience of workmen, and the total absence of all the tools and machines now collected in engine factories, his progress was necessarily expensive, slow, embarrassed, and all execution so imperfect as to preclude the possibility of more than partial success. Under these most disadvantageous circumstances, he succeeded in the autumn of 1784 in making a private, but very imperfect experiment, in order to test some of the principles of his invention. And notwithstanding much of his machinery was so utterly defective as quickly to fail in many parts, and to require renewal and reconstruction throughout, yet so well convinced was he of ultimate success from this experiment, that, at the October session of the Virginia Legislature for that year, he applied for and obtained an act guaranteeing to him the exclusive use of his invention in navigating the waters of the State. This will be seen by reference to the statutes of that Commonwealth. About the same time, also, he communicated his invention to General Washington, as appears by a letter of that personage, the original of which was before that committee, dated November, 1787, to the late Governor Johnson, of Maryland. It seems that he did not earlier make this communication to Washington, because he had not matured and digested his plan, or tested its truth by any, even partial experiments. And when he did make it, so new, so bold, so original, and unheard of as it, that Washington declares in that letter that he considered it “rather as an ebullition of his genius” than as any thing likely to be available.

In the beginning of the next year, (January, 1785,) he obtained a patent from the General Assembly of Maryland for navigating by steam the bays and rivers of that State; and immediately afterwards commenced preparations for an experiment on a larger scale. Through the whole of this year, he was deeply engaged in building a boat, and procuring, improving, adapting and testing the several parts of his machinery. He did not, however, from the causes which I have before mentioned, get ready for a public trial until the year following, (1786,) which, all things considered, was eminently successful. This experiment was made on the Potomac, near Shepherdstown, Virginia, in the presence of hundreds of spectators. It is proven by various witnesses. It is described in the letter of Mr. Bedinger, and certified by Doctor Alexander, of Baltimore, for whose high respectability I refer to such of the delegation from Maryland as are acquainted with him. The gentleman near me (MR. JENIFER) says there is no one more worthy of full confidence. In this trial he succeeded, notwithstanding the unavoidable imperfection of his machinery, in propelling his boat against the current by steam alone four or five miles an hour. There was long in the possession of one of his family an ancient pamphlet—with high evidence of authenticity upon its face, which I have often read, and the general contents of which, I know, are recollected by many persons in Kentucky—containing the approbatory certificates of numerous gentlemen, who witnessed this exhibition; amongst them, that of General Gates, as mentioned by Mr. Bedinger. This pamphlet has been lost or mislaid; and those interested have been unable to repossess themselves of it, or to obtain another copy. But independent of this mass of testimony, the proof before the committee as to this experiment is so clear, so ample, and conclusive, that no one can read it and doubt. The results of this trial were by no means discouraging. So far from it, that, says Doctor Alexander, who was on board, “every person present believed that Mr.

Rumsey had accomplished all his wishes." The first efforts of Fulton in America, more than twenty years after, were but little more successful. It was not until after repeated trials—great and extensive modifications and improvements, requiring much time and money, and testing to the utmost the liberal patronage of Livingston—that he succeeded in obtaining a velocity reasonably useful. And even the utmost rapidity with which he navigated his boats was far, infinitely far, behind that which subsequent improvement has achieved. I speak not this in disparagement of Fulton. It cannot be so understood. Great inventions, requiring complicate machinery, are never perfected and seldom made eminently useful at once. High excellence is rarely attained until the mechanical world has tendered its offerings—poured in its contributions through a long series of years. Time, labor, money, repeated modifications and experiments—the conjoint suggestions of practical and theoretical mechanics, are all prerequisite and auxiliary to the perfection of a great invention. Take, for instance, the printing press of our day, throwing off thousands of accurate impressions in an hour. From its wondrous celerity in multiplying copies, and through the agency of steam on the land and the water, scattering them far and near, it may almost be compared, in its capacity for the diffusion of intellectual light, to the sun in the heavens, in his capacity for shedding physical warmth and radiance upon the world. And yet the press of our day—all admirable as it is—is but the rude wooden type and clumsy apparatus of the great German inventor, in a beautiful, improved, and perfected form.

But to return from this digression, in which, as I promised brevity, I ought not to have indulged. After his experiment—successful experiment—upon the Potomac, in 1786, to which I have adverted, Rumsey, being under the strong conviction that skilful workmen and perfect machinery were alone wanting to the most complete success, and sensible that such could not then be procured in America, resolved to go to England. With slender means of his own, and aided—no, not aided—but mocked and deluded by some timid and unsteady patronage, he there resumed with untiring energy his great undertaking. He proceeded to procure patents from the British Government for steam navigation, and various inventions embracing improved steam engines and boilers; those of Watt, and all preceding ones, being extremely inartificial and imperfect. These patents bear date in the beginning of 1788. Many of his inventions, in one modified form or another, are now in general use. As, for instance, the cylindrical boiler, so superior to the old tub or still-boilers, in the presentation of fire surface, and capacity for holding highly rarified steam, is described, both single and combined, in his specifications, and is identical in principle with the tub-boiler, which he used in his Potomac experiment.

Difficulties and embarrassments of a pecuniary nature, and others, such as invariably obstruct the progress of a new invention, attended him in England. He was often compelled to abandon, temporarily, his main object, and turn his attention to something else, in order to raise means to resume it. He undertook, with the same power, but by its more judicious application, to produce higher results in several waterworks, in all which he succeeded, realizing thereby some reputation, and some funds to apply to his favorite project.

At another time, as mentioned by the committee in their report, in order to avoid a "London jail," and the delay, if not defeat, of all his high hopes, he was compelled to transfer, at what he considered a ruinous sacrifice, a large interest in his invention—a contract which entangled and embarrassed him during the remainder of his short life. Still, however, he struggled on, undismayed; and had constructed a boat of about one hundred tons burden, and pushed forward his machinery so near to the point of completion as to be able to indicate a day not very distant for a public exhibition, when his sudden death ensued from apoplexy, while discussing the principles of one of his inventions before a philosophical society of London. A very interesting account of the manner of his death is given in the letter of R. C. Wakefield, amongst the papers before the select committee. With his life, the whole project ceased; there was no one present to administer; there was no one interested in his undertaking possessed of skill and ability to carry it out. Most men looked upon it as wild and visionary. Few would have been willing to incur the ridicule of attempting to complete it. All that he left—his very boat and machinery—barely sufficed to satisfy anxious and greedy creditors.

With the sudden death of Fiesco, of Genoa, that most extraordinary revolution which, in a single night, with admirable ability, he had nearly effected, ceased, rolled back, became abortive. So did the sudden death of this humbler, but more useful man, arrest all further prosecution, at that time, of the great object to which he had so intently devoted himself, and which, in some of the modes which he contemplated, he must, had time been allowed, have completed. He was not permitted to live to witness the realization of the highest design which he had conceived, and the consummation of which he never doubted, to use his own bold language, "the navigation of our great rivers, the lakes, the gulf stream, and the ocean itself, by the agency of steam."

Mr. Speaker, it is evident from the information before the committee who reported this resolution, that Rumsey, from the introductory letters which he carried, from the high order of mechanical genius which he displayed, and the daring and original project which he was attempting, attracted some attention in London, and secured to himself the acquaintance and friendship of many respectable men. It is fair to presume that other intelligent Americans, then resident in London, would have formed some acquaintance both with him and the novel design he was prosecuting. It is known that Fulton was for many years, during and after this period, living in Europe, and spending much of his time in London; and in the absence of all other proof, it could scarcely be believed that he, with a talent for these things, with a mind directed to such objects, would have failed in becoming acquainted with, and interesting himself in the operations of his countryman, who was occupying a position of painful prominence; so much so that, as he states in a letter to his brother, his project was the frequent subject of newspaper remark, and even of "play-house wit." But all doubt is removed by the letter of Rumsey to his friend Mr. West, in America, in which he speaks of Fulton as if they were on terms of intimacy. Does not the conclusion almost irresistibly follow, that, from this association with Rumsey, and acquaintance with his plans, Fulton was advanced in knowledge, was led to reflect, and ultimately to act on this subject? And whether his application of steam power was identical or dissimilar—original or derived—wholly new, or modifications and improvements on some of Rumsey's plans—still it appears to me that it would be cruel injustice to the memory of this persevering, ardent, talented, but unfortunate man—unfortunate in being cut off in the prime of life, and in the midst of his career—to say that the world was under no obligation to him for an invention so incalculably, so supremely important.

If further evidence was wanting to prove that this acquaintance with Rumsey was not inoperative in turning Fulton's attention to the steamboat, it will be found in the fact that he was engaged in it in 1793, very shortly after the death of Rumsey. This is apparent from his correspondence with Lord Stanhope, who himself made some experiments in 1785. Fulton went to Europe for the purpose of introducing his torpedo for the explosion of ships; but, after the death of Rumsey, the steamboat seems to have engaged his chief attention, until his final success in 1807. It is known, and so stated by his biographer, that, before his return to America, he was for many years actively employed in studying the subject, in constructing a variety of models, and making a series of experiments on a small scale. And when it is recollected that fifteen years thus elapsed before he obtained a motion much exceeding five miles an hour, it is matter of admiration that Rumsey, without any reflected lights, should in the short period allowed him have effected so much.

Mr. Speaker, I have understood—I know not with what truth, but I believe the fact is embodied in "Colden's Life"—that when Fulton made his first essay before the city of New York, a vast multitude assembled—most of them doubters, disbelievers, sneerers. After a few revolutions of the engine, some accident occurred from imperfect machinery, leading to a temporary suspension of the experiment. A sibilant voice arose from the crowd, "We said so. We knew it would not do." Scorn and derision were poured forth upon the man who, improving on the labors of his predecessor, Rumsey, was doing more for the benefit of his species than has ever been effected by all the mighty armies and victorious chiefs, "from Macedonia's madman to the Swede." Now, suppose that Fulton, before remedying the defect, had suddenly died—in a land of strangers, too—leaving no one with legal authority to act for him—leaving no one interested in his design, of skill and talent to consummate it—poor—embarrassed—in debt—with executions levied on his very boat and engine, and merely suspended as a matter of special grace, until this trial should be made: suppose, from these or the like causes, the completion of the steamboat had been postponed for another twenty years; at the end of which time some other ingenious man who had witnessed Fulton's efforts—who was intimate with his plans—who had been deeply impressed by his powerful and lucid arguments, and warmed and excited to take an interest in the subject, by his bold and sanguine spirit—had, after long private preparation, openly resumed the project; and, under more favorable auspices—from a more advanced state of the mechanic arts, or the benign influence of a more liberal patronage—had succeeded, triumphantly succeeded, in establishing the utility of the steamboat, either on some of Fulton's plans, or by modifications and improvements of his own; now, I ask the friends of Fulton whether, in this state of the case—and more especially if his had been the original effort—his memory should have gone down into oblivion, unknown and unhonored by his country? As success alone, naked success, is the criterion by which the world forms its estimate of merit, I know this other individual would, generally, have monopolized the honor; but the inquiring, the reflecting, and the just, would not have passed unregarded the name of Fulton.

Mr. Speaker, I would not, if I could, take a single ray from the just fame of Fulton. It is admitted on all hands that he improved upon, and first broadly introduced, the steamboat into general use, and for this alone he is entitled to the boundless and eternal gratitude of mankind. The world has been liberal in the conference of honor—something, too, his country has done for his descendants—something further this House proposed doing at the late session. To that measure, when it was first up—the only occasion when I was present—I gave my cordial assent; and I would have raised my voice in its favor, had I not been sensible, that a cause sustained as it was, by the fervid eloquence and powerful arguments of the gentlemen from South Carolina, Pennsylvania, New York, and Kentucky, (Messrs. LEGARE, BIDDLE, HOFFMAN, and CHAMBERS,) needed not my feeble advocacy. But in denying him originality I do him no injustice. He never claimed it himself. His partial biographer cannot claim it for him. The very first act of the New York Legislature in his favor, in 1798, recognizes him not as the inventor, but the improver. All men who have looked into the subject know that it did not begin with him. Long before, the design had been conceived, to a good extent accomplished, its practicability proved, and was persisted in and prosecuted under the most favorable circumstances, with unwavering confidence and irrepressible resolution, until his dying hour, by James Rumsey; but for his acquaintance with whom, it is probable the powerful mind of Fulton would never have been brought to act upon the subject, and but for whom it is probable the world would yet have been without the benefits of the steamboat.

Mr. Speaker, there was but one individual who contested Rumsey's title to priority in the application of steam to navigation; and about his claims I wish to make a remark or two, in a spirit of candor and charity; for, as to the experiment ascribed to the Spaniard Garay, three hundred years ago, and mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. DUNCAN,) at the last session, when I was not present, I can only say, that if any such ever was made, all knowledge of it had sunk into utter oblivion. Ages—centuries had rolled round, and the most profound silence and ignorance prevailed in regard to it. It was unknown to history—unknown to tradition—and could have had no influence whatever in bringing forward the steamboat in comparatively modern times. I acknowledge that this statement appears to me to be an entire fiction; that, if there be such a record, it was not based upon fact. It can scarcely be credited by any one who will look into the history of the forigin, progress, and improvement of the steam engine, which, more than two hundred years afterwards, was used for scarcely any purpose except pumping water from mines, where but little machinery, and nothing but a simple rectilinear action, was required. If Garay was thus three centuries in advance of all the world, while his genius challenges our highest admiration, we are forced to acknowledge that he lived in vain; for, if the archives of the Spanish monarchy do present any basis for this statement, there it would have mouldered into dust, if the success of the steamboat in this new world had not given interest to every thing connected with the subject, and caused the eye of some antiquarian to rest upon the passage, which would otherwise have been neglected as unintelligible or incredible.

I said, Mr. Speaker, there was but one person contested Rumsey's title to precedence. It is stated in the American Supplement to Rees's Encyclopedia—on the subject of Steam—that Fitch made an experiment on the Delaware in 1783. If this were true, he preceded Rumsey. But I challenge the world to produce the testimony of a respectable witness, living or dead, to corroborate this statement. None such can be produced. The assertion is utterly erroneous. Fitch himself did not claim to have thought of it (steam navigation) until 1785. In 1787 he built a boat and machinery on the Delaware, and made his first experiments in 1788. These facts are very clearly proven by various evidence before the committee. I will recapitulate but a part. The letter of General Washington to Governor Johnson, written in November, 1787, which I have before adverted to, says that Rumsey communicated to him his steamboat invention in November, 1784, and that some time afterwards Fitch called upon him, claiming for himself a similar invention, and requesting an introductory letter, "which he (Washington) declined giving, and went so far as to inform Mr. Fitch that, though he was not at liberty to disclose the principles of Mr. Rumsey's discovery, he could venture to assure him that he (Fitch) was not original, but that the idea had been communicated to him by Mr. Rumsey." Now, as Mr. Rumsey made no communication on the subject to Washington until November 1784, it is probable that this interview on the part of Fitch did not take place until the year following; and, indeed, as I will hereafter show, not until the commencement of 1786; and, in either case, it was at a time when Rumsey was exerting every nerve in preparing for that experiment which he made on the Potomac in 1786, and which I have before mentioned. At all events, it was long after the private experiments which Rumsey made in 1784, in order to test some of the principles of his invention. If the statement in the Encyclopedia, that Fitch made experiments on the Delaware near Philadelphia, in 1783, were true, can it be believed that Washington, whose comprehensive vision took in every thing likely to be of any use to his country, would, at so short a distance, have never heard of it? And if he had never heard of it, can it be credited that Fitch, whose originality was questioned and denied, would have failed in certifying him of it? And if Washington had either heard of it before, or been informed of it by Fitch at this meeting, could he, to whom Rumsey had made no disclosure on the subject till November, 1784, have said to Fitch, Sir, you are not original; Rumsey is before you. No! every one will see in that letter, not only a refutation of the statement in the Encyclopædia, but a refutation of Fitch's claim to precedence. On his own presentation of his case—on his own statements, declarations, and admissions, Washington refuses to give him a letter, and assures him that he has been anticipated by Rumsey. There is also a letter from Washington to Rumsey, written in March, 1786, bearing upon this point. It will be seen in the 12th volume of Sparks's Life. In this letter Washington urges Rumsey to bring forward his invention; warns him that his secret is leaking out, and that others will take advantage of it, and goes on to state that one individual had called on him, claiming for himself a plan of steam navigation, and requesting a letter of introduction, which he declined giving. Now, it can scarcely be doubted that the individual here alluded to was Fitch, and that his interview gave rise to this admonitory letter, and took place not long before its date.

Application of Steam to Navigation—Dr. Rumsey.

The January number of the "New York Review," just published, contains a well-written article on "steam navigation," and I regret that the writer was not in possession of all the facts touching its early history. It therein appears that Mr. Ogden, claiming certain rights as representative of Fitch, asserted them by petition before the Legislature of New York. Among other testimony before the committee raised on this petition, was that of Gen. Bloomfield, fixing the period of Fitch's experiment to 1787 or 1788. On the authority of De Warville, the correspondent of Jefferson, and an eminent French writer of that period, I feel warranted in saying that it was the latter year.

In his work—published in 1789—which will be found in your library, he states that, being in Philadelphia in September, 1788, he attended by invitation and witnessed Fitch's experiment. In a note, written in the February following, in London, he says:

"I have just become acquainted with Mr. Rumsey, of Virginia, a gentleman of great ingenuity, who proposes building a vessel in which, without sails, and by steam alone, he will cross the Atlantic in fifteen days."

This sublime conception, this bold undertaking of Rumsey, the accomplishment of which in the last year has created so vast a sensation, was not unknown to me and others of his family, but, without the high authority of De Warville, I would not have ventured to have named it. The English article in the Encyclopædia manifests much ignorance and carelessness in its preparation; as, for instance, without the shadow of truth or evidence, it ascribes to Mr. Symington, the honor of introducing the steamboat into America, and at the same time states, that Symington's first experiments were on the Forth and Clyde, in 1801. Lord Stanhope, Symington, the Abbe Arnel of France, Fulton, and others, seem to have been urged to reflection and action on this subject, in consequence of Rumsey's operations in London. The American supplemental article in the Encyclopædia is also, in many respects, unfair, disingenuous, and untrue. The compiler, who is the partial eulogist of Fulton, aware that he cannot ascribe to his favorite the glory of originality, endeavors to mystify and becloud, rather than to illustrate, the true history of the invention of the steamboat. He gives to Fitch, whose claims were untenable, precedence of Rumsey; and I think I have shown that he succeeded him, although I have dwelt on but a part of the evidence: that evidence, taken together, most clearly proves that Fitch was but a borrower. The compiler goes further, and, as if to do away with all claim which Rumsey, or even Fitch, might have upon the good opinion of their countrymen, says that the idea of steam navigation had been entertained at a still earlier period by Hulls of England, and that therefore he is better entitled to the honor of originality, than Rumsey, although he admits that he made no attempt to reduce it to practice, and Rumsey, under the most adverse circumstances, actually succeeded in running a boat against the current of a river four or five miles an hour. The compiler further alleges that Rumsey, with unlimited patronage, and after full trial, abandoned the project as hopeless. Indisputable testimony shows that the assertion is as unfounded and false as it is illiberal and cruel. I judge that it is from his work that the Secretary of the Treasury deduces, what he call his "miscellaneous facts" in the report upon the steam engine laid upon our tables a few days ago. And from the misquotation of names and confusion of dates—caused, no doubt, by hasty reference—he has not improved the accuracy of the original article.

From the ignorance and carelessness, wilful or otherwise, displayed in this treatise in the Encyclopædia, I have no confidence in the statement that Hulls of England, obtained a patent for steam navigation, one hundred years ago. I am led to this conclusion by various reflections. The steam engine at that early day, and, indeed, down to the time of Watt in the latter part of the eighteenth century, was very inefficient, and very little used even for the simplest purposes. It is not stated, so far as my examination has gone, what agent Hulls contemplated using, whether steam or animal power. And further, Rumsey obtained a patent from the British Government, for the same object (steam navigation) long afterwards, (in 1788,) which was then considered by all the intelligent and scientific men of London as new and original.

But even if the idea of steam navigation had been entertained in Europe at this anterior period, Rumsey was not the less original. There was no knowledge in America that such a design had ever been presented in Europe. Rumsey, imperfectly educated as he was, with a slight acquaintance with books, relying, as he did, on his own resources, on his own inventive genius, had never heard of it, and even if he had heard that such a suggestion had been made, it can operate nothing in diminution of his merit. I, sir, can declare that I have invented a plan for aerial navigation—that I have devised a machine by which I will soar aloft above the dull atmosphere encompassing the earth, where clouds and storms prevail, into the pure regions of ether, where, manufacturing an air suitable to the sustentation of life, I will traverse thousands of miles an hour. But if I stop here—if I exhibit no plan—if I devise no machinery, if I, in no way, prove its feasibility—surely I am entitled to no credit for this suggestion of a wandering fancy, common, no doubt, to thousands. If you afterwards, whether you have heard my suggestion or not, devise a plan, construct machinery, and actually succeed in navigating the air, the honor of originality is exclusively your own. I cannot participate—it would be preposterous for me to arrogate any portion of the credit. If, from the infant state of the mechanic arts, or your poverty, or your early death, you left it incomplete, although you had done enough to prove its practicability, and to attract to it the attention of ingenious and scientific men, and another afterwards, improving upon your plan, brought it into successful and general operation, would it not be unfair that your claims, although you had found the diamond, although you had put the ball in motion, should be entirely superseded and disregarded? Should not the world, in the rendition of a just judgment, place you at least on terms of equality?

Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House longer; I have already occupied too much time. I will only add, that while many of the representatives of James Rumsey are poor, very poor—for, in consequence of his early death, they never derived any benefits from the numerous inventions of their ancestor, except such as have been enjoyed by the whole country—there is yet one of them whose claims address themselves to the best sympathies of our nature. The one to whom I allude is the only son, the only living child, of James Rumsey. While his father was in England devoting himself with fatal intensity to the completion of the steamboat, that son, by a malignant disease—scarlet fever—was, in early infancy, deprived of the faculties of speech and hearing. Talented, ingenious, ready and dexterous at various mechanical employments, he is now earning a scanty subsistence by daily labor; but, with the improvidence common to persons in his condition, making no preparation for approaching old age. To the support and comfort of the evening of his life, I have thought his country might contribute something, without violating any principles of wise policy.

Mr. Speaker, I have stood upon the bank of the beautiful river which washes the broad border of my own beloved State, and contemplated the majestic steam palace in her proud career, exchanging with rapidity and cheapness the productions of different climes, conveying with comfort and expedition the travelling public, giving new life and energy to commerce, to agriculture, to national industry and enterprise: I say, Mr. Speaker, I have stood in musing mood upon the shore of the fair Ohio, and viewed the noble steamer moving victorious against wind and current, and then reflected that the only son of the man who first seriously attracted the attention of the skilful and ingenious to the subject—the only son of the man who first yoked the power of steam to the car of commerce—the only son of the man who first, by actual trial, proved its practicability—the only son of the man who, in his arduous struggles to perfect and present to the world the steamboat, expended his little fortune, banished himself from his home and his country, and, in spite of all obstacles, was pushing onwards to success, when arrested by sudden death. When I have reflected that the only son of this man was toiling for his daily bread, smitten by his God, and neglected by his country—when I have contemplated that and this spectacle, the steamboat and this unfortunate son of its inventor, feelings, emotions, reflections, have crowded upon me of a character which, as a patriot, a philanthropist, and a Christian, I acknowledge it was improper and sinful to entertain. To the support of that stricken one I have thought his country, abounding in resources, with more hundreds of millions of public domain than she can squander in ages, might contribute something more substantial than a medal, without any extraordinary stretch of liberality. But it is not for me to solicit it, even for him. I shall be gratified, deeply gratified, if the Government of his country shall honor the memory of his father for all his sacrifices and all his services by the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I could have wished that the task which I have endeavored to discharge had been undertaken by another. But while I knew that on every subject of a political or party nature there would be, on this arena, a host of intellectual champions armed cap-a-pie, panting for the conflict, and struggling for the floor, I apprehend that, in a cause of this kind, which is rather of private concernment, there would be but little interest felt, and but few, if any, prepared to couch a friendly or defensive lance. Hence I have been constrained to trespass on the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I have no pecuniary interest in this matter; yet, occupying the peculiar position which I do, if any vote should be taken, I will, of course, be excused from participating in it.

The resolution passed the House by a unanimous vote.

Tariff Compromise Act of 1833.

[FEBRUARY, 1839.]

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 11.

Tariff Compromise Act of 1833—Historical Incidents—Its Origin—Its Design to prevent the Impending Prostration of the Protective System.

Mr. BENTON observed that some days ago, in the discussion of a bill then before the Senate, he had occasion to take some notice of the compromise act; and he then made a statement of what had passed in relation to it between himself and a gentleman who was then a Senator from the State of New Jersey, and head of the Committee on Manufactures. Since making that statement, he had had reason to address a letter to the gentleman whose name he mentioned, (Governor DICKERSON,) on the subject, and he had received an answer which he would read to the Senate, and then let that answer stand as his statement. Mr. B. here read the following:

SUCKASUNNY, (N. J.), Feb. 5, 1839.

DEAR SIR: Last evening I received yours of the 30th ultimo, which, no doubt, had been detained on the road a day or two, in consequence of the heavy rain by which our country has been lately deluged.

Your letter contains an extract from the National Intelligencer, in which it is denied that Mr. WEBSTER had said to me that he had not been consulted as to the compromise bill, &c., and you ask for my recollections as to this fact. I hasten to relate to you the facts in this case, so far as I can now recollect them. On the day before Mr. CLAY introduced this bill into the Senate, he mentioned to me that he had given notice that he should ask leave to introduce the bill on the next day, some of the leading features of which he stated to me. I had not heard the notice given. He said he had intended to show me the bill, but had been prevented by a multiplicity of business in which he had been engaged, but that I should see it in the morning.

Next morning I waited upon Mr. WEBSTER, and asked him if he was aware that such a bill was to be introduced. He assured me that he was not, and that he had not been consulted upon it, and expressed himself strongly of the disapprobation with which such a measure would be received in New England.

In the morning I arrived at my seat some minutes after the business of the day had commenced, and I found that Mr. CLAY had made his motion for leave to introduce his bill. Had I arrived before the business of the day had commenced, no doubt I should have had the opportunity of perusing the bill before it was presented. As it was, I never saw it until it was in print.

Mr. WEBSTER, as well as myself, opposed this bill, and both voted against it. If you read the debates that took place in the Senate on the subject, on the 21st, 22d, and 23d February, '33, I think you will be convinced that neither Mr. WEBSTER nor myself could have had any previous notice of this bill. I have not the file of papers by me, but you may easily find them at Washington. I will, however, refer you to Mr. WEBSTER's speech upon this bill, reported in Niles's Register, 4th series, vol. 8, page 7, in which you will find abundant proof that he could not have been consulted as to its object or details.

Among other expressions are these: "There was no expectation at the commencement of this short session that such a bill would be passed. The Senate had not had time to know the pleasure of their masters. No opportunity had been offered for obtaining a knowledge of either the course of public opinion, or the effect of this measure on the public interests." If Mr. WEBSTER had been consulted on this bill, would he have made such declarations? or if made, would they have passed unanswered?

Mr. CLAY had previously stated to me his fears, that Mr. VERPLANCE's bill, which he considered as an administration measure, or some other bill originally from the same source, would pass, greatly to the injury, if not destruction, of the manufacturing interest of the country, and suggested the propriety of making further concessions, in addition to those of the law of '32, as the only means of saving even a part of the protective system, but without stating what those concessions should be. I answered him, that I did not fear Mr. VERPLANCE's bill; that it could never pass; that it was already so altered and amended that I did not believe Mr. VERPLANCE would vote for it himself; and that, at all events, we should suffer the law of 1832 to go into complete operation before we should make any alterations in its provisions.

There was no obligation on the part of Mr. CLAY to consult me on this bill; what he said to me I considered as a mere act of courtesy. The bill originated with himself, without any participation of the Committee on Manufactures, of which both he and I were members. The fact, however, that I was associated with him on that committee, led to a belief that I must have been acquainted with the provisions of the bill before it was matured, and subjected me to some unpleasant inquiries, as to this fact, in one of which, no doubt, I stated to you the conversation I had had with Mr. WEBSTER.

I regret extremely being called on to state conversations long past, with gentlemen whose recollections now, or understanding at the time, may not be precisely the same as my own; more especially as there was much misapprehension in the public papers as to the debates upon this bill.

I am, with great respect,

Your obedient servant,

MAHLON DICKERSON.

Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. B. said he had felt himself called on to write to Governor DICKERSON, to know whether he had made any mistake in the statement he gave as to what had passed between them. He now presented Governor DICKERSON's own words, by which it would be seen that the statement he had made was substantially correct.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that it was, of course, very well known that he differed with the Senator from Kentucky as to the propriety of passing the compromise act. He never complained, however, of any want of courtesy or kindness in the Senator for not consulting him on the subject. The truth was, that the Senator from Kentucky did communicate to him, some weeks before, that he had it in contemplation to bring forward an important measure, without saying what that measure was. He certainly did become acquainted with the measure before the Senator introduced it; but he could not say that he knew of it before the notice was given in the Senate. He was inclined to think that the conversation of which Governor DICKERSON speaks, was about the time of the notice given of the intention of the Senator from Kentucky to introduce the bill. All he had at present to say was, that, differing as he did with the Senator from Kentucky with regard to the measure spoken of, he made no complaint as to his not being consulted.

Mr. CLAY said he did not know that it was a matter of the slightest consequence to the Senate or the public, to be informed of the preliminary steps which led to the adoption of a great public measure; it was sufficient to say that it was submitted by himself, on his own responsibility; and, after a full discussion in the committee, in the Senate, and in the House of Representatives, was adopted by decisive majorities, and responded to by the nation with an enthusiasm almost unexampled. He was not responsible to any whether consultations were or were not held on the subject before its introduction to the Senate; it was sufficient for him to say that it was introduced, and passed in the manner he had mentioned.

Mr. C. said he came to this city from Ashland, in December, 1832. At that time there was an impression generally prevalent that the protective system was about to receive a fatal shock, and would be prostrated. Immediately after his arrival, he proceeded to Philadelphia, in company with a friend from Louisiana, since deceased. While there, the project of a compromise of this great and important question presented itself to his mind, and was the subject of reflection and consultation with that friend. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) passed through Philadelphia about that time, and the plan was communicated to him: it was true that the Senator expressed his disapprobation of it. A committee of very intelligent gentlemen interested in manufactures waited on him (Mr. C.) to know what could be done to save them from the danger that was threatening them. To this committee he communicated his plan of settling this question, at least for a term of years, and it met their hearty concurrence and approval.

Upon his return to this city, he consulted the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. DAVIS,) upon the subject, and he at first expressed his approbation of it, but after further consultation and reflection upon it, his views were changed, and he voted against it. He thought it was prior to his introduction of the bill into the Senate, that he called a meeting of his political friends at his lodgings; there were some eight or ten present, and his impression was that the Senator from Massachusetts was there: certain he was that he was invited. The bill was read at this meeting, and its provisions discussed; and the fact that he (Mr. C.) had such a measure in contemplation was notorious in both Houses of Congress, and one or two motions were made by persons who had some glimpses of the plan to anticipate its introduction. He regarded these particulars respecting the preliminaries to the introduction of the compromise act, except as matters of history, unimportant; the great and beneficial results that had followed its adoption, was a sufficient excuse for its introduction.

With regard to the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON,) whose letter had been read, he was upon such terms with him as to forbid a confidential intercourse between them. He knew that he was a warm friend of the manufacturing interest, but he was also a friend of the Administration; and he stood as many others, who considered their devotion to the Administration paramount to their devotion to the highest interests of their country. It seems that from his letter, he did mention the matter to him, and it might be so, but he had no recollection of having done so.

Mr. BENTON rose to say that he had no connection with this conversational debate, except in the single point of the accuracy of his statement of what had passed between Governor DICKERSON and himself. He had read the letter for the single purpose of showing that he had committed no error in reporting the conversation of that gentleman. His object was accomplished by the reading of the letter itself; and he believed it was apparent that there was no mistake either in himself or in Governor DICKERSON; and that the statement of the latter was very consistent with the remarks which the reading of the letter had called forth.

Mr. DAVIS well remembered the transactions of the period referred to, for he felt a very strong interest in what was going on. He was ready and willing to do the Senator from Kentucky all the justice he was entitled to, and could corroborate his statement except as to that part in which the Senator stated that he (Mr. D.) was at one time favorably disposed towards the compromise act, which was not so, as he had been opposed to it from first to last.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) seemed to suppose that he (Mr. W.) was present at a consultation prior to the introduction of the bill in the Senate, or that he was invited to attend. The latter was very probable, but he had no recollection whatever of being present at any such consultation.

Mr. KNIGHT made a few observations, too inaudible to be understood, which terminated the discussion on the subject.

SATURDAY, February 16.

Inland Trade between New Mexico and Missouri
—Custom-house on Missouri Frontier.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, requesting Congress to pass a law altering the present mode of issuing titles to land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

3d SESS.]

Petition of the Florentine Lady, America Vespucci.

[FEBRUARY, 1839.]

Also, a memorial from the same, praying the establishment of a port of entry and custom-house at some point on the Missouri River, and allowing those who trade with Mexico by land the privilege of drawback and debenture. Mr. LINN went into a number of interesting details, showing the importance and former extent of the trade between this country and the Mexican provinces, and with the Indians of the Oregon Territory, and its comparative insignificance at present. The Hudson Bay Company, from their great facilities and advantages, were monopolizing the whole Indian and Mexican trade, as they imported their goods free of duty; and they would soon obtain a dangerous ascendancy over the minds of the Indians. He said that if there was not prompt action on the part of Congress on this subject, not only the trade with the Mexican provinces would cease, but that the territory inhabited by these Indians would be wrested from us. Mr. L. said he had, some days since, introduced a bill for the occupation of the Oregon Territory, with a view to doing something on this subject, which he hoped the Senate would consider and act upon at an early day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 19.

Reorganization of the Navy.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BANKS in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The question immediately before the committee, was the motion of Mr. CARY to strike out from the bill the appropriation to the navy board.

Mr. KENNEDY, who was entitled to the floor, said he was pleased that the House had, since he obtained it, shaped for itself another course, by adopting the resolution calling for a report of a plan from the Secretary of the Navy at the next session for reorganizing this board, and, therefore, rendered it unnecessary for him to say much as to the particular motion before the House. He thought the course adopted was the most appropriate one. Mr. K. then went on to review the policy of the past and present Administrations, and denounced it in unmeasured terms.

Mr. HOWARD then obtained the floor, and said, as a friend of the navy, he returned his sincere thanks to the gentleman from Michigan for the interest he evinced in hurrying forward the proposition; and, instead of being rebuked on account of the section of country from which it came, as he had been done by some gentlemen, he merited their thanks.

He then went on to reply, at length, to his colleague, (Mr. KENNEDY,) in vindication of the Administration. He referred to the essential services which that gentleman had rendered in breaking down the administration of John Q.

Adams, which he had just eulogized, and the great talent he had evinced, and had devoted, to bringing into existence the administrations of General Jackson and Martin Van Buren, which he had just denounced in such unmeasured terms. He looked upon the violent struggle of the Opposition for the Presidency, as the prolific source from which sprung all the evils of the present day which his colleague (Mr. K.) complained of. He then referred to the tariff question, which, he feared, instead of being settled with a single eye to the interest of the country, would be pressed into requisition to subserve party ends, and instanced the periodical attempts to agitate that question just preceding the past Presidential elections. He referred to the question of limitation to the term of service of the Presidency, which had been spoken of by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. UNDERWOOD,) and intimated that he would be in favor of a limitation to one term of six years. He then examined the charge of proscription which had been so frequently rung in the ears of the party, and referred to the large number of the Opposition in office in the State he in part represented, and elsewhere, and reviewed the course pursued by the Opposition where they had the power.

Mr. KENNEDY briefly rejoined.

Mr. BRONSON said that, at the suggestion of many gentlemen who were friendly to the amendment itself, but who did not consider this as the proper time to press it, and especially since the passage of the resolution of this morning rendered further action at this time unnecessary, he would withdraw the amendment he had offered; and he withdrew it accordingly.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 23.

The Vice President leaves the Chair for the Session.

The VICE PRESIDENT said, that according to usage, he did not intend to resume his seat in the Senate this session. He had a great deal of correspondence, and some business at the public offices to attend to, which the Senate knew that he could not do while performing his duties in the chair, and therefore his absence from the Senate became indispensably necessary. He would take this occasion to express his obligations to the members of the Senate, for the kindness and courtesy with which he had been treated during the years he had presided over their deliberations, and he concluded by wishing them all a safe and happy return to their families and their homes.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 26.

Petition of the Florentine Lady, America Vespucci.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of America Vespucci, made the following report thereon:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred so much of the petition of America Vespucci as relates to a grant of land, beg leave to report:

That, conceiving it to be their duty to verify the facts upon which the application was founded, they have examined a voluminous mass of documentary evidence, and find the statements of the memorial to be fully sustained. They have seen the authentic certificates of baptism, through many generations, of the Vespucci family in Florence, which attest the lineage and descent of the memorialist. They have read the highly favorable and complimentary letter of the Queen of the French, through her secretary, to the petitioner. They have read the letter to her of the King of the French, through the Minister of the Interior, subscribing for a work for the King, of which she was the author; and have also read the permission of the French Minister of the Marine for her to sail in a French national vessel. The committee have also had before them her credentials from the Minister of Tuscany, in France, and many other papers of high character and authenticity in her favor. They have also witnessed her own personal deportment here, and the manner in which she has been received by the French legation, which, added to other testimonials, leave not a doubt of the identity of the memorialist, and the truth of her representations.

After the lapse, then, of more than three centuries, a descendant of the celebrated Americus Vesputius is amongst us. This heroic navigator, before, and also after the close of the fifteenth century, landed upon the shores of the new world, among the most early and scientific of those who succeeded the great and pre-eminent Columbus in the discovery of this continent. A descriptive narrative of his several voyages was written and published by Americus, and Europe baptized with his name this mighty continent. This name can never now be abandoned. It is the name of our beloved country. It is associated with all the glories of the past, and the still brighter hopes of the future. It is written upon our national constitution, and engraven upon the heart of every true American. Under this name we have succeeded in two struggles with the most formidable power in Europe, and have so wonderfully augmented in population that, should the same ratio of increase continue for the future, the close of this century will find within our limits more than one hundred millions of people, and more than five millions within the single city of New York. In reflecting, then, with glory upon the name of America, can we forget the great navigator from whom we derived this proudest of earthly titles? A descendant of Americus is now here; a young, interesting, dignified, and accomplished lady, with a mind of the highest intellectual culture, and a heart beating with all our own enthusiasm in the cause of American and of human liberty. She feels that the name she bears is a prouder title than any that earthly monarchs can bestow, and she comes here asking of us a small corner of American soil where she may pass the remainder of her days in this the land of her adoption. She comes here as an exile, separated forever from her family and friends, a stranger, without a country and without a home, expelled from her native Italy for the avowal and maintenance of opinions favorable to free institutions, and an ardent desire for the establishment of her country's freedom. That she is indeed worthy of the name of America; that her heart is indeed imbued with American principles and a fervent love of human liberty, is proved, in her case, by toils, and perils, and sacrifices, worthy of the proudest days of antiquity, when the Roman and the Spartan matron were ever ready to surrender life itself in their country's service.

The petitioner desires the donation to her of a small tract of land by Congress. With every feeling of respect and kindness for the memorialist, a majority of the committee deem it impossible for this Government to make the grant. They think such a grant without a precedent, and that it would violate the spirit of those compacts by which the public domain was ceded to this Government. It is the unanimous and anxious desire of the committee that the petitioner should receive all the benefits and recognition that this Government can bestow. What this Government cannot do is within the power of the American people. They feel at least an equal pride and glory with us in the name of America. Throughout our wide-extended country, among all classes, this feeling is universal; and in the humblest cottage the poorest American feels that this name, the name of his beloved country, is a prouder title than any that adorns the monarch's brow, and that if he has no other property, this name, with all its great and glorious associations, with the past and hopes for the future, is an all-sufficient heritage to transmit to his children. This generous, patriotic, and enlightened people will take into their own hands the case of America Vespucci. They will procure for her that home which she desires among us. They will do all that Congress is forbidden to do, and infinitely more than she asks or desires, and demonstrate to the world that the name of America, our country's name, is dear to us all, and shall be honored, respected, and cherished in the person of the interesting exile from whose ancestor we derive the great and glorious title.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Lawless Trespassers and Depredators, from the British Provinces, on the State of Maine.

THE PRESIDENT submitted the following Message from the President of the United States:

I lay before Congress several despatches from his Excellency the Governor of Maine, with enclosures, communicating certain proceedings of the Legislature of that State, and a copy of the reply of the Secretary of State, made by my direction, together with a note from H. S. Fox, Esq., Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, with the answer of the Secretary of State to the same.

It will appear from those documents, that a numerous band of lawless and desperate men, chiefly from the adjoining British Provinces, but without the authority or sanction of the Provincial Government, had trespassed upon that portion of the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain which is watered by the River Aroostook, and claimed to belong to the State of Maine; and that they had committed extensive depredations there by cutting and destroying a very large quantity of timber. It will further appear that the Governor of Maine, having been officially apprised of the circumstance, had communicated it to the Legislature, with a recommendation of such provisions, in addition to those already existing by law, as would enable him to arrest the course of said depredations, disperse the trespassers, and secure the timber which they were about carrying away; that in compliance with a resolve of the Legislature, passed in pursuance of his recommendation, his Excellency had despatched the land agent of the State, with a force deemed adequate to that purpose, to the scene of the alleged depredations, who, after accomplishing a part of his duty, was seized by a band of the trespassers, at a house claimed to be within the jurisdiction of Maine, whither he had repaired for the purpose of meeting and consulting with the land agent of the Province of New Brunswick, and conveyed as a prisoner to Fredericton, in that Province, together with two other citizens of the State, who were assisting him in the discharge of his duty.

Lawless Trespassers, from the British Provinces, on the State of Maine. [FEBRUARY, 1839.]

It will also appear that the Governor and Legislature of Maine, satisfied that the trespassers had acted in defiance of the laws of both countries, learning that they were in possession of arms, and anticipating (correctly, as the result has proved) that persons of their reckless and desperate character would set at naught the authority of the magistrates, without the aid of a strong force, had authorized the sheriff, and the officer appointed in the place of the land agent, to employ, at the expense of the State, an armed posse, who had proceeded to the scene of these depredations, with a view to the entire dispersion or arrest of the trespassers, and the protection of the public property.

In the correspondence between the Governor of Maine and Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, which has grown out of these occurrences, and is likewise herewith communicated, the former is requested to recall the armed party advanced into the disputed territory for the arrest of trespassers, and is informed that a strong body of British troops is to be held in readiness to support and protect the authority and subjects of Great Britain in said territory. In answer to that request, the Provincial Governor is informed of the determination of the State of Maine to support the land agent and his party, in the performance of their duty, and the same determination, for the execution of which provision is made by a resolution of the State Legislature, is communicated by the Governor to the General Government.

The Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in calling upon the Governor of Maine for the recall of the land agent and his party from the disputed territory, and the British Minister in making a similar demand upon the Government of the United States, proceed upon the assumption that an agreement exists between the two nations conceding to Great Britain, until the final settlement of the boundary question, exclusive possession of, and jurisdiction over, the territory in dispute. The important bearing which such an agreement, if it existed, would have upon the condition and interests of the parties, and the influence it might have upon the adjustment of the dispute, are too obvious to allow the error upon which this assumption seems to rest to pass for a moment without correction. The answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Fox's note, will show the ground taken by the Government of the United States upon this point. It is believed that all the correspondence which has passed between the two Governments upon this subject has already been communicated to Congress, and is now on their files.

An abstract of it, however, hastily prepared, accompanies this communication. It is possible that in thus abridging a voluminous correspondence, commencing in 1825, and continuing to a very recent period, a portion may have been accidentally overlooked; but it is believed that nothing has taken place which would materially change the aspect of the question as therein presented. Instead of sustaining the assumption of the British functionaries, that correspondence disproves the existence of any such agreement. It shows that the two Governments have differed not only in regard to the main question of title to the territory in dispute, but with reference also to the right of jurisdiction, and the fact of the actual exercise of it in different portions thereof. Always aiming at an amicable adjustment of the dispute, both parties have entertained and repeatedly urged upon each other a desire, that each should exercise its rights, whatever it considered them to be, in such a manner as to avoid collision, and allay, to the greatest practicable extent, the excitement likely to grow out of the controversy. It was in pursuance of such an understanding that Maine and Massachusetts, upon the remonstrance of Great Britain, desisted from making sales of lands, and the General Government from the construction of a projected military road in a portion of the territory of which they claimed to have enjoyed the exclusive possession; and that Great Britain, on her part, in deference to a similar remonstrance from the United States, suspended the issue of licenses to cut timber in the territory in controversy, and also the survey and location of a railroad through a section of country over which she also claimed to have exercised exclusive jurisdiction.

The State of Maine had a right to arrest the depredations complained of; it belonged to her to judge of the exigency of the occasion calling for her interference; and it is presumed that had the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick been correctly advised of the nature of the proceedings of the State of Maine, he would not have regarded the transaction as requiring, on his part, any resort to force. Each party claiming a right to the territory, and hence to the exclusive jurisdiction over it, it is manifest that, to prevent the destruction of the timber by trespassers, acting against the authority of both, and at the same time avoid forcible collision between the contiguous Governments during the pendency of negotiations concerning the title, resort must be had to the mutual exercise of jurisdiction in such extreme cases, or to an amicable and temporary arrangement as to the limits within which it should be exercised by each party. The understanding supposed to exist between the United States and Great Britain has been found heretofore sufficient for that purpose, and I believe will prove so hereafter, if the parties on the frontier, directly interested in the question, are respectively governed by a just spirit of conciliation and forbearance. If it shall be found, as there is now reason to apprehend, that there is, in the modes of construing that understanding by the two Governments, a difference not to be reconciled, I shall not hesitate to propose to her Britannic Majesty's Government a distinct arrangement for the temporary and mutual exercise of jurisdiction, by means of which similar difficulties may in future be prevented.

But between an effort on the part of Maine to preserve the property in dispute from destruction by intruders, and a military occupation by that State of the territory, with a view to hold it by force, while the settlement is a subject of negotiation between the two Governments, there is an essential difference, as well in respect to the position of the State, as to the duties of the General Government. In a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the Governor of Maine, on the first of March last, giving a detailed statement of the steps which had been taken by the Federal Government to bring the controversy to a termination, and designed to apprise the Governor of that State of the views of the Federal Executive, in respect to the future, it was stated, that while the obligations of the Federal Government to do all in its power to effect the settlement of the boundary question were fully recognized, it had, in the event of being unable to do so specifically, by mutual consent, no other means to accomplish that object amicably, than by another arbitration, or by a commission with an umpire in the nature of an arbitration; and that in the event of all other measures failing, the President would feel it his duty to submit another proposition to the Government of Great Britain, to refer the decision of the question to a third power. These are still my views upon the subject, and until this step shall have been taken, I cannot think it proper to invoke the attention of Congress to other than amicable means for the settlement of the controversy, or to cause the military power of the Federal Government to be brought in aid of the State of Maine, in any attempt to effect that object by a resort to force.

On the other hand, if the authorities of New Brunswick should attempt to enforce the claim of exclusive jurisdiction set up by them, by means of a military occupation on their part of the disputed territory, I shall feel myself bound to consider the contingency provided by the constitution as having occurred, on the happening of which a State has the right to call for the aid of the Federal Government to repel invasion.

I have expressed to the British Minister near this Government a confident expectation that the agents of the State of Maine, who have been arrested under an obvious misapprehension of the object of their mission, will be promptly released; and to the Governor of Maine that a similar course will be pursued in regard to the agents of the Province of New Brunswick. I have also recommended that any militia that may have been brought together by the State of Maine, from an apprehension of a collision with the Government or people of the British Province, will be voluntarily and peaceably disbanded.

I cannot allow myself to doubt that the results anticipated from these representations will be seasonably realized. The parties more immediately interested cannot but perceive that an appeal to arms, under existing circumstances, will not only prove fatal to their present interests, but would postpone, if not defeat, the attainment of the main objects which they have in view. The very incidents which have recently occurred, will necessarily awaken the Governments to the importance of promptly adjusting a dispute, by which it is now manifest that the peace of the two nations is daily and imminently endangered. This expectation is further warranted by the general forbearance which has hitherto characterized the conduct of the Government and people on both sides of the line. In the uniform patriotism of Maine, her attachment to the Union, her respect for the wishes of the people of her sister States, of whose interest in her welfare she cannot be unconscious, and, in the solicitude felt by the country at large for the preservation of peace with our neighbors, we have a strong guarantee that she will not disregard the request that has been made of her.

As, however, the session of Congress is about to terminate, and the agency of the Executive may become necessary during the recess, it is important that the attention of the Legislature should be drawn to the consideration of such measures as may be calculated to obviate the necessity of a call for an extra session. With that view, I have thought it my duty to lay the whole matter before you, and to invite such action thereon as you may think the occasion requires.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 26th February, 1839.

A very interesting discussion followed, in which MESSRS. BUCHANAN, WEBSTER, DAVIS, CLAY of Kentucky, WALKER, NORVELL, and WILLIAMS of Maine, participated; when,

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. TALMADGE, five thousand additional copies were ordered to be printed.

General Appropriation Bill—Branch Mints.

The House went into committee, and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill; the pending question still being on striking out the appropriations for the Branch Mints of North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, and providing salaries for persons to supervise the public property thereat.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that he would remain here all night, and move a call of the House, rather than again rise without closing the amendments on this bill.

The debate was continued at great length by MESSRS. OGLE, BYNUM, GRAHAM, and RENCHER.

Mr. CAMBRELENG appealed to the House to take the question, and let the bill be reported.

And the question on the amendment was taken, and rejected.

Mr. RIVES then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to amend the bill so as to conform to the resolutions which he had submitted to the Sen-

North-Eastern Frontier.

The PRESIDENT submitted the following Message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27, 1839.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of various other documents received from the Governor of Maine, relating to the dispute between that State and the Province of New Brunswick, which formed the subject of my Message on the 26th inst.; and also a copy of a memorandum signed by the Secretary of State of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States, of the terms upon which it is believed all collision can be avoided on the frontier, consistently with, and respecting the claims on either side. As the British Minister acts without specific authority from his Government, it will be observed that this memorandum has but the force of recommendation on the Provincial authorities and on the Government of the State.

M. VAN BUREN.

[MEMORANDUM.]

Her Majesty's authorities consider it to have been understood and agreed upon by the two Governments, that the territory in dispute between Great Britain and the United States, on the North-eastern frontier, should remain exclusively under British jurisdiction until the final settlement of the boundary question.

The United States Government have not understood the above agreement in the same sense, but consider, on the contrary, that there has been no agreement whatever for the exercise by Great Britain, of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, or any portion thereof, but a mutual understanding that, pending the negotiation, the jurisdiction then exercised by either party, over small portions of the territory in dispute, should not be enlarged, but be continued merely for the preservation of local tranquillity and the public property, both forbearing as far as practicable to exert any authority, and, when any should be exercised by either, placing upon the conduct of each other the most favorable construction.

A complete understanding upon the question, thus placed at issue, of present jurisdiction, can only be arrived at by friendly discussion between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain; and, as it is confidently hoped that there will be an early settlement of the question, this subordinate point of difference can be of but little moment.

In the mean time, the Governor of the Province of New Brunswick and the Government of the State of Maine will act as follows: Her Majesty's officers will not seek to expel, by military force, the armed party which has been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Aroostook River; but the Government of Maine will, voluntarily, and without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force now within them; and if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the Governments of Maine and New Brunswick.

The civil officers in the service respectively of New Brunswick and Maine, who have been taken into custody by the opposite parties, shall be released.

Nothing in this memorandum shall be construed to fortify or to weaken, in any respect whatever, the claim of either party to the ultimate possession of the disputed territory.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty having no specific authority to make any arrangement on the subject, the undersigned can only recommend, as they now earnestly do, to the Governments of New Brunswick and Maine, to regulate their future proceedings according to the terms herein set forth, until the final settlement of the territorial dispute, or until the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall come to some definite conclusion on the subordinate point upon which they are now at issue.

JOHN FORSYTH, Secretary of State of the United States of North America.

H. S. FOX, H. B. M. Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1839.

Defalcation Reports.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Select Committee appointed on the 17th of January last, to inquire and report as to the defalcations of public officers, made a report; when

Mr. OWENS, of the same committee, on behalf of the minority, by leave, submitted a report containing the views of the minority upon the subject-matters committed to the committee.

Mr. HARLAN, on behalf of the committee, moved the reading of the conclusions of the committee; and that 5,000 copies of the reports with the journal, and 20,000 copies of the reports without the journal, be printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN said he was not opposed to printing, but he objected to the reading, unless all the reports were read. And he called for the reading, accordingly.

Some conversation followed in different parts of the House, of which little could be heard, owing to the extreme confusion.

The CHAIR decided that it was a parliamentary right to call for the reading; and, after some further conversation on points of order,

The Clerk proceeded to read the report of the majority.

The reading was frequently interrupted by attempts to suspend it. And, after it had proceeded some way, on motion of Mr. OWENS, all the reports (by general consent) were laid on THURSDAY, February 28.

North-Eastern Boundary.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the President's Message, and accompanying documents, in relation to the existing difficulties on the North-eastern frontier, made a report thereon, which was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the Messages of the President of the United States of the 26th and the 27th inst., and the accompanying documents, in relation to the existing difficulties on the North-eastern frontier of the United States, report the following resolutions, and recommend their adoption by the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate can discover no trace, throughout the long correspondence which has been submitted to them, between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, of any understanding, express or implied, much less of any "explicit agreement," such as is now alleged, that the territory in dispute between them on the North-eastern boundary of the latter, shall be placed and remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of her Britannic Majesty's Government until the settlement of the question; on the contrary, it appears that there was, and is, a clear subsisting understanding between the parties, under which they have both acted, that, until this question shall be finally determined, each of them shall refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction over any portion of the disputed territory, except such parts of it as may have been in the actual possession of the one or the other party.

Resolved, That whilst the United States are bound, in good faith, to comply with this understanding, during the pendency of negotiations, the Senate cannot perceive that the State of Maine has violated the spirit of it by merely sending, under the authority of the Legislature, her land agent, with a sufficient force, into the disputed territory, for the sole purpose of expelling lawless trespassers engaged in impairing its value by cutting down the timber; both parties having a common right, and being bound by a common duty, to expel such intruders from a territory to which each claims title, taking care, however, to retire within their acknowledged limits when this single object shall have been accomplished.

Resolved, That should her Britannic Majesty's Government, in violation of the clear understanding between the parties, persist in carrying its avowed determination into execution, and attempt, by military force, to assume exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, all of which, they firmly believe, rightfully belongs to the State of Maine, the exigency, in the opinion of the Senate, will then have occurred, rendering it the imperative duty of the President, under the constitution and the laws, to call forth the militia, and employ the military force of the United States, for the purpose of repelling such an invasion. And in this event, the Senate will cordially co-operate with and sustain the President in defending the rights of the country.

Resolved, That should the British authorities refrain from attempting a military occupation of the territory in dispute, and from enforcing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, that then, in the opinion of the Senate, the State of Maine ought, on her part, to pursue a course of similar forbearance. And should she refuse to do so, and determine to settle the controversy for herself by force, the adjustment of which is intrusted under the constitution to the Federal Government, in such an event there will be no obligation imposed on that Government to sustain her by military aid.

The report was ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow.

Treasury Notes.

The bill to revive and continue in force the act providing for the issue of Treasury notes, came up on its third reading.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to make an inquiry of Mr. WRIGHT, whether there was any intention of selling the remaining bond due by the Bank of the United States, gave it unhesitatingly as his opinion that the sale of the second bond was not only perfectly legal, but a judicious proceeding. He thought, moreover, that the manner in which the funds had been disbursed had a considerable agency in the resumption of specie payments.

The bill was passed without a division.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 28.

Florida War—Lost Horses.

The bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for 1839, then came up on its third reading.

Mr. BELL renewed the following amendment, moved by him in committee:

"For paying the value of the horses and equipage of the Tennessee and other volunteers who have at any time been in the service of the United States in the Territory of Florida, and which were turned over to the Government by the order of the commanding general, or other commanding officer, said value to be ascertained by the appraisement of said value when the volunteers entered the service, $52,000.

"And the provisions of acts approved and in force at various periods since 1813, authorizing payment for horses lost in the service of the United States by rangers, militia, and volunteers, are hereby revived and extended for two years, from and after the passage of this act, and under the action of the Third Auditor shall be deemed to embrace all cases not already satisfied, of horses lost to their owners in service as aforesaid, in battle or otherwise, where due care and diligence be rendered manifest on the part of the owner; and whether, if the death or loss of rangers' horses shall have occurred for want of forage, and at places when acting in obedience to the orders of commanding officers, forage could not have been procured by proper diligence on the part of the owner."

Mr. RUSSELL renewed his amendment to the amendment of Mr. BELL, by adding thereto the following:

"No payment, however, shall be made for horses or other property lost or destroyed, when the loss or destruction shall have been occasioned by the fault or neglect of the owner, or when, by the terms of the contract, the risk was upon the owner of the property. And the valuation, when horses have been turned over to the Government, shall be made at the time they were turned over.

Mr. TURNEY warmly opposed the proposition of Mr. R., and supported the original amendment.

After some further remarks from Messrs. THOMPSON and DOWNING,

Mr. BELL accepted the first branch of the amendment as a modification; but the second, he said, would have the effect of defeating the whole.

After a few further remarks from Mr. CHAMBERS, the last branch of Mr. RUSSELL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREENELL opposed the amendment of Mr. BELL, and entreated the House to put it off till next session, and not, thus in the dark, vote so large a draft upon the Treasury without having the facts or any investigation.

Mr. RUSSELL demanded the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the amendment was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 61.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 1.

General Appropriation Bill—Book Purchases—Disagreement of the two Houses.

The bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839, was taken up for consideration, and after several amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance had been concurred in, the amendment of the committee proposing to strike out the following section, viz: "For the balance due on account of the first volume of the Documentary History of the United States, five thousand six hundred and two dollars; and the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to deliver to the Secretary of the Senate forty copies of said work, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives three hundred and sixty-eight copies of said work, to be distributed to each of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the 23d, 24th, and 25th Congresses, who are not entitled to receive the same under former resolutions or acts of Congress," was considered.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped that the Senate would not strike out this appropriation. It was, in his opinion, a very small matter, and too unimportant to be wasting the time of the Senate on at this late period of the session. The House had thought proper to make this appropriation to fulfil the obligations of a contract entered into by this Government, and he thought the proper way was to agree to it, and not hazard the loss of the bill and the consequent stopping of the Government by delaying the passage of it. If gentlemen would persist in consuming time, and were determined to higggle with the House on this appropriation of five thousand dollars, he had warned them of the consequences, and they must take the responsibility.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if the Senator from Massachusetts thinks I am not aware of my responsibility, or that I fear to meet it, he does not know me. Mr. W. thought the time was come when the Senate should make a stand upon this subject, and said the responsibility of defeating the bill, if it was lost, would rest with those who had incorporated this provision into it. Mr. W. went on at some length in opposition to the practice of appropriating money for the purchase of books, and distributing them among themselves, and trusted that the Senate would not countenance it any longer.

After some remarks from Mr. BENTON in favor of the amendment, the question was taken on the recommendation of the committee, when

The PRESIDENT announced there was not a quorum in attendance.

Mr. SEVIER moved that there be a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT said the Senator from Arkansas might reach his object by moving that the Sergeant-at-arms be directed to summon the absent Senators, and if they refused attending, the presiding officer might issue his warrant, and have them brought before the Senate.

Mr. SEVIER modified his motion accordingly.

Several Senators requesting Mr. S. to withdraw his motion,

Mr. WALKER hoped that the Senator from Arkansas would persist in it. The only Senators who were invalids, and whose healths were endangered by the protracted sittings of that body, were in their seats attending to their public duties, while a majority of the Senate, who had not the plea of illness to offer as an excuse for their absence, were in their beds. He hoped the motion would be persisted in, and that Senators, if other motives could not induce them to do so, would be compelled by order of the body to attend to the public business.

After some conversation the motion was withdrawn, and

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 2.

General Appropriation Bill—Book Purchases—Documentary History of the United States.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839, was taken up, and the question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, to strike out the appropriation for the Documentary History—

MARCH, 1839.]

General Appropriation Bill—Book Purchases.

Mr. BENTON spoke at much length against the appropriation, and also against the distribution of the books, and read from reports of committees to justify what he said. He considered this whole business of printing books for members of Congress—a practice which had grown up within a few years past—to be one of the most abominable abuses which now beset the Government, and he considered this particular job as the most abominable of the whole. Taken in every way, the manner in which it was got through without the knowledge of the most attentive members—he meant others still more than himself—the enormity of the sum involved—the vast bulk and little worth of the work—and the distribution of it to the members that voted for it—and it was truly an abominable abuse. None of us knew that such a work was authorized by us. It was passed in 1833, and it was nearly a year afterwards before we discovered what we had done. He (Mr. B.) found it out from Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, at the next session, who was a member of a committee who discovered what had been done; and then, for the first time, it was found out that an act had been passed by which upwards of half a million of dollars, at the least, and possibly a million and a half, was to be given to an officer of the House of Representatives (Mr. St. C. Clarke, the Clerk of the House) and his partner, for printing a work to be given to those who voted that officer and his partner the money! As soon as found out, the abuse was resisted by some members, and has been resisted for six years, but without effect; for while a majority condemn and denounce it, yet they are placed under duress, and compelled to vote for the money and the distribution by putting them in the appropriation bills for the support of the Government, and then making it a question to lose the whole bill and stop the Government, or let the distribution go on. He, for one, would vote against it, and let the Government stop, if that should be the consequence; and let the people see who it was that would break up the Government before they would cease voting books to themselves! Even if the vote of the books was right in itself, it would be wrong to be put into an appropriation bill; and he would not be coerced by finding it there. But the whole practice was wrong in itself, and was becoming an enormous abuse—enormous for the amount of money—enormous for the principle—enormous for the frightful progress which it made—enormous for the consequences it might lead to. Every session we have jobs and distributions. A multitude of works have been printed and distributed. They multiply every session. We vote the money to the jobber—the jobber gives the books to us—and many of us sell the books instantaneously to Mr. Templeman, or some other purchaser. Twenty thousand—forty thousand—sixty thousand dollars—are a common vote, and done with a rapidity which defies all description, and in a way to escape the notice of the most attentive members. But this is a case, not of twenty—or forty—or sixty thousand dollars, but of one or two millions! It is absolutely a case of millions, and may be as many as the jobbers choose to make it. It is without limits or boundaries; it is to print whatever the jobbers choose to print—for there is no earthly control over them—under the name of the Documentary History of the Revolution. Already they inform us that the private and public libraries of America and Europe are to be explored to find either manuscript or printed matter to be published; and they are at liberty to publish all that they can find. The first computation supposed it might amount to a million and a half of dollars; then the undertakers, when the enormity of that sum startled everybody, proposed to put a limit on themselves by limiting the number of volumes. They proposed to limit the volumes to twenty, and left the number of pages unlimited, though estimated for at 800 pages. The pay was by the page—so much the page—and at this rate it would come to $20,400 a volume; and twenty volumes would make $408,000. This seemed to impose a limit, but it was all an illusion! The number of pages were unlimited, and instead of 800, the first volume—the only one printed—contains above 1,000 pages! and instead of $20,400, the estimated, the actual price is $26,000! and by doubling the pages, the next one may be $52,000. This bill is to pay a balance, a balance due for the first volume; and this balance is $5,600! the estimated price of $20,400 having been previously paid. At this rate the twenty volumes will cost $520,000; but there is nothing to limit it to that amount; the publishers can print what they please, as many volumes as they please, and as many pages as they please in each volume; and being paid by the page, the bulk of the work, and the amount of the price, is absolutely without limit! It is also without limit as to time! It may last for centuries, and through generations; and the families of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Force may be pensioned on the Federal Government through successive ages. It is a personal contract with Messrs. Clarke and Force; it will descend to their representatives; it has taken six years to make one volume; and twenty volumes, even if limited to that, would require, at the same rate, one hundred and twenty years to complete the work. So slow is the forthcoming work that we have been told on this floor—told by Mr. KING, of Georgia, who began the good work of opposing this business—that he was well informed that a member had sold his interest in the whole Documentary History, for which we pay a million or so, for ten dollars in hand.

Mr. B. then took the ground that the whole contract ought to be set aside, for fraud: first, in the manner of getting it through Congress in a way to prevent all knowledge of the magnitude of the work, and that by an officer of the

The Maine Boundary.

[MARCH, 1839.]

House; next, for want of moral or constitutional power in the Congress to vote themselves such presents; third, for the manner in which the price was fixed, and fixed nearly twice too much—as he proved, by reading answers to inquiries from the most eminent booksellers of Philadelphia and other cities, addressed to them by a committee of the House of Representatives after the discovery of the extent of the job given to Messrs. Clarke and Force. He read from the report to show that Messrs. Clarke and Force virtually fixed the price themselves by putting it into the face of the law, that they were to have at the same rate that Messrs. Blair and Rives were paid for a certain work, the price of which was fixed by Mr. Force, who was selected by Mr. Clarke and Mr. Lowry for that purpose; Clarke and Force's bill depending in Congress, while Mr. Force, as a referee, was fixing the price of work which was to govern his own.

Mr. B. finished with declaring that this book printing and book distributing business had become an enormous abuse; that the attention of the country ought to be roused up to it; and if the bill for the support of the Government was lost, it would rouse the country, and, in the end, save millions. For his own part, he had been resisting this business for six years without any effect, for it was growing and increasing annually. But he should go on opposing it, opposing all these jobs, great and small. He had to encounter friends and foes, and to draw on himself censure and opposition. He was sorry for it, but he could not help it. The abuse must be stopped, and he had taken a fixed and inexorable resolution to try and stop it. He had put on his iron nerves, and should yield to neither friends nor foes.

Mr. SOUTHARD spoke in reply, insisting that this sum was due under a contract which was a law of the land; and that Congress, before withholding appropriations, ought to declare that contract null and void, which no one dared to propose in direct terms, or else they ought to make a compromise, and allow Clarke and Force suitable damages.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would vote for this appropriation, but a sense of duty would not allow him to vote in favor of giving books to members of Congress. He agreed, however, if Clarke and Force should suffer damage on account of a failure in Congress to fulfil a contract, they ought to be remunerated.

On the call of Mr. FOSTER, the question was divided so as to ascertain, first, whether the Senate would make this appropriation; and, second, whether the books should be distributed as provided for by the bill.

The former of these questions was decided in the negative, thus striking out the appropriation of $5,602 by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson;

Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Foster, Knight, Merrick, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, and Webster—13.

The question on the distribution of the books was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Walker, Wall, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Wright—29.

The Maine Boundary—Increased Power and Means to the President in the event of Invasion of that State.

The bill from the House giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defence of the United States in certain cases against invasion, and for other purposes, was received, the 16th joint rule in the way of its reception was suspended, and the Senate proceeded forthwith to consider the bill. After having been read the first time,

Mr. BENTON observed that he did not think it necessary, at this late period of the session, and under present circumstances, to refer this bill to a committee. The subject was perfectly understood by every Senator; the bill, as it had passed the House, was on their tables; and the sense of the Senate had been fully expressed in the resolutions unanimously adopted last evening. He therefore thought that they had better not refer the bill, but take it up in Committee of the Whole, and act on it at once.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the bill from the House, now before the Senate, entirely met his approbation, with perhaps a single exception. Under all the circumstances, he doubted the policy of sending a special minister to England; but he should make no motion to strike this provision from the bill, unless his doubts might be fortified by the opinion of other Senators. With this exception, if such it ought to be considered, the bill, he believed, was just such a one as the Committee on Foreign Relations would have unanimously reported to the Senate, had it not been deemed more proper that this measure should originate in the House. It was precisely in accordance with the resolutions which had passed the Senate last night, by which we pledged ourselves, that in case the British Government should attempt to take possession of the disputed territory, we would stand by the President of the United States, and sustain him with all the military power of the nation in repelling this aggression. This bill contained no provisional army. It simply authorized a resort to the militia and volunteers, in case it should become necessary to call out a military force before Congress could be convened, and appropriated the money necessary to accomplish the object. Mr. B. agreed with his friend from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) that it was unnecessary to refer this bill to a committee, as it was plain and simple in its provisions, and the session so near its close. As to the propriety of sending a special minister to England—he would be glad to hear the opinion of other Senators on this subject.

Mr. TALLMADGE observed that he differed with the Senator from Pennsylvania in one particular. He was highly in favor of sending a special minister to England. He thought the minister sent should be a man of character and standing, and he had no idea that the President would send any other.

Mr. SOUTHARD acknowledged that he felt great difficulty in passing so promptly on a bill of such magnitude. He did not view it in the light that other Senators did, as carrying out the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but going far beyond them. He greatly feared the consequences of passing such a bill, and was alarmed at what would be the result of its passage. For if it did pass, and the President should call for the volunteers authorized by it, there would be a war between this country and Great Britain which might last for years. Where were these volunteers to be raised, and how? The moment, said Mr. S., that that bill is passed, you will find volunteers assembling under it, and eager to march into the British territories.

Now, I ask you (continued Mr. S.) to look upon the whole of our frontiers, and see what has occurred there during the past twelve months, together with the tone and temper of the people. Did it not require all the exertions of the Executive to repress the spirit that was so openly manifested? He would as soon, Mr. S. said, vote for an absolute declaration of war as this bill. The great danger was that the volunteers would not wait for the orders of the President of the United States, but that they would, as soon as organized, invade the British territory, and thus bring on a war while the two Governments were in the progress of adjusting the differences between them. There were other provisions of this bill to which he was not prepared to give his assent, and there were others which he approved of, and among the latter was the one referred to by the Senator from New York. He hoped that a special minister would be sent to England, and that the mission would result in the settlement of all our differences with that power. God forbid that a war between this country and England, the representatives of the freedom of the world, should ever take place. He did not fear the contest if it should be forced on him; but, said he, if we go into this conflict, I wish to go into it coolly and dispassionately, and in a manner calculated to carry with us the feelings of the people of the whole country. He preferred that the bill should be sent to a committee, with a view to a more mature consideration of the whole subject, and the recommendation of some measure less calculated to precipitate the country into a war. In the present posture of affairs, this section authorizing the raising of volunteers, would be looked on by the British Government in no other light than as a menace, and perhaps lead this high-spirited people into acts of hostility, which more moderate measures on our part might prevent. How could we expect any successful negotiations for terminating our differences with the British Government, with this threat hanging over them? Would they not point to it as an act of hostility, and refuse to negotiate until it was withdrawn?

Mr. S., after some further remarks, concluded by moving to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TALLMADGE did not know that he had any objections to the reference of the bill; the remark he made was in regard to the sending of a minister. But he saw no cause for the alarm felt by the Senator from New Jersey. No one could pretend that volunteers would be raised under the provisions of this bill till the President called for them; and after he has called for them, they will, as soon as raised, be in the service of the United States, and cannot go to Canada, or anywhere else, without orders. He could not agree with the Senator from New Jersey, that any part of this bill could justly be viewed as a threat or menace. We have been threatened with invasion, and though he did not believe that the threat would be carried into execution, yet it was highly necessary to be prepared for any such contingency. Should the British Government complain of this clause of the bill as a menace, which he did not believe they would do, the President could say, that from the very nature of our institutions, we were unprepared for any emergency, and therefore it was that Congress passed this measure in order that we might be prepared to meet the invasion that was threatened. We shall always, said Mr. T., enter into a conflict with a foreign power under disadvantageous circumstances, but we shall become stronger as it progresses, and triumph in the end. He did believe that this bill was necessary, and he would therefore give it his vote. We passed, said he, unanimously the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and last session we passed resolutions just as strong, and what did they amount to? To nothing. The British Government, instead of giving up their claims, had advanced the claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and threatened to support it with an armed force. Under these circumstances, he was for putting the country in a situation to meet the threatened contingency. He saw nothing alarming in the authorizing this volunteer force to be raised. They will be embodied only when the President shall call for them; and being under his orders, they will not be able to march a foot until he commands it.

Mr. MERRICK was in favor of referring the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was an important measure, and should go through all the forms of legislation; and if it passed, it should be after full and solemn deliberation. There was no man in the country more reluctant to go to war than he was. A war would be highly injurious to the people he represented, but he would not sacrifice the honor or the interests of the nation for the sake of preserving peace. He had no fears of any consequences resulting from authorizing this volunteer corps. They are, he said, to be composed of the freemen of the United States, and upon them we can as safely rely for obeying the laws as for defending the liberties of the country. We are about (said Mr. M.) to adjourn, and cannot meet again for many months. We are threatened with invasion, and the danger is great that the threat will be carried into execution. My opinion is (said Mr. M.) that war will come before twelve months are over, do what you will. Ought we, then, to adjourn without putting it in the power of the President to defend the country?

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that even at this late hour of the night, considering the position which he occupied in relation to the subject, the Senate would excuse him for asking their attention for a few moments, whilst he replied to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. SOUTHWARD.)

For my own part, said Mr. B., I am not excited in the slightest degree, but am calm as a summer's morning: nor do I believe that the Senate required a caution against acting under violent impulse. I confess that, throughout the whole proceeding, I have been only anxious that we should act with such coolness, such dignity, and such discretion, as would secure the approbation of the country. This important object has, I think, been accomplished. The justice of our cause is palpable; and I have only labored to prevent it from being obscured, by the adoption of any measure, in the assertion of our rights, on which our constituents could be fairly divided in opinion. It was for this reason that I have come into conflict with the State of Maine, in relation to the fourth resolution reported by the committee. Although I preferred that resolution as it originally stood, because it was more precise, yet the change in the last clause does not materially affect the meaning; and it has procured a unanimous vote in its favor—a consummation much to be desired. Should Maine act in accordance with the spirit of this resolution, then if war must come, it will find the country unanimous. On the part of Great Britain, it will be a war of pure aggression, waged, during the pendency of peaceful negotiations, for the purpose of assuming exclusive military jurisdiction, against the clear understanding between the two Governments, over a territory to which she has not even a shadow of title. In such an event, the only alternative is war or national dishonor; and between these two, what American can hesitate? Force must be repelled by force; or national degradation is the inevitable consequence. I confess, however, it is still difficult to believe that Great Britain will madly rush into such a contest for an object so inconsiderable. This is a question for her own decision. All we have to do is to stand on the defensive, and exercise forbearance until the shock of arms shall render forbearance no longer a virtue.

I would ask the Senator from New Jersey, what is there in this bill which is not precisely in conformity with the resolutions unanimously adopted last night? Which was the most important of all these resolutions? Was it not that one which declared that, if the British Government should, in pursuance of its avowed determination, attempt, by military force, to take possession of the disputed territory, that we would sustain the President in defending the rights of the country, and repelling this invasion? This is the single principle clearly and strongly expressed in the fourth resolution. What, then, do we propose to do by this bill? Merely to carry out this principle in practice; and that, too, in the mildest form consistently with the safety of the country. Would we not make ourselves a ridiculous spectacle before all mankind, if we should adjourn, after adopting this solemn resolution, and leave the President, without a dollar, to defend the country, in case it should be attacked? We first pledge ourselves in the most solemn manner to sustain him; and, when called upon to redeem our pledge, we prove recreant to this duty which, but yesterday, we imposed upon ourselves. Is there a single Senator here prepared to act such a part?

This bill is in fact but little more than a contingent appropriation of $10,000,000, placed at the disposal of the President, to enable him to call forth the militia, in execution of the constitution and the existing law, for the purpose of repelling the threatened invasion of the disputed territory. It is true that the term of service is extended from three to six months, and the President is authorized to accept of the services of volunteers. These are the only changes in the old law effected by the bill. It does not propose to add a soldier to the regular army. Until the next meeting of Congress, it relies exclusively upon the present army, militia and volunteers of the country, to repel the invasion of the disputed territory. Now, I ask, what less can we do, unless regardless of our duty, we should determine to adjourn whilst war is impending over us, without providing any means of defence? And yet the Senator from New Jersey fancies that he sees in the bill a menace to England; and he dreads a rushing of armed citizen volunteers across our frontier for the purpose of invading the territory of a friendly power. But what says the bill? Unless the contingency should happen for which it provides, these volunteers will remain at home. They can never be embodied without the orders of the President. They cannot move towards the frontier until the event shall occur on which we have solemnly declared that we will cordially co-operate with the President in defending the interest and honor of the country. What, then, is the inevitable consequence of the Senator's argument? That we shall adopt no precautionary measures to repel a threatened invasion, lest perchance they may be construed into a menace by the invading power. The gentleman has not seen the point to which his own argument would lead him. If he had, it never would have been advanced. Besides, this argument implies a want of confidence in our citizen volunteers, which I do not feel.

If we adjourn without passing this bill, we shall richly deserve the reputation of being a Government valiant in resolutions upon paper—a Government mighty in words, but contemptible in action. We should become the scorn of our constituents.

But this bill is called a threat. A threat! To prepare for war, when an intention to invade our territory has been avowed, is a threat which may offend our powerful neighbor! Such was not the opinion of General Washington. He believed that to prepare for war was the best mode of preserving peace. Weakness always invites aggression. Fortunately, or unfortunately, for us, from the very nature of our institutions, we shall never be well prepared for war; but for this very reason, when we have cause to apprehend immediate danger, our exertions ought to be so much the more vigorous. We now find that Sir John Harvey is collecting and concentrating his forces, which it is said will amount to four or five thousand regular troops, with the avowed purpose of making a descent on the disputed territory, and placing it under the exclusive jurisdiction of England. When this danger is impending, shall we place ourselves in the contemptible position of resolving that the State of Maine shall be defended, and then re-resolving that it shall not be defended, lest it might give offence to the British Government? We can never avert war by base submission; and if we could, the people of this country will never purchase peace at the price of self-degradation. No, sir, never. If the British Government should ever complain of this bill as a threat, our Minister can point with confidence to the letter and proclamation of Sir John Harvey, in which he has first threatened to take military possession of the disputed territory, under the express command of his sovereign. He can show that the menace first came from her Majesty's Government; and that our proceedings have been purely defensive. The bill contains no provision which goes further than adopting the necessary means of self-defence, in case a foreign foe should invade our native land. If my neighbor should be in the very act of attempting to deprive me of my property by force, and I should stand upon the defensive, he might, with the same propriety, turn about and accuse me of threatening him.

Whilst I am in favor of defending the just rights of Maine to the last extremity; I am also disposed to inform her distinctly, that if, in violation of the constitution, which confers upon the Executive of the Union the treaty-making power, and in violation of the clear subsisting understanding between the parties, she will become the aggressor, and attempt permanently to occupy the disputed territory by force, we are under no constitutional obligation to come to her aid, however difficult it might be, even in such a case, to resist her appeal. In the language of the amendment made to the fourth resolution, it is her duty to leave the ultimate vindication of her rights to the General Government, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belongs. Hands off from this territory on both sides, while negotiations are pending. During this period, the question belongs exclusively to the General Government. It would be forever a source of regret, both to Maine herself and to the whole country, if she should not withdraw her forces from this territory, in case Sir John Harvey should set her the example, desisting from attempting its military occupation.

I deprecate war; but in a just cause I do not dread it. If it should come now, it will be inevitable, and we may appeal to the world for the justice of our cause. Our course has hitherto been correct in asserting our rights. I trust and believe that Maine will not embarrass us in pursuing it to the end. That she has cause to complain, I cheerfully admit; but let her continue to rely upon the General Government, and when the crisis shall arrive, if arrive it must, she will find the country as one man rushing to her rescue. On the contrary, should the patriotic, but excited feeling which now seems to pervade her citizens, drive them into acts of aggression, and involve us in war, the best cause will be weakened by such conduct, and distraction, and division among the citizens of the other States, may be the consequence. Let her be prudent as well as firm. This controversy must soon be ended either by negotiation or by arms. Let her patiently and patriotically await the result, unless the territory should be actually invaded.

The question was here taken on Mr. SOUTHARD's motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and lost without a division.

Mr. SOUTHARD then addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill, recapitulating the arguments used by him when first up.

Mr. WALKER said he did not rise at this late hour to make a speech in favor of this bill, but to appeal to the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. SOUTHARD,) and beseech him, by his love of country and regard for its honor, and its rights, not to vote against this bill. It was not the bill that the Senator supposed it was. He certainly could not have had an opportunity of understanding it truly. He appealed to the Senator not to prevent a unanimous vote of this body in favor of a measure so essentially necessary for the honor and safety of the country. He fully believed that the Senator regarded the rights and liberties of his country as much as any man on that floor; and he had not a doubt but if he understood this bill properly, he would give it his support. Every vote given against this bill, said Mr. W., will be regarded by Great Britain as an invitation, on the part of the Senator who gave it, to persist in her unreasonable pretensions, and never to surrender her claims to this disputed territory. Not to pass this bill would be dishonorable, when we had declared that Great Britain had not a shadow of claim to this disputed territory, and that we would consider her taking possession of it as an invasion of the territory of the United States, that would justify the President, under the constitution, in calling out the militia to repel it. When, in addition to this, we had pledged ourselves to the State of Maine to sustain her, would it not be dishonorable to vote down the only measure that would enable the President to carry into effect the recommendations of the Senate? If we should send a minister to England after this bill had been negatived by the Senate, the British ministry would laugh him to scorn.

And under what circumstances, said Mr. W., are we to refuse to pass this bill? From all the official information that is before us, we learn that the Governor of New Brunswick says that he is positively instructed by the British Government to take possession of this disputed territory, and that he is determined to do it with all the force of the Provincial Government, both regulars and militia. There is a threat, and not merely a threat, for it has been followed up by an actual call for militia, and by armed troops marching into the disputed territory. We shall disgrace ourselves, said Mr. W., by returning to our homes and leaving a sister State undefended, when she has been threatened with invasion. Under these circumstances he appealed to the love of country of the Senator from New Jersey—for he believed that patriotism beats in his bosom as strong as in that of any other Senator—to let the vote on this bill be a unanimous one by adding his voice in its favor; so that when our minister went to England, he might go armed with the strongest power of the country. He knew that there were those within the sound of his voice, who, armed with such a moral power as this bill, passed by the unanimous consent of both Houses of Congress, would give him, could not fail of bringing this controversy to a successful and happy termination.

Mr. NILES said he rejoiced to see this bill so perfectly acceptable to the members of this body, with but one solitary exception. We all agree, said he, in this matter, that we are for preserving the peace of the country if we can do so without sacrificing our honor. The only question, then, is, whether the assuming the attitude the bill proposes, by clothing the President with power to arm for defence only on the one hand, and proposing to open a new negotiation on the other, the latter purpose will be frustrated by the former, as the Senator from New Jersey apprehends. Now, he had no such apprehensions. All the Senator's objections were, in his view, founded in error. No volunteers could be organized until the President called for them by his proclamation, and when they were organized they would be in the service of the United States; and no matter what the state of excitement on the Canada borders was, they could not march a foot without orders. But he would pass over this objection, as it could not be supported by any show of reason. The only plausible objection raised was, whether Great Britain might not consider the authorizing this volunteer force as some sort of a menace—as coming to her with the olive branch in one hand and the sword in the other. This was possible; but what would be the ultimate effect of assuming this attitude? It would produce this effect: it would convince the British Government that we are in earnest in this matter, and that though we have a strong desire for peace, yet we are not willing to delay the settlement of these difficulties any longer, and that it must be settled at once, or produce a rupture between the two countries. The high attitude we assumed towards France, notwithstanding her complaints of insults, settled the controversy with her, that had lasted for a quarter of a century. Pass this bill, and the present controversy will be settled in twelve months. Instead of its being a war measure, I, for one, said Mr. N., pronounce it to be a peace measure. It will preserve peace between the two countries. If you do not pass it, it will protract the negotiation, and perhaps end in a war which will last for years. He stood upon that noble maxim of the late President of the United States, that we desired nothing from foreign nations but what was right, and would submit to nothing that was wrong.

Mr. SOUTHARD here moved to strike out the provision in the bill for raising fifty thousand volunteers; which motion was rejected, as follows:

YEA.—Mr. Southard.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, Wright, and Young—38.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading; and it was carried by a unanimous vote—yeas 41.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed unanimously.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 2.

Relations with Mexico.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 27th instant, relating to Mexico, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the unreasonable procrastination which has attended every step, on the part of Mexico, in the progress of the negotiations between the two Governments, for many years past, justifies a hope that the minister who is about to be sent to that country by the President, will press for a speedy and definite settlement of the demands which have so repeatedly, but ineffectually, been made upon Mexico by the Government of the United States.

Resolved, That this House will impatiently expect the result of this mission; and, if it shall prove unavailing, will sustain the Executive branch of the Government, in any ulterior measures which may become necessary.

Hayti.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution, which was concurred in, to discharge the committee from the further consideration of sundry memorials asking for the opening of international relations with Hayti.

Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following resolution, which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with those whose territorial jurisdiction comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of opening a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by the construction of a ship channel or canal across the isthmus, and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal, to all nations, on the payment of reasonable tolls.

The Maine Boundary—Bill to Increase the Means of Defence in the Event of Invasion.

The House then, in pursuance of the special order, went into Committee on the Union, Mr. LINCOLN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the difficulties in Maine.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. SALTONSTALL, who made an explanation of his remarks of last evening.

Mr. C. then proceeded to discuss the merits of the question, with reference to Sir John Harvey. Mr. C. was convinced that officer had misconstrued his instructions, and he adduced facts which went to show it. As to the bill, he denied that it was a war measure, either on its face or in its spirit. What were the preparations contemplated by it? Were they either aggressive or belligerent? They were not; they were purely defensive, and in conformity with the act of 1795.

Instead, too, of being an augmentation of the Executive power, derived under that act, it was a diminution, because the law of '95 gave the President general power, whereas this bill restricted it to a particular exigency, a positive contingency, on the arising of which alone he could act. Having explained and advocated the provisions of the bill, Mr. C. proceeded to defend the principles of the bill and the report, in reply to Mr. BIDDLE. As to the present being an incidental question, it was precisely one of those which the country could understand. The main issue, the question of boundary, was involved in a tedious controversy, running through a long series of ponderous documents. Not so with this. It was a question of fact, plain and intelligible to every man. The State of Maine had been invaded, and that all could understand. Bring it home to the ordinary occurrences of life. A question of title to an estate might be so involved in intricacy, that no common man could unravel it; but if a trespasser fenced in half his neighbor's farm, it was plainly understood. Moreover, the case of the Aroostook was stronger than that of Madawaska. In regard to the latter, Great Britain had set up a claim of jurisdiction, on the ground of uti possidetis. But they had never before set up to exercise practical jurisdiction in the Aroostook, for there the uti possidetis gave it clearly to the United States, and we had always held over it full sovereignty. Mr. C. produced a map published by the House of Commons of England, and also cited the commission of the Earl of Durham as Governor General of all the British North American provinces, and which demonstrated that she herself then regarded the sovereignty over this territory as not belonging to her. After dwelling on the main points very briefly, Mr. C. concluded; and was followed by

Mr. CRARY, who, after a brief review of the question, made an earnest defence of the bill, which he regarded as a peace or a war measure, just as it might be taken by Great Britain. As for the State of Maine, he knew the character of the people of this country too well to think, for a moment, that she would recede a single step; and rather than vote to coerce her to do so, he would abandon his seat and go home. He hoped the British Government would at once disavow the unlawful acts of her Provincial Governor; but if she did not, he was prepared for the worst consequences. Nor had he any of those terrors of her mighty power which some gentlemen seemed to entertain. Her relations with Russia, with Persia, with the Burmese empire, and the East generally, were of the most critical character. The blood she had so cruelly shed in Canada, had weaned the heart of that Province from her, and her domestic relations were at this moment being shaken to their centre. He did not desire war, but he would yield nothing to preserve a dishonorable peace. After some further remarks, Mr. C. concluded, and

Mr. ADAMS followed at length in support of the bill, and on the question generally. He said he should not be surprised that, if the Congress failed to do any thing at the present crisis, it might be taken as an argument by Great Britain that this Government had left Maine to its fate. She would answer "no" to all the claims of that State to have her rights of jurisdiction respected. Whatever might be the action of the House at the present time, he believed the question would eventually have to be settled by force of arms, and, for one, was not disposed to have much further negotiation. It was for this reason that he was disposed to vote for this bill as a further notification to the British Government—one which she could not misunderstand—as to what were our determinations. He was in favor of the bill, not merely because this contingency presented itself, but to put us in a state of defence for any contingency that might occur. He understood it as a bill to arm merely for the defence of our soil, and not as an indication that we were determined or expected to have war. England cannot understand it thus; there is nothing offensive in it at all. Every independent nation, whether weak or strong, has the right to arm herself up to the ears. The right to arm in self defence is a right of peace. Indeed, he was rather disposed to take a stiffer course than this bill proposes, for he did not altogether approve the section which proposes to send a special minister to England; he thought she had assumed a wrong position, and should rather send us a special minister to explain what, indeed, were her intentions.

The President and Secretary of State seemed to regret the course Maine has taken; but, so far as he was concerned, he respected and revered her for it; it was one sanctioned by the unanimous voice of her Legislature. The act of that State was deliberate, one of the qualities which belonged to firm and consistent action. The act was not rash and indiscreet, as denounced by some, but it was the exercise of her unquestionable right to defend her territory; and so far from disapproving, he would esteem her course, during the short remnant of his life, as honorable.

We had been so quiescent, that the usurpations of England had now commenced to assume the form of rights. He wished to stop them where they are—send them back. That there should be no further mistake, no further delusion on the part of England as to what our rights are in this matter, he thought this bill should be passed. If, however, gentlemen would offer a substitute equally firm, equally argumentative, he would be willing to take it, not without.

Mr. LEGARE made a few remarks in reply to Mr. ADAMS, and was understood to intimate his approval of the resolutions which passed the Senate; and that he would not, on any account, vote this tremendous power, given in the bill, to the President, were he not of the opinion that he would use it with great prudence.

Mr. BELL regarded the former proceedings of Massachusetts, or Maine, or of this Government, as of very little consequence to the present question, because, if Great Britain intended to assert her claim by arms, she would give us an intimation of that fact, or otherwise postpone it, and therefore we need not apprehend any violent collision till we have received information from that Government. Mr. B. did not think the bill in its present shape could pass the House, and some compromise must be come to. He could not bring himself to believe that any thing like war would ensue. He had never questioned our right to the boundary claimed by us, and though he had anticipated difficulties, yet there was no issue of national honor now involved. All he thought the House ought now to do, was to express its concurrence in the views of the President, not by the passage of this bill, or the first section of it, but to grant him a sufficient supply of money to execute the powers already vested in him, in case the contingency provided for under the existing law of '95 should arise. He had no objection to vote a contingent appropriation of five millions or more, and he had no great objection to the proposition to send a special messenger to England, if the Executive desired it.

Mr. HOWARD explained that the latter proposition was one emanating entirely from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, no member of which, he believed, knew whether it met the views of the Executive or not.

Mr. BELL was glad it came from the source it did. He then went on further to sustain his views of the non-expediency of action at present. They ought to do no more than declare their own opinion, or concurrence in the views of the Executive, and grant him sufficient supplies for any exigency that might arise till despatches were received from England, and the new Congress could be called together. There was no necessity to go beyond this point.

Mr. EVERETT remarked, that the only point of controversy was this: That the British threatened to take forcible and exclusive possession of the debatable territory, and this is what is intended by this bill to prevent. But an agreement had been entered into that all further proceedings on both sides should be estopped; and, after communicating that fact, by the President, there we should have stopped, for no further measures were required. They should not have permitted any serious difficulty to have grown out of an incidental question. There was no necessity for this bill; for in any contingency, Maine would not be left defenceless, as the law of '95 was in force, and authorized as much as the Executive could possibly do in sixty days.

At this stage, it being 3 o'clock, the House took its daily recess.

Thanks to the Speaker.

Mr. ELMORE, of South Carolina, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon. JAS. K. POLK, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

Mr. McKENNAN inquired of the chair whether this could be received at this time without suspending the rules of the House for that purpose?

Mr. ELMORE suggested that it had always been customary to offer a resolution of this kind as an act of courtesy, and it was never objected to.

Mr. BELL hoped that no objection would be made. It was an act of courtesy on the part of the House, to which he presumed there would be no objections of a technical character.

Mr. McKENNAN said he should not press the inquiry or make further objection.

Mr. CURTIS renewed the objection. This was not petition day, and petitions could only be presented on leave. The short time remaining ought to be devoted to the pressing business of the country, which ought not to be interrupted by a resolution of this description, which would, in all probability, lead to an excited debate.

Mr. ELMORE quoted from the journal a precedent when a vote of thanks had been passed to Mr. Stevenson. The question of order had then been raised as now; the CHAIR had decided the motion to be in order; an appeal was taken, and the House sustained the decision of the CHAIR by a vote of 95 to 40.

Mr. PRENTISS said he would not object to the offering of the resolution, but wished to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. ELMORE reminded him that it was a question of order, and that no amendment could be offered till it had been settled, and the resolution received.

Mr. WISE said he should never have raised the question of order himself, but thought it was very proper that it should be raised and considered; and as it was now up, he should back his friend from New York (Mr. CURTIS) in his objection. This was a resolution—nothing more, and nothing else—and it came under the rules which governed the presentation of resolutions. If it was in order, it could be only because the rules admitted its presentation, or because the House, by a vote of two-thirds, suspended the rule for a time. The rules expressly forbade its being presented save on a particular duty, and the rules had not been suspended.

Mr. CURTIS said that to avoid delay he would withdraw his question of order, though he held it to be a valid objection under the rules.

Mr. ELMORE said, that in offering this resolution he had only followed out a practice of the House which had prevailed from the beginning of the Government. Courtesy had always dictated to the members of the House to accord to their Speaker that meed of thanks which was due to his services. He had no desire to wound the feelings of any gentleman; nor would he debate the propriety of the resolution itself; but if others entered into that question, he should claim an equal right to do so.

Mr. PRENTISS said that he had come to the House prepared to expect the offering of such a resolution. He had seen indications of its coming, and he had come prepared also to offer an amendment to the resolution, and to sustain that amendment, which he should do, if left to sustain it alone. He moved to amend the resolution, by striking from it the word "impartial."

Mr. P. said he was unwilling, at this hour, when they were about so shortly to leave that hall, to allude to any thing which might excite unpleasant reminiscences. He considered this resolution as not a mere matter of form. It had been claimed to be a mere act of parting courtesy, usual at the termination of every Congress; if it were that, and nothing more than that—if it were the mere touching of the cap or extending the hand to the SPEAKER who was retiring from office—Mr. P. would not oppose or object to it. He was for encouraging the courtesies of life, and they had seen quite enough, during the present session, to convince them of the necessity of doing so; but this was a peculiar case, to which the rules of mere courtesy did not apply. Mr. P. could not consent to praise the SPEAKER for having been impartial in the discharge of the duties of the chair, simply because it was not true that he had been impartial. It might be said that this was a very small matter—a customary compliment merely; but, as every gentleman knew, in politics, a very small thing might become a very great thing; a mere thread might be seized upon, and, by party management, might be woven at last into a cable, by which to lead bodies of men, and to control the Legislatures of States. The present resolution was one which presented facilities for being so availed of. Mr. P. had no objection to uttering a courteous farewell to the SPEAKER as a gentleman, and wishing him a pleasant journey home; but he believed this vote of thanks was to be used as so much political capital to do political business upon, and he, for one, was not disposed to furnish it.

He said that the Speaker had not been impartial: the House did not so consider him; and in proof of this, it would be sufficient to refer to the vote of the House, refusing to him, on that very ground, the appointment of the members of an Investigating Committee to examine into the defalcations of his own party. And though the debate on that subject had rushed and raged through the House like an unchained tiger, leaping in all directions, yet this was a point, and the only point, from which it had never departed; here it had fixed its fangs with a determined and deadly hold. Trust the Speaker with that appointment the House would not. And now, to pass a solemn vote that the Speaker had discharged his duties in an "impartial" manner, it would be to declare a lie. Mr. P. never would vote for such a declaration. He never would say what he did not believe, nor record the assertion that the SPEAKER had been impartial, when the House had recorded its own vote to the contrary. Mr P. had here, in his pocket, a little document, which would speak very intelligibly as to this SPEAKER's impartiality. He well knew what this resolution of thanks was worth, under existing circumstances. He should speak out plainly and explicitly, as he was wont to do. He knew that the incumbent of the chair was playing a political game, in which the smallest amount of capital was useful to him. In that game Mr. P. was opposed to him; and he would not, by voting for this resolution, throw it into his own teeth. He would not send that gentleman into the electioneering field with this certificate in his pocket. He would not certify to the people of the United States a positive lie, which was to be used against himself and others, with whom he acted. He would say to the whole country, that in the formation of the committees of the House—and what act was of deeper importance—the Speaker had not been impartial. Mr. P. would not be understood as saying that it was unusual or improper that the Speaker of that House, in appointing its standing and other committees, should place upon them a majority of those who corresponded with him in political sentiments; of this he did not complain. But he believed there was not a legislative body upon the globe where, political parties being so nearly balanced, the disparity of those parties in the committees of that body was so enormous. Mr. P. would deal in no loose or general assertions on this subject; he would put his finger upon the facts; facts which, if the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. ELMORE) was able to swallow, his powers of deglutition must be very different from those of Mr. P.

To begin with the Committee on Foreign Affairs. How stood parties there? There were six administration men to three of the Opposition. Was this—Mr. P. put it to gentlemen—was this a fair representation of the balance of parties in the House itself? Then there was the Committee of Ways and Means, every one admitted its importance, as standing at the head of the finances; and how was it constituted? Here again it was six to three. But what was the constitution of the Committee of Elections? Everybody knew that a place on that committee had been no sinecure, this Congress; so far from it, the acts and reports of that committee had shaken the pillars of this Government, as the blind Samson shook the pillars of Dagon's temple; if they had not been absolutely thrown down, they had at least been shaken to their foundation. It was a committee in which, of all others, the strictest impartiality was demanded; for there it was that the demon of party was most likely to rear its hydra head. And how did this committee—a committee of judges—how did it stand? SEVEN to TWO. Yes, seven to two; that was this SPEAKER's "impartiality." Well, how stood the case with the Judiciary Committee? Here, again, it was seven to two, if the distinguished gentleman from Virginia was to be ranked with the Administration; but as a change had taken place since the constitution of the committee, it stood, on the most favorable statement, six to three. Here, then, under the action of this most impartial SPEAKER, the four most important committees of the House were so constituted as to give the Administration party, as its very smallest majority, two to one; and the most important of them all, in a political point of view, had seven on the one side, and but two on the other!

Mr. P. did not mean to be understood as derogating, in the slightest degree, from the character, or reflecting on the conduct, of the members of these committees—far from it. They acted, no doubt, according to their own views of public duty. He spoke only of the balance of political power in those committees collectively. But how stood matters in those committees which exerted no party or political influence? Oh! there he found quite a different state of things. The Committee of Manufactures contained eight Whigs to one Administration man. Now, if their duty had been to manufacture politics, did any man believe that such a proportion would have been observed? Oh, no, the balance would have been far different. Then there came the Committee on Roads and Canals—a committee which, however useful or important, exerted no political influence; and it contained seven Whigs. Here the proportion was seven to two. So in the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, seven to two. In the little Committees on Expenditures in the various Departments, it was still larger; some of these were all Whigs. Now, did not this show design? Was there not a reason for so great a contrast? It showed a deliberately adopted principle of action, followed out through the whole selection; and this by a SPEAKER on whose own election to the chair, the House had been so equally divided, that his election had been carried by thirteen votes only out of two hundred and forty-seven! After this, could Mr. P. vote to declare that this officer had been "impartial" in exercising his great and most responsible power? This was in the appointment of committees; and then, as to others cases, where the House had been equally divided, and the casting vote of the CHAIR decided the question one way or the other, would any gentleman point him to a single instance, whether of greater or minor importance—whether the decision swept away the whole political rights of a State, or recognized the official claims of the Globe newspaper, or settled the smallest question, where the vote had not invariably been given in one direction?

Mr. P. did not deny the capacity of the SPEAKER, his despatch of business, or his full and thorough knowledge of parliamentary law—he conceded all this—but it was the facts he had just quoted on which Mr. P. took his stand, and denied, utterly, the "impartiality" of the CHAIR. And he never would, out of mere courtesy, endorse a tool of the Executive, or a tool of the party.

A more perfectly party Speaker, one who would be more disposed to bend the rules of the House to meet the purposes of his own side in politics, never had pressed the soft and ample cushions of that gorgeous chair. To say that he had been impartial in the duties of his high office, would be but flattery, it would be certifying to what was not true; and Mr. P. had too often seen the effects of certificates, not to be cautious how he gave them. He was willing to make the SPEAKER a courteous parting bow; but he would not consent to let him sit there, and do all his party work, and then march out with the honors of war. The duties of the chair were too important for this. The presiding officer of that House cut out, in effect, all the business of the House. It was he who placed before it all the material for its action; and decided who should work it up. Through the standing committees of that House, his power extended to the utmost bounds of the nation. It was in some respects beyond that of the President himself. Such an officer ought not to be the high priest of party—that Moloch before whose altars were daily immolated the dearest rights of this Republic. The present SPEAKER was, as the House well knew, a candidate at this time for the Chief Magistracy of his own State; and in the canvass there, and throughout all the West, this vote would be referred to as an undeniable proof that he had exercised the utmost impartiality while in that chair: and yet the House itself had utterly refused to trust him. When that damning fact should be brought by his opponents, what more would he have to do, should this resolve pass, than to tear from the records of the House the leaf which contained it, and holding it up to the sun, pronounce all these representations to be unfounded calumnies? All those gentlemen who did conscientiously believe the SPEAKER had been impartial, would of course vote for the resolution; but Mr. P. called upon all who did not, and could not in their hearts believe so, but who did believe that, with strong hand, he had wielded his power for the purposes of a party, to vote against it. Let those who knew the resolution to be untrue, say so by their acts. For one, if Mr. P. had ever seen the poised needle turn and point with still prevailing attraction toward the pole, he had seen that SPEAKER turn with equal constancy towards the interests of his party. Gentlemen might raise the notes of their te Deum laudamus as high as they pleased; but he called upon all those whose free sentiments had been crushed on that floor by the weight of his official truncheon, to let the world see that they would not give the lie to those sentiments of indignation which had often been forced from their lips under the smart of oppression. Let them not give this unguarded, sweeping certificate of good behavior, to aid the election of the Governor of Tennessee. Thus to vote a public lie, was to set a bad and pernicious example, particularly in a free Republic.

Mr. P. concluded by moving as his amendment to the resolution, to strike out the word "impartially."

Mr. GRAY said he did not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution, but for the purpose, if the House should agree with him, of having immediate action upon it, that the House might proceed as speedily as possible to other business. He said it was his intention to move the previous question; but before he made that motion he would make a brief reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. PRENTISS,) who had not objected to the resolution on the ground that the SPEAKER had not with ability and impartiality presided over the deliberations of the House; but, on the contrary, the gentleman conceded that the SPEAKER had, with ability and impartiality, decided all questions which by the rules and parliamentary law of the House it had been his duty to decide. The whole ground of objection was, that the SPEAKER had appointed a majority of his political friends on the leading and most important committees of the House; and hence the SPEAKER had not been impartial. The gentleman said, strike out the word "impartial," and he would vote for the resolution.

Was it not the duty of the Speaker to appoint committees as the House would have done? Can any one doubt that the House would, by ballot, have elected committees precisely, or, at least, substantially, as the Speaker had appointed them? Could an instance be given in which a committee had been elected, that the majority of the House had not placed a distinct majority of their political friends upon the committee? There is a case too recent to be forgotten by the House—the Swartwout committee. A majority of the House are opposed to the Independent Treasury, and supposed, perhaps, that if they could have a committee of opponents of that measure, that arguments might be found against the measure; and what was the result? The Committee were six and three—two to one against the Administration.

The resolution offered is not novel; it has been customary here, and it is customary in State Legislatures. One was passed complimentary to Mr. Stevenson at the expiration of his term of service. He pursued the same course as the present SPEAKER in the appointment of committees, and more recently, at the expiration of the term of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) a resolution, in nearly, if not the precise language with the one under consideration, was passed. The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) who was then in favor of the Administration, followed the example of Mr. Stevenson in the appointment of committees.

Mr. G. said he had before him the journals, and would read the appointment of committees made by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) if any one desired it. The present SPEAKER has done the same, nothing more; and less he could not do, unless he entirely disregarded the will of the majority.

Mr. G. said that his colleague (Mr. CURTIS) had raised a question of order upon the introduction of the resolution, and as he supposed his object was to defeat the resolution by preventing its consideration, Mr. G. said he would refer to an example in the New York Legislature, which his colleague would recollect. In 1838, the present Lieutenant Governor of that State was Speaker of the Assembly. During the session party spirit ran high; frequent collisions took place between the minority of the House and the Speaker; many appeals were taken from the Speaker's decision, and much asperity was exhibited in debate; and yet, at the close of the session, the minority joined in an expression of thanks to the Speaker. A distinguished individual of that minority, formerly a member of this House, (Mr. MANN,) as is usual on such occasions, rose above the party excitement that had prevailed, and made a speech highly complimentary of the Speaker; it was due to the Speaker and the honor of the State that the minority should thus act, and should the same just spirit prevail here, what is due to the dignity of the House, to the Speaker, and to the honor of the nation would be done.

But another and more significant objection is raised: it is, that the adoption of this resolution may make him political capital, that it may be used in the Tennessee election "upon every stump in the State;" hence the gentleman from Mississippi would withhold from him the justice which, by parliamentary custom, is due to him, lest, by doing justice to him now, he may have justice done him hereafter in his own State. Mr. G. said it was not a matter that ought to be discussed; the facts in the case were upon record, and known to the House; the propriety of the resolution was self-evident; and if gentlemen wished to make a party question of it, and show the country that they carried party feelings to an unprecedented and unwarrantable extent, the sooner they declare it the better.

Mr. G. then moved the previous question.

The previous question having been moved upon the resolution, it was seconded; and upon the motion, shall the main question be put, which was upon the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 75.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution, which was taken on yeas and nays, and passed by the following vote:

IN SENATE.

SUNDAY, March 3.

Disagreement between the Houses and Struggle over the Book Distribution Appropriation.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839: the amendments were, first, to strike out the provision that the printing of the Executive Departments should be done by contract; and the second was, striking out the provision for distributing copies of the Documentary History of the United States to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate insist, and that a conference with the House be asked; which was agreed to.

Numerous bills from the House were acted on; after which the Senate took a recess until 6 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee of Conference, appointed to consider the disagreement of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill, reported that the managers appointed to conduct the conference on the part of the Senate, and the managers on the part of the House, had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses to adopt the following course: that the Senate should recede from so much of its amendment as provides for the manner of executing the printing for the Executive Departments, with an amendment providing that the printing shall be executed in the city of Washington; and that the Senate insist on so much of their amendment as relates to the distribution of the Clarke and Force papers to members of the Senate, leaving it in the power of the House to make the distribution to its own members, while any such distribution to members of the Senate is prohibited.

Mr. BENTON said he never would agree to this report, and he demanded the ayes and noes on concurring in it. This system of distributing books had grown up to an enormous abuse, indeed the most enormous abuse in our Government. He would oppose it to the last; and if the appropriation bill was lost in consequence, and the Government stopped, why let the responsibility rest on those who would incur the risk for the sake of securing to themselves three or four hundred dollars' worth of books.

Mr. WRIGHT asked that the questions on concurring with the recommendations of the Committee of Conference be taken separately, which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. TALLMADGE inquired whether the bill would be lost, in case neither of the two Houses would agree to recede from the ground taken by them.

The PRESIDENT answered, that that question was not before the Senate; but it was obvious that if one House should insist on its amendments, and the other should insist on its disagreement, and no compromise be effected, the bill would be lost.

Mr. TALLMADGE observed that if the House of Representatives saw fit to vote for a distribution of books to its members, he would be willing to let them take the responsibility, and settle the matter with their constituents. He would, therefore, vote for concurring with the recommendations of the Committee of Conference.

Mr. NORVELL said that if any principle was involved, it applied as well to the distribution to the members of the House as of the Senate. He should, therefore, vote against concurring in the report.

Mr. WALKER was for concurring with the committee. If that was not done, the result would be that the whole bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, would be lost. The Government, throughout all its departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, would be brought to a close; and that, too, at a period of all others the most unfortunate. Other Senators might think it would be less dangerous to lose this bill than to suffer members of the House to vote themselves a few books. He hoped the Senator from Michigan would reconsider his determination, and let the report of the committee be concurred in.

Mr. BENTON said that the consequences of the Senate adhering to the resolution it had taken on the subject of the distribution of these books, might be the loss of the bill now pending; and as that bill contained the appropriations necessary for keeping the Government in action, gentlemen were a great deal alarmed at the danger of the Government's being stopped. Then on whom would the responsibility rest? It will rest on those who have a personal interest in these books; and those members, therefore, who are to receive these books, ought not to be permitted to vote on this question, in which they are personally interested.

The PRESIDENT here stated that the discussion was not in order; that, by the joint rules, when a committee of conference was asked for by one House, and assented to by the other, the report of the conferees, together with all the papers, should first be presented to the House that assented to the conference. Under this rule, therefore, the report and papers were sent by the Secretary to the House of Representatives.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that the House had concurred in the report of the Committee of Conference on the amendments to the General Appropriation bill, and resolved that the bill do pass accordingly.

The question was then taken on concurring in that part of the recommendation of the Committee of Conference as relates to the printing of the Executive Departments, and carried.

The question then recurring on concurring in that part of the report which relates to the distribution of the Clarke and Force documents—

Mr. BENTON warmly opposed concurring in the agreement. He objected to it because it made a distinction between the two Houses—allowing a distribution of books to the members of the House, while it refused a distribution of books to the Senate. He objected to it because a distribution of books to either House was wrong in principle. Some gentlemen seemed to fear that if the Senate insisted on its amendment, the appropriation bill would be lost, and the wheels of Government stopped; but could they suppose there was any member of either House who would be willing to break up this Government for the sake of retaining his share of these books, which was not worth more than three hundred and thirty dollars at the price they cost the Government, and which, if sold to Mr. Templeman, or any other bookseller, would not bring half or quarter of that sum. Now, he was determined, as far as it depended on him, to put it to the test, whether any member of Congress would be willing to put an end to this Government for the sake of retaining his three hundred and thirty dollars' worth of these books.

Book Distribution.

Mr. B. here enlarged on the growing evils of this system of distributing books to members of Congress; and, in illustration, alluded to the manner in which another proposition to distribute books had been run through the Senate last night. A resolution was offered by a Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) to distribute among the members two volumes relating to the land laws. He had given full notice of his opposition to this resolution, and his intention to oppose it when it came up for consideration. Yet, in the course of a fatiguing session of eighteen hours, he had been absent from his seat but a few moments, and in those few moments this distribution was galloped through. It was presented to the Senate while he (Mr. B.) was in his seat; objected to by him; then withdrawn; taken up in his absence, and hastily run through. This book-making concern was one of the most crying abuses in our system. There was no end to it—it ran round in a continued circle. In the first place, a sufficient number of books are ordered to supply the members of a Congress. At the ensuing session, the new members are to be supplied; and this is easily done, and in the following manner: some of the members who had already received copies, may sell them to Mr. Templeman, and he sells them at a small advance to the publishers, and they are furnished to the new members at Government price as new books, who, in their turn, sell them to Mr. Templeman, and the process goes on ad infinitum, so that the original fifteen hundred copies may supply fifteen thousand members, the Government, at every revolution of the circle, paying the full price. He hoped the Senate would insist on its amendment, and let the people of the country see what members of Congress were willing to break up the Government to hold on to the books they had voted to themselves.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he had never voted for a purchase or distribution of books in his life. He was opposed to the whole matter, and thought it a most serious abuse. He would not, however, incur the hazard of such a serious embarrassment as would result to the Government from the loss of the appropriation bill. He would, therefore, vote for agreeing to the report of the Committee of Conference, and let the members of the House take the responsibility of voting books for themselves.

The question was then taken on agreeing with the report of the Committee of Conference, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Foster, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Davis, Niles, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, and White—7.

The Hon. WILLIAM R. KING having temporarily retired from the chair—

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING, for his able, impartial, and dignified conduct as presiding officer of this body.

Mr. DAVIS heartily concurred in the resolution, and hoped that it would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SOUTHARD hoped the word "unanimous" would be inserted in the resolution.

Several members were heard at the same time expressing the same wish.

Mr. TALLMADGE modified his resolution by inserting the word unanimous, and the resolution was then unanimously adopted.

Notice of Adjournment.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that, having completed the legislative business before them, the Senate was ready to adjourn.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, stating that they had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress had completed the business before them, and were ready to adjourn, if he had no further communications to make.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the resolution was concurred in, and Mr. HUBBARD and Mr. FULTON were appointed on the part of the Senate.

Book Distribution.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had passed the joint resolution of the Senate for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

Mr. BENTON asked, what resolution? He had been in his seat, with the exception of a few minutes, the whole day and the whole night, and he had not the least recollection of any resolution of the kind having passed, and this was the first intimation he had that any such resolution was before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN also said that he had no knowledge of any such resolution having passed, and he believed he was in the chamber at the time of its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, stated that he was in the chair when the consideration of the resolution was called for by the Senator from New York, (Mr. TALLMADGE.) The resolution was taken up, considered, and adopted, with all the forms that are usual on the passage of a resolution. He wished to know if the Senator from Missouri intended to impute any incorrectness of conduct to the CHAIR in the proceedings on the resolution.

Mr. BENTON. Not at all: not at all. He was out of his seat at the time, and knew nothing of what was done, or how it was done; he only knew it was quickly done. He was out of his seat but a few minutes; was invited out of it into a near room; was, in fact, invited out several times before he went; and was out but a few minutes. He knew nothing of what was done until since he came back. He certainly imputed no blame to the Senator from Mississippi: neither thought it nor imputed it.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had looked at the resolution, and found that it contained the certificate of the Secretary, that it had passed. Without making any complaint as to the irregularity with which that resolution passed, he would only say that if their Secretary, or the Secretary of any other body distributed books under a resolution thus passed, he would, so far as he (Mr. W.) was concerned, do it upon his responsibility.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, that as to the responsibility attending this resolution, he avowed himself willing to meet it there or before the country. He had called up the resolution, and it had been acted on at his instance. He acknowledged that advantage had been taken of time and circumstances, but the same advantage had been taken of him and others in various instances. He did not pretend to be much of a Jackson man, but he was perfectly willing, as regarded his participation in this matter, to meet the responsibility.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn, provided he had no further communications to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had received for answer that the President had no further communications to make to Congress, and requested them to wish to each member of the Senate a safe return to his family and his home.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. TALLMADGE hoped that the Senate would not adjourn until they had consummated the business before them; and they would disregard this Message, which had been sprung upon them—and sprung upon them in an irregular manner, during the discussion of a pending question—and complete the business before them.

The question on adjournment was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON said this resolution could not pass. It was in the power of any one member to stop it, and he should use every effort to do so. It was then after midnight—it was two o'clock—there is not a quorum of the Senate present. Messages of adjournment have passed between the two Houses and with the President, and no act, save the adjournment, can be done except by unanimous consent, which hides and covers up irregularities. The resolution had better be dropped; it cannot be passed; it will not be passed. Mr. B. said it was now after two o'clock—half-past two o'clock, and he moved that the Senate do now adjourn, and that the hour be entered on the journal. It was now half-past two o'clock on the 4th day of March, and the constitutional existence of the Senate was at an end. This was the fact, and he wanted it on the journal.

Mr. TALLMADGE inquired if the motion to enter the hour on the journal was in order.

The PRESIDENT said that by the rules, any member who moved an adjournment had the right to have the hour at which such motion was made entered on the journal.

The entry was accordingly made on the journal.

The PRESIDENT said that before taking the question on adjournment, he would ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks. He regretted exceedingly that he had left his situation in the chair for a moment, as it had led most probably to unpleasant feelings. He had hoped that at this hour, when they were about to separate, nothing would have occurred to mar the harmony of the body, or interrupt the feelings of personal kindness so appropriate to the occasion. He had endeavored, while presiding over their deliberations, to which he had been called by the kindness of the Senate, to discharge his duties to the extent of his ability—faithfully he believed, honestly he knew he had; and he regretted, deeply regretted, that any thing should have occurred during his temporary absence from the chair, to induce unpleasant feelings, and prevent a harmonious adjournment.

Mr. BENTON said that every word spoken by the PRESIDENT, (Mr. KING,) went into his heart, and found a resting-place there. Like him, he wished a harmonious adjournment; like him, he wished all to separate with feelings of personal kindness; and for that very purpose, he had moved the adjournment. It was the quiet and easy way to get rid of an unpleasant subject; to avoid a struggle which will lead to no results; for the resolution could not become a law. He wished to drop it as it was; and then there would be nothing to mar the kind feelings which prevailed, and which all would wish, with the PRESIDENT, to see preserved.

[MARCH, 1839.]

The question was then taken on the adjournment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, King, and Williams of Mississippi—6.

NAYS.—Messrs. Foster, Fulton, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and White—12.

Mr. BENTON said it was now entered on the journal that it was half-past two o'clock in the morning, and no quorum, only eighteen members present, and he now made a motion, which was addressed to the PRESIDENT himself. In doing so, he would cite the example of Mr. Macon, whom they all knew, and than whom no man was more scrupulous. Mr. Macon held that at twelve o'clock at night, on the 3d of March of the short session, his powers as a Senator ceased, and if the Senate was not willing to adjourn at that time, he went away. Now, Mr. President, (said Mr. B.,) I believe that at this hour, half-past two o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March, you have no authority here, and I have no right to address you. I therefore mean to make the question with you, whether, at this hour, you have power to act. The CHAIR has given notice that he is going to sign the resolution, and I object to it. It is the 4th of March, and no quorum.

The PRESIDENT said it was a very common thing at the close of the Congress to sit and do business after midnight on the 3d of March.

Mr. BENTON said he knew it was, but in such cases the fact was kept out of the journal; all appeared there to have been done on the 3d of March. The journal went on headed the 3d, and the approvals of the President bore date the 3d. But now this is not the case. The time is marked on the journal; it is marked the morning of the 4th, and the whole proceeding will be invalid on its face.

The PRESIDENT was of opinion that he could not sign the resolution when a quorum of the Senate was not present, and so stated to the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said, as there was no quorum present, he hoped the Senate would adjourn.

Several members said they hoped not; that a quorum would be soon present, and said that the CHAIR could despatch the Sergeant-at-arms after the absentees.

Mr. BENTON said they had no right to send the Sergeant-at-arms after members; that all power over Senators was at an end.

The question was then taken on adjournment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. MERRICK then made a few remarks in relation to the passage of the resolution. He said he was in his seat in the Senate, but knew not of the passage of this resolution. In fact, he did not know that the resolution had been presented for the consideration of the Senate, until he was informed that it had passed. He was in favor of the object of the resolution, and would have voted for it if he had been aware of its having been before the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said, in regard to the resolution, he had understood such a one was to be offered, and not having been offered, he had concluded that it had been abandoned. The first actual knowledge he had of the resolution being before the Senate, was hearing its title pronounced by the voice of his colleague, (Mr. WILLIAMS.) I did not know what it meant. He read the resolution. I heard him distinctly put the question; and the various questions that are usually put on the passage of a resolution, were put as fully, and as clearly, as they generally are, and the question was carried as fairly, and the Senate was as full, as it was when a majority of the acts passed by that body were carried.

Mr. ROANE said that he knew no more of the passage of that resolution than the child unborn. He must have been in the chamber at the time, but he had never heard it called up, nor any question taken on it. With respect, however, to these Madison papers, he looked on them in a very different light from the trash that was so often published by Congress. He had received this very evening, from a distinguished gentleman in Virginia, a letter asking information about them. It was a letter abounding with good sense, and placing a proper estimation on these papers. With this letter in his hand, he went round to the seat of his friend from Missouri, and endeavored to soften his rigid resolution with regard to the distribution of books, so as to make the Madison papers an exception. He endeavored to put these papers in contrast with the trash that was put abroad under the sanction of Congress, which may, perhaps, form the materials for a spurious history of the country. He represented that these Madison papers had already been published, and that there would be an absurdity, after paying for them, to put them away in the garret, with the trash that has lumbered there among the cobwebs of time. The Senator from Missouri stated the terms on which he would agree to the distribution of this particular work, and that was, to make a general distribution throughout the Union and into every State; and he desired me to go to the Secretary's table, and get the Clerk to make out a list of the general distribution of documents, and then he would support it. Mr. R. then descanted at length on the great value of the Madison papers; the importance that the information contained in them should be disseminated as widely as possible, and the absurdity of locking them up from the public view, after having paid for printing them. He did not consider the works of James Madison of the same nature with those publications with which it had been the custom of the two Houses to supply their members—"a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance"— and he hoped that the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, with regard to distributing books, would not, like the rigid laws of the Medes and Persians, be applied to them.

Mr. BENTON said the reference of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. ROANE) to him was correct; he had refused to agree to a distribution of the Madison papers to the members of Congress, but was willing to a general distribution, according to the general distribution of documents; and desired the Senator from Virginia to get that list from one of the clerks, and either to omit the members of Congress, or require them to pay the cost. This general distribution would carry the work into every State—its Senate and House of Representatives—its Executive office—its colleges and universities—to all the Executive offices of the General Government—to the library of Congress—to the offices of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and many others. It would distribute eleven or twelve hundred copies, and place them in every part of the Union, and in the best hands for preservation and for use. Gentlemen were debating as if the only alternatives were between an exclusive and gratuitous distribution of these papers to members of Congress, or a consignment of them to the worms in the garret, and an everlasting loss of them to mankind. This was rather wild. The distribution which he proposed would have saved them from the worms, would have given them to the whole Union, and to all mankind; it would have curtailed nobody but members of Congress.

The PRESIDENT said that on further consideration, and consulting the rules, he was of opinion, that it did not require a quorum to be present to authorize the signing of a bill or resolution. It was not properly an act of legislation, but merely a signing to be done by the CHAIR to authenticate the act. Holding this opinion, he would now proceed to sign the joint resolution.

Mr. BENTON said the signing could only be done in the presence of the Senate, and there was no Senate when there was no quorum. Every signing was a public act. The presiding officer gave audible notice of it; the Senate ceased to act; no Senator could speak; nothing could be done while the PRESIDENT was signing. Mr. B. was clearly of opinion that acts could only be signed when the Senate was formed and a quorum present.

The CHAIR then signed the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN said that the resolution could not now go to the President for his signature. There is no committee of the House of Representatives which is necessary to form the joint committee, to join the committee on the part of the Senate to carry it. The House of Representatives has adjourned and dispersed, and the two members who composed part of the Joint Committee to take bills to the President, had ceased to exist as members of Congress; the body to which they belonged had ceased to exist. The resolution could not be carried: there is no authority existing which could carry it.

Mr. FOSTER said that he would carry it. He was a member on the part of the Senate of the Joint Committee, and he had once carried a bill to the President alone, but he had ascertained that he had made a mistake.

[Mr. FOSTER and Mr. MERRICK, the committee on the part of the Senate, then left the chamber with the joint resolution.]

Mr. BENTON said the impediments were not yet surmounted, there was a little difficulty to be encountered, when the committee got back. He had the rules in his hand, and would read them at the proper time. It is now 4 o'clock on the morning of Monday, the 4th of March; the House of Representatives adjourned and gone, and no quorum here. There are obstacles ahead.

Mr. WHITE said he would state what he knew respecting the passage of this resolution. He had just come into the Senate chamber, when he heard the Senator occupying the chair (Mr. WILLIAMS) ask if a resolution should be taken up. If he gave it any particular designation, it escaped my ear. The presiding officer put the question, and it was passed, several voices voting in the affirmative. Not knowing what it was, or what it contained, I asked for the reading of it, and it was handed to me. As there was no discussion on the subject, no division asked, and none taken, and consequently deeming the question an unimportant one, he voted neither aye nor no. He himself was opposed to the principle of distributing books among the members of Congress; but none of those whose lead he was accustomed to follow on this subject, opposing this resolution, and on looking around and observing that the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) was not in his seat, he thought it was an unimportant matter, and did not expect to hear any thing more about it.

[The committee who waited on the PRESIDENT for his signature to the joint resolution, having arrived in the Senate chamber,]

Mr. BENTON rose to a point of order—to have things done in order. One of the most solemn acts of the two Houses is that of sending bills to the President to be signed: it has to be done in a prescribed form, and reported and recorded in a prescribed form. Upon this depends all the questions connected with the ten days' constitutional right of the President to retain a bill—his culpability if he does not return it—the prevention of the return by the adjournment of Congress—the efficacy of the bill as a law, if not returned in time, unless prevented by an adjournment. All this makes the presentation of the bill to the President one of the most formal and serious acts of legislation; and therefore the rules had carefully provided to make the presentation a matter of record in each House of Congress—a record, the verity of which could not be impeached, and which would require no extensive evidence to support it. A standing committee was to carry it: that committee was to be joint: it was to be composed of two members from each House; and these two members of each House were to make report to their Houses respectively that the bill had been presented, carefully stating the day on which it was presented; and then this report was to be entered on the journals of each House.

3D SESS.]

Adjournment.

[MARCH, 1839.]

[Mr. B. here read the rules, to show that he stated them correctly.]

He said these rules could not have been complied with in this case. The joint standing committee was dissolved by the dissolution of the House of Representatives. The half committee of the Senate was a nonentity without the other half from the House of Representatives. No record could be made in the House of Representatives, which had been adjourned for two hours, and no such record can be made here, as the rules imperatively require. I call the attention of the Secretary of the Senate to the rules in the entry which he is to make. The Senators will report what they have done; and that is, they went without the committee of the House to the President, and went on the 4th of March; and there ends the work for which we have been kept here so many hours. It drops now, as I proposed it should drop three hours ago.

Mr. MERRICK reported that within the last hour the committee had placed in the hands of the President a joint resolution for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved that the Senate adjourn sine die.

Mr. BENTON asked if a minority of the Senate could adjourn sine die. He thought they could only adjourn from day to day, until a quorum was present.

The PRESIDENT decided that the Senate could adjourn sine die, and

The Senate adjourned sine die at 20 minutes past 4 o'clock, A. M.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, March 3.

Book Purchase—Documentary History—Disagreement of the two Houses.

The other amendment, upon which the Senate had, in part, insisted, in relation to the Documentary History, was then taken up.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House insist.

Mr. TOUCHEY moved that the House recede from its disagreement.

Mr. ATHERTON called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and Mr. TOUCHEY's motion was rejected—ayes 66, noes not counted.

The motion to insist was then agreed to, without a division.

At a subsequent stage, the bill was returned from the Senate, accompanied by a message stating that they still insisted, and asked a committee of conference, having appointed a committee of three on their part.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to concur in the resolution for a conference, which was agreed to, and, on his motion, a committee of three was appointed on the part of the House, consisting of Mr. BOND of Ohio, Mr. ATHERTON of New Hampshire, and Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts.

About seven o'clock at night, Mr. BOND made a report from the Committee of Conference, which recommended the Senate, in part, to recede, and in part to insist, upon their amendment, with the addition that the printing shall be executed in the city of Washington; and recommended that the Senate recede from part of their amendment striking out the appropriation for the Documentary History, but only so far as the House was concerned, the Senate abstaining from taking the books.

The report was concurred in without a division; but, at a subsequent stage, at the instance of Mr. BELL,

Mr. BOND moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the last matter was agreed to; and, after a desultory discussion by Messrs. BOND, LINCOLN, and BELL,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said that, rather than peril a bill upon which the temporary existence of the Government depended, upon a mere point of etiquette, he should demand the previous question; and it was seconded, carried, and the main question ordered and put, when the House refused to reconsider—ayes 54, nays 84.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee on the Union, Mr. BRIGGS in the chair.

Madison Papers.

The House concurred in the resolution of the Senate to suspend the 16th and 17th joint rules of the House, so as to pass a joint resolution to provide for the distribution, in part, of the Madison papers.

The joint resolution was soon after received, and, having been read twice,

Mr. WISE briefly supported it.

Mr. PETRIKIN was not opposed to the resolution, but he would take that occasion to remark that the charge brought by Mr. BELL against the Senate was now proven to be unfounded.

The resolution was then put on its third reading, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the resolution was passed without a division.

Adjournment.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that, unless he had further communications to make, both Houses were ready to close the present session, reported that they had performed that duty, and were informed by the President that he had no further communication, but he wished the members all a safe and happy return to their homes.

A motion was made by Mr. CONNOR that the House adjourn without day, when .

The SPEAKER rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In taking leave of this body, in all probability forever, emotions are excited which no language can adequately convey. When I look back to the period when I first took my seat in this House, and then look around me for those who were at that time my associates here, I find but few, very few, remaining. But five members who were here with me fourteen years ago, continue to be members of this body. My service here has been constant and laborious. I can, perhaps, say what but few others, if any, can—that I have not failed to attend the daily sittings of this House a single day since I have been a member of it, save on a single occasion, when prevented for a short time by indisposition. In my intercourse with the members of this body, when I occupied a place upon the floor, though occasionally engaged in debates upon interesting public questions, and of an exciting character, it is a source of unmingled gratification to me to recur to the fact, that on no occasion was there the slightest personal or unpleasant collision with any of its members. Maintaining, and at all times expressing, my own opinions firmly, the same right was fully conceded to others. Our discussions were at that time conducted with that courtesy and decorum, and respect for the opinion of others, which ought ever to prevail in a deliberative assembly. For four years past the station I have occupied, and a sense of propriety, in the divided and unusually excited state of public opinion and feeling, which has existed both in this House and in the country, have precluded me from participating in your debates. Other duties were assigned me.

The high office of Speaker, to which it has been twice the pleasure of this House to elevate me, has been at all times one of labor and high responsibility. Its difficult, and often delicate, duties have been fully appreciated and freely expressed by all my predecessors. They have all borne testimony to the difficulty, nay, impossibility, of discharging its duties with entire satisfaction to all, especially in seasons of high political or party excitement. Whilst they have borne this testimony, I think I may truly affirm that none of them have had a severer ordeal to pass than has fallen to my lot. Frequent have been the occasions when, but for the indulgent and liberal support at all times given to me by this House, I should have been utterly unable to preserve that order and decorum which should ever attend the deliberations of the representatives of the people. It has been made my duty to decide more questions of parliamentary law and of order, many of them of a complex and difficult character, arising often in the midst of high excitement, in the course of our proceedings, than had been decided, it is believed, by all my predecessors, from the foundation of this Government. This House has uniformly sustained me, without distinction of the political parties of which it has been composed. Our records will show, that upon the numerous appeals which have been taken to the House, I have been sustained by both political parties, and often by decided and large majorities. Though doubtless I may often have fallen into error in promptly deciding novel questions, suddenly raised, I trust it was not on points material, and I know it was never intended. I return to this House my thanks for their constant support in the discharge of the arduous and difficult duties I have had to perform.

But, gentlemen, my acknowledgments are especially due to the majority of this House for the high and flattering evidence they have given me of their approbation of my conduct as the presiding officer of the House, by the resolution you have been pleased to pass. I regard this as the highest and most valued testimonial I have ever received from this House, because I know that the circumstances under which it has passed has made it matter of substance, and not of mere form. I regard it as of infinitely more value than if it had been the common matter-of-course and customary resolution, which, in the courtesy usually prevailing between the presiding officer and the members of any deliberative assembly, is always passed at the close of their deliberations. That is unmeaning—is indiscriminately conferred—is a mere act of courtesy, and possesses, comparatively, but little value. I return to the majority of this House, what I sincerely feel, my grateful thanks for this high evidence of their approbation and regard, given, as it has been, at a time of high party excitement, which, in the accomplishment of party and political objects, but too often disregards all other considerations. I shall bear it in grateful remembrance to the latest hour of my life.

I trust this high office may in future times be filled, as doubtless it will be, by abler men. It cannot, I know, be filled by any one who will devote himself with more zeal and untiring industry to do his whole duty than I have done.

We are now about to separate, many of us never again to meet. I wish you, gentlemen, a safe return to your families and friends; and whatever our respective future destinies may be, my prayer to a beneficent and overruling Providence is, that our future lives may be useful and happy.

The SPEAKER then announced that the House stood adjourned without day.

The House, at two o'clock, A. M., adjourned sine die.

Deposits with the States.—In the Senate, leave to introduce a bill relative to, asked, 61; the bill, 61; a large surplus will be in the Treasury, 61; what shall be done with it? 61; motion to refer to committee on finance, 62; Senate asked to create a surplus for future distribution, 62; referred, 62.

A message from the House, disagreeing to amendments to the fortification bill, 204; important amendment, 204; its nature, 204; Senate adhere, 204.

In the House, a resolution to release the States from the restoration of the deposits, 212; laid on the table, 212.

In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 309; the permanent expenditures of the government doubled within a few years, 309; what amount of last year's appropriations remain unexpended? 309; the appropriations will fall short during the ensuing year, 310; the amendment recognizes a system of permanent distribution, 310; there will be a large surplus, which it is dangerous to leave unemployed in the hands of the government, 310; the distribution principle corrupting and dangerous, 310; taxation should be reduced to the wants of government, 310.

This amendment will send the money back to the people again, 311; by the distribution law the people of the large States had been sacrificed to the interest of the small, 311; this amendment levies money for purposes that the constitution does not warrant, 311; if this measure was wise and proper at the last session, why is it not now? 311; the last bill distributed the money unequally, unjustly, 312; this principle was sanctioned by the last Congress, 312; operation of the measure, 312; amendment lost, 314.

Amendment renewed in the House, 314; it is said there will be no surplus, 314; it is said the amendment is not made to a proper bill, 314; it is said to be improper, 314; amendment carried, 315; further amendment that the distribution should be in the ratio of the representation, 315; a plan conceived and matured by the high tariff party, to continue their scheme of injustice, 315; what is the spectacle we behold? 316; the conduct of some has been equivocal, 316; the whole system contemptible, 316; a system of bargain and corruption, 317; injustice will be done to distribute on the basis of the representation here, 317; shall there be a new and novel policy introduced in the government? 317.

Admitted that something ought to be done to remedy the overflowing treasury, 318; the strange association presented on this floor, 318; this ratio something like the semblance of justice, 319; the policy of distribution opposed to the policy of reduction, 319; the amalgamation of parties in its favor, 319 the horror expressed at Southern gentlemen voting for this bill, 320; it is said we are taxing the people for distribution, 320; ruinous to call on the States for money deposited with them, 320; the ratio of last year more just and equitable than

- this now proposed, 321; the funds raised from the sale of lands, trust funds, 321; the surplus should be so deposited that the States ceding the land might receive the benefit of it, 321; New York should not oppose this bill on the ground that the small States would receive more than they were entitled to, 322; the banks are the "horse-leeches," 322; why has the South been suffered to be so long plundered by unjust taxation? 323; amendment lost, 323; other amendments, 323; bill ordered to a third reading, 324. See Index, vol. 12.

- Executive Administration.*—In the House, a resolution of inquiry relative to the manner in which the business of the departments had been conducted, considered, 212; the last message of Andrew Jackson, 212; who is he? 212; his career, 213; conduct as President, 214; committed many grievous errors, 215; instance of Commodus, 215; the acts of the President sanctioned by the people, 216; visit to Tennessee, 216; anecdotes, 216; the worst as well as the last message, 217; condition of the departments, 217; is it true or false that the various Executive departments have been conducted with ability and integrity? 218; that is the issue, 218; let no one accuse me of commencing an attack on the coming Administration, 218; resolution adopted, 219.
- The resolution predicated on a clause of the President's Message, 219; compliment to the members of the Cabinet, 219; all the subjects contemplated for investigation are provided for by the House committees, 219; report at the last session, 220; this is to be an ex parte proceeding, 220; what are the specifications? 220; amendment offered, 221.
- Is the gentleman from Rhode Island put forward as the champion of Andrew Jackson? 221; did the President write the laudatory paragraph? 221; it is said this investigation is unnecessary, 222; is the Committee of Ways and Means appropriate to make such examinations? 222; trial of Reuben M. Whitney, 222; the visit to Tennessee, 223; it is said, why not move an impeachment of the President? 223; it is said this is equivalent to an impeachment, 224; all we ask is, that a committee should examine the archives, records, and papers of the Government in all the departments, and report, 224; it would be to deny those officers a trial according to the strict rules of criminal law, 225; further debate, 226, 227.

What is the relation that Andrew Jackson bears to the representatives of the people? 228; no precedent to justify such a measure, 229, 230; further debate, 231, 232, 233; neither abuse nor corruptions will be found existing in any department, 237; the relentless opposition exhibited, 238; patriotism of the President, 238; impossible to foresee the character of Van Buren's administration, 239; we are charged with being influenced by the spoils, 239; who are the friends of the banks? 239; the charge of increased annual expenditure, 240; charge of corruption, 240; this House assailed, 240; who rules the opposition? 240; who complains of the President? 241; the nation has approved the course of the President, 241; what is to be the future? 241; Van Buren charged as an usurper, 242; the opposition contributed to make him President, 242; the Gwinn letter, 242; suppose the President was favorable to Mr. Van Buren, was there any thing wrong in this? 243; how made a candidate, 243; practices used to defeat him, 243.

What does the original resolution propose? 251; no precedent for this movement in parliamentary history, 251; a repetition of old charges, 251; the Executive is charged as having broken every pledge, 252; corruption said to exist, 252; allusions to the President, 252; how hope that the people will attend to your charges, 253; the approaching administration is said to be the triumph of the New York system, 253; original resolution concurred in, 254.

See Index, vols. 10, 12.

Expunging the Journal.—See Index, vol. 3.

Expunging Resolution.—In the Senate, notice of, 57; offered, 65; the resolution considered, 99; three years since notice was given, 99; views of President Van Buren, 100; the will of the people, 100; a view of the administration of President Jackson, 101; state of our foreign relations, 101; affairs at home, 102; constitution vindicated from an imputation of more than forty years, 102; the true theory and practical intent of the constitution shown to the country, 103; removal of the public money from the bank, 103; wisdom of the treasury order, 104; difficulty with France, 104; he came into office the first of generals and goes out the first of statesmen, 104; his confidence in the discernment and equity of the American people, 105.

How was the original resolution passed? 106; it has failed of its object, 106; the President tried and condemned without form, 106; he has not been tried according to the provisions of the constitution, 107; every legislative, executive, and judicial body has a right to strike out, alter, erase, and correct its records, 107.

The passage of this resolution foreseen, 107; change in public sentiment, 107; Virginia joined the funeral procession, 108.

Important amendment, 108.

The measure proposed is a violation of the constitution, 108; if you may expunge a part, you may expunge the whole, 108; interposition of Executive power has made the change here, 109; what is the pretext for this enormity? 109; a destiny in this thing, 109; every proposition of the original resolution true, 111; the questions involved in the original resolution, 112; position in which the treasury stood previous to 1833, 112; investigation of the condition of the bank in 1833, 112; appointment of Mr. Duane, 113; power of the President for this act, 113; no necessity for the removal of the deposits, 114; assumption of power by the President, 114; powers of the Senate, 114; impeachment, 115; has not the Senate power to remonstrate against an Executive usurpation? 115; if not, what are the consequences? 115; precedent in France, 116; precedent in Pennsylvania, 116; what patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this resolution? 117, 118.

A more grave and solemn question rarely presented to the Senate, 119; who was the President? 119; the original resolution is unjust, 119, 120; it is unconstitutional, 121, 122, 123; had the Senate any power to adopt such a resolution? 124; do the Senate possess the power of expunging from their journals? 125; the word "keep," 126; the word "expunge" the appropriate one, 128; authority of Mr. Jefferson, 128; action in Massachusetts, 128.

What is it we are called upon to do? 130; terms of the resolution, 130; the word "expunge," 131; has the Senate any such power over its journal? 131; intention of the journal, 132; there are matters of fact of which the journal is the highest evidence, 133; the friends of the President should preserve the resolution as a monument of reproach to those who participated in the measure, 133; reasons offered for the adoption of this expunging resolution, 133; eight offered by the mover, 134; it is the inherent right and property of every deliberative assembly to have and express opinions which can be done only by resolution, 135; the right to pass the original resolution unquestionable, 136; passage of the original resolution regretted, 136; the question one of power to expunge the journal, 136; it is said the resolution contained impeachable matter, 137.

This no ephemeral transaction, 137; preamble objectionable, 137; advice to a judge in the British provinces, 137; the constitution has not laid down any restriction applicable to the present case, 138; an assumption to say that the Senate impeached the President, 138; the act not unconstitutional, 138; the resolution ought to be expunged for its impropriety, its dangerous tendency, its injustice, and its falsehood, 139; its impropriety, 139; its dangerous tendency, 140; its injustice, 140; its falsehood, 140; the Executive power, 141; the right of removal of the deposits, 141; the privilege and duty of the President, 142; the act a stroke of generalship which causes the laurels of New Orleans to look pale, 142; a master stroke, 142; the voice of the people has commanded us to expunge, 143.

We abandon no ground we have assumed and heretofore sustained, 144; character of the resolution of 1834, 144; power of Congress to place the public treasure out of the immediate control of the President, 145; the Executive power, 145; the act of removal was against law, 146; details of affairs, 146; duty and action of the bank officers, 147; charges examined, 147, 143; the removal was in violation of the constitution, 149; truth of the statement in the resolution, 149; our right to spread it on the record, 149; why was it improper or indelicate to pass this resolution? 149; the Senate has a right to assert its own powers, 149; it is objected to as couched in terms of censure, 150; every thing that can enlist the popular ear resorted to in order to sustain this proposed act, 150; it is said the Senate is merely called upon to rejudge its own justice, 151; the majority should well consider this act, 151; further debate, 152.

Protest of the Massachusetts Senators, 153.

The resolution to expunge, 155.

Its adoption, 156; its execution, 156; disturbance of the galleries, 156; the disturber taken into custody, 157; brought to the bar of the Senate, 157; remarks, 157; discharged, 157.

A resolution to expunge the expunging resolution offered, 556. See Index, vol. 12.

FOSTER, EPHRAIM H., Senator from Tennessee, 639.

FOSTER, HENRY A., Representative from New York, 460.

Fourth Instalment.—In the Senate, a bill for the postponement of, reported, 351; read a second time, 351; called here at an extraordinary emergency, 352; necessity for relief, 352; three evils under which the community suffers, 352; this measure proposed in order to provide for the wants of Government, 352; a question of expediency whether it would not be better to supply the wants of the treasury from other means, 353; it is most convenient, 353; what sort of notes does the Secretary propose to issue? 353.

The state of the treasury, 353; money must be borrowed to make out a part of this instalment if paid, 354; if Congress insist upon this transfer, it must authorize a loan to do it, 354; dexterity of the Senator from Massachusetts, in extricating himself from difficulty, 354; facts in regard to this bill, 354; the deposit law a bare transfer of the deposits, 355; are we bound on principle to deposit this fourth instalment? 355; the law of 1815 on treasury notes, 355; this postponement ought to be made, 356; another era had now arisen, 356; amendment offered, 356; would change the essential principles and terms of the deposit act, 356; carried, 356.

History of the deposit act, 357; better to curtail expenditures than to stop the payment of this instalment, 357; the States have already made a disposition of the money, 357; retrenchment ought to be exercised, 357.

No power in the constitution to raise money for the mere purpose of depositing with the several States, 353; it would lay the foundation of a new national debt, 353; for what does the constitution authorize us to borrow money? 353; voracious character of the surplus spirit, 353; Congress will never make any requisition for this money, 353; bill passed, 359.

In the House, a bill to postpone the payment of, reported, 462; the bill to postpone considered, 466; the object of all these bills is to establish a treasury bank, 466; this bill originates in the hostility of the Administration to the deposit law, 467; are the expenditures of this Government to be restricted now or ever? 467; state of the treasury, 467; have not the States acquired rights under the act of 1836, which Congress cannot annul? 467; shall we set about curtailing extravagance? 468; extraordinary expenditures of the last year, 468; to continue this act will create a debt, 468.

The treasury bank already established, 469; expenditures of the Government, 469; a deficiency in our means, 469.

A clear contract was formed between the States and the Government by the act of 1836, 470; the President proposes nothing for the relief of the people, 470; the plan is to make this a hard-money Government, 470; it will increase executive patronage, 470; the beginning of a new system, 471; amendment moved, 471.

Shall the Government borrow money and pay this instalment? 471; does the Government want the money? 471; state of the treasury, 471; is it good policy to deposit this money when the Government needs it? 471; expectation has been raised on the part of the States that the transfer would be made, it is said, 472; how is the amount to be raised? 472; the question is—shall we borrow money to deposit with the States? 473; it is said to be a question of faith, 473; it is said, the expenditures can be so reduced as to pay this instalment, 473.

Does any one pretend this instalment shall never be paid? 474; can it be withheld without the consent of the States? 474; what are the obligations resting on Congress, in the relation which it holds to the States, relative to the payment of this instalment? 474; the law of 1836, 474; the proposition made, 475; the response, 475; a deliberate contract between independent sovereignties, 475.

This act is not a contract, as has been pretended, 475; expiration of the law, 475; is the fund necessary to meet the wants of the Government? 476; it is said the States have acquired a vested right in it, 476; if a contract, is it binding and valid? 476; a gratuitous bailment to the States on the part of the United States, 477; those who oppose, pervert the purposes of the deposit act, 477.

Wisdom and policy of the deposit law, 478; no deficiency of resources, 478; the States will receive this fund in bank bills, but the Government in coin, 478.

Opposition of the last administration to the measures recommended in the Message, 480; the State bank system on the collection of the revenue in coin is the true issue, 480; the bank system has been adopted from the foundation of the Government, 480; not a bill simply to withhold the fourth instalment, 480; the General Government no adverse or paramount rights in this fund to the people, 481; right that the people should have any surplus collected, 481; it is said there is no surplus, 781; the clause of the deposit act possesses all the features of a contract, 481; we are asked to break this contract, 482; and in order to help the administration out of difficulties, 482; divorce of bank and State no new question, 482; sub-Treasuries, 483; comparative safety of bank deposits, 483; the true issue, 483; amendment rejected in committee, 484; object of the bill, 486; are there no other means of replenishing the treasury? 486; why is there a deficiency in the treasury? 486; the proposition to separate the interests of the Government from the people, 487; competent for Government to create in the form of laws, contracts binding on it, 487; what is the nature and spirit of the act of 1836? 487; the history of that act, 488; what action by the States ensued the passage of that law? 489; what is the necessity alleged by the President and assumed by this bill? 489.

Is the nation bound by contract to deposit this money with the States? 490; objects of the act of 1836, 490; what was the consideration, and when was the contract consummated? 490.

A change come over the spirit of our dream, 490; catastrophe has come and overwhelmed us, 491; origin of the deposit measure, 491; it is not intended the States shall ever receive this instalment, 492; the bill is in aid of the sub-Treasury scheme, 492; how can conservatives vote for this bill, which is part of a system of warfare? 492; "banks on the hip," 492; the Flag letter, 493; the evil which General Jackson did live after him, 493.

Previous question put, 494; bill ordered to a third reading, 494; motion to reconsider, 495.

The provisions of the act of 1836 are peculiar, 495; what will be the result of defeating this bill? 495; the three instalments must be called back, 495; to execute the law, the Secretary must draw contributions from the States, to distribute back again, 495; further remarks, 496; motion to reconsider, carried, 496; amendments, 497; bill passed, 497.

In the Senate, a bill to further postpone the payment of, considered, 707; will not one year's further postponement be sufficient? 707; moved to postpone to January 1st, 1840, 708; postponement can do no harm, 708; check the House in its expenditures, 708; now proposed to raise a revenue for the purpose of distribution, 708; effect of the act foretold, to break the deposit banks, or compel them to crush their creditors, 708; what was the effect of the motion under consideration? 709; raising money for distribution unconstitutional, 710; the original bill was not a distribution act, 710; distribution recommended three times by President Jackson, 710; the principle contended for was deposit with the States, where the Government could command it when wanted, 711; President Jackson questioned the constitutional power of the Government to raise money for any such act, 712; economy of Adams' administration, 712; further debate, 713, 714; bill postponed, 715.

Independent Treasury Bill.—In the Senate, a bill for, etc., considered, 374; amendment offered, 374; a subject of great importance, 374; reasons for not supporting the amendment, 375; the treasury order has exerted a most salutary influence, 375; the recent change in affairs requires a change in the policy of the last administration from the deposit banks to the sub-Treasury, 375; course of the banks cowardly and treacherous, 376; the deposit system a failure, 376; is the proposed system practicable? 376; this is no Government, if it has not the power within itself to manage the finances, 377; how will the proposed measure affect the paper of the State banks? 377; will cause a complete separation of the Government from the banks, 378; what have been the fruits of the connection of bank and state? 378; the banks have become an element of political power, 378.

This scheme is the most alarming proposition that has ever been presented to the American mind, 380; it proposes to separate your fortunes from those of the great body of the people, 380; a measure most noxious to the West, 381; consequences that must result from the measure, 381.

A crisis of the country, 381; what does it behoove us to do in the present exigency? 381; do any objections apply to the present measure? 382; its simplicity, 382; decision of time in its behalf, 382; the Government cannot continue her connection with banks without stimulating their factitious credit, 383; union of the Government with the banks stimulates the natural evils of the banking system, 383.

The President anticipated much diversity of opinion on this subject, 384; banks as able as ever to perform the duties required of them, 384; divorce of bank and state a mere catch phrase, 384; it strikes at the foundation of the credit system, 384; gives to the people a depreciated currency, 385; it will finally deprive them of any currency adequate to carry on the business of the community, 385; tendency to bring the country to an exclusive metallic currency, 385; a most unsafe and dangerous union, 386; danger in the scheme from the appointment of its officers, 386; every fact goes against the system, 386.

The bill declares the divorce, 387; it restores the currency of the constitution, 387; great political, pecuniary, and moral evils have flowed from the departure, 387; the moneyed losses to the Government from the use of bank notes, 387; I am asked if I would lose confidence in all steamboats if one or two should blow up, 388; the day of resumption will be a day of peril and death to many, 388; banks of circulation are banks of hazard and of failure, 388; the power of a few banks over the whole, 389; what apology for losing the precise advantage for which the constitution was framed, 389; the moral view of the question obvious, 389; what is the obstacle to the adoption of this measure? 390; the first petition to Congress for a bank, 390; report of the committee on it, 390; origin of banking in this country, 390; what does the President recommend? 390; the right and obligation of the Government to keep its own money, 391; example of England, 391; example of the confederation, 391; the nature of the bill, 391; capacity of the country to furnish the quantity of gold and silver, 392; evidences, 392; specie circulation of France, 393; taunted with treasury notes, 393; views of Bonaparte, 393; change in France, 394; effects of the paper system of England, 394; the amendment proposed, 395; objections, 395; some suppose it will be a great injury to the local banks, 395; objections to the further use of bank notes, 396; this is a measure worthy to be called reformation, 397.

Two plans before the Senate, 397; a new experiment, 398; imperial precedents, 398; causes of the present distress, 398; treasury order, 399; the United States Bank, 399, 400, 401; the present question, 402; the perpetual and gratuitous introduction of the bank, 402; who will support my proposition? 402; this sub-Treasury scheme in the House in 1834, 403; the gloom of the future, 404; the past, 404; the peculiar causes of our distress, 405; evil under which the country labors is the suspension of the banks, 405; the system of measures proposed by the administration, examined, 405; why this new experiment? 406; no prudent Government will long run counter to the habits of the people, 406; insecurity of the measure, 406; liability to favoritism, 406; it is said, the Executive is now weak, 407; union of the purse and the sword, 407.

It is said, the bill will increase Executive patronage, 409; letter from the Seventh Ward Bank, New York, 409; dangerous tendencies of the deposit system, 409; Executive patronage, 410; the President against the extension of patronage, 411; it is said this bill establishes a treasury bank, 411; that it will divorce the Government from the people, 412; what is the present law? 412; it is said, the terms, "divorce of bank and state," are popular catch-words, 412; the State banks will be where they were before the removal of the deposits, 413; this measure will prove a fountain of wealth and prosperity to the South, 413.

Nothing in all these measures for the relief of the country, 414; how has this question arisen? 414; position of the administration when two months old, 414; tendency of the Message and bill to abolish a useful power of the Government, 415; the characteristic of this crisis is distress, 415; the single object of these measures is the relief of the Government, 416; two propositions to be maintained, 416; duty of the Government to see a proper paper currency maintained, 416; position of the member from South Carolina on the bank, 417; explanation, 417; the bill and amendments deny in substance it has any duty connected with the currency beyond the regulation of the coins, 417; this is not true, 417; what measures does the Message recommend? 418; shall one of the great powers of the constitution be now surrendered forever? 418; the State banks, 418; this project is in every respect objectionable, 419; against all our usages and habits, 419.

This bill, if carried into effect, cannot fail to relieve the Government, 419; its effects, 419; an objection by banks to the reception of the deposits, 420; it is objected to this bill, that it provides for the collection of the revenues of the Government in gold and silver, 420; that it repeals the deposit bank act, 421; that it creates one currency for the Government and another for the people, 421; that it divorces the Government from the banks, 421; all these measures look to the relief of the Government and the people, 422.

The commercial and manufacturing classes suffering under a periodical pressure, 422; history of the country in this respect, 422; whence this eternal vicissitude in the business of the country? 422; causes, 422, 423; the present distress inevitable, 424; evils of a redundant paper circulation now manifest, 424; the banks have divorced the Government from themselves, 424; we are now entirely free to determine what shall be done with the public money, 424; a national bank, 424; would such a bank control and regulate the issues of the State banks? 425; mistake in regard to the deposit banks, 425; no confidence in the deposit banks, 426; when a bank fails, who suffer? 426; the deluge of shipplasters, 426; if you double the circulation you double the price of articles, 427; the banks are now in the power of the State Governments, 427; the union between the banks and the treasury ought not to be restored, 428; the divorce should be perpetual, 428; power of the Secretary over these banks, if he was disposed to exert an improper influence, 428; a league of associated banks might be more dangerous than a national bank, 428; the present bill, 429; the amendment, 429; the funds receivable, 429.

This ferocious warfare on the institutions of the country to be deprecated, 429.

Reasons in favor of the measure, 430; the Government dependent on the banks, if they are made depositories, 430; hence the uncertainty of its financial affairs, 431; indebtedness to England, 431; a national bank would have been overwhelmed, 431; the movements of certain presses devoted to the banks, 431; consequence of the connection of the Government and the banks for the last few years, 432; the choice is between a fiscal agency and a national bank, 432.

Three measures proposed by this bill, 432; objects to be accomplished by them, 433; security in keeping the public treasure, 433; to provide a currency of gold and silver, 433; the entire expulsion of paper not contended for, 433; the ratio of the mixture of paper and coin reduced to three classes, 433; applied to the currency of the whole country, 434; this measure will destroy the proposed object, 434; tendency of paper to expel coin, 434; its effect on a mixed currency of the country, 435; it is said, by requiring payments in coin to the Government, you compel its circulation, 435; experience at present, 435; Congress bound to furnish a sound currency of coin and paper to the people, 436; power given in the constitution to regulate commerce and the standards of value and quantity, 436; power to coin money, and for what purpose, 436; the consequence of the existence of this power and the constitutional duty, 437; duty of Congress to regulate the issue of bank notes, 437.

Measures proposed by the Finance Committee, examined, 437; the first bill to postpone the fourth instalment, 437; the second, to issue treasury notes, 438; the third, to extend merchants' bonds, 438; fourth, to extend the time to the deposit banks for repayment, 438; is this forgetting the suffering interests of the community in our exclusive care of the Government? 439; what do these measures amount to for relief? 439; views of the Message, 439; the crisis one of deep interest, 440; natural to inquire into the causes, 440; certain general positions conceded by all, 441; influence of the present bill on the treasury, 441; give the treasury perfect command of its means, 441; relieve the treasury from the necessity of using its means to sustain the credit of the banks, 442; cause a perfect uniformity in the value of the collections and disbursements of the treasury, 442; what unfavorable influences will follow from this bill, 442; influences of the measure upon Government, 443; free the legislation of Congress from bank influence, 443; effect of this measure upon the banks, 444; it is said, it will destroy these institutions, 444; the banks would be benefited in every light, 445.

Amendment, 445; adopted, 445; amendment authorizing reception of certain bank bills, lost, 445; other amendments, 446; bill ordered to third reading, 446.

An apprehension the divorce would cripple the banks, 446; effect of the amendment, 446; gradual change in the mode of collection, 447; Government should be able to command its own funds, 447; further remarks, 448; bill passed, 448.

Immediate causes of our distress arise from that peculiar system of credit and currency enlarged so extensively in this country and England, 521; disposition of those who depend upon this system to lean on Government, 521; the slightest irregular movement of Government produces a shock, 521; contraction of capitalists and banks, 522; Government in a peculiar position under the suspension of specie payments, 522; how shall you reunite the Government and the banks? 522; three alternatives, 522; influence of banks and of individuals, 523; the proposition submitted in 1835, 523; remarks, 524.

This bill violates the constitution, 526; said to be no new proposition, 526; provisions of the bill, 526; if the bill passes, the money of the people would not be safe, 526; in the midst of a great commercial revolution, 527; how can we exercise the powers given us by the constitution, and remould the fiscal action of the Government, so as to relieve the country of its sufferings? 527; under our banking policy, the banks have the exclusive right of making paper money, and their paper only received for public dues, 527; under the usury laws, they draw higher interest than the capitalist, 528; the false and artificial laws of expansion and contraction, 528; if the State governments will have a paper currency, this is the safest mode, 529; never wish to see the banks converted into political engines, 529; the connection between bank and state a conjunction ominous to our liberties, 529; plan of special deposits best, 529; divorce is the great principle, 530.

The measures are not at all commensurate with the exigencies of the times, 530; it is to operate on the currency as it now is, 530; how long is this state of things to continue? 530; specie banished, 531; what will be the probable operation of a law that takes no account of the present state of the currency? 531; we could have no return to a specie circulation under it, 531; the Government must deal in that currency in which the people deal, 532; suppose the law carried out, what would follow? 532; resumption indefinitely postponed by this law, 532.

A general return to the precious metals would embarness and impede trade, 534; absurd to talk of such a currency in this country, 535; it is said, the only advantage of a paper currency is its cheapness, 535; circulation of Europe, 535; loss by a metallic currency, 535; it is said, we should not be alarmed by experiments, 536; currency of bank paper not due entirely to the Government, 536; a word for the South, 537; supposed injurious effect of banks on the laboring classes, 537; effect of expansion on wages, 537, 538.

What have we done? 538; postponed the fourth instalment, 538; issued treasury notes, 539; this is the next great measure, 539; no man can determine the number of sub-treasuries, 540; what is this bill? 540; one of the great means used by autocrats to perpetuate their power, 540; such is this bill, 541.

This measure, as a Democratic one, is new, 542; public opinion not sufficiently enlightened, 542; motion to lay the bill on the table, 542; carried, 542.

A bill, etc., considered, 621; motion to strike out what relates to funding the surplus, 621; carried, 621; this bill a reproduction of that of the last session, 622; the producing classes, not the banks, constitute the country, 623; what had the administration sought to do? 623.

Resolutions of the Pennsylvania Legislature presented, requesting a postponement of the bill, 625; the features of the bill, 625; the right of instruction, 625; on questions of expediency it should be a strong case to induce a Senator to abandon his post, 626.

Who are most conspicuous in pressing this bill upon Congress and the people? 626; it is said we ought to follow the lead of the Senator from South Carolina, 627; he withdrew from us, 627; his speech was plausible, ingenious, abstract, metaphysical, and generalizing, 627; he reminds us that we denounced the pet bank system, 627; he professes to be the friend of the banks, and attacked the whole banking system of the country, 628; the additional amount of money the banks furnish is a powerful stimulus to industry, 629; banks deemed highly injurious to the planting interest, 629; none profited more by the employment of capital and credit derived from the banks, 629; the argument against the right of the Government to receive bank notes not sound, 630; I appeal from himself to himself, 630; further considered, 633.

Motion to postpone to the next session, lost, 642; the Edgefield letter, 643; reason for not acting against the administration, 643; what would have been the result if we had joined in the attack? 643; could I have acted differently from what I did? 643; extract from the Edgefield letter, 643; the imputation falls to the ground, 644; what he charges on me he has actually done, 644; it is said I bore a character of stern fidelity, and it is implied that I forfeited it, 644; if he meant stern fidelity to party, my answer is, I never belonged to the party he does, 645; my present political position, 645; I cannot retort upon the Senator the charge of being metaphysical, 646; I make no reply to the defects of understanding he attributes to me, 646; course of public life, 646; the restrictive measure, 646; the bank of 1814, 647; administration of the War Department, 647.

War experience, 648; peace experience, 648; the second explosion of the paper system, 648; the great measures for restoring the currency, 649; the bank explosion of 1837, 650; the two principles of the bill, 650; founded in the clearest reasons of propriety and constitutionality, 650; the Federal Government ought to use the money of the Federal constitution, 651; an adequate supply of specie for the country is one of the first duties of the Federal Government, 651; large mercantile payments will forever be made in bits of paper representing large masses of property, 651; the constitution vests in Congress power to regulate the value of coin, 652.

Amendment rejected, 655; reconsideration lost, 655.

In the House, the Senate bill having been read twice, motion to lay it on the table carried, 655.

Resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina presented, 721; political character of the resolutions, 721; how far to be regarded as instructions, 721-726; debate, 727, 728.

Michigan, admission of.—In the House, a bill relative to the Southern Boundary and admission, &c., considered, 29; moved to postpone, to proceed with the Arkansas bill, 29; recommitment of both moved, 29; the question of boundary should be left for future adjustment, 30; bill ordered to a third reading, 30; passed, 31.

In the Senate, a message relative to, 65; remarks, 65; referred, 65; motion to read the bill for admission a third time, 69; one of the gravest questions ever submitted to the Senate, 69; the bill should pass early, that Michigan might receive her share of the deposits to be distributed, 69; the facts of the case, 69; more time desirable, 70; is the Senate competent to declare the acts of the last convention valid? 70; force of the preamble of the bill, 70; people of the Territory perfectly competent to hold a convention spontaneously, without any application to the Legislature about the matter, 71.

The last convention illegal and unauthorized, 71; is this act of the people a fulfilment of the condition of admission? 71; was society to be reduced to its elements? 71; such doctrines ought not to be tolerated, 71; no act of the Legislature required to give validity to the convention, 72; a mere question of right, 72; the admission resisted for four years, 72.

Orders postponed to consider the bill, 72; the bill, 73; moved to recommit and strike out the preamble, 73; the facts, 73; had this self-constituted assembly authority to assent for the State? 73; if not, then to introduce her on its authority would be repugnant to the principles of our constitution, 73; on what reason is it held that this assembly had the authority? 74; because more votes were given for this than for the other convention, 74; a question of principle involved, 74; the authority of numbers is made to set aside the authority of law and the constitution, 74; same principle involved in the late anarchical movement of Maryland, 74; ground of the Maryland insurrection, 74; it is said the Michigan assembly was not self-constituted, 74; Congress has no right to call a convention in a State, 74; how Michigan can come in, 74; Michigan differs from the other States only in her Federal relations, 75; what shall be done? 75.

Review of facts and circumstances, 75; Congress did not intend that the intervention of the Legislature should be necessary, 76; amount of the testimony as to the assent of the people, 76; this delay unnecessary, 77.

Amendment to the preamble moved, 77; it asserts what is not a fact, 77; the question is between the two conventions—if the first was legal, the last was not, 78; what evidence is there of any regularity in the elections of delegates? 78.

What is the question? 79; shall we release Michigan after she has given her assent to the conditions? 79; opinion of the people as to their southern boundary, 79; shall we reject this preamble, which will forever terminate the dispute between two States? 80; views entertained of the preamble at the last session, 80; no objection to the act of Congress unless the people are not competent to give the required assent without the intervention of the Legislature, 81; conduct of the people, 81; Tennessee, 81; Missouri, 81; case of Maryland, 82; as a source of power to the convention, legislative action would have been absurd, 82; the people are the rightful authors of all constitutions, 82.

Present aspect of the question, 83; Pennsylvania affairs, 83; the Maryland branch of the question, 83; remarks of Madison, 84; conventions independent of State legislation, 84; how have State Legislatures assumed to have the power to grant or withhold them? 84; the case of Michigan, 84; denunciation of mobs at the last session, 85.

The bill involves a monstrous political heresy, 85; the case simply stated, 85, action under the ordinance of '87, 86; has the condition been complied with? 86; settlement of the boundaries, 87; privilege of Legislatures and force of constitutions, 88; the power to call the convention required in Michigan a mere act of ordinary legislation, 88.

Grounds upon which the opposition to this admission has been made, 89; she is still a territory, 89; Legislatures and conventions are mere agents of the people, in whom all sovereignty resides, 89; has a single remonstrance been presented? 90; the Senate has not enjoyed the confidence of the people for some years, 90; this a question of facts, 90; what were the doctrines of '98? 90; democracy was called a disease, 91; purpose for which the alien and sedition laws were passed, 91; absurdity of the principle contended for, shown, 91; the preamble unnecessary, 92; amendment lost, 92; bill ordered to a third reading, 92.

The question depends upon what was the vacancy and how it is to be filled, 500; the vacancy, 500; have these persons been elected? 500; it is a vacancy which the Executive of a State cannot supply, 500; still less can he supply it for a term of two years, 500; nullification, 501; this election unconstitutional, 501; how will the resolution be received by the people of Mississippi? 502; adopted, 502.

SLADE, WILLIAM, Representative from Vermont, 3, 460; on the abolition of slavery, 563.

Slavery, action of Indiana.—See Index, vol. 3, Ordinance.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.—In the House, petitions presented, 5; laid on the table, 5; further petitions, 5; motion not to receive, 5; impropriety of introducing them here, 6; votes equivocal, 6; motion to reconsider, 6; right of petition sacred, 6; care should be taken to allay public feeling, 6; former motion misunderstood, 6; the question must be met now or at some future time, 7; desire to agitate the question, 7; motion to reconsider laid on the table, 7.

Resolutions on the subject, 7; motion to reconsider the vote referring a petition, 7; idle to attempt to avoid this subject by any parliamentary manoeuvre, 8; necessity of quieting the anxiety on the subject, 8; what the vote will show, 8; the only way to get rid of the question, 8; how disposed of formerly, 8, 9; present action, 9; discussion will follow, 9; what becomes of the incendiary speeches if they go to the public? 9; this subject is no affair of yours, 10; nothing satisfy the South but the indignant rejection of these petitions, 10.

Who are these petitioners? 10; their condition, 10; question of reconsideration carried, 10; motion to lay the petition on the table, 11; carried, 11.

Resolutions offered, 12; question taken and carried, 13; the report of the select committee, 24; not one ground in the whole report for Southern men to rest a foot upon, 24; an abandonment of the rights of the South, 24; the report ought to be printed, 25; it yields every thing the abolitionists could have expected, 25.

Motion to recommit with instructions, &c., 25; should print it, 25; every thing not surrendered to the abolitionists, 26; the number of memorials, 26; great moral causes at work in favor of the South, 26; the power of Congress in the District, 26; every thing operating favorably for the South, 26; further debate, 27; first resolution adopted, 27; second resolution adopted, 28; third adopted, 28.

In the Senate, a memorial of the grand jury of Washington, protesting against the interference of citizens of distant States with slavery in the District, 158; motion to print an extra number, 158; it takes the right ground, 158; is the subject matter proper for Congress to entertain, 158; it would lead to the belief that Congress was about to act on the subject, 158.

Memorials from Indiana presented, 186; motion to receive laid on the table, 187, 189.

In the House, petitions for, presented and laid on the table, 254; others presented, 255; petition of Southerners, 255; nothing about slavery, 255; laid on the table, 255; other petitions presented, and a motion to suspend the rule, 256.

Petitions from females of twenty-eight towns in New Hampshire, 265; laid on the table, 266.

Petition from Fredericksburg, Virginia, 266; to stop the slave-trade in the District, 266.

Petition from twenty-two slaves, 266; what shall be done with it? 266; first instance of the kind, 266; should be summarily dealt with, 266; such infraction of the rules should be punished, 267; rules suspended, 267; motion to take the Fredericksburg petition from the table and return it to its authors, 267; amendment moved relative to the presentation of a petition from slaves, 268; an amendment to the amendment, 268; an abuse of the right of petition to present papers indiscriminately, 268; too many seek to hide their opinions on the abolition of slavery, under a denial of the right of petition, 269; an amendment offered relative to contempt of the House, 269; is there the power or the will in this House to discountenance such proceedings? 269; the resolution states two facts, are they so? 269.

The charges made against me, 270; attempt to present a petition from slaves, and praying for their emancipation, 270; who knows that this is so? 270; what is the decision of the House? 270; why are we almost daily drawn into the consideration of abstract and impracticable subjects, 270; views under which Mr. Adams acts, 271; charity for his age, 271; will we live up to the agreement we have made with our Southern brethren? 271; an attempt to introduce a petition from slaves no trifling matter, 271; other resolutions, 271.

The proceedings the effect of the resolutions on this subject, 272; bound to maintain the dignity of this body, 272; the Union safe, 271; the venerable member hoaxed, 272; this subject ought not to be discussed by Southern members, 272; discussion had continued until excitement had risen to the highest pitch, 273; whether the petition was a jest or not his conduct was reprehensible, 273.

Resolutions of censure of Mr. Adams considered, 273; he did not present the petition of slaves, 274; explanation, 274; modification of the resolutions offered, 274; explanation should be satisfactory, 275; the resolution, 275; the explanation does not prove the propriety of his course, 275; difference of opinion as to the course to be pursued, 275; the South not well understood, 275; did the member from Massachusetts violate any parliamentary rule? 276; was it an offense to give color to the idea that slaves possess the right of petition? 276; how gentlemen seek to justify their course, 276; our great fundamental rights, 276; these rights assailed in the denunciations of the North, 277; can the sentiments of a portion of the people in the non-slaveholding States be a crime? 277; the right of petition not a right given by the constitution, 277; will these angry attacks check the spread of the disapprobation of slavery? 278; the right of petition appertains to the person of the petitioner, 279; further debate, 278.

The resolutions, 280; not true that all men have the right to petition the Government, 281; object of the Abolitionists, 281; the resolution of the House relative to these petitions, 281; its extent, 281; wrong to raise the question whether slaves can petition, 281; the charge of offence too vague to justify a vote of censure, 282; legal rights of the slave, 282; character of these petitions, 282; modification of the amendment, 282; previous question moved and not seconded, 282.

First question before the House was whether they would receive a petition from slaves, 283; reasons assigned for not receiving their petition, 283; petition a right given by the God of nature to every man when created, 283; a petition is a supplication, 284; this right does not depend upon condition or character, 284; once admit that the right of petition is limited, and limitations will be constantly added, 285; does it depend on the power to grant the request? 285; the resolutions which have been offered, 285; when you charge others with crimes, be sure of your facts, 286; threats of an indictment, 286; the members of this House amenable to a grand jury for words spoken in debate! 287; first request of the Speaker of the House of Commons, 287; not to be intimidated, 287; am I to be found guilty for giving color to an idea? 288; the resolution does not answer my question, 288; it turns upon the man, 288; the second resolution a substitute for all the others, 289; not conscious of having given the least particle of offence to the House, 289; adjournment moved and lost, 289; motion to lay on the table moved and lost, 290; resolutions rejected, 290.

Petitions presented, 555; motion to lay on the table, carried, 555; others presented, 555; question of reception, carried, 555.

In the Senate, petitions presented, 557; is this feeling on the increase? 557; not on the increase, 557; grows out of a spirit of fanaticism, 557; no conciliatory course, no temporizing, 557; committee of the District not constituted to consider this subject, 557; it is asked if this increase of petitions does not arise from a belief that the right of petition is invaded, 558; limits of this right, 558; better meet the petitioners at once, and say they have no right to come here on this subject, 558; their prayer is reasonable, temperate, just, 558; no reason for urging their reception but to produce excitement, 559; men of all parties concur in these petitions, 559; sentiments of New Hampshire, 559; to receive and report would not increase excitement, 559; it is said the right of petition is violated, 559; nothing gained by discussion here, 560; past course of the Senate, 560; will control political parties at the North, 560; further debate, 561; laid on the table, 562.

Vermont Anti-Slavery Resolutions.—Infamous libel on the South, 562; the united voice of Vermont, 563; the time had come to determine if this Union was to be dissolved, 563; respect due to the source whence the resolutions come, 563; memorial withdrawn, 563.

In the House, motion to refer two memorials to the Committee on the District, 563; possible results of such a course, 564; members from Virginia requested to retire, 564; other delegations requested also, 564; questions of order, 564; House adjourns, 565; note, 565.

Resolution to lay all petitions on the table, 566; proceedings, 566; resolution adopted, 567.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.—In the Senate, resolutions offered, 567; the resolutions, 567; note, 568; object of the resolutions, 568; desirable to pass them by a unanimous vote, 569.

What would abstract propositions of this nature effect? 569; no measure could be considered child's play when all that was dear to man was at stake, 569; danger of producing mischief by discussion of the resolutions, 569; was it not better to meet the question a little offensively than not to meet it at all? 570.

Counter resolutions offered, 570; the creed of the Abolitionists displayed, 570.

Reason for pressing the resolutions, 570; to decide if any neutral ground could be adopted on which to rally and check this fatal doctrine, 570; amendments moved, 571; debate, 571, 572; vote on the separate resolutions, 577; the resolutions as passed, 577.

Why strike out the words political, moral, or religious? identical language of the Abolitionists, 579; this the ground on which to meet them, 579; theirs, a grand scheme of universal emancipation, 579; amendment moved to the third resolution, 579; slavery entirely a domestic question, 579; Maryland and Virginia would never have ceded if they imagined this question would have been raised, 580; reasons for inserting the words proposed to be struck out, 580; if this war is to be transferred to the North, would you weaken the bonds of those who fight for the South? 580; General Government bound to keep "hands off," 581; effect of the amendment, 581; further amendment offered, 582; remarks, 582.

Amendment offered, 583; all classes of men an inexpressible right above all government to the freedom of speech and the right of petition, 583; amendment adopted, 583; what intended by the original resolutions, 584; abstractions, 584; amendment and resolutions cannot stand together, 584; source of the amendment, 585; first resolution embodies the principles of nullification, 585; they contain all the principles of the alien and sedition laws, 585; motion to refer to a select committee, 586; the resolutions assume the only constitutional ground which can give peace, 586; the mass adverse to the fanatics, 587; extent and magnitude of the present danger, 587; first object to meet the disease where it originated, 588.

This not the best course to attain the desired results, 588; this the great centre of agitation, 588; what shall we gain by the adoption of the resolutions? 589; what have we witnessed on the present occasion? 589; on what are these abstractions to operate? 589.

The resolutions not called for, 589; Abolitionists have no motive to dissolve the Union, 590; misguided philanthropists, 590; discussion challenged, 590; not a censure of Abolitionists whispered, 591.

The resolutions sound and just, 591; they are an answer to the petitions, 591; designs of the agitators not confined to the District, 592; what is the real source of danger? 592; not predict the issue of the struggle at the North, 592; amendments moved, 593; fourth resolution adopted, 593; the fifth, 593; difference with the other resolutions, 593; presents the issue in this District, 594; the resolutions meet the case, 594; so long as slavery continues in Maryland and Virginia, it is vain to expect its abolition here, 594.

Vague and general abstractions, 594; the mover relies on two points to carry the Senate with him, 595; it is possible the gentleman might be mistaken, 595; interference with slavery a violation of public faith to Maryland and Virginia, 595; these resolutions may tend to increase excitement, 596; offered to revive and rally the State rights party, 596; nothing needed in the slave States to stimulate our vigilance, 596; three classes of cases for the exercise of the right of petition, 596; it is said when a petition is once in possession of the Senate, the right has been practically enjoined, 597; it is said these fanatics are beyond the reach of any argument, 597; no apprehension for the safety of the Union, 597; other resolutions offered, 598; to what they relate, 598.

The principle taken that concession is the way to meet the Abolitionists, 599; what is there alarming in the mere fact of receiving petitions, 599; further debate, 599, 600.

The amendment entirely abandons the territories to the Abolitionists, 601; it concedes the right of Congress to appropriate funds to emancipate slaves, 601; admits

- the duty of Congress to receive and discuss abolition petitions, 601; the low and subdued tone of the amendment, 601; reply, 601, 602; amendment adopted, 602; vote reconsidered, 602; the first part places slavery in the District on its true principles, 602; motion to strike out the second part carried, 603.
- No matter-of-fact or ground of argument on which this affirmation of plighted faith can be sustained, 603; Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over the District, 603; the States making the cession expected Congress to exercise this jurisdiction, 603.
- Would the States have ceded this territory if they supposed Congress would make it an asylum for fugitive slaves? 603; a violation of implied faith to abolish slavery in this District, 603.
- The words of the resolution speak for themselves, 604; nothing to support the affirmation of plighted faith, 604; no provisions in the act of cession, 604; cases supposed, 605; first branch of the substitute carried, 605.
- Second branch of the substitute considered, 605; note, 605; reason given for not abolishing slavery in Florida, because it is inexpedient, 606; this fallacious, 606; a particular territory should not be designated, 606; Missouri Compromise a dangerous measure, 606; this resolution contrasted with the fifth, 606; no other territory but Florida in which slavery exists, 607; it is said the tone of the resolutions is not strong enough, 607; two compromises on the Missouri question, 607; further debate, 608, 609; resolution agreed to, 610.
- Sixth resolution, 610; the fundamental position that the Union rests on an equality among the several States, 610; whatever destroys this equality tends to destroy the Union, 610; further remarks, 610; motion to lay the resolution on the table, 611; carried, 611.
- Vermont Anti-Slavery Resolutions* introduced again, 615; their substance, 615; offensive language of the resolutions, 615; motion to lay the question of reception on the table, lost, 616; resolutions laid on the table, 616; presented, 719; debate, 720.

In the House, an appropriation for a diplomatic agent to, considered, 325; the question involves the destiny in some sort of a young Republic, 325; non-intervention has hitherto been the practice of this Government, 325; message of Monroe in 1819, 325; is it the duty of this country now to recognize Texas as an independent nation? 325; deficiency of our information, 325; her ability to maintain a separate existence, 326; an act of recognition would be an acknowledgment of our determination to uphold her, 326; views of the President, 327; Texas purposes, upon our acknowledgment, to seek for admission into the United States, 327; action of her Government, 327; are we not bound by every consideration of comity to confer with Mexico before we recognize the independence of one of her revolted provinces? 328.

Treasury Circular.—In the Senate, resolutions relative to, offered, 57; nature of this paper, 57; objects for which it was framed, 58; errors of the Secretary, 58; to destroy the effect of the deposit bill, 59; other motives, 59.

Extract from the President's Message, 59; this order intended to save the finances and the currency, 60; the constitutional medium of gold and silver, the only safety to the national finances, 60; opposition to the resolutions, 63; charges upon their advocates, 63; what is meant by constitutional currency? 63; what was the law when the Secretary issued this order? 64; resolution of 1816, 64.

Weighty reasons to justify voting against this resolution, 64; effects of the order, 65.

Substitute offered, 66; objects of the resolutions, 66; is this within our power? 66; power of the Executive to issue the order, 66; policy and expediency of the measure, 67; course of the Secretary in the execution of the deposit bill, 67.

The substitute considered, 92; Congress has no power to repeal an order of the Executive department, 92; a direct declaration of repeal inoperative, 92; the resolutions propose to prescribe a rule unnecessarily where a large discretion is necessary, 93; they are intended to censure the President, 93.

The substitute, 94; the circular has done its work, 95; one object of it was to check the tendency to bank issues and bank credits, 95; no operation more delicate than the reduction of the currency of a country, 95; now called upon to establish some permanent and equal rule for the collection of the public revenue, 96; two things to be settled in our ideas, 96; object, not the suppression of bank paper, but an efficient regulation of it, 96; exclusion of small bills, 97; the system of currency of Adam Smith, 97; reform in the currency of England traced in detail, 98; the result of it in practice, 98; an abundant supply of the precious metals in the ordinary channels of circulation, is the end to be aimed at, 98; incompatibility of a paper and metallic currency, 99.

Funds Receivable.—Bill taken up, 162; amendment lost, 162; bill ordered to be engrossed, 162; the bill, 165.

Importance of the original resolution for rescission, now in the form of a bill, 165; paper money intended to be made the currency of the Government, 165; objections against the bill, 165; the attempt to suppress small notes, 166; now the time to do it, 166; influence of the small banks, 166; their influence in England, 167; statement of Horsley Palmer, 167; our present position, 168; constitutional currency, 168; no certainty in the kind of money to be received at the land offices, 168; tend to inundate the new States with paper, 168; should no longer receive paper money, 168; a measure rescinding the treasury order, 169; effects of the order, 169; its effect on the Western banks, 170; immediate means in proportion to a bank's liability, 170; further debate, 171.

Facts and circumstances under which this controversy originated, 173; why vote for a reference, and then denounce the only report the committee can make? 174; why assail the committee? 174; scenes of ruin an extinction of all banks would cause, 174; this measure is said to be a repeal of the constitution, 175; resolution of, 1816, 175; the bill compared, 175; astounding doctrines advanced, 176; the bill should have been a resolution, 176; the proviso of the bill, 177; previous propositions, 177; views of the Senator from Missouri heretofore, 178, 179; to authorize a receipt of bank notes in payment of revenue, is not a repeal of the constitution, 179; no inducement held out to the banks to suppress small notes, 181; further debate, 181; bill passed, 190.

In the House, the bill limiting the funds receivable for revenue, considered, 331; amendment offered, 331; its effect is to destroy every valuable provision of the bill, 332; a central power necessary to regulate the currency, 332; this bill a repeal of the Treasury Act, 332; further debate, 332; bill ordered to a third reading, 333; note, 333; a resolution to rescind passed, 630.

Treasury Notes.—In the Senate, a bill to authorize the issue of, reported, 351; motion to make the amount ten millions, 359; is it the object of the Government to force the conversion of the sums in the banks into metal, to be deposited in the treasury? 359; the object of issuing treasury notes was to anticipate the funds in deposit with the banks, until Congress should say how they should be made available, 359; not to be used as bank notes unless the law should authorize them to be so used, 359; but the States would have taken the bank notes, 359.

Mr. Calhoun's views on the first and second bank, 360; reasons for opposition to a reunion with banks, 360; influence of Government endorsement on bank notes, 360; causes which have led to the present state of things, 361; tariff act of 1828, 361; renewal of the charter of the Bank of England, 361; other causes, 362; the question of relief, 362; Government can do but little, 362; should set an example of liberal indulgence, 363; we have arrived at a remarkable era, 363; days of encroachments, tariffs, surpluses, &c., past, 363; "I move off under the direction of the State rights banner," 363; history of that party, 363; amendments offered, 363.

Missapprehensions respecting this bill, 364; two classes of treasury notes, 364; notes for investment, 364; notes for currency, 364; character of the proposed notes, 364; the bill denounced as the germ of a new national debt, 365; the policy of issuing treasury notes in time of peace, 365; no interest should be allowed, 365.

The Government has an extensive domain, 365; interest would cause them to be taken to Europe, 366; an injurious effect would be produced on the price of cotton if they bore interest, 366; motion to strike out the allowance of interest, 366; the object is to make the notes equal to gold and silver, 366; this matter of interest should be left to the discretion of the Secretary, 366; amendment rejected, 367; bill ordered to be engrossed, 367; passed, 367.

In the House, a bill to authorize the issue of, reported, 463; a bill for the issue of, considered, 497; the Senate has no right to send a money bill to this House, 497; this is a money bill, 497; such objection too late, 498; it is a mere anticipation of the receipt of revenue, 498; House bill taken up, 498; condition of the treasury, 498; these notes denounced as paper money, 498; amendments proposed, 499; not bear interest, 499; object of the Committee of Ways and Means, 499.

Views of General Jackson on this bill, 503; objections to the bill, 503; commencement of a new national debt, 503; our mode of raising money invites extravagance, 504; extracts from the opinions of others, 504; are we prepared to run over again a career of improvidence, 504; what is the fund looked to for the redemption of these notes, 504; prophecy of the message that under a State charter the bank would prove stronger than ever, 505; complaint that the Pennsylvania institution did not continue to pay specie, 505; the word divorce, is to reconcile us to every evil, 506; unnecessary as a revenue measure, 506; other objections, 507.

The bill is indirect and deceptive, 508; already passed a bill to postpone the fourth instalment, 508; Congress no power to issue treasury notes, 508; the rate of interest is left to the Secretary, 508; earnestness of the friends of the measure calculated to excite surprise, 509; the commencement of a permanent and most perilous system, 509; a great change come over our national affairs, 509.

Objected that no rate of interest is fixed, 509; objected that the issue is unconstitutional, 510; the present embarrassments have not arisen from what may be called general distress, 510; objected that the bill is deceptive, 510.

Called upon to increase the burdens of the people, 511; did the people expect such language from those to whose interests they have shown so much devotion? 511; should commence the remedy where the evils originated, 511; let the treasury continue in want of funds, 512; only practicable relief, a Government loan, 512.

This bill well calculated to afford relief, 512; nothing to do with providing a currency other than the constitution literally mentions, 518.

A partial and restricted measure which furnishes a hard currency to the Government but not to the people, 518; a measure for the emission of ten millions of paper currency, 518; nothing will do to resort to the extraordinary and dangerous resource of treasury notes, 514; a scheme for the establishment of a national bank, 514.

No doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to issue these notes, 514; value of the notes four per cent. better than bank paper in the market, 515; in what form will these notes be most beneficial to the public? 516; amendment moved, 516.

Effects of a debased and disordered currency, 516; fearful this is the first stage of the disorder, 517; pass this bill and the Government is made independent of the people, 517; founded on a pretext utterly unfounded, 517; a much better way to supply the deficiency, 518; compel the Government to recognize the only circulating medium in the country, 518.

Is it not conceded that the treasury is nearly exhausted? 519; called an incipient step towards a treasury bank, 519; bill passed, 520; a bill to authorize the issue of, reported, 661; object of this bill is to give the treasury full benefit of the act of October, 666; resources of the treasury were ample, but the public creditors unable to meet their engagements, 666; treasury notes were objectionable because they were unproductive, and always would be depreciated, 667; the present issue compared to continental money, 667; this method adopted in order to prevent a pressure on the merchants, 667; bill passed, 668; motion to reconsider, 668; a partial issue of notes and the remainder by loan the best course, 668; motion to reconsider lost, 669.

In the Senate, the House bill considered, 669; scarcely twenty-four hours since the bill came here, and the question is on ordering it to a third reading, 669; other less objectionable modes of raising means might be resorted to, 669; bad policy to get into the habit of raising money by such means, 669; it is said there is no imminent necessity for passing this bill, 670; it is said, the bill is not broad enough to accomplish its object, 670; it is said, there are no statements of the condition of the treasury, 670; standing of the notes in the market, 671; much has been said about the advocates of a paper system, 671; this bill will not have the effect to reverse the act of October, 671; the Government bound to pay its creditors in legal currency, 672; fallacy of supposing bank notes equal to gold and silver, 672; it is recommended the notes be sold for money, 672; the present question is a very simple one, 672; if treasury notes are really below par it might be easily explained, 673; treasury notes can never be at the established rates according to law, 673; I am asked if I would sell these notes for money and have it in specie, 674; the example of the three farmers, 674; a fiction to consider bank notes equivalent to specie, 674; it is said bank notes are not credit, 674; it is thought impossible to keep bank notes at par with gold and silver, 675; under the resolution of 1816, every thing was passed to the credit of the United States as cash, 675; the doctrine of State rights tends to a government paper, 675.

Give assent in no shape and no form to the establishment of the repudiated continental system of paper money, 676; this mode of raising money leads to extravagant issues, 676.

These notes equal to specie in the market, 676; the Government embarrassed, not by its own acts, 676; the system of extravagance which formerly found so much favor with the opposition, 677; the misrepresentations which have been made, 677; how the treasury came to be out of money, 677; the distribution act did not contribute to the suspension of the banks, 678; necessity of the deposit act, 678; the withdrawal of the funds from the banks is said to have been the cause of suspension, 678; bill read third time, 679; in the Senate the bill passed, 758. See Index, vol. 5.
